A

OF THE HOLY BIBLE.

K

THE letter K. answers to the Hebrew ק koph; and sometimes to צ *cap*h, also. Many words which might be expected under K, may be sought under C, according to their sounds, independent of their mode of spelling.

KABZEEL, קבצאל, congregation of God; from קבצ kabatz, to assemble, and אל el, God. A city in the southern part of Judah, Joshua xv. 21. called Jekabseel, Nehem. xi. 25.

KADESH, קדש, holy, or holiness. Num. xx. 22.

[1. The name of a wilderness, Gen. xx. 1. which appears to be the same as that called the Wilderness of Pharan, Numb. xiii. 26. and Numb. xxiii. 36. the desert of Tzin.

Simon thinks that Kadesh implies a sacred place, or Asylum; and he refers it to two cities:

1. In the desert of Pharan, Numb. xiii. 26. which he thinks is the same as Kadesh-Barnea, Numb. xxxiv. 4. Deut. i. 2. 19. ii. 14. Judith, v. 14.

2. On the confines of Edom, Numb. xx. 16. in the desert of Tzin; or, as Hiller thought, itself was named Tzin. Numb. xxvii. 14. xxxiii. 36. Vide Reland, Palestine, lib. i. cap. 25. Lightfoot, Cent. Chor. cap. 7. and Leuckfeldus in Bunting, Itiner. Bibl. P. 1. note 137.

There has been an undue reluctance of giving this name, Kadesh, to places and towns. In my opinion it is equivalent to the title sacred (ιερα), which we find very frequently on medals; it might be given originally by the former inhabitants of these cities, and adopted by the Hebrews after their conquest. Yet, probably, we have an instance of this appellation being added to a place, in Meribah-Kadesh; which is written, "Meribah," simply, Numb. xx. 13. but "Meribah in Kadesh," chap. xxvii. 14. or rather, as in Deut. xxxii. 51. "Meribah-Kadesh:" It is written in the plural Meriboth-Kadesh, Ezek. xlvii. 19. xlviii. 28. Why was this place called by the additional name of Kadesh? Very likely, because here had been a Divine appearance; and wherever the Divinity appeared, the place was considered as holy: and if El Paran was adjacent to Kadesh, then we see how this place might obtain the name of Kadesh (holy), because here the Divine Presence appeared to reprove Israel, and gave them directions to turn by the way of the Red Sea, and to quit the confines of the promised land, to which they were now approaching; as appears by their attack on the Canaanites, and their being repulsed to Hormah. Numb. xiv. 45. Deut. i. 46. Vide KADESH.

I believe that this remark may be applied to explain Numb. xx. 1. "the congregation came to Kadesh," i. e. to Meribah-Kadesh, not Kadesh, simply; nor Kadesh-Barnea, or near it; for hither the Israelites did not come, most certainly, in the first month, from any assignable period with which we are acquainted. This, indeed, is what the sacred writer observes, ver. 13. "This is the water of Meribah, because Israel strove with the Lord," &c. But the Kadesh in the next verse seems to be a Kadesh much nearer to Edom than Meribah was; for, from Mount Sinai, or Rephidim, i. e. Meribah-Kadesh, Moses could have little inducement, or opportunity, to send any message to Edom. Moreover, from Meribah-Kadesh, Israel could not journey to Mount Hor, ver. 22. and again, from Mount Hor, by the way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom, chap. xxi. 4. but, from Kadesh, i. e. El Paran, to Mount Hor, was a short distance, and from Mount Hor, by the way of Egypt, was much the same as from Kadesh, by the way of Egypt; a course which we know was actually taken by the Israelites. Kadesh is described as "a city in the utmost of the borders of Edom," chap. xx. 16. and from hence was this message of Moses sent. I suppose it was on the west of Edom.

This remark has great influence on the question, whether certain miracles were twice performed during the journey of the Israelites in the desert; the title Kadesh having been taken as the name of a place, when, in fact, it was only an honorary addition.

It is probable that Kadesh-Barnea was not the Kadesh west of Edom, but was distinguished from it by the name of Barnea, and was separated from it by some considerable portion of Mount Seir, or of Hor, which of course lay between them; Kadesh-Barnea being east (and probably, also, south) of Kadesh.

Whether any Kadesh were in the land of Moab, properly speaking, may be doubted; and there seems to be a confusion crept into the history, by an incorrect appropriation of this name, or title.

Kadesh-Barnea, in the Jewish interpreter Onkelos, is Rekem Giaheh; in Jonathan, Rekem Gioheh. Rekem, says Rab. Nissim, is on the east; meaning of the land of Israel.

This eastern Rekem seems to be that of the desert of Zin. Numb. xx. 1.

Kadesh-Barnea was in the desert of Paran (or Faram, vide PARAN). Numb. xii. 16. xiv. 1. In Kadesh-Barnea the Israelites encamped many days. Deut. i. 46. Kadesh-Barnea was the southern border of the land. Numb. xxxiv. 4. Josh. xv. 3. Such is the opinion of Lightfoot: the reader will compare it with that already given, which supposes another Kadesh, distinct from this.]

KADESH-BARNEA, קדש-ברנע, holiness of the inconstant son; from קדש kadesh, בר bar, a son, and נוך nuah, who moves about: otherwise, holiness of the corn, or of purity, and בר bar, or ברר barar, pure, corn.

KADESH, or KADESH-BARNEA, otherwise the fountain of judgment. Gen. xiv. 7. At Kadesh, Miriam died. Numb. xx. 1. Here Moses and Aaron, distrusting God's power, when they smote the rock at the waters of strife, were appointed to die; without the satisfaction of entering the promised land. Numb. xxvii. 14. The king of Kadesh was killed by Joshua. Josh. xii. 22. This city was given to Judah: it was about eight leagues south from Hebron.

It is, perhaps, the Cadytis, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 5. whose situation he thus describes. "The country of the Syrians, called Palestine, reaches from Phœnicia, to the mountains of Cadis. Now Cadis [or Cadytis,] is a city, in my opinion, not much less than Sardis. From Cadis, the trading places which lie upon the sea, as far as the city Jenysus, belong to Arabia; and from Jenysus to the lake Sirbon, they again belong to Syria." Palestine extends therefore from Phœnicia, which ends about mount Carmel, to the mountains of Kadesh-Barnea, south: From Kadesh to Jenysus (a place quite unknown to us) the maritime places belong to the Arabians; and from Jenysus to the lake Sirbon they again belong to the Palestines, or Syrians of Palestine. This seems to be pretty clear. Herodotus in another place, lib. ii. says, that Nechos king of Egypt, having attacked the Syrians at Magdolum, defeated them, and took Cadytis from them, which is a large city in Syria. Some believe that he refers to the battle between Necho and Josiah king of Judah, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. fought at Megiddo, which has some resemblance to Magdolum. Scaliger was of this opinion. Others have thought, that Cadytis signified Jerusalem, called Cadyta or Cadyscha, q. d. the holy city. But we do not read in Scripture, that Necho took this city, either before, or after his expedition to Carchemish. We were of opinion formerly, that the Cadys of Herodotus, is Kadesh, or Kedesh of Naphtali, in Upper-Galilee, which Necho might have taken after his victory over Josiah at Megiddo, near the foot of mount Carmel. His way to Carchemish, on the Euphrates, lay in the neighbourhood of Kedesh of Naphtali.

[It is certain, from Scripture, notwithstanding our author's doubts, that after the battle of Megiddo, Necho did take Jerusalem; for he was there when he made Jehoiakim king. And although there is no mention of the name of Kadytis, in scripture or in Josephus, yet that it was so called by the Syrians and Arabians in Herodotus's time, appears certain; since by them and by all the eastern nations, it is to this day called by this name, or by one of the same origin and import. Jerusalem is a name as strange to them, as Kadytis is to us. They call it Al-kuds, which signifies the same as Kadytis, 'The Holy.' The inscription on the Jewish shekels was Jerusalem Kedushah, whence the neighbouring nations called it Kedushah, in the Syriac dialect Kedutha; Herodotus giving it a Greek termination, called it Kadytis. See Prid. Connect. &c. Part 1. Book I.] Vide FRAGMENT, No. LIV.

[This name still continues: says Chateaubriand, Travels

Travels, Vol. I. p. 385. Lond. 1811. "All at once, at the extremity of the plain, I perceived a line of Gothic walls, flanked with square towers, and the tops of a few buildings peeping above them. At the foot of this wall appeared a camp of Turkish horse, with all the accompaniments of Oriental pomp... El Cods! "The Holy City!" exclaimed the guide"—From El Cods! Herodotus might easily make Cadys, or Cadytis.]

KADMIEL, קדמאל, the antiquity of God; from קדם kedem, antiquity, and אל el, God: or the God of the east, or God is my rising, or east. One of the children of Hodoviah, who returned from Babylon. Ezra. ii. 40.

KADMONITES, קדמוני, ancient, first men, orientals; from קדם kedem.

KADMONITES, Gen. xv. 19. ancient inhabitants of the promised land, descended from Canaan son of Ham. Their habitation was east of the Jordan, about mount Libanus. The celebrated Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Boeotia, has been conjectured to have been originally a Kadmonite, and his wife Hermione to have been named from mount Hermon. The Kadmonites were Hivites; the word Hivites is derived from a root which signifies a serpent. Fable says, that Cadmus sowed serpents' teeth, from which sprung up armed men; because he settled at Thebes, his Hivites, or Kadmonites, who were valiant and martial [rather, the name of his tribe was serpent.]

[It is most likely that this name expresses the situation of the people, Easterns: we may, therefore, I think, safely place them either on the east of Judea, adjoining the Dead Sea, or east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab. Possibly both ideas may be true: they residing, before the formation of the Dead Sea, west of the Jordan; after that event, east of their former establishment.]

KADUMIM, old, or before others, or oriental: otherwise, the old, or eastern sea, or fires, or lowness of waters. The name of a brook. Judg. v. 21.

[Simon thinks this word denotes processions; meaning in which some take precedence, go before, take the lead of others. If this name may be derived from processions in consequence of victory, then it may relate to the victory obtained by the Israelites, Judges v. 21. which, being on the banks of the Kishon, might give an additional name to that stream.

Sebastian Smith thinks this brook takes the lead in rapidity; such being the import of the Arabic root. Others think, "the brook of accidents." The Chaldee renders, "by which were done wonders and victories."

This river is called in our version, "that ancient river, the river Kishon:" but as rivers are of equal age, and the Kishon is of no great magnitude, not navigable, perhaps it is properly a term of description, that hasty river, which rushes before others; or of honour, that river which deserves preference in dignity, because of its assistance, &c.]

KAIN, קין, Eciv, possession, from קנא kanah, whence מִקְנָה mikanah, purchase, enjoyment: otherwise, a nest; from קנן kinen. The name of a city. Josh. xv. 57.

KAIN, father of the Kenites. Num. xxvi. 22. See KENITES.

KALENDS, the first day of the month, according to the style of the Latins. [It was a custom among the Romans, for the high-priests to call together the people on the day of the calends (whence the name of Calends, a calando plebem), and instruct them in the sacred duties to be performed in that month. Macrobius. i. Saturnal.] The Greeks had no kalends; hence proverbially and illasively people are referred—to the Greek kalends; i. e. to an unknown and uncertain time. The Hebrews observed particular ceremonies on the first day of every month. See NEOMENIA, which is analogous in Greek to Kalends.

KALLAI, קלל, Καλλαι, to be nimble; from קלל kalal: otherwise, roasted; from קלל kalah: otherwise, my voice; from קול kol, a voice, and the pronoun my. A man's name, Nehem. xii. 20.

KANNA, or Canna, see CALAMUS.

[KANAH, a reed, or rush.

1. Kanah, a brook, i. e. "reed brook," on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh. Josh. xvi. 6. xvii. 9.

2. A city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28. where, most probably, canes or reeds, grew in abundance.

3. Another Kana is Cana in lower Galilee. John ii. 1. 11. iv. 46.]

KAPHARSALAMA, Καφαρσαρμα, field, or city of peace; from כפר caphar, and שלום shalom, peace. A city, 1 Macc. vii. 31.

KARAITES, a sect of Jews, which adheres to the literal sense of Scripture. See CARAITES.

KARKAA, קרקא, to cover, or, covering against the cold; from קרם karam, covering, and קרח karach, cold: otherwise, a beam; from קרן jakah, to suspend. [The floor, or pavement; either because the town was paved in part, or in whole, or it was level as a pavement.]

KARKAA, a town on the confines of the tribe of Judah, southward. Josh. xv. 3. Eusebius places a castle called Carcaria, at the distance of a day's journey from Petra.

KARKOR, a full collection (of men). Very probably a place where men were wont to assemble; and convenient for that purpose. Judges viii. 10.

KARNION, Καρνιον, the horn, from קרן keren: perhaps, the same as Carnaim. 2 Macc. xii. 21.

KARTAH, קרתא, city, from קרת kereth: or occasion, lecture, lesson, meeting; from קרא kara, to call, to read. A city, Josh. xxi. 32.

In Numidia was a town named Cirta, or Cirtha,

KARTAN, קרתן, city, vocation, &c. see Kartah: otherwise, which causes cold; from קרר karar, cold. A city, Josh. xxi. 32.

[Supposed to be the same as Kiriathaim, No. 2. in Napthali. This termination, in the Chaldee and Arabic, implies duality. Probably there is an ellipsis in pronouncing this name q. d. Kiriathan.]

KASBON, Κασβών, a city, 1 Macc. v. 36. The same as Heshbon.

KASIB or Kasbi, a city of Judah. Gen. xxxviii. 5. See CASBI.

[KATTATH, or CATETH, a torch, or contention. The limit of the tribe of Zebulon. Josh. xix. 15. In Judg. i. 30, called KITHRON, which is the same in sense. The Vulgate, LXX. Syriac, and Arabic, render these names, which are from the same root, by small, trifling, insignificant things: the Chaldee to the same effect; whence the name of this city, perhaps, might be analogous to our name little-town, Littleton.]

KEDAR, קדר, blackness, or sorrow. Isa. xvi. 7.

[1. A region in the desert of the Agarenes. Gen. xxv. 13. 1 Chron. i. 29.

2. A city, as some think, called by Josephus Camala. Isa. xlii. 28. lx. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 21. Psa. cxx. 5. Jer. ii. 10. xlix. 28.

"Black and all Black," says Simon: but Bernard thinks the Arabic root imports, virtue, power, dignity. Perhaps this name expresses "sun-burnt;" deeply tanned (not properly jet-blackness) and may describe a situation parched by heat, which we know was the character of many places in the country in and around Judea.]

KEDAR, son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13. the father of the Kedarenians, mentioned by Pliny, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Nabathæans in Arabia Deserta. These people living in tents, it is not possible to shew the place of their habitation, because they often changed it.

Arabia-Deserta is sometimes called in Scripture Kedar; but the Kedarenians dwelt principally in the south of Arabia-Deserta, or the north of Arabia-Petræa: there were some, as far as the Red Sea. Cant. i. 5. Jerem. xlii. 11.

KEDEM. קדם, a Hebrew word, generally translated East. It is said, Gen. xi. 1, 2, the sons of Noah—departed from the East, and came into the land of Shinar. Here difficulties have been raised; for the land of Shinar is not west of Armenia, where the ark rested, as has been thought: and Armenia is not east of the land of Shinar, i. e. Babylonia. On the contrary, we are sure it is north of that country. To solve these difficulties, interpreters have imagined different explanations of this passage.

Some by Kedem have understood the country afterwards peopled by Kedemah, the youngest son of Ishmael: as Capellus, apud Boch. Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 7. Others render, the beginning; supposing Moses intended to note the time, at which, after the deluge, men spread themselves in different countries. Others, Bochart. loc. cit. that Moses spoke according to the custom of the Assyrians, who called their provinces beyond the Tigris, Kedem or East; and those on this side that river, Arab or West. Drusius, instead of they departed from the East, translates, they departed eastward: [and this seems to be the import of the passage by the use of the word Kedem in other places, as Gen. ii. 8. a garden in Eden eastward—and thus the idolatrous Jews are described, Ezek. viii. 16. with their backs toward the temple of the Lord, and their faces toward the east, worshipping the solar light toward the east, i. e. the rising sun: as the Gaurs, or Gabres, in Persia and India do to this day. Nevertheless, this is not the only sense in which Kedem may be taken.]

It appears from many places in the Old, and in the New Testament, that the sacred writers called the provinces beyond the Tigris and Euphrates (Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Persia), Kedem, or the East. Moses, who was educated in Egypt, and lived long in Arabia, might probably follow that custom. Especially as Babylonia, Chaldæa, Susiana, Persia, much of Mesopotamia, and the rivers of Euphrates and Tigris, are for the greater part of their course east of Palestine, Egypt, and Arabia.

Beside this, as those who came from Armenia, Syria, Media, and Upper Mesopotamia, entered Palestine and Egypt on the east side, it was sufficient to warrant the Hebrews in saying, that these people lay east of them. Lastly, these countries were known among the Hebrews under the name of the East, as appears by the following passages. Numb. xxiii. 7. Balaam says, Balak king of Moab had brought him from the mountains of the East; i. e. from Pethor on the Euphrates. Isaiah says, xli. 2. that Abraham came from the East into the land of Canaan: we know he came from Mesopotamia and Chaldæa. The same prophet says, xlii. 11. that Cyrus should come from the East against Babylon: and in chap. ix. 12. he places Syria east of Judæa. Daniel says, xi. 44. Antiochus should be troubled with news of a revolt of the Eastern provinces; i. e. the provinces on the other side of the Euphrates. St. Matthew says, that the wise men who came to worship Jesus, came from the East. Matt. ii. 1.

All this confirms the opinion, that in the scripture style, the East is often used for the provinces which lie easterly though perhaps inclining to the north of Judæa and of Egypt. [And those who worshipped the rising sun must in some part of his course, i. e. in Midsummer, have seen him rise considerably considerably to the north of the east: yet nobody would scruple to say he rose in the east, or eastward; which strengthens this idea.]

KEDEMAH, קדמא, or Kedem, oriental; from קדם kedem, the East.

KEDEMOTH, קדמות, antiquity, old age: from קדם kedem: otherwise, orientals: from קדמין kademim. Probably this might be expressed in English by "old town."

KEDEMOTH, a town of Reuben, east of the brook Arnon, Josh. xiii. 18. One of the stations of the Hebrews in the wilderness, Deut. ii. 26. given to the sons of Merari, the Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 79.

[We have also a Kedemoth, Ezek. xxxvi. 11. which Cellarius, in his Ancient Geography, tom. ii. page 660. thinks was so called from its eastern situation.]

[KEDESH, holiness. This is the same word as KADESH, and I know not of any competent authority for spelling it differently.

1. A city in Judah. Josh. xv. 23.

2. A city in Napthali. Josh. xii. 22. xix. 37. xxi. 32. Judg. iv. 6, 9. 1 Chron. vi. 61.

3. A city in Issachar, 1 Chron. vi. 57. thought to be called Kishion. Josh. xix. 20. xxi. 28.

It is probable, as observed on KADESH, that cities whose names imply holiness, were qualified as sacred, set apart, separated; and we find many which on their medals assume this distinction. As they were so entitled by their inhabitants, who prided themselves on this character, we may suppose that the sacred writers took such titles as they found them; and reported them—not as admitting any real holiness in those cities, but as their common appellation.]

KEDESH NAPTHALI. Josephus calls it Cadesa or Cædesa, and the Greek of Tobit, i. 2. Cadis: [almost the same in sound as the Cadytis of Herodotus.] It lay in Upper Galilee above Naasson, having Sephet to the left, or north. Kedesh was given to Napthali, and afterwards ceded to the Levites of Gershom's family, Joshua xix. 37.; it was a city of refuge, Joshua xx. 7.

KEHELATHAH, קהלאת, Μακελλάθ, assembly; from קהל kahal, to assemble.

KEHELATHAH, an incampment of Israel in the wilderness; Num. xxxiii. 22. [As it appears to denote "THE place of assembly," some have thought the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram happened here.] Probably the same as Keilah, a town south in Judah.

KEILAH, קל"ה, she that divides, or cuts.

[Some think refuge, strong hold, placed on high, as in a rock, from the Arabic root of that import, implying a castle on the summit of a hill. It was a walled town, as appears from 1 Sam. xxiii. 7.]

KEILAH, a town of Judah, Joshua xv. 44. Eusebius places it seventeen miles from Eleutheropolis, on the side of Hebron: Jerom says, eight miles from Hebron. It is said that the prophet Habbakuk's tomb was shewn there. Sozomen. Hist. lib. viii. cap. 29.

KELAIAH, קליא, Κωλία, the voice of the Lord; from קול kol, a voice, and יהוה jah, the Lord; otherwise, lightness of the Lord, from קלל kalal.

KELITAH, קלית, Κωλίτας, refuge, or retired; from קלל kalat: otherwise, voice that declines; from קול kol, a voice, and נטה natah, to incline.

KELITAH or KELAIAH, a Levite. Ezra x. 23.

KEMUEL, קמואל, God is risen; from קום kum, to arise, and אל el, God: otherwise, God has raised him.

KEMUEL, third son of Nahor, the father of the Syrians; rather, of Aram. Gen. xxii. 21. He had a son, surnamed "the Syrian," or, "the Aramite;" for the Syrians were really derived from Aram, a son of Shem. Kemuel may have given name to the Kamilites, a people of Syria lying west of the Euphrates. Strabo, lib. xvi.

KEMUEL, son of Shiphthan of Ephraim, a deputy appointed to divide the land. Numb. xxxiv. 24.

KENATH, קנא, purchase, possession; from קנא kanah, or lamentation; from קנן kun.

KENATH, a town of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 42. It was named Nobah, after Nobah an Israelite had conquered it. Nevertheless, it is now known by the name of Kenath. Eusebius says, it is in the Trachonitis, about Bozra. Pliny places it in the Decapolis, lib. v. cap. 18.

KENAZ, קנז, this nest; from קנן kinan, to make a nest, and the pronoun זה, this: otherwise, this lamentation, this possession, this purchase. Father of Othniel and Caleb. Josh. xv. 17. Judg. i. 13. iii. 9, &c.

KENAZ, fourth son of Eliphaz, son of Esau. A duke, or chief, of Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 15.

A city of the Idumeans, or Edomites. Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 42. [The Arabic root signifies game, prey taken in hunting.]

[KENI, the same as Kenite. A region of the Philistine country. 1 Sam. xvii. 10. Judg. i. 16. "The children of the Kenite;" should be, according to LXX. "of Jethro the Kenite."

KENITES, קניז possession, or purchase, or lamentation, or nest; from קנא kanah, ken, kun.

KENITES, a people which dwelt west of the Dead Sea, and extended themselves pretty far into into Arabia-Petræa. Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, and a priest of Midian, was a Kenite; and in Saul's time the Kenites were mingled with the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xv. 6. Although the Kenites were among those people whose lands God had promised to the descendants of Abraham, nevertheless, in consideration of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, all of them who submitted to the Hebrews, were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. The lands of the Kenites were in Judah's lot.

Balam when invited by Balak king of Moab, to curse Israel, stood on a mountain, whence addressing himself to the Kenites, he said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock; nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted until Ashur shall carry thee away captive. Numb. xxiv. 21. The Kenites dwelt in mountains and rocks, almost inaccessible. Ken signifies a nest, a hole, a cave; and Kinnim, in Greek, may be translated Troglodytes: [or Cave-ites]. The Kenites were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar. The Kenites are not mentioned after the time of Saul; but they subsisted, in a mingled state among the Edomites, and other nations of Arabia-Petræa. Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap.

KENIZZITES, ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham. Gen. xv. 19. They dwelt, it is thought, in the mountains south of Judæa. Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, probably took his name from the Kenizzites, among whom he settled.

KEPHA, Kaïpha or Keïpha, or Hepha, a town at the foot of mount Carmel, on the north, opposite Ptolemais, likewise called Sycaminon, the city of wild fig-trees. See SYCAMINON.

KEREM, כֶּרֶם, Anathema. See CHEREM.

KERIOTH, כִּרְיֹת, πόλεις, the cities, the callings. A city, Josh. xv. 25. See KIRIATH.

KEROS, כֶּרוֹס, Κορὸς, who is bent, or made low; from כָּרַס karas: otherwise, buckle or hook, Keres; from the same word, differently read. A Nethinim. Ezra xi. 44.

KESITAH. LXX. Εκατον ἀμνῶν. Vulg. centum Agnis. This word occurs Gen. xxxiii. 19. Josh. xxiv. 13. Job xli. 11. Isa. xxiv. 13. It is translated sheep, or lambs: implying that Jacob bought the field, where he had set up his tents, for the price of a hundred lambs; and that each of Job's friends and relations, after his recovery, made him a present of a lamb or young ewe. But the Rabbins and modern interpreters are generally of opinion, that Kesitah signifies rather a piece of money; for to such a man as Job, a young ewe, seems a present unworthy of the generosity of his friends and relations, and neither adequate to his wants, nor to his and their quality. But may not the same objection be made to Ke- sitah as signifying a piece of money?—unless it were of gold, and of considerable value; for some make it very small. [David Kimchi explains Kesitah by קֶרֶךְ, which signifies no more than the Hebrew gerah, worth an obolos, or less in value than two-pence. The Hebrews had no coin smaller than the gerah, which in the Chaldee is translated mehah. 1 Sam. xi. 37.] Bochart and Eugubinus supposed that the LXX meant minæ, not lambs; in Greek hecaton minôn, instead of hecaton amnôn: now a mina was worth sixty Hebrew shekels, or £6. 17s. sterling. [Or nine pounds English; supposing, as Dr. Prideaux does, a shekel was worth three shillings.] M. Le Pelletier of Roan, is of opinion, that the Kesitah was a Persian coin, stamped on one side with an archer (Kesitah or Keseth, in Hebrew signifies a bow), on the other side a lamb; i. e. a daric, in value about half a guinea. [A daric is a piece of gold worth twenty-five shillings English, says Dr. Prideaux, Conn. Pt. I. p. 101. See DARCONIM.] Several learned men say, the Kesitah was a silver coin, whose impression was a sheep; for which reason the LXX and Vulgate translate it SHEEP. In our opinion, Kesitah was a purse of gold or silver. In the east they reckon at present by purses. A purse in Persia consists of fifty Tomans, which make 2518 penny pieces of French money. The word Kista, in Chaldee, signifies a measure, a vessel; and Eustathius says, Kista is a Persian measure. Jonathan and the Targum of Jerusalem translate Kesitah, a pearl.

KETURAH, קֶטֶרֶת, he that burns, or makes the incense to fume; from קָתַר kathar: otherwise, perfumed, or odoriferous: otherwise, to bind.

KETURAH, Abraham's second wife, Gen. xxv. 1, 2. The Jews say, Keturah and Hagar, whom Abraham, after the death of Sarah, invited again to his house, are the same. Others think, she was a Canaanite. It surprises some, that Abraham, aged a hundred and forty years, should marry a wife, perhaps a Canaanite, and have children by her. Some say, as Austin, that God miraculously prolonged his prolific virtue, in order to his begetting Isaac. Others, that he married Keturah before Sarah's death, as a wife of the second rank; and after Sarah's death, gave her the rank and quality of matron and wife of the first order; that he had children by her, a little after the birth of Isaac, and the expulsion of Hagar. Her sons are Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Abraham gave presents to these, and sent them east in Arabia-Deserta.

KEY. Is an instrument frequently mentioned in scripture, as well in a natural, as in a figurative sense. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were closed generally with bands, and the key served served only to loosen or fasten those bands, in a certain manner. Chardin says, that a lock in the east is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple, and the key is a wooden handle, with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow. See likewise Dandini's Voyage to Mount Libanus. chap. 14. See also the article KEY among the PLATES.

KEY in a moral sense has many significations. Isaiah xxii. 22. And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: He shall open and none shall shut; he shall shut and none shall open. He shall be grand master and principal officer of his prince's house. Christ gives Peter authority in his church, Matt. xvi. 19. the key of the kingdom of heaven, the power of binding and loosing, i. e. of opening and shutting; for this frequently consisted only, as we have said, in tying and untying. Isaiah remarks, that Eliakim should wear his key upon his shoulder, as a mark of office; of his power to open and shut, with authority. These keys were of wood, long and large, as they are at present in the east. Calimachus says, that Ceres carried a key upon her shoulder.

[This custom of carrying a key on the shoulder is very strange to us. The ancients had large keys in the form of a sickle; from their weight and shape, they could no otherwise be carried conveniently, but as we see our reapers carry their sickles. Homer having said, that Penelope took several things out of her store-room, adds, Ἔδωκε δὲ κληῖδ' εὐκαμπία χεῖρι παχύν, καλὴν, χαλκίαν. Κώπη δ' ἰλίφαντος ἰπῆιν.

Odyss. 21.

Whereby he seems to represent, that it required some strength to lift up. For the same reason therefore they were called Κάτωμαδία. See Huet. Demonstr. Evang. Prop. ix. cap. 105.]

Christ reproaches the scribes and pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge, Luke xi. 52. i. e. with reading and studying the scriptures, without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth; which in some sort they held captive in unrighteousness. Rom. i. 18. Christ says, Rev. i. 18. that he has the key of death and hell, i. e. power to bring to the grave, or, to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death. The Rabbins say, that God hath reserved to himself four keys, with which he hath entrusted no one, not even the angels; the key of rain, the key of the grave, the key of fruitfulness, and the key of barrenness.

KEZIA, קֶזְיָא, superficies, or angle; from קֶזַע katzah: otherwise, cassia, an aromatic plant, or kind of perfume; (different from קִידָא kidda, or kadda, Exod. xxx. 24). KEZIA, was the second daughter of Job, after his misfortunes. Job xlii. 14.

KEZIZ, קֶזֶז, end, extremity; otherwise, cut off; from קֶזַע kutz, or קֶזַע katzah, or קֶזַע katzaz, to cut off the extremities.

A valley in Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 21.

[The valley whose shrubs and trees are stunted, cut off without rising to a considerable height. A city of Benjamin which probably gave name to the valley, and might receive its own name from a person, "Short's-town."]

KIBERATH-HAARETZ, Gen. xxxv. 16. xlviii. 7. 2 Kings, v. 19. Jerom in two passages translates it—"spring," verno tempore; and in the third, "the finest season in the year," electo terræ tempore. The LXX keep to the Hebrew word Chaphrata, and join it with Hippodromus, intending perhaps to shew, that Kiberath-Haaretz was the space which a horse run in the Hippodrome, i. e. two furlongs or three hundred paces. Aquila translates it along the ways; others (Chald. Syr. Vatab.), an arm of land; others, the way which a man might go from meal to meal. It is our opinion, that Kiberath is from the Hebrew, Kerab or Kabar, to plough; and that Kiberath-Haaretz signifies a ridge of land, or the length of a piece of ground which two oxen might plough in a day; about half an acre. Jugum vocabatur, says Pliny, quod uno jugo boum in die arari posset. Actus, in quo boves aguntur cum aratro, uno impetu justo. Hic erat CXX pedum; duplicatusque in longitudine jugerum faciebat. Compare Columella. lib. v. cap. 1. Isidor. Origin. lib. xv. cap. 15. See likewise 1 Sam. xiv. 14, where it is said, Jonathan and his armour-bearer killed twenty men, within as it were half an acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough.

KIBEROTH-AVAH or KIBEROTH-HAT-TAAVAH קִבְרוֹת הָאָוָה the graves of lust. Numb. xi. 34, 35. One of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring they were tired with manna. God sent them quails in great quantities, but while the meat was in their mouths, (Psa. lxxviii. 30.) he smote so great a number of them, that the place was called the graves of those who lusted.

KIBZAIM, קִבְצַיִם, the assemblies; from קָבַע kabatz. A city of Ephraim, Josh. xxi. 22.

[This name being in the dual form, it is probable there were two cities comprehended under it, adjoining each other: thought to be also called JOCKMEAM, which has the same meaning.]

KIDRON, קִדְרוֹן, obscurity, obscure; from קָדַר kedar. [Perhaps קִדְרוֹן from the Arabic קִדְר filthy, obscene.] Vide KEDAR.

KIDRON, the brook in the valley east of Jerusalem, between that city and the Mount of Olives. It discharges itself into the Dead Sea: It has generally but little water, and often none:

But

K I K

But after storms, or great rains, it swells, and runs with much impetuosity. Some suppose the name Cedron, or Kidron, came from the abundance of cedars which they fancy were formerly planted on its banks: but there is no proof of this. The name is derived rather from the obscurity of this brook, which runs in a vale; or from the common sewers of the city which empty themselves into it: for a branch of the valley of Kidron, i. e. the southern, was the sink of Jerusalem. The kings Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah burnt there the idols and abominations of the apostate Jews. 2 Kings xxiii. 4.

[As this brook answered the purpose of a drain to the lands around the city of Jerusalem after rains, it possibly might answer the same purpose to some of the suburbs of the city, and receive their underground discharges. Hence, perhaps, its name "black." So a poet of our own characterizes the river Fleet, in London, which not unaptly answers to the brook Kidron at Jerusalem:

Where black fleet Fleet-ditch with disembuging streams, Rolls his due tribute of dead dogs to Thames.

The blood of the sacrifices from the temple ran by a drain into the brook Kidron, and was sold to the gardeners on the Mount of Olives, to manure their gardens with; for which the gardeners paid the price of a trespass-offering. Joma. 58.

Not only the blood poured at the foot of the altar in the temple, but other filth, ran by a drain into the brook Kidron, says Bab. Joma. fol. 58. 2. This effectually confutes the notion of any virtue imparted to the pool of Bethesda from the blood of the sacrifices, as some have supposed.

Maimonides reports that a foot causeway, or a bridge, supported on arches, was erected between the temple and the Mount of Olives, crossing the valley of the brook Kidron. Over this bridge the red cow was led away to be burned, in order to procure the ashes of purification. This was built at the expense of the public treasure, which was in the temple. The intention of this bridge was to preserve from pollution the bearer of this heifer, whose ashes were to be for universal cleansing. A like care was used in regard to the scape goat.

The sheaf of first-fruits was reaped from the ashes valley of the brook Kidron; on the first day of the passover. It was a public service.

As this name has the ṯ, we submit whether it does not refer to Aṯn, "the dark coloured Aun." It imports sun-burnt to darkness of hue, or complexion. 'Can any epithet more justly characterize the Hindoo deity Vishnu ?]

KIKAJON. Jonah iv. 6. Jerom translates Hedera, Ivy. The LXX. Gourd. Aquila, Ivy. Jerom confesses, that ivy does not answer the Hebrew Kikajon; but as he could not find a

K I N

Latin word proper to it, he chose rather to use Hedera, than to leave Kikajon, which might be mistaken for a monstrous animal in the Indies, or mountains of Bœotia. His account of the Kikajon describes it as a shrub which grows in the sandy places of Palestine, and increases so suddenly, that within a few days it rises to a considerable height. The leaves of it are large, and almost like those of the vine. It is supported by its stem, and furnishes a very agreeable shade under the thickness of its leaves.

Modern interpreters almost all agree, that the Hebrew Kikajon signifies the Palma Christi, or Ricinus, in Egypt called Kiki; in Greek, Selticyprion. It is a plant like a lilly, the leaves smooth, scattered here and there, and spotted with black spots: the stem round and glossy: It produces flowers of divers colours. Dioscorides says, that one sort of it grows large like a tree, and as high as a fig-tree. The leaves of it are like those of the plum-tree, though broader, smoother and blacker. The branches and trunk of it are hollow like a reed. Jonah in all probability speaks of this last species. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXVIII.

St. Austin relates, that an African bishop appointed Jerom's translation to be read in the congregation to his people; all who were present were offended, when they heard Ivy named instead of a gourd, which they had been used to hear; and they found it necessary hereupon to consult certain Jews residing in the city, who out of malice or ignorance declared, that the Hebrew signified a gourd: so that the bishop, to appease his people, and prevent their leaving his communion, was forced to say, that Jerom's translation was faulty in this place. Aug. Epist. 71. Hieron. inter Augustin. 75. n. 22.

[KILMAD, or CHILMAD, the wall, or fortification of Media. Supposed by Simon to be a city of Media. Ezek. xxvii. 23.]

KIN or KAIN, קין, Kwîa, possession, purchase; from קנא kanah: otherwise, nest; from קין kinen: otherwise, lamentation; from קן kun. The father of the Kenites, Numb. xxiv. 22.

KINAH, קינה, from the same. A town of Judah, Josh. xv. 22.

KING. The Israelites had no national king till Saul. Before him, they were governed, first, by elders, as in Egypt; then by rulers of God's appointment, as Moses and Joshua; then by judges, as Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, Samuel; lastly, by kings, as Saul, David, Solomon, &c. For the succession of the KINGS, Vide CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

The Jews, after their return from captivity, A. M. 3468, lived under the dominion of the Persians one hundred and four years, till Alexander the Great; who came to Jerusalem, 3672. After his his death, in 381, Judæa submitted to the kings of Egypt; then to the kings of Syria; but, Antiochus Epiphanes having forced the Jews to take arms for the defence of their religion in 3836, the Maccabees recovered by degrees their ancient liberty, and lived independent, from the government of John Hircanus, in 3874, till Judea was reduced into a province by the Romans.

KING, see FRAGMENT, No. CCII. ad. fin.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, an expression used in the New Testament, to signify the kingdom of Jesus Christ; the calling of his people to the faith; the preaching of the gospel. The ancient prophets, when describing the characters of the Messiah, scarcely ever failed of inserting the name of king or deliverer; and when they spoke of his humiliations and sufferings, they interspersed hints of his power, his reign, his divinity. So Zachariah foretelling Christ's entry at Jerusalem: Behold, thy king cometh unto thee. He is just and having salvation, lowly and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass. The Jews and the apostles, accustomed to this way of speaking, expected the kingdom of the Messiah, to resemble that of a temporal king, exercising power on his enemies, restoring the Hebrew monarchy, and the throne of David to all its splendor; subduing the nations, and rewarding his friends and faithful servants, in proportion to their fidelity and services. Hence the contests among the apostles about precedency in his kingdom; and hence the sons of Zebedee desired the two chief places in it. Jesus to prove that he was the true Messiah, declared often, that the kingdom of heaven was come, or was at hand; and when he spoke of what was to happen after his resurrection, he says, such a thing would be seen in the kingdom of heaven. He frequently begun his parables, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto—a rich man—a father of a family—a treasure," &c.

We therefore may observe several acceptations of this phrase—the kingdom of heaven.

1. For the coming of the Son of God, for his temporal birth, his preaching, his manifestation to the world. As Luke xi. 20. If I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. Matthew says, that Jesus Christ went about all the cities and villages preaching the gospel of the kingdom.

2. To shew the vengeance which God would exercise on the impenitent Jews; and which accordingly he did exercise after the death of our Saviour, on Jerusalem, by the Roman arms, which destroyed that city and the temple, and committed such cruelties, as occasioned the last siege of it to be one of the most lively images of the final judgment. In this sense the kingdom of heaven is taken, Matt. iii. 2. Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. See likewise the parable of the ten virgins, Matt. xxv. 1, 2, 3. also, that of the servants with whom the father of the family left a certain number of talents, to be improved by them. Matt. xxv. 23, 24, &c. The foolish virgins excluded from the wedding, and the unprofitable servant cast into a dungeon, denote the obdurate Jews forsaken by God, and given up to the vengeance of their enemies.

3. For eternal bliss: He who doth the will of the Father which is in heaven, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven. Matt. vii. 21. Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Matt. xix. 14. [This is the interpretation of the passage by the ancients; most moderns refer it to the temporal kingdom of heaven; No. 5.] Matt. vii. 21. viii. 11.

4. To signify the calling of the Gentiles, exclusively of the Jews. Christ having spoken of the centurion's faith, foretells the calling of the Gentiles, and rejection of the Jews in these words: The children of the kingdom shall be cast out. Matt. viii. 12. In the same sense are the parables of the feast to which strangers were called, on the refusal of those friends, who had been previously invited to it. Matt. xxi. 2. Also, that of the husbandmen who drove their master's servants out of the vineyard, and killed his son. Mark xii. 2.

5. Most frequently the church of Christ, the preaching of the gospel; God's conduct towards the elect, in order to bring them to the faith, and afterwards to happiness. In this sense Christ says, the kingdom of heaven is like to a treasure hid in a field, which a man discovers, and purchases at the price of his whole fortune; or unto goodly pearls, for which a merchant gives all that he is worth, Matt. xiii. 44; by this treasure, and these pearls, meaning faith in Jesus Christ. In another place he compares the kingdom of heaven to a field, where tares are found mixed with the good seed,—to a net with which good and bad fish are gathered;—by which is meant the church, that containing always, in this world, good and bad Christians. Matt. xiii. 47, 48. He says frequently, that his reign will begin after his resurrection; that the gospel would be preached then, principally, and his elect called by him to the faith.

The kingdom of God is often synonymous with the kingdom of heaven. But in the Old Testament the kingdom, or reign, of God, signifies his infinite power, his sovereign authority over all creatures, over the kingdoms of the world, over the hearts of mankind. Wisdom says, x. 10. God shewed his kingdom to Jacob: he opened the kingdom of heaven to him in shewing him the mysterious ladder by which the angels ascended and descended; and Ecclesiasticus xlvii. 13, says God gave to David, Testamentum Regni, the co- venant, assurance, or promise of the kingdom for him and his successors.

The kingdom of hell, the kingdom of Satan, signifies either the empire which the Arch-devil exercises over other devils; or that which he exercises over the wicked in this life; or, that which he has over the souls of the wicked, in hell. The book of Wisdom says, i. 14. the kingdom of hell was not on the earth before the sin of the first man, nec infernum regnum in terra. Or according to the Greek, Pluto had not then his royal palace on the earth. Οὐδὲ Ἄδης βασιλεῖον ἐπὶ γῆς: He did not exercise his dominion over mankind. Our Saviour says in the gospel, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself. How then shall his kingdom stand? This he says in answer to the accusation of the Pharisees, who charged him with casting out devils by the power of Beelzebub prince of the devils. He shews the impossibility of this, because it must then be said, that Satan endeavours to destroy his own dominion; that the kingdom of hell is at variance with its own subjects.

KINGS, BOOKS OF. We have four books in our Bibles under this name. Anciently there were but two in the Hebrew bibles, the first called Samuel, the second called Kings or Kingdoms. At present in the Hebrew copies, as well as in the Greek and Latin, there are four books; the two first in the Hebrew called Samuel, the two last Kings. The Greeks cite them all four as the Books of Kingdoms, the Latins as the Books of Kings.

The First Book of KINGS contains the history of a hundred years; from the birth of Samuel A.M. 2849, to the death of Saul, in 2949. It comprizes an account of the birth of Samuel, the war between the Philistines and Hebrews, wherein the ark of the Lord was taken; the death of Eli the high priest, and of his sons Hophni and Phineas; the restoration of the ark by the Philistines; Samuel's being acknowledged judge of Israel; Saul's election to be king, his successful beginning, his wars and victories; his rejection; the anointing of David, his valour, his misfortunes, his flight; the war between the Philistines and Saul, with the death of that prince.

The Second Book of KINGS contains the history of thirty-nine years; from the second anointing of David at Hebron, A.M. 2949, to 2988, wherein David appointed Solomon to be his successor; two years before his death, in 2990. It includes an account of David's being acknowledged king by the tribe of Judah, while the other tribes of Israel obeyed Ishbosheth, son of Saul. Ishbosheth being killed seven years after, in 2956, David was acknowledged king of all Israel. He received the royal unction a third time; took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, brought back the ark from Kirjathjearim to the city of David, defeated the Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, and Edomites, on several occasions. Hanun, king of the Ammonites, having insulted David's ambassadors, this prince made war on Hanun's country, and subjected it. During this war David lived with Bathsheba, and procured the murder of Uriah: Nathan reprov'd him for his adultery and murder; David repented; but God punished him by the rebellion of Absalom. After this contest, wherein his unnatural son perished miserably, David being quiet in his dominions, ordered the people to be numbered. The Lord punished his curiosity with a plague. Lastly, David prepared every thing necessary for the erection of the temple.

The Third Book of KINGS comprises the history of one hundred and twenty-six years, from Solomon's anointing, A. M. 2989, to the death of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, in 3115. It gives an account of Adonijah's aiming at the crown, of Solomon's association in the throne, of David's death, of the deaths of Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei; of the building the temple by Solomon, of his riches, wisdom, reputation, fall, and death; of his son Rehoboam's alienating the minds of the Israelites, of the separation of the ten tribes, and their choice of Jeroboam for their king. Of Rehoboam's successors Abijah, Asa, and Jehoshaphat, who died A.M. 3115. Of Jeroboam's successors Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Omri, Tibni, Ahab, and Ahaziah, who died in 3108.

The Fourth Book of KINGS includes the history of two hundred and twenty-seven years; from the death of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the beginning of Jehoram in 3115, to the beginning of the reign of Evilmerodach king of Babylon, who delivered Jechoniah out of prison in 3442.

In the kingdom of Judah we find a few pious princes among many who were corrupt. Jehoshaphat was succeeded by Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, Joash, Amaziah, Uzziah, otherwise Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon, Josiah, Jehoahaz, Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, Jechoniah, or Jehoiachin, Mattaniah, or Zedekiah, in whose reign Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans, the temple was burnt, and the people were carried to Babylon, A. M. 3416. After this we read of the sad death of Gedaliah, whom the Chaldeans had left in the country to govern the remains of the people, the retreat of this people into Egypt, and the favour shewn by Evilmerodach, king of Babylon to Jehoiachin or Jechoniah king of Judah, whom he took out of prison, and placed in his palace.

In the interval God raised up many prophets in Judah; as Iddo, Ahijah, Shemaiah, Hanani, Asariah, Jehu, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zephaniah, Huldah, Micaiah, Micaiah, Joel, &c. The fourth book of Kings has preserved several particulars of the lives of these great men, as well as of the prophets who lived at the same time in the kingdom of Israel, or the ten tribes.

This book presents a long succession of wicked princes in the kingdom of Israel; Ahaziah, Jehoram son of Ahab, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam, Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekaiiah, Pekah, Hosea, son of Elah, in whose reign Samaria was taken by Salmanezer; and the ten tribes carried captive into Assyria. Several eminent prophets are named during this interval in the kingdom of the ten tribes: Iddo, Oded, Ahijah, Elisha, Hosea, Amos, Jonah, &c.

As to the author of the four books of Kings, the world is not agreed. Many ascribe the two first to Samuel, whose name we read in the titles of these books, in the Hebrew. The Jews allow him only twenty-seven chapters in the first book, which include the history of his life, and a recital of the actions of Saul and David, while Samuel was living. The rest they believe was continued by Gad and Nathan, according to 1 Chron. xxix. 29. Now the acts of David the king, first and last, behold they are written in the book of Samuel, the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer. This opinion is very probable; but it labours under great difficulties, since we find certain remarks, which do not properly belong to the time of Samuel, or the time of Nathan: e. gr. it is said, 1 Sam. iii. 1. that while Samuel was living, Prophecy was rare in Israel; which intimates, that when the author wrote, it was more frequent. 1 Sam. xiv. 23. Bethel is called Bethaven, or "the House of Iniquity;" a name not given to it till Jeroboam had set up one of his golden calves there.

The author observes likewise on David's invading the Geshurites and Gezrites, that this country of old was well peopled, from Shur even unto the land of Egypt, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. i. e. it was so in David's time, but not when the author was living. 1 Sam. ix. 9. They who formerly were called seers, were in his time termed nabi or prophets: now in Samuel's time the name of seer was common; the author, therefore of these books is later than that prophet. He speaks of Samuel as of a person dead long before, and praises him. 1 Kings xii. 15. He observes that the city of Ziklag belonged to the kings of Judah, ever since the cession of it by Achish to David, 1 Sam. xxvii. 6. This remark must have been made after the separation of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel; consequently the writer lived not only after Samuel, but after David and Solomon.

From several other observations of this nature, some have concluded, that David, Hezekiah, Jeremiah, or Ezra, compiled these books from memoirs composed in the time of Samuel and the prophets, of David and Solomon; and if we compare the different characters of these two books, we shall on one side see that circumstances, facts, and remarks, are mostly the same. The uniformity of the style, and the course of the narration, prove likewise, that they both had one author, and he contemporary with the persons of whom he speaks: but on the other side, there are circumstances, which support the opinion, that a later writer revised them, and added some particulars, and certain terms, intended to explain what the distance of time had rendered obscure. Now, if we suppose that Ezra, an inspired author, had in his hands original writings of Samuel, and the ancient writers of Saul and David's times, that he digested them into order, and connected them, all difficulties are easily solved, and the seeming contradictions are reconciled.

That these works are authentic and canonical it is not disputed; both the Jewish and the Christian church unanimously receive them as inspired Scripture; and Christ quotes them in the gospel. Matt. xii. 2. Mark ii. 25. Luke vi. 3.

There are much the same difficulties with relation to the author of the third and fourth books of Kings, and the time when they were composed. Some have imagined that David, Solomon, and Hezekiah, wrote the history of their own reigns. Others, that the prophets took this office on them, who lived under their government, in Israel and Judah, as Isaiah and Jeremiah, Gad, and Nathan. We know that several of the prophets wrote the lives of those kings who reigned in their times; and the names and writings of these prophets are mentioned in several places of the books of Kings and Chronicles. Besides, the memoirs and annals of the kings of Judah and Israel are cited almost in every chapter, and these included the particulars of those princes' actions, whereof the Sacred Books have handed down only summaries, and abridgements.

It must be confessed therefore, that two descriptions of writers were concerned in the Books of Kings. (1) Those original, primitive and contemporary authors, who wrote the annals, journals, and memoirs of their own times; from which the matter and substance of our sacred history has been formed; and from which the authors who came afterwards have taken what they record. These ancient memoirs have not descended down to us, but were certainly in the hands of those sacred penmen, whose writings are in our possession, since they cite them, and refer to them: but (2) Who compiled and digested these ancient writings? and when did they live?

It is generally believed that Ezra is the author [rather Editor] of the Books of Kings, and Chronicles, as we have them at present; the proofs are are these : 1. The author lived after the captivity of Babylon. At the end of the fourth Book of Kings he speaks of the return from that captivity. 2 Kings xxv. 22, 23, &c. 2. He describes the ten tribes as still captive in Assyria, whither they were carried as a punishment for their sins. 3. In the xvii. chapter of the fourth Book of Kings, he introduces reflections on the calamities of Judah and Israel, which demonstrate that he wrote after the event. 4. He refers almost every where to ancient memoirs, which he had before him, and abridged. 5. The author, as far as we are able to judge, was a priest, and very much attached to the house of David. Now all these marks suit well with Ezra, a learned and very inquisitive priest, who lived during the captivity, and after it ; who might have collected an infinite number of documents, which time and the persecutions suffered by the Jews, have deprived us of.

I confess, there are particulars in these books which do not agree with the time of Ezra: he says, that in his time the ark of the covenant was still in the temple; that the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were still subsisting. 1 Kings vi. 1, and 28. 1 Kings viii. 8. 1 Kings xii. 19. He speaks of the months Sif and Bul, names, which in the time of Ezra were no longer in use. He expresses himself throughout as a contemporary, and as a writer, who had witnessed what he wrote. But these may be easily reconciled. Ezra generally transcribes word for word the memoirs which he had in possession. This is a proof of his exactness, his fidelity and honesty. In other places, he inserts reflections or illustrations, which arise naturally from his subject. This shews that he was master of the matter which he had in hand, and that being inspired, he was not afraid of intermixing his own words with those of the prophets, whose writings lay before him. Vide FRAGMENT, CXVI. ad fin.

The King's Rights. The Israelites having desired Samuel to give them a king, as other nations had around them : he replied, such a king will exercise various prerogatives : " He will take your sons to guide his chariots," &c. 1 Sam. viii. 11. Consult the passage.

It is questioned whether Samuel only predicted what would happen to the Israelites from their king ; or whether he declared the real privileges of a king, and the lawful use of his royal authority: commentators for the most part think, that the prophet describes in what manner the prince would abuse his power, and what would be his excessive pretensions, rather than the just and legal exercise of his rights. See Grotius De jure Belli & Pacis, lib. 1. cap. 1. & cap. 4 ; Art. 3. & 4, and Schicardus de Jure Regni.

KINGS of the FEAST. Vide ARCHITRICLINUS.

KINGS. Idolatrous nations, and even the Hebrews, called their gods kings. Moloch, Milchom, Adramelech, and Anamelech, are names of deities importing the title of king. The words of Isaiah xxxvii. 13, Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Henah and Ivah? seem parallel to those of chap. xxxvi. 19, Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim? In Amos i. 15. God threatens Milchom, the god of the Moabites, with sending him and his princes into captivity. In Scripture God is called in every page almost, the king of the Hebrews.

[KINGS. This word does not always imply the same degree of power, or the same degree of importance: neither does it imply the magnitude of the dominion or territory of this national officer. Many persons are called kings in Scripture, whom we should rather denominate chiefs or leaders; and many single towns, or at most, together with their adjacent villages, are said to have had kings.

Being unaware of this lower sense of the word king, or unwilling to adopt it, many persons have been embarrassed by the passage Deut. xxxiii. 5. " Moses commanded us a law—he was king in Jeshurun"—or king among the upright; i. e. he was the principal among the assembly [in colligendo] of the superiors of the Israelites. (Some refer this to Jehovah). Moses was the chief, the leader, the guide of his people, fulfilling the duties of a king: but he was not king in the same sense as David, or Solomon, was afterwards. This remark reconciles the observation Gen. xxxiv. 31, " These kings reigned in Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel:"—for, Moses, though he was king in an inferior sense, yet did not reign, in the stronger sense, over the children of Israel; the constitution not being monarchical under him.

Moreover, we find, in Joshua, that almost every town in Canaan had its king; and, we know, that the territories of these towns must have been of little extent, because, otherwise, so small a country as Canaan could never have contained thirty-one kings, who being conquered, are enumerated, Josh. xii. 9–24.—beside many kings of the same nature, who, no doubt, escaped the arms of Joshua. Vide Gen. xiv. 9. also Judges ii. 7. where Adonizedek, himself no very powerful king, mentions seventy kings, whom he had subdued and mutilated. In 1 Kings iv. 20. Benhadad and thirty-two kings with him, (i. e. regents in towns under his dominion, tributary allies, kings in the lower, perhaps even, in the lowest sense of the word,) are mentioned.

xviii. 14. "the king of terrors" i. e. death; the ruler, the supreme of terrors: so chap. xli. 34. "the Leviathan is king, i. e. chief, principal, superior, over all the children of pride."—those who most pride themselves on their stations, or qualities, are nevertheless compelled to acknowledge, that the Leviathan is their superior; and to refrain from comparing, or equalling, their powers to those of that tyrant of the waters.

KING is also used figuratively by our Lord, John xviii. 37. Pilate said, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answered, "Thou sayest—thou expressest what is the fact; I am a king;"—but not of this world. Accordingly, Rev. i. 15. we read, Jesus Christ the prince of the kings of the earth—i. e. superior to all earthly monarchs.—1 Tim. i. 17. "The king eternal, immortal," &c. vi. 15. "Our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed and only potentate: King of kings and Lord of lords."—Vide also Rev. xvii. 14. and FRAGMENTS, No. CCII. ad fin.

N.B. This application of the title "king" to Jesus Christ, subjected the primitive Christians to many inconveniences; as appears among other places, from Acts xvii. 7. where they are accused of acting "contrary to the decree of Cæsar, saying, there is another king, one Jesus."

KING signifies government, such as a king usually exercises; even though it be not conducted under one person, Rev. xvii. 10. "There are, (rather, have been) seven kings—forms of government; five are fallen—one is; the other is not come"—so ver. 12.]

KINNERETH, or Cinnireth, a lake. See TIBERIAS.

KINOTH, קִנּוּת, lamentations, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. The Septuagint translate it θρήνοι.

[KIR, a wall, a BRICK building. A city of Moab. Isaiah xv. 1. Simon thinks this name is fully written, Kir heres, "the wall of baked brick." Isaiah xvi. 11. Jer. xlviii. 31. 36.

There is another Kir, part of Albania and Media, where flows the river Kyrus. 2 Kings xvi. 9. Isaiah xxii. 6. Amos i. 5. ix. 7.

Hiller, in his Onomast. S. p. 527. gives the sense of this name as above: but the learned Scharbau, in Parerg. S. P. iv. p. 57, 58. explains it to import the "city of the sun." That cities may take name from the materials of which they are built, is certain; so Plinthene, "tile town," and Ostracina, "shell town;" cities in Egypt, might be named from the materials with which their streets were paved; as the present Sienna, a university in Italy, is paved with brick, set herring-bone fashion.]

KIR-HARESETH, קִר-הָרֶשֶׁת or קִר-הָרֶשֶׁת, a city. Isaiah xvi. 7. The Vulgate has put the signification for the name, urbs cocti lateris. The word kir signifies a city, and hareth, or cha- resh, or keresh, signifies brick, baked, made, or built.

KIR-HARESHETH. See AREOPOLIS, the capital of Moab.

KIRIATH, קִרְיָת, Πόλις, city; from קִרְיָת kereth: otherwise, vocation; from קָרָא kara, to call: otherwise, lesson, reading, or meeting; from the same, which signifies to read, &c. Spelt, also,

KIRJATH, which equally signifies a city; hence we often meet with it in the names of places.

[KIRIATH, the (two?) cities, or vocations, &c.

1. A city in Judah. Josh. xv. 25.

2. A city of Moab. Jer. xlviii. 24. 41. Amos ii. 2.

3. A city of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28.]

KIRIATHAIM, קִרְיַתַּיִם, Kiriathaim, the two cities, the callings, &c. Kiriathaim in the dual number. A town beyond Jordan, ten miles from Medaba, west. Josh. xiii. 19.

KIRJATHAIM, a city of Naphtali, 1 Chron. vi. 76. [Thought to be the Karthan of Josh. xxi. 32.]

[A city of Moab, or partly in the lot of Reuben, Gen. xiv. 5. Numb. xxxii. 37. Joshua xiii. 19. Jer. xlviii. 1. 23. Ezek. xxv. 9.]

KIRIATH-ARBA, קִרְיַת-אַרְבָּע, Πόλις ἄρβων, the city of four; from Kiriath, and אַרְבַּע arbah, four. A city of Judah. Josh. xv. 13.

[So called from its founder Arba; but some think from four patriarchs here buried, whom they fancy to be Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Josh. xv. 54. xx. 7. called HEBRON, Gen. xxiii. 2. Josh. xx. 7. Nehem. xi. 25.

Arba was of the race called giants, father of the Anakim. Josh. xiv. 15. xv. 13. xxi. 11. Hiller and others think he was so called because he was four cubits high; but this does not reach the stature of some mentioned in sacred writ. Heidegger, in Histor. Patriarch. tom. ii. Exercit. 1. supposes that this term implies perfect stature. So the Greeks said a four-sided man, for a complete man. Plato, in Protag. Aristotle, Ethic. ad Nicomach. lib. i. cap. 10. Stobæus, Serm. 44. They say also a four-sided body, in the same intention. Suetonius has the phrase statura quadrata, and Celsus corpus quadratum. We also say a square-built, square-set man; meaning one whose form indicates strength. Notwithstanding these authorities, I would query whether this name expresses any thing farther than a town whose sides were four-square: and, perhaps, its streets might cross each other at right angles, making a square in the centre of it.]

KIRIATH-ARIM, קִרְיַת-אֶרֶם, Kiriatharim. City of cities, or of villages; from Kiriath, and אֶרֶם hir, a city; otherwise, the city of those that watch; from אֶרֶם hur, to watch.

This name may serve to shew the improbability, that that the appellation "city of cities," should be composed of two words so different as Kiriath and arim: whereas, if we take the arim, or oirim, to signify bridges, then this name thus compounded imports the city of bridges, or "bridge-town:" which is a name very common among ourselves, and, indeed, in many other languages, as du Pont, deux-Ponts, &c.]

KIRIATH-BAAL, קרית-בעל. The city of Baal, or of those that command, or that possess; from kiriath, and baal, a master, or husband.

[A city in Judah, called also Kiriath jearim. Josh. xv. 60. xviii. 14. Jer. xxvi. 20. Called also BAALAH.

Most probably this should be understood as the "city of Baal;" of which Baalah is the feminine form. Some think the "city of riches:" q. of Parvates, the Hindoo goddess of wealth?]

[KIRIATH HUZOTH, the city of squares, or which had many open places in it.

It was the royal seat of Balak, king of Moab; and therefore may well be supposed to have had handsome streets, &c. Numb. xxii. 39.]

KIRIATH-JEARIM, קרית-ערי, Πόλις ἱερὴ. The city of woods, or forests; from kiriath, a city, and ער jahar, a forest. A city, Josh. xv. 9.

KIRJATH-JEARIM, or Kirjath-Baal, or Baale of Judah or Bela, a city of Judah on the confines of Benjamin, where the ark was lodged for many years in the house of Abinadab; till David removed it to Jerusalem. See BALA.

This seems to be also Kiriath Arim, the iod being dropped, as the he is added. Jer. xxvi. 20.]

KIRIATH-SANNAH, קרית-סנה. The city of the bush; from סנה senah, a bush; or according to the Hebrew and Syriac, the city of enmity. A city, Josh. xv. 49.

[By comparing the name, Sena, with the other names of the same place, Sepher and Debir, we cannot but think, that as those have somewhat of sacredness in them, so has this: nor is the idea diminished by the remark that Jehovah appeared to Moses in the Sena, or bush; which word is used only twice, i. e. when speaking of that appearance. Exod. iii. 2, 3, 4. Deut. xxxiii. 16. What could there be coincident with the then current ideas of sanctity which could render this Sena, a bush, the proper place, or vehicle of divine appearance?

Kirjath Sannah, as our translators write this name, is thought by Simon to denote the city thoroughly purged, i. e. extremely clean: from the Chaldee and Arabic roots, to strain, to purify, which Hiller explains as denoting the city cleared from bad citizens: but this appears to be forced. Possibly, "the city of the purified," i. e. priests, is more analogous.]

KIRIATH-SEPHER, קרית-ספר, Πόλις γραμμάτων, the city of letters, or of the book; from קרית kiriath, a city, and ספר sepher, a letter, or a book. Josh. xv. 15. Judg. i. 11.

KIRJATH-SEPHER, otherwise Debir, Kirjath-debir (the city of words) a city in the tribe of Judah, afterwards given to Caleb. It was taken by Othniel, to whom Caleb for his reward gave his daughter Achsah in marriage.

[This city was so called long before Moses; at least it should seem so by the manner of mentioning it, which proves that books were known before that legislator, and that he is not the oldest writer that ever was, as the Fathers have asserted; a character which it is to be observed he never assumes. It is possible the Canaanites might lodge their records in this city, and those few monuments of antiquity which they had preserved; or it might be somewhat like the cities of the priests in Israel, the residence of the learned, or a kind of college.]

[Some think this should be understood as denoting "the city of separations," from the Arabic root sepher, of that import. I rather think, from its other name Debir, which designates an oracle, that here was a seat of learning, a college, or university; an establishment, probably, of priests, for the purpose of educating the younger members of their body. The circumstance is truly remarkable, because it occurs so early as the days of Joshua; and is evidently an establishment by the Canaanites, previous to the Hebrew invasion. It contributes, therefore, greatly to prove that the origin of letters was not the revelation of them to Moses on Mount Sinai, as some have imagined; since, beside the silence of Moses on that matter, we find indications of their being already in use elsewhere.]

KISH, קיש, hard, difficult; from קשקש kashak: otherwise, straw, or forage; from קשקש kashash: otherwise cucumber; from קשא kasha.

1. KISH, son of Abi Gibeon and Maachah, 1 Chron. viii. 30.

2. KISH, son of Ner, father of king Saul, 1 Sam. ix. 1. and 1 Chron. viii. 33. ix. 38, 39.

3. KISH, son of Abdi, a Levite of Merari's family, 2 Chron. xxix. 12.

KISHION, קישון, hardness; from קשקש kashak. See KISH. A city of the tribe of Issachar, yielded to the Levites of Gershom's family. Josh. xix. 20.

[Probably the earth in the neighbourhood of this town was what we call a stubborn soil; or it might be hard from stiff clays, or compactness or toughness of particles.

But this termination aun leads to the possibility that it may import the rigid, or stiffened Aun, i. e. the great progenitor, laid out at length, as if dead, and religiously lamented accordingly.

We know that Tammuz was thus commemorated, and that such figures are common among the antiquities of Egypt. If this town be the same as that called Kadesh, i. e. sacred, 1 Chron. vi. 57. then the idea of sanctity may have originated from some such circumstance, i. e. from ancient worship practised by the early inhabitants. Vide KISHON.] [KISHON, hard, or stubble, or cucumber-bed. From the same root as Kish: a brook; Judith iv. 7.

Some think this name imports curved and winding, like the river Meander in Phrygia; and this they derive from the Arabic root. It is probable, the root of this word means stiff, rigid, and perhaps, as observed on Kishion, the compound alludes to Aun, considered as a person, when in that state: or, if it be derived from a cognate Hebrew root, the name for a bow (the Arabic root also imports to bend) it may mean the "bending Aun," beneath the weight of years; the aged Aun; or, the Aun bending his bow, in which character he would be analogous to Apollo, the god of day, and to the ancient Scythian deity of Caucasus, &c. Vide KISHION.]

KISHON. Judges v. 21. The brook Kishon rises in the valley of Jezreel. It runs along this valley, to the south of Mount Tabor, and discharges itself into the Mediterranean at Acco, otherwise Ptolemais.

KISS. There are in the Scripture style kisses of friendship, adoration, homage and respect; kisses of peace and reconciliation. St. Paul speaks frequently of the kiss of peace, used among believers, and given by them to one another, as a token of charity and union, publicly, in their religious assemblies. Salute each other with an holy kiss. Rom. xvi. 16. We have spoken of the kiss of adoration under the word ADORE. Joseph coming to visit his father Jacob, then on his death-bed, the good old man kissed the end of his staff of command, (says the Vulgate.) Esther kissed the end of king Ahasuerus's sceptre, as a mark of homage. Adoravit fastigium virgæ ejus. Vide LXX. in Gen. xlvii. 31. Esth. v. 2. Ps. ii. 12. juxta Heb. The psalmist exhorts us, to kiss the Son of God, and acknowledge his dominion. We kiss the text of the holy gospels, out of respect, and with a kind of relative worship; with the same spirit the converted adúlteress kissed our Saviour's feet, washed them with her tears, and wiped them with her hair. Luke vii. 38.

[KISS. Pharaoh tells Joseph, "Thou shalt be over my house; and upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss:" our translation reads, "according to thy word shall all my people be ruled;" but places in the margin, "at thy word shall all my people kiss." Under the article ADORE we have shewn, that, those who were said to kiss idols, really kissed their own hands, and transferred the action to the idol, or professed to do it this honour: i. e. they expressed their sense of veneration by this action: but we read Prov. xxiv. 26. "The lips shall be issed that give right words in answer"—as this seems to express the same action as is referred to Joseph, it may be proper to examine the import of the phrase.

It is probable, that this refers, ultimately, to the mode of kissing the roll of a decree, or writing, which contains the orders of a sovereign prince, as is still the custom in the east—i. e. the written orders of Joseph should be treated with the same respect, by inferior officers, as those of the king.—The passage in Proverbs is rendered by LXX. "Lips shall kiss those things that answer to right words:"—i. e. those writings—those decrees—which correspond to principles of equity and justice, shall be treated with the utmost reverence—even to kissing. The mode of honouring a writing from a sovereign in the east, is, by kissing it, and then putting it up to the forehead. On a late trial in the Court of King's Bench, in England, in which some Mahometans were sworn, they honoured the Koran, on which they took their oaths, by this expression of respect.

It deserves notice, that, occasionally, various parts of the person, were kissed, and still are, in the East; probably according to the degree of intimacy of the parties, or to their relative stations—as the lips—the hands—the feet—the garments—the earth where the feet had trod, &c.—and in many instances, things sent by a superior to an inferior. So Isaac says to his son, "Come near and kiss me," Gen. xxvii. 26; so, Joseph fell on his father's face, and kissed it, Gen. l. 1. so, Joab took Amasa by the beard, to kiss it, 2 Sam. xx. 9. (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XCIII.) and so, the woman kissed the feet of Christ, Luke vii. 45.]

[We should remark also that not only men who were related kissed each other, as Laban kissed Jacob, Gen. xxix. 14, and Esau kissed Jacob, Gen. xxxiii. 4. and Joseph kissed all his brethren, but Samuel kissed Saul, 1 Sam. x. 1. as a token of respect to the king elect; in like manner, when the Son is declared king, Psalm li. 12. the kings and judges of the earth are directed to kiss him: no doubt to shew their submission, veneration, and affection. Jonathan and David kissed each other, 1 Sam. xx. 41. and, "Absalom kissed any man—of whatever rank, or situation—that came nigh to him," 2 Sam. xv. 5. This custom long continued: for "the brethren fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him," Acts xv. 37. This accounts, very easily, for the custom of the kiss of peace, among the primitive Christians; which, however it might seem to us, to be unadvisable, was in those days esteemed merely as a mode of of expressing affectionate honour. It should be remembered, that the sexes sat apart in Jewish, and in Christian, places of worship; notwithstanding which, the heathen took occasion from the use of this salutation, to raise reports injurious to Christian purity; and it did not therefore long continue to be practised in public assemblies. Most probably it was gradually relinquished; but, there is some reason to think it continued among several of the sects denominated heretics: where it gave occasion to the same reports of promiscuous embraces, as it had done when in general use among Christians. This is the most liberal way of accounting for reported behaviour so utterly inconsistent with any reception of the Christian doctrine.]

KITE, a bird of prey, Hebrew דַּאֵחַ Daah; in Latin Milvus: some translate this word Magpye; and others Vulture. The Hebrew Daah, signifies to fly. The Kite flies very swiftly and very high. Moses places it among the unclean birds. Lev. xi. 14.

KITHLISH, כַּתְּלִי, Καθαλὶν, wall; from כַּתְּלִי cathal: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, a troop of lions: according to the Syriac, squeezing to the lion. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.

KITRON, קֶטְרוֹן, Κερπών, Vulgate, cetron, bonds: otherwise, he that perfumes, that makes to smoke; from קֶטַר cetar, to burn incense: otherwise, the song of him that is weary; from קָטַץ cut, to be weary, and רָנָה ranah, a song. A city of Zebulun, which that tribe could not take from the Canaanites. Judges i. 30.

Simon thinks this imports "extremely small."

Possibly this name, in composition, alludes to "the Aun of fumigation," i. e. the object of worship paid by incense, and other perfumes: as was the custom in ancient rites, and still is in the East. Compare the plate of Mount Taurus, i. e. Mount Bull.

KITRON, Judges i. 29, 30. is Sippor, (i. e. Sepphoris) says Bab. Megill. fol. 6. 1.

Sepphoris, says Josephus, was a very strong place, and the greatest city in Galilee. De Bell. lib. iii. cap. 3. It is noted in the Talmuds for being a university: wherein taught Rabbi Judah the Holy, who died here.]

KITTIM, כִּיְתִי, Κίτοι, they that bruise; from כִּתְּחַת cathath: otherwise, gold; from כִּתְּחַת cethem: otherwise, colouring.

KITTIM, son of Javan, and grandson to Noah. He peopled Macedonia. Josephus by Kittim understands the Isle of Cyprus; others the Isle of Chios; others Cilicia; others Achaia. But the author of the first Book of Maccabees understands it of the Macedonians; for he calls Alexander, King of the Kittims, and says, that Perseus, King of the Kittims was overcome by the Romans. Daniel speaks of the ships of the Kittims, which Bochart thinks refers to the Roman fleet; presuming that Kittim signifies Italy. It is true Daniel speaks in this place of the Roman fleet, but he calls it the fleet of the Kittims, because it lay in the harbours of Macedonia, when it departed to attack Antiochus, under the conduct of Caius Popilius; and of this event Daniel was speaking in the passage cited by Bochart: thus the fleet of the Kittims and Macedonia was in fact, the Roman fleet also.

KNIVES of Stone, used in circumcision. See STONE.

TO KNOW. I know thee by name, Exod. xxxiii. 12, 17. I know thee very particularly, I know well who thou art: thou art my peculiar servant, whom I have named. God speaks thus to Moses. Otherwise; I have called thee to my service by thy name.

To know: kill every woman that hath known man: Numb. xxxi. 17. All married women; all who are not virgins. Thus,—Adam cognovit uxorem suam;—Virum non cognosco;—Rex non cognovit eam. These expressions describe in a modest manner the act of marriage.

To know the Lord, Jer. xxxi. 34. to know the way and judgments of the Lord: And in a contrary sense, they have not known the Lord, nor his ways, Hosea xiii. 4, &c. does not signify a mere speculative knowledge, but a practical knowledge, accompanied with pious actions, and obedience. The Ox knoweth his master, but Israel doth not know him. Isaiah i. 3.

I did know thee in the Wilderness, Hosea xiii. 5. I chose thee for my people, and gave my law to thee in the wilderness. You only have I known of all the families of the Earth. Amos iii. You only have I taken for my people. They have made princes, and I knew it not. Hosea viii. 4. They have set themselves over my people without my [approval] mission or consent.

I do not know thee, I know not who thou art that is to say, I have nothing to do with thee, I treat thee as a stranger, as an indifferent person, as one whom I have never seen.

To know denotes frequently the contemplation of any thing with approbation, esteem and friendship. The Lord knoweth the ways of the righteous, Ps. i. 6. The Lord knoweth the days of the upright, Ps. xxxvii. 18. The Lord knoweth the ways which are on the right hand; he approves, he loves them, Prov. iv. 27. [The author cites from the Vulgate, wherein the 27th verse is inserted with additions copied by the translator from the Septuagint, which are not in the Hebrew; that concludes, as the English version does, with, remove thy foot from evil.]

KNOWLEDGE. God planted in Paradise, the tree of knowledge of good and evil; i. e. of the the knowledge of all things; for to know good and evil signifies a general knowledge, at least in morals. Some are of opinion that this tree of knowledge was different from the tree of life; and that Eve was seduced to eat the fruit of knowledge, by the hope of becoming a little deity, abounding with light and knowledge; ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. Gen. iii. 5.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, says Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 3, in her thanksgiving song: He sees, perceives, and knows every thing; the past, the present, and the future, lie open to his view; he penetrates our deepest thoughts, and most concealed inclinations.

Thy knowledge, Lord, is infinitely too high for me, I cannot attain unto it. Psalm cxxxix. 6. It would not only be ridiculous for man to pretend to equal the knowledge of God, but even to believe that he can form a just idea of it. We may easily apprehend, that our notice of things is very limited and imperfect, whereas the knowledge of God is without defect; but to attempt to learn its extent, is to aim at numbering the drops of water in the sea.

The knowledge of God,—of salvation,—of the saints, may denote those serious and useful notices of religious things, which guide us to God and holiness; or the knowledge which is given and inspired by God, and has things holy for its object.

There is no knowledge or wisdom in the grave whither thou goest—in the other life: Eccl. ix. 10. Those qualities of wise and learned which procure you some honour and reputation in this life, will disappear at death. There will then be no question, but of a religious life and holiness. Those are the only advantages at the hour of death. It may be taken likewise as an objection offered by libertines, “Let us enjoy present pleasure, for every thing perishes with the body; in the other life there will be neither work, nor reason, nor wisdom, nor knowledge.”

Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth. 1 Cor. viii. 1. The knowledge of speculative and useless things, which tend only to gratify curiosity and vanity, which contribute, neither to our own salvation nor to our neighbour's, neither to the public good, nor to God's glory; such knowledge is much more dangerous than profitable. The true science is that of salvation, the best employment of our knowledge is in sanctifying ourselves, in glorifying God, and in edifying our neighbour; this is the only sound knowledge.

St. Paul says, that he was rude in speech, but not in knowledge; his knowledge was not ostentatious, imposing on others with pompous, sublime and eloquent discourses; but was humble, solid, elevated, pure, and suited to the capacity of those who heard him with holy dispositions, and with the desire of being truly edified and instructed.

Our Saviour reproaches the Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge, and neither entering in themselves, nor suffering others to enter into the kingdom of heaven. Luke xi. 52. The Pharisees made particular profession of studying the law. They passed for the most learned of the Jews. They could not endure that others should be in any reputation for learning. In a word, they seized on the key of knowledge; but what did they do with it? They did not live the better for it; they did not enter into the kingdom of heaven: their lives were nothing but ostentation and hypocrisy. The traditions, wherewith they had overloaded the law, were rather a corruption than a fair explanation of the will of God. So that they not only did not, themselves, follow the way which leads to the kingdom of heaven, but they led others out of it by bad explanations.

[KNOWLEDGE. To consider this word fully, would make a very extensive article: sometimes it imports—to understand—to have acquired information respecting a subject.

Knowledge implies discernment, judgment, discretion: the power of discrimination.

Knowledge may be partial; we see but in part, we know but in part. 1 Cor. xiii. 9.

To have ascertained by experiment, Gen. xxii. 12.

It implies, discovery, detection; by the law is the knowledge of sin, Rom. iii. 20.

Knowledge, natural, is acquired by the senses, by sight, hearing, feeling, &c.: by reflection; by proper use of our reasoning powers; by natural genius; dexterity improved by assiduity and cultivation into great skill. So of husbandry, Isai. xxviii. 36. of art and elegance, Exod. xxxv. 31. in the instance of Bezaleel.

Knowledge, spiritual, is the gift of God; but may be improved by study, consideration, &c.

The priests' lips should keep knowledge, Mal. ii. 7. not keep it to themselves, but keep it in store for others: to communicate knowledge is the way to preserve it.

Knowledge is spoken of as an emblematical person, as riches, and treasures, as excellency, and as the gift of God.

Knowledge does not always add to the happiness of its possessor; but too often he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow, Eccl. i. 18.

God is the source, and fountain of knowledge; He knows all things; at all times, and in all places. Jesus Christ is possessed of universal knowledge; knows the heart of man, and whatever appertains to his mediatorial kingdom. Men know progressively; and ought to follow on to know the Lord: what we know not now we may know hereafter. Holy angels know in a manner much superior to man; and, occasionally, reveal part of their knowledge to man. Unholy angels may know many things, of which man is ignorant.

The great discretion of life, and of godliness, is, to discern what is desirable to be known, and what is best unknown: lest the knowledge of "good lost and evil got," as in the case of our first parents, should prove the lamentable source of innumerable evils.

Knowledge of God is indispensable, self knowledge is important, knowledge of others is desirable; to be too knowing in worldly matters is often accessory to sinful knowledge; the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ is a mean of escaping the pollutions which are in the world; workers of iniquity have no knowledge; no proper conviction of the divine presence. Some men are brutish in their knowledge; e. gr. he who knows that a wooden image is but a shapelessly-formed stump of a tree, yet worships it: he boasts of his deity; which, in fact, is an instance of his discernment degrading even to brutality. Some are wicked in their knowledge, "knowing the depths of Satan, as they speak." Rev. ii. 20. Strange indeed! that men should boast of what is to their detriment, and pride themselves on knowing that—the absence of which were their greatest felicity!

KOHATH, קהת, congregation; from קה kavah; otherwise winkle, plait; from קמט kamat: otherwise to make blunt; from קהה kahah: otherwise, obedience; from קה jakah, to obey.

KOHATH, son of Levi, and father of Amram, Jehar, Hebron and Uzziel, Gen. xlv. 11. Kohath's family was appointed to carry the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle, while Israel marched through the wilderness. Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iv. 4, 5, 6, &c.

KOHELETH, קהלת, Vulgate, Ecclesiastes; Eccles. i. 1. the preacher: otherwise, he [she] who assembles.

KOLIAH, קוליה, Κωλία. The voice of the Lord; from קול kol, a voice, and קיה jah, the Lord. A man's name, Nehem. xi. 7. Also, the father of Ahab, Jerem. xxix. 21.

KORAH, קרה, bald, frozen, icy; from קרה karak, or kerek. Son of Izhar, Exod. vi. 21.

1. KORAH, son of Esau and Aholibamah, succeeded Kenaz in part of the kingdom of Edom. Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.

2. KORAH, (Vide DATHAN and ABIRAM,) son of Jehar, and head of the Korites, a celebrated family among the Levites. Korah being dissatisfied with the rank he held among the sons of Levi, and envying the authority of Moses and

Aaron, formed a party against them; wherein he engaged Dathan, Abiram, and On, with two hundred and fifty of the principal Levites, Numb. xvi. 1-3, &c. Korah, at the head of these rebels, complained to Moses and Aaron, that they arrogated to themselves all authority over the people of the Lord. Moses, falling with his face upon the earth, answered them: "Let every one of you take his censer, and to-morrow he shall put incense into it; and offer it before the Lord; and he shall be acknowledged priest whom the Lord shall choose and approve."

The next day Korah with two hundred and fifty of his faction, presenting themselves with their censers, the glory of the Lord appeared visibly over the tabernacle; and a voice was heard "Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment." Moses and Aaron hereupon falling with their faces to the ground, said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wrath with all the congregation! And the Lord said unto Moses, Command all the people to depart from about the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. When the people were retired, Moses said, If these men die the common death of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me; but if the earth open and swallow them up alive, then ye shall know that they have blasphemed the Lord. As soon as he had spoken, the earth opened, and swallowed them up, with what belonged to them.

But one thing which added to this surprising wonder, was, that when Korah was thus swallowed up in the earth, his sons were preserved. We do not know the year when the death of Korah and his companions happened. The sons of Korah continued as before, to serve in the tabernacle of the Lord. David appointed them their office in the temple, to guard the doors, and sing praises. Several psalms are inscribed to them, under the name of Korah: the 42, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, and the 84, 85, 86, 87; in all eleven.

The Mahometans have several traditions relating to Korah, which it may be proper to produce here, though no great account is to be made of them: They say, Korah, whom they call Karum, was the son of Masaab, cousin-german to Moses. Moses seeing he was poor, taught him chemistry, by which he acquired such immense riches, that forty camels were necessary to carry his gold and silver. Some assert, that he had several camels loaded only with the keys of his strong boxes.

Moses having commanded the Israelites to pay the tythe of all their fortunes, Korah refused to obey him, he even rebelled against his benefactor, and spread several calumnies against him, which destroyed almost all his authority with the people.

Moses

Moses hereupon complained to God, who permitted him to punish Korah as he should think proper. He therefore cursed him, and commanded the earth to open and swallow him up; which was immediately executed.

The Mahometans add another tradition, that Korah, seeing his treasure sunk under ground, then that his tent was swallowed up, after that his family, and lastly discerning himself to be already engulfed up to his knees in the earth, begged of Moses four several times to pardon him; but found him inflexible. Some time after, God appeared to this prophet, and said to him: Thou couldest not forgive Korah, though he four times desired it of thee; had he addressed himself to me once only, I should not have refused him my pardon.

KORE, קרא. He that binds, or calls; or partridge; from קרא korah, or kore. Father of Shallum, 1 Chron. ix. 19. 2 Chron. xxx. 14.

KORITES, קוריתים, Koríai, or Korishites. The children of Kore; from קורח korach, as before.

KOZEBAH, a city of Moab. See KEB. 1 Chr. iv. 22. or Kishi the son of Abdi.

KUSHAIAH, קישאי, Kosaias, his hardness; his importunity; from קשה Kashah, and the pronoun יו, his: otherwise, the chaining of the Lord; from שק jakash, chaining, and יה jah, the Lord.

KUSHAIAH, or Kishi, son of Abdi, and father of Ethan, a Levite of Merari's family, 1 Chron. xv. 17. A singer; he stood always before the ark. 1 Chron. vi. 44.

LAADAH, לעדה, for ornament, or for to pass; from the preposition ל l, for, and עדה hadah, ornament, or passage: otherwise, for witnessing, or for spoiling; from the same preposition, and עד had, to witness, &c. Son of Shelah, and father of Mareshah, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 21.

LAADAN, לעדן, for pleasure: from the preposition ל l, for, and עדן hadan, pleasure: or for ornament, or for witness: otherwise, he that devours judgment; from לוע luah, to devour, and דן dun, judgment: according to the Syriac, according to time.

LAADAN, son of Gershon, 1 Chron. xxiii. 7, 8.—xxvi. 21.

LABAN, לבן, white: otherwise, a brick.

LABAN, son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, brother to Rebekah, and father to Rachel and Leah. When Jacob came into Mesopotamia, A. M. 2245, ante A. D. 1759, he was well received by his uncle Laban. Gen. xxviii, &c. A month after his arrival, Laban said to him, Must you, because you are my nephew, serve me without recompence? Jacob proposed to serve him seven years, for his youngest daughter, Rachel; and Laban consented. (Many are of opinion, that Jacob served him seven years, before he married Rachel; but others assert the contrary. Jacob was then seventy years of age.) Jacob said to Laban, Give me my wife, for my time is accomplished. Laban therefore made a wedding feast, but conveyed Leah into Jacob's chamber, so that Jacob did not detect the fraud. The next morning he complained sharply of it: Laban replied, that it was unlawful to marry the younger daughter before the elder; but if he would serve seven years more, he would give him Rachel: to this Jacob consented. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVI.

When Jacob had spent fourteen years in the service of Laban, he was desirous to return to Canaan: but Laban wishing to continue him in his service, said, "Ask what wages you please." Jacob demanded all the young which his flocks should produce that were of a brown colour, spotted and speckled: i. e. that seemed least desirable for their wool, and their fleece. To this Laban agreed; and committed all that were spotted and of divers colours, to the keeping of his own sons; fearing, in all probability, lest Jacob should by mixture of spotted sheep and goats, produce cattle of divers colours.

After staying twenty years with Laban, Jacob perceiving that his father-in-law did not regard him with the same kindness as formerly, resolved to depart without Laban's knowledge, who pursued him, and overtook him at Mount-Gilead. God appeared over-night to Laban, and forbade him to treat Jacob with harshness; so that he only complained of his flight—of his not giving him the comfort of embracing his daughters and grand-children, and of conducting them on their journey with cheerful music. But on the subject of stealing his gods, or Teraphim (See TERAPHIM) he remonstrated with vehemence; and Jacob agreed, that the culprit should be put to death; not knowing that Rachel was that person. Laban searched all the tents of Jacob in vain: for Rachel concealed these images under her. See RACHEL.

Jacob in his turn remonstrated with Laban on his conduct past, and present. Laban answered, "Behold my daughters and my grand-children! All your family is as dear to me as my own. Let us make a covenant together, and set up a monument of it." (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXIX.) They swore therefore reciprocal friendship and alliance: Laban called this pile of stones Jagar-Sahadutha, "the heap of testimony;" Jacob called it Galeed, "the heap of witness," each according to his language, Laban, using the Chaldee. Having offered sacrifice, they ate and drank together; and the next morning Laban took leave of his daughters and grand-sons, and returned to Haran. This is all we know of him.

[LABAN, the moon; whiteness; incense.

A city of the priests in Judah. Josh. xv. 42. where it is written in the English translation, Libnah. It is also thought by some to be the Libnah of Josh. x. 29. Vide LIBNAH.

This name occurs Deut. i. 1. and probably is derived from the whiteness of the sand, or earth, in its district. I should not think it to be the same as Libnah, because Libnah appears to be too far distant west of Paran: and several places in the desert, or on its borders, might be white in their appearance, whether their soil were chalky or not.]

LABOSARDACH or Laborosarchod, king of Babylon, son of Neriglissar, he reigned nine months; according to Berosus. (He was slain by his own people, and succeeded by Nabonidas, says Berosus; or Nabannidoch, according to Abydenus; or Labynitus, according to Herodotus.) Many are of opinion, that this is the Belshazzar of Daniel. The succession of Nebuchadnezzar's sons is extremely perplexed. See NIGLISSAR.

LABOUR, is sometimes used for sin, iniquity, falsehood, or for the punishment of sin: e. gr. sub lingua ejus labor & dolor, Psalm x. 7. under his tongue ungodliness and sorrow; according to Heb. [and Eng.] mischief and iniquity, or vanity:

He thinks only of doing mischief, of injuring and afflicting his neighbour. Psalm lv. 11. Labor in medio ejus & injustitia; sin and injustice are in the midst of the city. Psalm cxli. 9. Labor labiorum ipsorum operiet eos. Let the mischief of their own lips cover them: Let the punishment of their sin, of their evil discourses, fall upon them. Isaiah lix. 4. Conceperunt laborem & peperunt iniquitatem: They have conceived mischief, and brought forth iniquity. These words were in a manner proverbial: they occur in Psalm vii. 14. and Job xv. 35. Habakuk i. 3. Quare ostendisti mihi iniquitatem & laborem: i. e. iniquity and the crimes of the wicked. [The Latin labor may answer to our English word TRouble.]

Labour is used for any kind of misfortune, or fatigue, or trouble. Nosti omnem laborem qui apprehendit nos. Numb. xx. 14: all the evils which we have suffered. Narravit universum laborem qui accidisset eis in itinere; Exod. xviii. 8: the uneasiness which attended their journey.

Labour is also taken for the fruit of labour. Psalm cv. 44. Labores populorum possederunt: they possessed the labours of the people. And elsewhere, let strangers spoil his labour, and the first fruits of their labours; i. e. what they have acquired by their labour.

Labour is sometimes used for the uneasiness we give others. Labor labiorum ipsorum operiet eos. Ps. cxli. 9. The mischief they do others will fall upon themselves; or, the pain occasioned by their evil discourses and calumnies will overwhelm them. Labor stultorum affliget eos. Eccles. x. 15. The wicked shall be punished with those very evils which they design for others. And Ps. xciv. 20, Numquid adhæret tibi sedes iniquitatis, qui fingis laborem in præcepto? Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief, iniquity, by its precepts? for the Hebrew reads finget in the third person, and not fingis. The throne of iniquity are the wicked, they who abuse the power which God hath put into their hands; they frame mischief by a law, they overwhelm the weak with their authority; they afflict, oppress them.

LABOUR. See Gen. iii. 17, 18, 19. Psalm cxxvii. 1, 2, 3, 4. Prov. vi. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. Eccles. xxix. 28, 29, 30, 31. Acts xviii. 1, 2, 3, 4.—xx. 33, 34, 35. And 1 Thes. xi. 9, 10, &c.

LACEDEMONIANS, Λακεδαιμόνεις, the lake of dæmons; a Greek compound of λακκος, a lake, and δαίμονες, dæmons, or genii [good, or bad]: otherwise happy.

LACEDÆMON, otherwise called Sparta, a celebrated and very ancient city in the Peloponnesus: said to have been first called Lelegia, from Lelex, its first king, thought to be contemporary with Creon and Erichthonius. It afterwards wards took the name of Lacedæmon from Lacedæmon, son of Jupiter and Semele: lastly, that of Sparta, from queen Sparta, wife to Lacedæmon.

The Lacedæmonians were always distinguished by their valour. Lycurgus formed their government, and gave them laws. He settled a council composed of thirty-two, of whom the king was the first: but this council could conclude nothing without the consent of the people. Many of Lycurgus' laws resemble those of Moses; e. gr. equality in partition of lands, respect to old men and magistrates, frugality, abhorrence of drunkenness and intemperance. The Spartans brought up their sons and even their daughters in the laborious exercises of war; they inspired them with a love of liberty and independence; they spoke little; and said much in few words. The Laconic style became a proverb for its brevity.

The intercourse between the Jews and Lacedæmonians, does not appear to have been established till the time of the Maccabees, when Jonathan Maccabæus having sent deputies to Rome, directed them also to Lacedæmon, Macc. vii.

It was probably Areus, or Arius I. king of Lacedæmon, who wrote to Onias I. high-priest of the Jews. This prince was certainly contemporary with Onias, and history agrees with this opinion. The beginning of Onias I. we fix to A. M. 3682, his death to 3702.

As to the relation between the Jews and Lacedæmonians, it may be proper to remark, first, that according to the Greek text, the Lacedæmonians first wrote to the Jews, that they had discovered their relationship in some old books, having had the patriarch Abraham, for their common father. The Jews, though proud of their noble origin, did not reject this pretention of the Lacedæmonians. We have Arius's letter to Onias, but not Onias's answer to Arius: it appears however, by the sequel, that both people maintained their alliance and relation.

The high-priest Jason being obliged to quit Judæa, his country, and Arabia, whither he had retired, went to Lacedæmon, and there desired protection. 2 Macc. v. 9. The high-priest Jonathan, brother to Judas Maccabæus, wrote to the people and senate of Lacedæmon, to renew their ancient alliance; 2 Macc. xii. 6. Their relation was not contested. It must be confessed, nevertheless, that if this were founded only on the documents remaining in Scripture, or in prophane authors, their belief was ill grounded. But they might at that time have in their possession proofs and documents which are unknown to us.

Some have advanced, that Ebal son of Joktan, Gen. x. 29. (Vide apud Scal. Isagog. lib. iii.

p. 382.) was the same with Ebalus, father of Tyndarus, and grandfather of Castor, Pollux, and Helena; but chronology rejects this opinion; and besides, this would not prove that the Lacedæmonians and Jews had Abraham for their common father, since Ebal is six or seven generations older than Abraham.

Others believed (D. Thom. seu alius in Libb. Macc.) that the Lacedæmonians sprung from Hagar, or Keturah, by Abraham; but this is mere conjecture. Grotius imagines, that the Lacedæmonians being descended from the Dorians, and the Dorians from the Pelasgians, who were originally of countries adjacent to Syria or Arabia, it has been inferred that the Lacedæmonians and the Jews were of the same race: this is one of those agreeable opinions which will not abide rigid examination.

Eutychius patriarch of Alexandria, deduces this relation from Esau's side: He believes, that Esau married not only Canaanite women, but, likewise Greek women; hence the alliance between the Jews and Greeks: but this supposed marriage is altogether gratuitous.

Some derive it from Cadmus, who being a Phœnician, and coming into Greece with some Arabians, occasioned this report. The foundation of the city of Lacedæmon is attributed to Cadmus, and the etymology of the name Sparta, which signifies sown, is borrowed from Cadmus's having sown the serpent's teeth, which sprung up men.

Diodorus Siculus relates, that a multitude of strangers settling in Egypt, and beginning to change the laws and customs, the natives drove them out; part of them withdrew into Greece under the conduct of Danaus and Cadmus; others, having Moses at their head, made themselves masters of Judæa, which at that time was desolate. Here arises a conjecture concerning the common origin of the Lacedæmonians and Jews.

The foundation of Sparta is by some authors attributed to a man named Sparton, who accompanied Bacchus in his wars and travels; others assign it to Spartus son of Phoroneus. Some think that this Sparton, Bacchus's companion, was a Jew; if this were well proved, it might support the assertion that the Jews and Lacedæmonians were derived from the same father. But Pausanias remarks, (Corinth.) that the Lacedæmonians knew of no such man, and did not acknowledge him to be the founder of their city.

The ancients believed, that the Jews were originally of the isle of Crete. This opinion was common in the time of Tacitus: Judaos Creta insula profugos novissime Lybia insedissee, &c. Tacit. Hist. lib. v. initio. The name of Mount Ida, is not very different from that of Juda; the Idæi not much unlike Judæi; the river Jarden resembles resembles in name the Jordan of Palestine; the laws of the Cretans given by Minos, those of the Lacedæmonians by Lycurgus, resemble those of the Jews by Moses: all this in remote antiquity. The Cretans sent colonies into Palestine: The Philistines were originally Cretans. Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonian legislator, long dwelt in Crete, and borrowed his laws from thence. All this might contribute to the belief, that the Jews and Lacedæmonians were of the same origin.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. c. 5. took the passage of Jonathan's letter to the senate of Lacedæmon in a sense different from that in the Maccabees. These books import, that, Albeit we need none of these things, for that we have the holy books of Scripture to comfort us. Josephus makes Jonathan say, that the Jews, wanted not the testimony of strangers to be persuaded, that the Jews and Spartans were brethren, having the sacred writings in their hands which furnished them with proofs of it, &c. This explanation of Josephus is followed by many interpreters; but where are these passages of Scripture, which demonstrate this relation!—except we suppose, what is very uncertain, that the Lacedæmonians descended from the Edomites or Ishmaelites.

LACHISH, לַחִישׁ, she walks, she goes; from לַחֵ jalac, and שׁ jesh, to be: otherwise, who exists of himself; from the pronoun כִּי, and the preposition לַחֵ, and שׁ jesh, to be, to exist.

LACHISH, a city south of Judah, Josh. x. 23. —xv. 39. Eusebius and Jerom mention a village called Lachish, seven miles from Eleutheropolis, south: Sennacherib besieged Lachish, but did not take it. 2 Kings xviii. 17; xix. 8. 2 Chr. xxxii. 9.

[It was built by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 9. Simon thinks it imports “to the terror,” i. e. of the enemy.]

LAD, vide CHILD, YOUTH.

LAEL, לֵאֵל, to God himself, or to the strong and mighty; from the preposition לַחֵ, to, and לֵאֵל el, God: or the strong.

LAHAD, לַחַד, who praises or gives commendation; from לַחַד jadah, to praise.

LAHMI, לַחְמִי, Λαχμῖ, or Bethlehemite. My bread, or my war; the same as lehem, and the pronoun יִי, my.

LAHMAS, or Lahmam, לַחְמָם, Λαχμὰς, their bread, or their war; (see LEHEM.) and the pronoun מָם, theirs. A town of Judah. Josh. xv. 40.

LAISH, or LESHEM, לַיִשׁ, lion.

LAISH, or Laisa, לַיִשָּׁה, lioness. A city, Isaiah x. 30.

LAISH, father of Phalti. Sam. xxv. 44.

[A region in Asher, acquired by the tribe of Dan. Called Dan. Joshua xix. 47. Judges xviii. 29. otherwise Leshem-Dan.

LAISHA, mentioned Isaiah x. 30. may, or may not, be the Laish of Dan. The prophet commands the daughter of Gallim to lift up her voice, so that it may be heard to a distance; but whether to so great a distance as Dan, may be doubted. Indeed, it does not appear for what purpose her screams should be heard so far off: but if this Laish were a town nearer to Geba, Gibeah, and the other places mentioned, then this alarm might be intended to reach Laish, for the purpose of inducing its inhabitants to join in the general flight.

Hiller thinks the name Laish is transposed, and is properly Shil, tranquillity, stillness, whence Shiloh. That the place was esteemed secure is evident from Judges xviii. 7. 10. 27. Simon inclines to deduce it from the Arabic, signifying a bound, or confinement.

Perhaps lions had descended frequently from some parts of Lebanon to this spot: whence it might take its name. Or, might some hill in this place be thought to resemble a lion couchant, as the Lion's Mountain, at the Cape of Good Hope? Vide CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, and LEBANON.]

LAIS, or Lesem, otherwise Paneas, afterwards Cæsarea Philippi, and lastly Neronias. Many suppose it was the same as Dan. But Dan was different from Lesem and Paneas. Dan was four miles from Paneas, towards Tyre. See PANEAS.

LAKE. There were three chief lakes in Judea; the lake Asphaltites, the lake of Tiberias, and the lake Semechon: also, towards Egypt, the lake Sirbon. Besides these, some pools were also called lakes: as that of Cendervia, whence the little river Belesus flowed, east of Ptolemais, that near Cæsarea Palestine; the lake Phiala, at the foot of Libanus; the lake Jazer, and that of Hesebon beyond Jordan. Isaiah, xxi. 11. speaks likewise of a lake which Manasseh caused to be made, between the two walls of Jerusalem.

The lake Ashan, mentioned 1 Sam. xxx. 30. was probably near the city of Ashan, which belonged to Judah. See Joshua xv. 42. The Hebrew reads Cor Ashan, the town of Ashan. It was given first to Judah, and afterwards to Simeon, Joshua xix. 7. St. Jerom read Bebor-Asan. “in Lacu Asan,” instead of Becor-Asan.

Lacus is often used for a cistern. Consider the hole of the lake from whence ye were taken out, says Isaiah, li. 1. i. e. the covenant of your fathers and mothers. And as their tombs were generally excavations in rocks, or under ground, wherein the bodies of the dead were disposed in niches, Scripture often calls tombs, lakes; so (Vulgate) Lacum aperuit & effodit eum, & incidit in terram, quam fecit, Ps. vii. 16. And Again, Unto thee will I cry, O Lord, my rock, be not silent to me, answer me, lest if thou be silent to me,—assimulabor descendentibus in lacum; I become like those who go down into the grave, the pit. Ps. xxviii. 1.

The Hebrew בֹּר bor signifies a pit, a cistern, a lake, a sepulchre, a hollow deep place, wherein wild wild beasts are shut up, (such as lions,) or slaves, as still practised in Africa, and other places. Zachariah says, ix. 11. Emisisti vinctos tuos de lacu, out of prison. Jeremiah was cast into prison, in which prison was a well of mud, without water. Jer. xxxviii. 6, 7, 8. Lacus novissimus signifies the deepest, the farthest part of the tomb or prison: Invocavi nomen tuum, Domine, de lacu novissimo, Lam. iii. 55. And Ezekiel, xxxii. 23. speaking of the king of Assyria's sepulchre says, it is placed in the deepest part of the cave; quorum sepulcra data sunt in novissimis lacu.

In Palestine, wine and oil were preserved in great vats, or subterranean cisterns, in the manner almost wherein water is preserved by us; these are likewise called lakes: For this reason, when talking of a press, they say, they dig a lake, or subterraneous great vat, for receiving the wine. Mat. xxi. 33. Vineam plantavit homo & circumdedit sepem, & fodit lacum. And St. John, Rev. xiv. 19, 20. says, the Angel gathered the grapes to put into the lake of God's wrath, &c. [i. e. a reservoir.] See WINE-PRESS.

LAKUM, לִקּוּם, לקום, to confirm, or to raise up; from the preposition ל, to, and קום, to raise, or confirm. A city of Nephtali, Joshua xix. 33.

[Some think "an obstruction in the way," meaning, the defence of the region. Hiller inclines to refer it to strength, or subsistence, i. e. well established.]

LAMB. This word in scripture sometimes comprehends the kid: the Hebrews at the pass-over were at liberty to chuse either for a victim. The original, Seh, in general signifies a youngling, whether of a goat or ewe. Agnus anniculus, a lamb of a year old, may likewise be interpreted a lamb of the year, born in the year, but which does not suck: for to sacrifice the paschal lamb while it used the teat, or to seethe it in the milk of its dam, was prohibited. Exod. xii. 5. Lev. xxiii. 12. On other occasions the law required, that the young should be left eight days with its dam before it was offered. Exod. xxiii. 30. Lev. xxii. 27.

The Prophets represent the Messiah, in meekness, like a lamb which is sheared, or is carried to the altar, without complaint. Isai. liii. 7. Jer. xi. 19. St. John Baptist describes our Saviour by the title of the lamb of God. John i. 29, 36. and in the Revelations he is symbolized as a lamb that had been sacrificed. Isaiah, xii. 6. says, that in the time of the Messiah, the lamb and the wolf will feed peaceably together; in the Gospel the wicked at the judgment are compared to goats, the righteous to lambs. Our Saviour sent his disciples to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, like lambs amidst wolves. Luke x. 3.

LAMB OF GOD. By this name John the Baptist called Jesus Christ, John i. 29, 36, to signify the innocence of the divine Saviour, and his quality as a victim to be offered for the sins of the world. Lastly, he might allude to these words of the prophet: He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. Isa. liii. 7. [If it was a little before the passover—then the sight of a number of lambs going to Jerusalem to be slain on that occasion, might suggest this idea: q. 'Behold the true, the most excellent, Lamb of God,' &c.]

LAMECH, מֶלֶךְ, poor, made low; from מָכַח macac; or who is struck; from נָכַח.

I. LAMECH, son of Methuselah, and father of Noah. He was an hundred eighty-two years old at the birth of Noah; and he lived after it five hundred and ninety-five years; his whole life was seven hundred seventy-seven years; being born A. M. 874, dying 1651.

II. LAMECH, of the race of Cain, was son of Methusael, and father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-Cain, and Nuamah. Gen. iv. 18, 19, 20, &c. Lamech is famous for his polygamy, whereof he is thought to be the author. He married Adah and Zillah. Lamech said to his wives, "Hear me, ye wives of Lamech; have I slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt! If Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, truly Lamech seventy-seven-fold." These words are a difficulty. A tradition among the Hebrews, says that Lamech growing blind, when hunting, killed Cain ignorantly, believing that he killed some beast; and that afterwards he slew his own son Tubal-Cain, who had been the cause of this murder, because he had directed him to shoot at a certain place in the thicket where he heard something stir. Other suppositions are produced to explain this passage almost all equally uncertain and absurd. Josephus says, Lamech had seventy-seven sons by his two wives; but Scripture mentions only three sons and one daughter. A book entitled Polygamia Triumphatrix, makes Lamech its hero, and asserts, that scripture mentions his Polygamy, in order to commend it!!!

LEMENTATIONS. A mournful poem, composed by Jeremiah, on occasion of the pious king Josiah's death; it was a long time used by the singing men and singing women of Israel. 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. That famous poem is believed to be lost; but we have another of the same prophet remaining, composed on the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Proofs of this occur in every chapter of the Lamentations. The preface, which is very ancient, expresses it; Jeremiah speaks throughout of Jerusalem and the temple, as of things destroyed, and prophaned. Ecclesiasticus says, that after the taking of Jerusalem, the enemies made the ways which lead to it quite desolate, alluding to this passage in the Lamentations.

mentations, the ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts.

The first two chapters of the Lamentations principally describe the calamities of the siege of Jerusalem. The third deploras the persecutions which Jeremiah himself had suffered. The fourth adverts to the ruin and desolation of the city and temple, and the misfortune of Zedekiah. The fifth is a kind of form of prayer for the Jews in their captivity. At the end he speaks of the cruelty of the Edomites, who had insulted Jerusalem in her misery, and contributed to aggravate it; he threatens them with the wrath of God.

The first four chapters of the Lamentations are in acrostic verse; or abecedary; every verse or couplet beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in alphabetical order. The first and second chapters contain twenty-two verses, according to the letters of the alphabet. The third chapter has three verses together, which triplets begin with the same letter; and it includes in all sixty-six verses. The fourth chapter is like the first two, and has only twenty two verses; the fifth is not an acrostic.

It is particular in the second, third, and fourth chapters, that the letter pe is before ain; whereas in the first chapter, and in all the acrostic and abecedary psalms, ain always precedes pe. The reason of this is not known; copyists have attempted to repair this supposed defect, but the connection of the discourse requires, that things should be left as they are.

The Hebrews call the Book of Lamentations Echa, from the first word of it; or Kinnoth, i. e. Lamentations. The Greeks call them Threnoi, which signifies the same. The style of Jeremiah's Lamentations is lively, tender, pathetic and affecting. It was the talent of this prophet to write melancholy and moving elegies. Never was a subject more worthy of tears, nor written with more tender and affecting sentiments. The Hebrews used to compose Lamentations or mournful songs on the death of great men, princes, and heroes, and on occasion of public miseries and calamities. See 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. Behold they are written in the Lamentations. We also have those which were composed by David on the death of Absalom and Jonathan. The prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, having foretold the desolations of Egypt, Tyre, Sidon, and Babylon, made Lamentations on their fall. It seems by Jeremiah, that they had women hired to weep: Call for the mourning women, and send for cunning women, and let them take up a wailing for us, &c. Vide Is. xiv. 4, 5. & xv. xvi. Jer. vii. 29. ix. 10. 17. xlviii. 32. Ezek. xix. 1. xxviii. 11. xxxii. 2.

LAMMA, למה, Λαμά, wherefore, from the preposition ל l, for, and the pronoun מה mah, why.

LAMNATZEACH, למנצח, to him that presides; from נצח natzach, to preside, to have the oversight of any thing.

LAMNATZEACH. This Hebrew word is read in the beginning of many psalms. The LXX and Vulgate translate, in finem, for the end, or for eternity. Many refer this word to the coming of Jesus Christ, who appeared in the world at the end of the times and ages pre-ordained for that purpose. Others interpret it of the calling of the Gentiles and reprobation of the Jews; others of eternity, or the last judgment; but these explanations are rather mystical than literal. Some construe, in finem, by always. q. d. a psalm which deserves to be eternally in the mouths and memories of the faithful.

The Greek interpreters Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, render Lamnatzeach, victorious, or who giveth victory, or a song on some victory. But if we examine the text of the psalm bearing this title, we seldom find any thing relating to victory. They who suppose these titles to relate to the victories of Jesus Christ, open a larger field, since our Saviour overcame the world, death, and the devil, by his sufferings, humiliations, and death, as well as by his resurrection, ascension, and glorious mysteries; but we desire a grammatical and literal explanation.

The generality of modern interpreters maintain with the Rabbins, that Lamnatzeach, signifies to the master of the music, to him who presides over the class of singers, or musicians, in the temple. The verb Natzach, whence Lamnatzeach is derived, signifies to direct workmen; to preside over singers; or musicians. [Thus in 2 Chron. ii. 2. where Solomon's workmen are numbered, there are also מנצחם עליהם which the LXX render rightly by words signifying to order—to direct work—to oversee, or inspect, ἐπιστάρας αὐτῶν, and ver. 18. ἐργοδιώκτας, and chapter xxxiv. 12. ἐπισκοποι. And this word is particularly used of musicians, 1 Chr. xv. 21. where Mattathiah, &c. are appointed, "to excel," in the margin—to oversee, i. e. to order the music. The passages wherein the word Lamnatzeach occurs, may easily be explained in this sense: which therefore is probably its true signification.]

A great number of Levites in the temple, were employed in singing praise to God. Each company had its president, or master, Natzach. A long enumeration of them 1 Chr. vi. 31. concludes with these words: these are they whom David set over the service of the song in the house of the Lord. The principal were Asaph, Heman, Ethan, and Jeduthun. The companies of singers were distinguished not only by their families, and their rank in the temple, but likewise by the musical instruments they used. Chenaniah was celebrated for strength and sweetness of voice; 1 Chron. xv. 22. and Chenaniah chief of the Levites was for song:

song: he instructed about the song, because he was skilful. When the ark was removed to Jerusalem, Nenaiah presided over the band of young women who sung in that ceremony. 1 Chron. xv. 20. In the titles of the Psalms we see some, for example, which are addressed to the president of the eighth band, or of the third band, Psalm xi. xii. Others were over those who played on Neginah, a musical instrument played on by the fingers. Psalm iv.

Some of these Menatzeachs, or music-masters, presided in the courts of princes, directing the companies of musicians of both sexes which were employed there, as well as elsewhere in religious ceremonies. On festivals and rejoicings, also on solemn and mournful occasions, those who sung and played on instruments were all directed methodically. Also, over the women who were hired to mourn, was a female president, who directed the whole, and tuned their lamentations. When David had composed any pieces of sacred poetry, he gave them to Asaph, to be set to music, and sung in the temple. So we understand 1 Chr. xxv. 2. Asaph prophesied according to the order of the king; and we find several psalms addressed to Asaph, president of the music. David himself did not think it below him sometimes to preside over the musicians, and direct the band; this we infer from the Psalms entitled, To David the servant of God, president of the music. Ps. xi. and xxxvi. or to David head of the music.

LAMPS. Are frequently mentioned in scripture, and it may be worth observing what their form was anciently. The ancients did not commonly use wax or tallow, but rather oil in their lamps. The lamp, or candlestick with seven branches, which Moses placed in the Holy, and those which Solomon placed afterwards in the temple of Jerusalem, were crystal glasses filled with oil, and put on the branches of the candlestick. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXIII. and PLATE]. The lamps or candlesticks used in houses were commonly put on a high stand on the ground. The lamps of Gideon's soldiers, Judg. vii. 16. and those of the foolish and wise virgins, Matt. xxv. 1. 2, &c. were of another sort. They were a kind of torches made of iron or earthen ware, wrapped about with old linen, moistened from time to time with oil. M. Bernier says, (Letter to M. de Merville, p. 34) that in India, they still use lamps of this kind. They are, says he, of iron, let into sticks, the ends whereof are wound about with old rags, which from time to time are moistened with oil, out of a vessel of brass or tin, with a long neck, which he who carries the lamp, carries also in his hand. [See the Plate of WEDDING PROCESSIONS in India.] Gallonius, de cruciatib. Martyr. cap. vi. says, that some of these ancient lamps are found in the ruins of Rome; made of iron or of potters' earth, large, with orifices on the top about four inches wide, or something more, ending in a point below, to be inserted into a piece of wood, as a handle. Into these vessels they put oil, or other combustible matter, to maintain the light. In Homer light is derived from a fire made of oily, sweet-smelling wood, placed on high candlesticks, in the middle of the chamber. Odyss. Σ. rer. 106. Notwithstanding, we acknowledge, that anciently they used wax candles, flambeaux, and lights coated with wax, and other combustible materials, and even oily, gummy woods, in particular ceremonies: Jason, high-priest of the Jews, received king Antiochus at Jerusalem by torch light, with great acclamations. 1 Macc. iv. 22.

VOL. II. PART XVII. Edit. IV.

Besides the common signification of the word Lamp, it denotes in a figurative sense, the hope, heir, resource, or guide of the people. After the danger of David, when attacked by the giant Ishbibenob, the Israelites said to him; Thou shalt go no more out to war with us, lest thou extinguish the Lamp of Israel, 2 Sam. xxi. 17. God would not suffer all the tribes to shake off the yoke of Rehoboam, that David might have a Lamp always before the Lord in Jerusalem, 1 Kings xi. 36 that there might be always a prince of his family. See 1 Kings xv. 4, and 2 Kings viii. 19. and 2 Chr. xxi. 17. Prov. xxiv. 20. and Psalm cxxxii. 17. are to be understood in the same sense. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CXXII.

The Lord is called the Lamp of his servants, their hope, their succour: 2 Sam. xxii. 29. and Psalm xviii. 28. Job speaking of his first prosperity, says, xxix. 3. Oh that I may again see those days of old, wherein his Lamp shined upon my head, and by his light I walked through darkness! Also Solomon: Prov. xiii. 9. The light of the righteous rejoiceth; but the Lamp of the wicked shall be put out. And Prov. xx. 20. Whoso curseth his father or his mother, his Lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness: which may be understood either of the death of such sons, or of their abandoned hopeless state. [Or, of the extinction of their families: q. they shall have no descendants to honour their memories.]

Lamps sometimes signify lightning, and fire from heaven, Populus videbat voces & lampades; Exod. xx. 18. the thunder and lightning [flashes].

The people received Holofernes cum coronis & lampadibus, Judith iii. 10. in order to do him honour. They observed the same custom in their compliments to new married people, as appears from the parable of the ten virgins, Matt. xxv.

The commandments of God are, as it were, a lamp to guide the righteous: Lucerna pedibus meis verbum tuum, Psalm cxix. 105. Prov. vi. 23. (See LIGHT.) St. John Baptist is called a burning and a shining light, John v. 35. And our Saviour is the Lamp [luminary] of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23.

LAND. Denotes often the country of the Israelites, or the country, or district, spoken of; the land of Canaan, the land of Egypt, the land of Ashur, the land of Moab. Behold my land is before thee, Gen. xx. 15. settle where you please. The Hebrews sent to view the promised land, reported, that it was a land which devoured its inhabitants, Numbers xiii. 33. it was encompassed with enemies, exposed to continual dangers. [Rather, it did not feed, but starved its inhabitants.]

[In many places of our public version the term all the earth is used, where the meaning should be restricted to the land, or all the land.]

The land of the living, the habitation of the blessed in the other life; or Palestine, in opposition to the land of captivity, where the Jews, considered themselves as being, as it were, in the grave. See Psalm xxvi. 13. li. 7. lv. 23. cxli. 6. Isaiah xxxviii. 11. liii. 8, &c.

The land of forgetfulness, of obscurity; the grave. Psalm lxxxvii. 13. Job x. 21, 22. Psalm lxii. 10, &c.

LANGUAGE. Several questions are proposed on this subject, as 1. Whether God was the author of the first language? whether Adam received it from him by infusion; or formed and invented it by his own industry and labour? 2. Whether this language is still in being? 3. Which is it?

It is disputed by some, whether mankind have a natural language, as birds have natural notes of singing, and animals of crying: Dogs bark, wolves howl, and asses bray, naturally: ravens croak, pigeons coo, and other birds emit other sounds: some cry, others chirp, each according to its nature and species. Thus should man have some natural language, which all men should speak, and probably did speak before the deluge. And as all men groan when they are sorrowful, and chuckle when they are glad; as all threaten and cry aloud when they are angry; and this naturally, and uniformly, it is presumed by some, that all would speak the same primitive language, which was Adam's, did not education change our natural notions, and did not habits contracted when young, stifle the voice of nature in us.

The ancients, who were unacquainted with the true history of the world's creation, reported, that under the happy reign of Saturn, not only all men, but all terrestrial animals, birds, and even fishes, spoke the same language: That mankind, not sufficiently sensible of their happiness, sent a deputation to Saturn, desiring immortality, representing, that it was not just that they should be without a prerogative granted by him to serpents, which are yearly renewed by shedding their old skin, and assuming a new one. Saturn in great rage not only refused their request, but punished their ingratitude, by depriving them of that unity of language, which kept them associated. He confounded their language, and thereby put them under a necessity of separating. Plato, in Politico. Philo, de Confus. Ling. p. 310. [Hence we learn that the heathen attributed the confusion of tongues to a Divine interposition; and so far they confirm the history of what took place at Babel.]

Others have believed, that Nature produced men and animals of different species in different places, and gave them certain sounds and accents to express their passions, as joy, grief, astonishment, desire, &c. That afterwards necessity prompted them to invent distinct words and expressions, to signify things whereof they stood in need. Horat. lib. i. sat. 3. ver. 99, 100. Diod. Sicul. lib. i.

Potere aliquem tunc nomina distribuere
Rebus, & inde homines didicisse vocabula prima Desipere est. Lucret. lib. v. ver. 10, 40.

Nature produced sounds, and necessity taught men to invent language.

Ac varios linguæ sonitus natura subegit
Mittere, & utilitas expressit nomina rerum.

Vitruvius says, de Architectura, lib. ii. cap. 1. that the first men continued long like beasts, in caves underground, without speech; making themselves understood by one another by actions and attitudes, and ill-articulated voices; that by signifying the same thing by the same sounds, they eventually accustomed themselves to speak, and struck out a language.

Psammetichus king of Egypt, adopting this theory, says Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 2. was curious to know what nation might be the original. He took two new-born infants, and had them brought up separately, that no one might speak to them. He believed that the language, which these children should speak would be the natural and primitive language of man, whence he might infer, that the people who still speak it were the oldest on the earth. When the children were of age to talk, the shepherd who had the care of them observed, that as often as he saw them, they cried out to him beccos. On enquiry it was found, that among the Phrygians beccos meant bread: whereupon it was concluded, that the Phrygians were the most ancient people.

This way of reasoning was on many accounts erroneous: for supposing the Phrygians to have been the most ancient people in the world, had they preserved their primitive language in its purity? Might not chance have produced beccos, as it does abundance of words in all languages? Might not these two children, having been bred up among sheep, learn such a sound from their bleatings?

If there were any language natural to man, all men would have a great propensity, and disposition to speak it, and many traces of it would remain among the different people of the world. Children who have been abandoned and exposed, or who are deaf, would speak this language; which is contrary to experience. A child wholly left without talking to it, will never speak any language, known, or unknown. Melabdin Echebas, then Great Mogul, (Purchase, lib. i. cap. 8. apud Walton, Proleg. i. note 3.) having appointed a child to be brought up, secluded from the company of men, the child continued without speaking. There were two boys of about nine years old found in 1661, amidst a troop of bears in Poland, one of which was taken, and great endeavours were used to teach him to speak; but this could never be accomplished; he should, however, have spoken the language natural to man, there having been no defect in his tongue: [Those who remember Peter the wild boy, who was taken in a wood in Germany, who had a pension from the king, and who long lived in Hertfordshire, will confirm this account.]

We must conclude therefore, that there is no natural language peculiar to man. Man has indeed certain natural sounds, motions, and signs to express his passions, joy, pleasure, grief, desire; but no speech or articulate series of signs, whereby to manifest his thoughts. The induction which some draw from animals, who have, they say, a kind of language, is many ways false and defective. Animals have certain cries and sounds, whereby they express their joy, their appetite, their sufferings: so man expresses his joy by laughing, his grief by sighing; but this is very different from speech. It is said farther, that birds have a language which is understood among themselves, and which some men have pretended to understand. But if we take a young singing bird that has not learned a note from the old ones, it will imitate the note or chirp of any other kind of birds, or even the tunes of musical instruments [witness the piping bullfinches]. And if it were possible to breed it up so that it should hear nothing, it would produce only uncertain, intermediate, and chance-medley sounds.

So that taking the matter rightly, neither men nor animals have any natural language: and certainly the system which supposes men and beasts to have been produced by chance in different places of the world, and to have formed each separately by itself, a peculiar language after its own fancy, necessity, and conveniency, is not maintainable. Chance is not a cause capable of producing a living organized body, much less a reasonable animal; to put matter in motion requires a moving cause different from matter; and to impress a regular motion on bodies, requires a reasonable and intelligent cause: altho' man may now invent words and form additional language, yet it does not follow, that the first men, so formed their primitive language, nor that any nation made an original language for itself: There is a great distance between possibility, supposing this to be possible, and fact.

Moses represents Adam and Eve as the stock whence all nations spring. He describes them as reasonable and intelligent persons, speaking, and giving names to things. There is a necessity for supposing the almighty power of God, not only to derive beings out of nothing, but likewise to give them form, life, and reason; to endow them with the knowledge of their own powers, and to excite them to the exercise of their own reason: if we admit God as a creator, there is no difficulty in acknowledging him to be the author of the language of the first man.

What was the Language which God taught Adam? In discussing this question several difficulties arise. The generality believe, that this primitive language was the Hebrew; others say the Syriac, the Chaldee, the Æthiopic, or the Armenian. There is scarcely any Eastern language which has not pretended to this honour. Beccanus maintained, that it was the Flemish, and derived etymologies from it; Adam he derived from Haasdam, i. e. who hateth the heaps; Eve, from Kuvat, vessel of the age; Abel, from Haas-Belq, who hateth war; Cain, from Quaat-Ende, bad end; Methuselah, from Machtusalig, save yourselves, (supply, from the Deluge). Other learned men assert, that the first language is irrecoverably extinct. Others believe that it subsists in the Hebrew tongue, and its derivatives, but greatly impaired and changed.

If we refer to the Sabians, the dispute would be soon decided; since they shew a book which they ascribe to Adam; the character of it is very singular, but the language is almost entirely Chaldee. Upon this notion the language of this book must prevail, and Chaldee be acknowledged to come nearest to the language of Adam; but we know how far we may trust the pretensions of the Sabians. [See the Article DISCIPLES OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST; in which this book of Adam, is set in a different light].

The generality of critics have declared for the Hebrew before all others. The conciseness, simplicity, energy, and fertility of it; its relation to the most ancient oriental languages, which seem to derive from it the etymologies of the earliest names borne by mankind, as they naturally occur in this language; the names of animals, which are all significant in Hebrew, and describe the nature and property of these animals, (particulars not observed in other languages), these characters uniting, incline us very much in favour of its primacy and excellency; it has another privilege, that the most ancient and venerable books in the world are written in Hebrew.

Nevertheless very able critics, (Grot. ad Genes. xi. 1. & not. in. lib. de Verit. Relig. Christ. n. 10. Huet. Demonstr. prop. 4. cap. 3. Cluver, German. Antiq. lib. i. p. 74. George Horn, not. in Sulp. Sev. lib. i. Henric. Kippeng de Lingua primæva, &c.) are of opinion, that the Hebrew tongue, as at present in the Bible, or as it was in the time of Moses, is not the primitive language, pure, and uncorrupted; they observe many words in the Bible, the originals whereof are not in Hebrew. They allow there may be more of Adam's language preserved in Hebrew, than in any other tongue; but this they say has undergone changes and alterations, and in the many ages from Adam to Moses, many native roots of it have been lost, and many of foreign extraction have been received.

Theodoret, qu. 60, 61. in Genes. Georg. Arnira præfat. in Gram. Syr. Myricæus præf. in Gram. Chald.) and the Maronites maintain, that the Syriac or Chaldee, is the true language of Adam. This assertion they found on the roots and etymologies of the names Adam, Eve, Abel, &c. in the Syriac and Chaldee dialects; also on Abraham's speaking Chaldee as his natural language before he spoke Hebrew, this being the language of Canaan. It is replied, that as to etymologies, the Hebrew tongue has the same advantage as the Chaldee, and is preferable in respect to simplicity and energy; moreover, it seems to be rather the parent than the child of the Chaldee: and lastly, there is so much affinity between these languages, that it is very credible Abraham spoke both, and that Hebrew, as the most simple and ancient, was preferred by this patriarch and his descendants.

The Eastern languages are mostly derived from the Hebrew. Noah, probably, spoke the same language as Adam, and Noah's language was preserved among his descendants till the confusion at Babel, Gen. xi. 1, 2. The whole Earth was of one lip.

It is questioned, in what manner this confusion happened? 1. Some believe that the words just cited, may be understood as signifying only the agreement and union of opinions, among men at that time, who determined by their united labour to build a tower, in order to make their names celebrated. Others think, that God by his extraordinary power wrought a sudden change in their memory and imagination, producing a forgetfulness of their natural language, and teaching them a new one; or putting them under a necessity of learning another.

St. Gregory of Nyssa is of opinion, that this account of Moses intends something very simple and natural, i. e. that while men were dispersed in different places of the earth, it happened, as a natural consequence of their dispersion, that each making some alteration in the language received from his forefathers, in process of time it became so distinct, that they were no longer able to understand one another. But the generality of critics have not approved of this system, because it reduces to nothing, the miracle recorded by Moses of the confusion at Babel. We need only read his text to be satisfied, that he intended to describe a miraculous event.

Another question relates to the number of languages, formed at the confusion of Babel. The ancients, for the most part, were of opinion, that the number of languages was equal to the number of those who undertook the edifice; so that, as there were at that time seventy heads of families, there were likewise seventy languages. But where have they intelligence of these seventy heads of families?

Some reckon them thus, Japheth had fourteen sons, Ham had thirty, and Shem twenty-six; in all seventy. Some reckon seventy-two, because the Septuagint add two persons to those enumerated by Moses; namely, Elisa to the genealogy of Japheth, and Cainan to that of Ham. Euphorus, cited in Clem. Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. i. Pacianus, bishop of Barcelona, reckoned a hundred and twenty. Ep. contra Novatianos.

But the names Cainan and Elisa, added by the Septuagint to the text of Moses, no way concern those who adhere to the Hebrew; and are content with seventy. They who believe that Arphaxad, Salah, and Eber were not concerned in the tower of Babel, nor in the punishment ensuing, lessen the number seventy by three; Joktan, son of Eber, and his sons, to the number of thirteen, in all probability, were not born at the time of that tower, consequently here is a new diminution.

Some reckon but twenty diverse languages in Scripture, which are more perhaps than were formed at the confusion of Babel. Others think, that at first there were but three languages, those of the families of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. The number of seventy languages appears too large, and was not necessary for God's design; three would not have been sufficient to oblige men to a separation, but ten or twelve languages were were more than were requisite for that purpose.

St. Luke, Acts ii. 4, 5. &c. relates, that the Holy Ghost having descended on the apostles on the day of Pentecost, they began to speak all languages; so that strangers, who came to Jerusalem from all parts, were amazed when they heard them speaking each in his own language.

[The strangers who came to Jerusalem at the national festivals, were Jews residing in foreign parts: heathen certainly did not engage in this pilgrimage. Nor can we suppose that the extremities of the globe furnished pilgrims, as Eastern Tartary, China, and especially America, a part of the world then unknown. It is evident, therefore, that the sacred writer's expression "every nation under Heaven," must be taken in a restricted sense; and that his term dialect refers to the languages spoken in those countries where the Jews were resident; whether we suppose them to be settlers of the ten tribes, or others who had quitted their own land on various occasions and callings.]

In Daniel, the people under the dominion of Nebuchadnezzar are distinguished by languages, tribes and nations. In Revelations (v. 9, alibi, &c.) in like manner, the kingdom of the Messiah is distributed by people, nations, tribes and languages, Thou hast redeemed us out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. Moses relating the settlement of the several countries of the world by the sons of Ham, Shem, and Japheth, says, they were divided in their lands every one after his tongue, after their families, and after their nations.

ADDITION.

[Language is the medium of communication between the material animal life and the spiritual rational power, in man: it is the link that connects the senses with the understanding. Whatever faculties we may suppose belong to animals, we see no proof of their drawing inferences, conclusions, and determinations consequent on the exercise of language. In respect to vocal sounds man may have taken hints and lessons from animals; but animals have taken no discursive lessons from man. It is well worth while, then, to consider this invaluable gift of the Almighty; and the rather as it forms one of the chains of evidence that all the families of mankind are derived from the same origin; and are made, as the apostle's expression is, "of one blood."

Late years have brought us acquainted with ancient languages which were formerly unknown to the learned of Europe; among them the most venerable is the Sanscrit of India. Its structure is, apparently, too perfect, too refined and artificial, to warrant our admitting it as the first language of mankind; yet in point of antiquity, it may compete with the Hebrew, as current in the days of Moses: and it is remarkable that the Mosaic writings seem to contain several words of Sanscrit origin, (chiefly in the history of Balaam); which may give occasion to various reflections.]

Among subjects of inquiry on this article, it might be worth while to obtain information on the present state of those oriental languages to which our attention is directed, on account of their connection with the Sacred Writings. Whether literati resident among those branches of the ancient languages which still exist in their native regions, might obtain more accurate knowledge of Scripture expressions, than are procurable at a distance; we may suppose, but we cannot determine.

The following extracts from NIEBUHR, will shew the fate of language, when those who speak it are subjected to foreigners of another tongue: nevertheless, that some remains of it may survive the general wreck, in different places, is not incredible; and such an account, with the manner in which it is preserved, is subjoined from the same author:

"Many people living under the dominion of the Arabians^a and Turks, have lost the use of their mother tongue. The Greeks and Armenians settled in Egypt and Syria speak Arabic; and the services of their public worship are performed in two languages at once. In Natolia, these nations speak their own languages in several different dialects. The Turkish officers sometimes extend their despotism to the language of their subjects. A Pacha of Kuysur, who could not endure to hear the Greek language spoken, forbade the Greeks in his pachalic, under pain of death, to use any language but the Turkish. Since that prohibition was issued, the Christians of Kaysar and Angora have continued to speak the Turkish, and at present do not even understand their original language." NIEBUHR, vol. ii. p. 259.

"In Syria and Palestine, indeed, no language is to be heard but the Arabic; and yet the Syriac is not absolutely a dead language, but is still spoken in several villages in the pachalic of Damascus. In many places, in the neighbourhood of Merdin and Mosul, the Christians still speak in the Chaldaean language; and the inhabitants of the villages who do not frequent towns, never hear any other than their mother tongue. The Christians born in the cities of Merdin and Mosul, although they speak Arabic, write in the Chaldaean characters, just as the Maronites write their Arabic in Syriac letters, and the Greeks write their Turkish in Greek letters."

It

It may not be amiss to observe, that many languages now spoken, may be traced to one common and primitive stock, as the original. Sir W. JONES has demonstrated, that THREE great branches of language are sufficient to account for all the varieties extant: and this hypothesis forms a very strong, as well as a new, argument in favour of the Mosaic history of the early post-diluvian ages. But, should we allow a fourth branch, we should do no violence to the narration of Moses. It is now, perhaps, impossible to combine, or even to ascertain, what words remaining in either, or in all, of the three branches should be considered as belonging to the primitive language; but, by way of shewing how words may sometimes be traced into different dialects, to which at first sight they appear to have little relation, the reader will accept the following note from a popular work:

"—Numberless instances might be given, but our limits permit us to produce only a very few. In the Shanscrit, or ancient language of the Gentoos OUR signifies a day: (see Hallhed's preface to the Code of Gentoo Laws). In other eastern languages, the same word was used to denote both light and fire. Thus in the Chaldee, UR is fire; in the Egyptian, OR is the sun, or light, (Plut. de Osir. et Isid.): in the Hebrew, AUR is light: in Greek anp (aer) is the air, often light: in Latin AURA is the air, from the Æolic Greek; and in Irish it is ABAR. From the very same original we have the Greek pur (pur), and the English fire. In Hebrew, OR signifies to raise, lift up one's self, or be raised: hence plainly are derived the Greek opw (oro), to raise, excite, and the Latin ORIOR to arise: whence ORIENS the east, and the English, orient, oriental: also the Latin, origo, and the English origin, original, &c. The word KHUNT in Shanscrit, signifies a small territory, which is retained in Kunthos (Kent), Canton, Cantabria. The word KHAN, KIN, CRAN, GAN, GEN, GIN, is of the same kind, and pervades Asia and Europe from the Ganges to the Garrone. The word LIGHT English, LUCHT Flemish, LUX Roman, and λυκος (Lycos), Greek, has been traced to Egypt. ARETZ, AREK, ERECH, HERTHA, EARTH, and ERDE, are all one word, from Palestine and Chaldea to Britain and Germany. The Chaldeans turned the Hebrew word SHUR or SHOR, which signifies an ox, into THOR, as likewise did the Phenicians: (see Plut. Vit. Syll.) hence the Greek ταυρος, the Latin taurus, the French taureau, and the Italian and Spanish toro. The Hebrew word BIT or BEITH, which signifies cavity, capacity, the concave or inside of any place, has spread itself far and wide, still retaining nearly the original signification; in the Persian language it is BAD, BED, BHAD, and signifies a house or abode. In all the dialects of the Gothic tongue, BODE signifies the same thing; hence the English, abide, abode, booth, boat, [bed]; the French batteau. In all these instances there is a striking resemblance in sound as well as in sense between the derived and the primitive words; but this is not always the case, even when of the legitimacy of the derivation no doubt can be entertained."

The variety of tongues, the copiousness of some, and the scantiness of others, furnishes no good objection against the Divine origin of language in the first instance; for whether language were at first revealed from heaven, or in a course of ages invented by man, a multitude of dialects would inevitably arise after the human race was separated into a number of distinct and independent nations, distant from each other, and having little, or no, free or intimate communication.

To apply this to our object, in illustrating Scripture, we may warrantably suppose, 1. That the ancient Hebrew language retained a considerable proportion of original words, and expressions, or modes of expression. 2. That some of these may occur in the Hebrew Scriptures. 3. That the sister dialects to the Hebrew, the Chaldee, the Arabic, &c. may likewise have retained many original words; and when these radical words are similar to those retained by the Hebrew, an adequate knowledge of these languages cannot but contribute essentially to our understanding of passages where derivatives from such words occur in the Hebrew. And this is distinguishedly fortunate, when such words occur but once in Holy Scripture: when they have, as we may say, neither friend nor brother in the Holy language, the advantage to be derived, from their relations, in foreign but kindred dialects, becomes invaluable.]

LAODICEA, Λαοδικεία, Gr. just people; compounded of λαός, people, and δίκαιος, just.

LAODICEA. There are several cities of this name, but scripture speaks only of that in Phrygia, on the river Lycus, near Colossæ. Its ancient name was Diospolis: afterwards Rhoas. Lastly, Antiochus son of Stratonice rebuilt it, and called it Laodicea, from the name of his wife Laodice. St. Paul never was in this city, and the Laodiceans had never seen his face in the flesh, Col. ii. 1. Notwithstanding, on information from Epaphras their messenger, that false teachers had propagated pernicious doctrine in Laodicea, and Colossæ, he wrote to the Colossians, and desires them, when they had read his letter, to send it to the Laodiceans:

he writes also that in the like manner, the Laodiceans, would send their letter to the Colossians. That ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea, καὶ τὴν Λαοδικεῶν ἐπὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀναγνῶτε. Coloss. iv. 16.

The expression, And ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea, is ambiguous. It may either signify the letter, which he wrote to Laodicea, or that which the Laodiceans wrote to him. Interpreters have been divided; some, Greg. Magn. lib. xxxv. cap. 15. Moral. in Job. Philastr. de Hæres. cap. 88. Haymo. Hervæus, &c. taking it in the former, others in the latter sense. We have extant a letter under the name of St. Paul to the Laodiceans. Theodoret, in Colos. iv. and Jerom had seen one with this title (in Catalog. Legunt quidam & ad Laodicensis Epistolam; sed ab omnibus exploditur.) The fathers of the seventh council say (Septima Synod. Œcumen. An. 787. seu Nicena. xi. Act. 6.) that their predecessors had likewise a knowledge of one. But both rejected it as false and spurious; and all men of learning are convinced that that is a counterfeit, which under St. Paul's name, is inserted in some ancient bibles printed in Germany, or in Antwerp. We find it likewise in some old MSS. There is reason also to question whether that which the ancients speak of be the same with this, since we have it not in Greek; the copy published by Hutter in that language having been translated by him from the Latin. Besides, Philaster says, that the heretics have added something to the epistle to the Laodiceans; and Timotheus, priest of Constantinople, (libell. de his qui ad Ecclesiam accedunt, apud Meurs. Var. divin. p. 117.) tells us, that it was forged by the Manichees; now there are no traces of Manicheism, or of any other heresy in that which we have, which runs thus:—"Paul an Apostle not of men, nor by man, but by Jesus Christ, to the brethren who are in Laodicea, grace and peace to you from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. I thank God in all my prayers, that you are firm and persevering in good works, waiting for the promise of God at the day of Judgment. Suffer not yourselves to be moved by the vain talk of those who accuse the truth, that so they may persuade you to forsake the gospel which I have preached. I trust that God will so order things, that my disciples may continue fixed to the perfection of the truth of the gospel, and in the practice of good works, whereby they will deserve eternal life. The bonds which I bear for Jesus Christ are known to all the world, I rejoice at them, and take pleasure in them; and this will be of use to me in procuring eternal salvation, by the help of your prayers, and the assistance of the Holy Spirit, whether in life or death: for me to live in Christ is life, and to die is joy. He will grant you through his mercy to be always united with the most perfect love. Wherefore, dearly beloved brethren, as ye have learned that the Lord must come, continue in the same sentiments, and guide yourselves in his fear, and ye shall have eternal life, for it is God that worketh in you. Do therefore every thing that you do without sin, and practise continually that which is most perfect. My dearest brethren, rejoice in our Lord Jesus Christ, and shun all sordid gain. Direct all your petitions to God; remain firm in the opinion you have of Jesus Christ, and practise always that which is most perfect, true, pure, just, and lovely. Retain in your hearts what ye have learned, and ye shall have peace. All the saints salute you. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit, Amen. Cause this to be read to the Colossians, and read that which is directed to the Colossians."

But, if this epistle be spurious, as is agreed, what was that of the Laodiceans, which St. Paul requires the Colossians to read in their assembly? Marcion, (apud Tertul. contra Marcion, lib. v. cap. 11, & 17.) pretended that this was the epistle to the Ephesians; Grotius is of the same opinion, as are Le Clerc and Hammond. They say St. Paul having writ an epistle to the Ephesians and Laodiceans, conceived in the same terms, he desired that these should be looked on as circular letters throughout Asia Minor, and should be sent from one church to another. Now as Laodicea was nearer to Colossæ than Ephesus, St. Paul chose rather, that the Colossians should address themselves to the Laodiceans, than to the Ephesians, in order to receive this letter.

Others, in great number, both ancients and moderns, tell us, that this was an epistle, which the Laodiceans had written to St. Paul, and which that apostle was desirous the Colossians should read. There is some probability in this hypothesis; but we cannot deliver it as the true. St. Paul, one would think, should rather have sent from Rome the letter which he received from the Laodiceans, if he had a mind, that it should be read by the Colossians, than refer the Colossians to Laodicea for a copy of it.

Others affirm, that St. Paul wrote a letter to the Laodiceans at the same time with this to the Colossians, which letter is not come to our hands. But there is indisputable proof, that St. Paul did not then write to Laodicea; for he desires the Colossians to salute the brethren of Laodicea in his name, chap. iv. 15. We had better therefore suppose, that St. Paul speaks of the letter he received from Laodicea, which is lost. This fact indeed, is not certain; but it is the most plausible supposition, to explain the passage in question.

[It is by no means convenient to acknowledge, that Apostolic letters written to the churches for general benefit, are lost: and especially, when, as in this instance, a different opinion accounts as well, and even better, for expressions used. It is incredible, that for so short an epistle as the made-up one given above, to copy which would scarcely employ an amanuensis an hour, the Colossians should be referred to Laodicea: but, if we accept that to the Ephesians, as sent to several other churches also, with perhaps some small variations suited to the character and condition of each church, respectively, then we may easily conceive reasons why the Apostle referred the Colossians to Laodicea, rather than to Ephesus, or elsewhere, for the copy sent. This agrees with the existence formerly of copies addressed "to the Saints who are" a blank being left for the name of the city. Nor is there any thing so peculiar in the Epistle to the Ephesians, as should restrict it to that church, exclusively: for, as to the argument drawn from the magnificence of the architecture in Ephesus, (the famous Temple of Diana, &c.) it is evident, from the account given by Dr. Chandler of the remains of buildings at Laodicea, that the subject was as familiar to the Laodiceans as to the Ephesians; and that the buildings at Laodicea were not unworthy rivals in point of magnitude or of magnificence, to the most famous; whether in Ephesus, or in any other city. The error of Dr. Macknight, and others, in supposing that the Epistle to the Ephesians, was sent to them solely, or that that to the Laodiceans was sent to them solely, seems to be confuted by this very passage, in which the Apostle directs a reciprocal communication, for mutual and public instruction, of the monitions and exhortations received by these sister churches,—confirmed, probably, and explained by the same messengers—Tychicus, and others.]

[LAODICEA was long an inconsiderable place, but it increased towards the time of Aug. Cæsar. It had suffered during a siege by Mithridates. The fertility of the soil, and the good fortune of some of its citizens, raised it to greatness. Hiero, who adorned it with many offerings, bequeathed to the people more than two thousand talents. Laodicea, though an inland town, grew more potent than the cities on the coast, and became one of the largest towns in Phrygia; as its present ruins prove. Among the ruins seen by Doctor Chandler, was an amphitheatre, in a hollow, the form oblong, the area about one thousand feet in extent, with many seats remaining. At the west end a wide vaulted passage, designed for the horses and chariots; about one hundred and forty feet long. The entrance from without is choaked up, except a small aperture, at which the light enters; and the soil has risen above the imposts of the interior arch. This has an inscription on the mouldings, in large characters in Greek, which may be thus translated, "To the Emperor Titus Cæsar Augustus Vespasian, seven times consul, son of the Emperor the god Vespasian; and to the people. Nicostratus the Younger, son of Lycius, son of Nicostratus, dedicated at his own expense; Nicostratus his heir having completed what remained of the work, and Marcus Ulpius Trajanus the proconsul having consecrated it." The seventh consulate of Vespasian falls on the seventy-ninth year of the Christian æra, and the consulship of Trajan on the eighty-second. Twelve years were consumed in perfecting the structure.

"The city increasing, the stadium, it should seem, was not sufficiently capacious, but Nicostratus enlarged or lengthened it, and converted it into an amphitheatre, like that at Nysa.

"On the north side of the amphitheatre toward the west end, is the ruin of an extensive edifice. It consists of many piers and arches of stone, with pedestals and marble fragments. At the west end lies a large stone with an inscription; the city or people "has erected this to Ased, a man of sanctity and piety, and recorder for life; on account of his services to his country."

"From this ruin, you see the Odæum, which fronted southward. The seats remain in the side of the hill. The proscenium lies in a confused heap. The whole was of marble. Sculpture had been lavished on it, and the style partook less of Grecian taste than of Roman magnificence.

"Beyond the Odæum are some marble arches standing, with pieces of massive wall, the ruin, as is conjectured, of a gymnasium. This fabric, with one at a small distance, has been re-edified, probably after an earthquake, to which calamity Laodicea was remarkably subject. Westward from it are three marble arches crossing a dry valley, as a bridge. Many traces of the city-wall may be seen, with broken columns and pieces of marble used in later repairs. Within, the whole surface is strewn with pedestals and fragments. The luxury of the citizens may be inferred from their sumptuous buildings, and from two capacious theatres in the side of the hill, fronting northward and westward; each with its seats, rising in numerous rows one above another. The travellers in 1705 found a maimed statue at the entrance of the former; and on one of the seats the the word ΖΗΝΩΝΟΣ, Of Zeno. Beneath the hill on the north are stone sarcophagi, broken, subverted, or sunk in the ground.

"Laodicea, with Colossæ its neighbour, was enriched by sheep, which produced fleeces exceeding Milesian in softness, and the jetty raven in colour. Some shepherds came with their flocks to the ruins, and in the evening to the water near our tent, says Dr. Chandler. I remarked only one or two sheep which were very black and glossy.

"Laodicea was often damaged by earthquakes, and restored by its own opulence, or by the munificence of the Roman emperors. These resources failed, and the city, it is probable, became early a scene of ruin. About the year 1097 it was possessed by the Turks, and submitted to Ducas, general of the emperor Alexis. In 1120 the Turks sacked some of the cities of Phrygia by the Mæander, but were defeated by the emperor John Comnenus, who took Laodicea, and repaired or built anew the walls. About 1161 it was again unfortified. Many of the inhabitants were then killed, with their bishop, or carried with their cattle into captivity by the Turkish sultan. In 1190 the German emperor Frederick Barbarossa, going by Laodicea with his army toward Syria on a croisade, was received so kindly, that he prayed on his knees for the prosperity of the people. About 1196 this region, with Caria, was dreadfully ravaged by the Turks. The sultan, on the invasion of the Tartars in 1255, gave Laodicea to the Romans, but they were unable to defend it, and it soon returned to the Turks. We saw no traces either of houses, churches, or mosques. All was silence and solitude. Several strings of camels passed eastward of the hill: but a fox, which we first discovered by his ears peeping over a brow, was the only inhabitant of Laodicea." Trav. p. 225.

[The grandeur of this city A. D. 79. is sufficiently attested by these ruins; whence we infer, that at the date of the Epistle to the Colossians, A. D. 60. or 61. Laodicea was a place of consequence. Whether the church here were numerous, we do not know; but, from the Epistle in the Revelations addressed to its minister, it should seem to have fallen into a lukewarm state, about A. D. 96. and it is threatened accordingly. It should seem also, that the Laodiceans boasted of their wealth, and knowledge, and garments; which agrees with their history, that they were enriched by the fleeces of their sheep, and eminent in polite studies, as evinced by the Odæum, the Theatre, the Amphitheatre, the magnificent sculptures, &c. FRAGM. CCCXXVIII.]

LAPIDOTH, לָפִידוֹת, enlightened, or lamps, from לָפִיד lephad. [bright, or flashing eyes?]

VOL. II. PART XVII. Edit. IV.

LAPIDOTH, the prophetess Deborah's husband, Judg. iv. 4. Some are of opinion, that Lapidoth was the place of her birth, or habitation. Others considering the import of lapidoth, which signifies lamps, have imagined, that Deborah employed herself in making wicks for the candlestick in the tabernacle. [Others render lapidoth, splendors—i. e. "a woman of splendors"—a magnificent establishment, &c.]

LAPWING, in Latin, upupa, a bird by Moses declared to be unclean. Lev. xi. 19. The lapwing is about as large as a thrush; its beak long, black, thin, and a little hooked; its legs are grey and short. On its head a tuft of feathers of different colours, which it raises or lowers as it pleases. Its neck and stomach are something reddish. Its wings and tail black with white streaks. The Heb. דִּקְיָפָה dukipha, both LXX. and Jerom translate lapwing.

It is very beautiful, but does not sing. Pliny calls the lapwing—trimestris, because it is seen only three months. It retires, in all probability, betimes into warmer countries. It lives generally in old ruins, or along the highways. The male has a fuller and higher tuft than the female, and the colours of his feathers are brighter and more lively. It abounds in Germany† See the NATURAL HISTORY.

LASHA, לָשָׁה, Vulgate, Lesa; for crying: from the preposition לָ, for, and שָׁוָה shuah, to cry: otherwise, to save; from שָׁוָה jashah; otherwise, to anoint. [Simon thinks this name signifies attractive, pleasant, recreative.]

LASHA. Moses describing the limits of the land of Canaan says, that it reaches south to Lasha. Gen. x. 19. The Chaldee and Jerom think Lasha to be the stream Callirhoe, north of the Dead Sea, and which discharges itself into it. But it is much more natural to understand it of the city or Lasha, Lusa, or Elusa, [q. Al-asha] at pretty near an equal distance between the Dead Sea, and the Red Sea. Ptolemy mentions this city of Lusa, also, Stephens the geographer, and Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2.

LASTHENES, Λασθενής, force of stone; from λᾶς, or λίθος, a stone, and σθένος, strength.

LASTHENES, prince of Crete, who settled Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, on the throne of Syria, by his troops. Demetrius, in acknowledgment, gave Lasthenes the government of Syria, and the principal authority in his kingdom; he called him his father and cousin. But Lasthenes abusing his power, involved king Demetrius in great perplexities, out of which he never could disengage himself perfectly. A. M. 3856. ante A. D. 148. See LAUGHTER, risus. Laughter is an indication of joy, insult, mockery, assurance, or admiration. Sarah in her transport of joy called her son—Isaac, i. e. laughter. Gen. xxi. 6. Woe unto them that laugh now, says our Saviour, for they shall weep. Luke vi. 25. At destruction and famine thou shall laugh; thou shalt not fear it, thou shalt be perfectly secure against those evils. God laugheth at the wicked; he despises their vain efforts. Ishmael laughed at Isaac, he insulted him, he vexed him according to St. Paul. Gal. iv. 29.

Laughter in general implies rejoicing. There is a time to laugh, and a time weep, i. e. a time to rejoice, and a time to be afflicted. Eccl. iii. 4. Blessed are ye who weep now, for ye shall laugh. Luke vi. 21, 25. I said of laughter, of joy, pleasure, it is mad, Eccl. ii. 2. Your laughter shall be turned into mourning, your joy, shall terminate in sorrow, in repentance, in remorse. James iv. 9.

Laughter does not become a wise man. A fool lifteth up his voice with laughter, but a wise man doth scarcely smile a little. The laughter of a fool is as noisy as the crackling of thorns, Eccles. viii. 8.

Abraham's laughter, when God promised him a son, was an expression of admiration and gratitude, not of doubt: the Scripture which relates it, does not disapprove of it, as it does of Sarah's. Gen. xvii. 17.

LAW. This word, when alone, is taken for the Law of Moses; sometimes, for the religion of the Jews in opposition to the gospel. Josephus remarks, that the Greek legislators were modern in comparison of Moses, and that the ancient Greeks were unacquainted with the very term nomos, (law); it is not in Homer.

The Rabbins pretend, that Noah's sons received certain laws which compose the law of nature, and bind all people, in all countries. Maimonides believes, that the first six were given to Adam, and that God added a seventh to Noah. Of these precepts the first, ordains submission to judges and magistrates; the second, forbids—blasphemy against God; the third,—idolatry and superstition; the fourth,—incest, sodomy, bestiality, and sins against nature; the fifth—murder, and all effusions of blood; the sixth—theft; the seventh—the eating of the limb of an animal while living, i. e. eating of crude blood, &c.

A distinction is generally made between the law of nature, and positive laws. The law of nature is impressed on our hearts, such are our obligations to worship the Supreme Being, to honour our parents, and those in dignities, to obey superiors, to do to no man what we would not have done to us, &c. Positive laws are of several kinds: moral, civil, and political, or ceremonial. Moral laws are, generally, only consequences, or explanations, of the law of nature. Judicial, civil, and political laws regard principally the duties of men in society, the order and polity of the state; they restrain the violence of wicked men, they defend the weak from the oppression of the strong, and regulate duties, rights, and powers. Ceremonial laws respect the external worship of God, the duties of ministers and people towards God, and their reciprocal obligations to one another, with relation to the Divine Being.

The Law was given to the Hebrews, by the intervention of Moses, on Mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt, A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491. The principal laws are those of the Decalogue; vide Exod. xx. &c.

Some learned men have been of opinion, that Moses in most of his laws intended—either to imitate those of the Egyptians, or—to reverse their customs and maxims, or—to circumscribe the Hebrews, whereby to prevent their falling into those errors, idolatries and superstitions, which they had seen in Egypt. Others on the contrary have asserted, that the Egyptians imitated, in part, at least, the Hebrew laws. In this diversity of opinions, we think we ought ingenuously to confess, that the Hebrews often imitated the Egyptians; and that, reciprocally, the Egyptians sometimes copied the Hebrews: that the Egyptians having a different turn of mind, on many occasions kept at a distance from the Hebrews; in like manner, that the practices of the Mosaic laws, which oppose the superstition of Egypt, were not instituted without design, and that the Jewish legislator intended to cure the Israelites of their proneness to idolatry, and to correct the evil habits which they had contracted in Egypt.

As to Laws, judicial or ceremonial, we may believe that Moses acted according to his prudence, in retaining what might be useful among those of Egypt, in rectifying such as might be made good, and, by contrary laws, endeavouring to suppress what was opposite to justice, charity, reason, or to the true interest of his people.

The law of Moses being the shadow only of things to come, but bringing nothing to perfection, as St. Paul says, Heb. x. i. vii. 19. it was necessary that Jesus Christ should complete what what was imperfect in it, should reform what abuses it tolerated, and should fulfil what it only promised and typified: and this he has executed with great precision. He declares in the gospel, Matth. v. 17. that he came not to destroy the law, but to perfect it. He has enlarged, modified, or restrained the law of Moses, more particularly the explanations which the Rabbins, and masters in Israel, had given of it; explanations, which were rather corruptions, than illustrations.

St. Paul hath, in some sort, finished what our Saviour had begun; or rather he hath set in their full light, the purposes of his Master. E. gr. that, the law of Moses is, superseded, or abrogated by the gospel; that since the death of the Messiah the legal ceremonies are of no obligation; that, believers are no longer under the yoke of the law, but under grace; Rom. vi. 14. that Jesus Christ hath procured for us the liberty of sons, instead of the spirit of bondage, which reigned under the Old Testament: in a word, that it is neither the law nor the works of it, that justify Christians, Romans viii. but faith animated by charity, and accompanied with good works, Gal. iv. 31. v. 13. When we say, that the gospel hath rescued us from the yoke of the law, we understand only the appointments of the ceremonial and judicial law; not those moral precepts, whose obligation is indispensable, and whose observation is much more perfect, and extensive and enforced, under the law of grace, than it was under the old law.

As to the established laws of Moses, they who would see them more particularly may consult the articles Passover, Sabbath, Blasphemy, Adultery, Sacrifices, Burnt-Offerings, &c.

ORAL LAW, or tradition, which the Jews say they have received delivered down from their ancestors. They affirm, that Moses received equally the written, and the oral law, on Mount Sinai: that the latter was given only by word of mouth, and hath been transmitted by the elders. Thus they attribute equal authority to both, both having the same origin, and flowing equally from God. Nay, they give a preference to the oral, before the written law; for this, they say, is in many places obscure, imperfect, or defective, and could not be used as a rule without the assistance of the oral law, which supplies all that is wanting in the written law, and removes all difficulties.

Wherefore they add to the written law the explanations, modifications, and glosses of the oral law, and it is a sort of maxim among them, that the covenant which God made with them at Sinai, consists less in the precepts of the written law, than in those of the oral law; and to the latter they generally give the preference. They say, for example, that the words of the Levites are more lovely than those of the law; that the words of the law are sometimes weighty and sometimes light; whereas those of the doctors are always weighty: that the words of the elders were of greater weight than those of the prophets. They compare the sacred text to water, and the Mishna or Talmud, which contains their tradition, to wine: or, the written law to salt, but the Mishna and Talmud to most exquisite spices: the law is only, as it were, the body, but the oral law or tradition, is the soul of religion. Ever since our Saviour's time they have been reproached with making the word of God of no effect by their traditions. Mark vii. 13. See CABBALA.

LAW. This word often implies the whole scripture of the Old Testament. The Mahometans, after their leader Mahomet, maintain, that the Jews have corrupted the law, as the Christians, they say, have corrupted the gospel. This accusation purposes to discredit the Scriptures, and thereby disarm both Jews and Christians of the weapons necessary to destroy Mahometism, which is founded properly on this chimerical supposition only, and the diabolical calumnies of that infamous impostor. Directly as he had persuaded his followers of this, he put both Jews and Christians under a necessity of proving their copies authentic, free from corruption, and written by the inspired authors; in the mean while Mahomet impudently advances what he thinks fit, corrupts the histories of the Old and New Testaments, makes the patriarchs, Moses, and Jesus Christ, speak to suit his interests and system; and when we cry out against imposture and corruption, he says that we ourselves have altered the sacred writings, and that we have neither the law nor the Gospel entire and pure.

And wherein have the Jews falsified the books of the Old Testament? Why, say the Mahometans, by adding vowels, which before they had not. It is true, the vowel-points are of pretty modern invention; but this is no corruption of the text, it is a determination of the manner wherein we are to read certain words, which without this might admit of diverse meanings. But these vowel-points deprive no one of the liberty of reading otherwise, if he can find a better sense without them. They add farther, that in the books of Moses there is no precept which obliges the Jews to praying, fasting, almsgiving, or pilgrimage to Jerusalem; this is manifestly false: but, instead of examining the matter, the contest may be soon ended by saying with Mahomet, When they who have books present them to you, neither believe nor reject them; but say only, We believe in God, in his books, and in his messengers. On this principle the Mussulmen think themselves forbidden to translate, or to cite, any thing out of the law or the gospel.

LAZARUS, Λάζαρος, assistance of God: from my hazar, help, and לך el, God; probably the same as Eleazar.

I. LAZARUS, i. e. Eleazar, brother to Martha and Mary, dwelt with his sisters at Bethany, near Jerusalem; and Jesus Christ sometimes lodged with them, when he came to that city. While Jesus was beyond Jordan with his apostles, Lazarus fell sick; his sisters sent information to our Saviour, who said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God. After two days he said to his disciples, Lazarus is asleep, but I go to awake him: meaning, that he was dead, but he would restore him to life. Jesus on his arrival found, that he had been already four days in the grave. Martha having received intelligence of the approach of Jesus, went to meet him, and expostulated on his delay. Soon after Mary likewise went to meet Jesus, who seeing her weeping, was himself troubled. Then he asked, Where have ye laid him? When he came to the place, he said, Take away the stone; and Jesus having returned thanks to his Father for always hearing him, he cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus come forth!" Then he who was dead came forth bound hand and foot, with grave-clothes, and his face wrapped up in a napkin. This miracle being wrought, as we may say, at the very gates of Jerusalem, made a great noise; John xi.

Six days before his last passover, Jesus came again to Bethany, where he had raised Lazarus; and Lazarus was one who reclined at table with him. The Jews observing, that the resurrection of Lazarus had made a great impression on the people's minds, took a foolish resolution to effect the death of both. That part of their wicked design, which related to our Saviour, they executed; but Scripture does not tell us what became of Lazarus. Epiphanius says, that there was a tradition of Lazarus's being thirty years of age, when Jesus Christ raised him from the dead, and that he lived thirty years longer. So that he died by this account A. D. 63. The Greeks say, that he died at Citium, a town in Cyprus, where his sepulchre was to be seen near the walls of the city; and that churches in the same island were dedicated to his honour. The emperor Leo the Wise, having built a church at Constantinople in honour of St. Lazarus, about A. D. 890. sent to Cyprus, when his body was found near the town of Citium, in a marble tomb, the inscription whereof imported, that this was Lazarus beloved by Jesus Christ, and raised again by him. Grec. apud Lanoi de Magdalen, p. 222.

[It is remarkable, that the ancient Christian sculptures, and pictures, represent Lazarus as very young, some of them even as a child, at the time of his first interment. He was, probably, (much!) under twenty years of age.]

II. LAZARUS. Luke xvi. 19. speaks of a poor man, named Lazarus, who lay at a rich man's gate full of sores, and desired the crumbs which fell from his table, without finding relief or pity; while the rich man enjoyed great plenty, was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared magnificently every day. Lazarus being dead, was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man died also, and while he was in hell amidst his torments, he saw Lazarus afar off, and cried out, Father Abraham, have pity on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the end of his finger in water to refresh my tongue. But Abraham answered him, Son, thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus his evil things: now he is happy, thou art miserable, &c.

Interpreters are divided, whether this be a history or a parable. St. Irenæus, St. Ambrose, Gregory the Great, Tertullian, Euthymius, Luke of Bruges, and others, thought it a history, supposing the name Lazarus, and other particulars, to intimate something more than a parable. But St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril of Alexandria, Theophylact, and most modern interpreters, consider it as a parable. Others observe a medium, i. e. that the substance is historical; and that our Saviour has embellished it with parabolical circumstances. Lazarettoes or hospitals for the relief of lepers are dedicated to this St. Lazarus. There were abundance of them in France dedicated to St. Lazarus, St. Martha, and St. Magdalen. Among the French, as formerly among the Hebrews, they who were afflicted with a leprosy, were separated from other people; and the causes of lepers were committed to the ecclesiastical court.

[LEAD, is a very heavy metal, sufficiently well known. The mode of purifying this metal from the dross which is mixed with it, by subjecting it to a fierce flame, and melting off its scoria, furnishes several allusions in Scripture to God's purifying, or punishing his people.

The prophet Ezekiel, xxii. 18, 20. compares the Jews to lead, because of their guilt, and dross, from which they must be purged as by fire. Mention is made of a talent of lead, Zech. v. 7, 8. which probably was of a figure and size, as well known as any of our weights in ordinary use:

use: so that though weights are usually called in Hebrew stones, yet, perhaps, they had some of metal only, as this talent of lead, for instance.]

LEAGUE, vide COVENANT.

LEAH, לֵאָה, Asia, weary, tired.

LEAH, wife of Jacob, and Laban's eldest daughter. Her father led her into Jacob's chamber on the wedding night; Jacob took her to be Rachel, whom he had really married. When he complained of this imposition, Laban answered, that the custom of that country forbade the marriage of younger daughters before the elder. Gen. xxix. 23, &c. [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXVI.] The Lord observing Jacob to have more inclination for Rachel than for Leah, made Leah the mother of six sons and one daughter, viz. Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah: we know not the year of Leah's death; but she died in the land of Canaan, and was buried in the same cave with Sarah, Abraham, and Isaac. Gen. xlix. 31.

LEAVEN; in Greek, Ζύμα, zyme; in Latin, fermentum; in Hebrew, כֶּמֶץ seor. The Hebrews were forbidden by the law to eat leavened bread or any food with leaven in it during the seven days of the passover, Exod. xii. 15. 19. Lev. ii. 11. And they were very careful in cleansing their houses from all leaven before this feast began. God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; i. e. in cakes, or in any baked meats. But on other occasions they might offer leavened bread, or honey.—[The cases of conscience relating to this matter are very numerous, and seem to be a principal study of the Jewish doctors. Decisions of the most remarkable may be seen in the Mishnah, Ordo Festorum, tom. ii. 138.] See Num. xv. 20, 21. where God requires them to give the first-fruits of the bread, which was kneaded in all the cities of Israel, to the priests and Levites. St. Paul, 1 Cor. v. 7, 8. expresses his desire, that the faithful should celebrate the Christian passover with unleavened bread, 'in azymis,' which figuratively, signifies sincerity and truth; wherein he teaches us two things, first, that the law which obliged the Jews to a literal observance of the passover, is no longer in force; secondly, that by unleavened bread, truth and purity of heart were denoted.

OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.

But leavened bread was not used at all times: the Hebrews, in the passover, used unleavened bread seven days, in memory of what their ancestors did, when they went out of Egypt: they being then obliged to carry unleavened meal with them, and to make bread in haste; the Egyptians pressing them to be gone.

The Jews began to cleanse their houses from leaven on the 13th of Nisan; to this St. Paul in some places alludes, saying, "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" i. e. if there were but a small portion of leaven in a quantity of bread or paste, during the passover, it was thereby rendered unclean: it was to be thrown away and burned. Our Saviour in the gospel (Matt. xvi. 11.) warns his apostles to avoid the leaven of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, meaning their doctrine.

The practice of the Jews at this day, in relation to unleavened bread, is this: they are forbidden to eat, or to have in their houses, or in any place belonging to them, either leavened bread, or any thing else that is leavened. That they may the better observe this rule, they search all the corners of their houses, with most scrupulous exactness, for all bread or paste, &c. that is leavened. Having thus well cleansed their houses, they whiten them, and furnish them with kitchen and table utensils all new, or with others to be used only on that day. If they are of metal, they have them polished, and put into the fire to cleanse all impurity, which they may have contracted by touching any thing leavened. All this is done on the 13th of Nisan, on the eve of the passover, which begins the 15th, or, rather, on the 14th in the evening; the Hebrews reckoning their day from evening to evening. Leo of Modena's Cerem. Jews, Part iii. cap. 3.

LEBANAH, לִבְנָה, λεβανῶ, or λεβανὰ white, whiteness. A Nethinim, Ezr. ii. 45.

LEBANON, vide LIBANUS.

LEBAOTH, לִבְאוֹת, λεβαῶθ, lions, or sign of the heart; from לבב lebab, the heart, and אוֹת oth, a sign. A town in Judah, Josh. xv. [Called Beth Lebaoth, Josh. xix. whence I conclude that here was a temple; and, as the term appears to be dual, I suppose that two lionesses were the symbols which formed or accompanied the image of the idol. q. CYBELLE?—"Lions'-Town" is not an uncommon name. It occurs in Phœnicia, in Egypt, in Achaia, and in Sicily. As there could be but few lions either in Egypt, or in Achaia, and none in Sicily, the multitudes of this animal, or its haunts, could not give name to these places.]

LEBBÆUS, λεββαῖος, a man of heart; from לב leb, or לבב lebab, the heart.

LEBBÆUS, otherwise Judas or Thaddæus, brother to St. James the Less, son of Mary, sister to the blessed Virgin, and of Cleophas, brother to St. Joseph. He was married and had children. Nicephorus calls his wife Mary, lib. i. cap. 33. The Muscovites believe, that they received the faith from him. See JUDAS VI.

LEBNAH,

LEBNAH, לִבְנָה, moon, whiteness, brick, or incense. See LIBNAH, a city, Josh. xv. 42.

LEBONAH, לִבְנָה, white. From Judg. xxi. 19. we learn that Shiloh lies north of Bethel, and south of Lebonah. Maundrell takes it for Chan-Leban, four leagues from Sichem southward, and two leagues from Bethel.

[So called either from the production of incense in its district, or from the preparation of it in this city: or, much rather, from the whiteness of its soil.]

LECAH, לֶכָּה, Λαχά, who walks out, or goes away; from לָךְ jalac. [the walks, if a place; if a person, walker, 1 Chron. iv. 21.]

LEEK, porrum, a pot-herb generally known. The Hebrews complained in the wilderness, that manna grew insipid to them; they longed for the leeks and onions of Egypt. Travellers assure us, that in Greece and Africa the onions are excellent. The Egyptians are reproached with swearing by the leeks and onions of their gardens: allium cepesque inter Deos in jurejurando habet Egyptus, says Pliny. Juvenal ridicules that superstitious people, who did not dare to eat leeks, garlic, or onions, for fear of injuring their gods:

*Porrum et cepe nefas violare aut frangere moran;
O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!* Juven. Sat. xv.

*'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour?
Each clove of garlic is a heav'nly pow'r:
O holy nations, and O sacred clods,
Where ev'ry fruitful orchard teems with gods!*

LEES, faces. To drink up the cup of God's wrath, even to the lees: to drink the whole cup to the bottom. See Psalm lxxv. 8. Isai. li. 17. Ezek. xxiii. 34. The Rabbins say, that Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, drank the lees of all the foregoing ages.

The lees of the people, signifies the vilest part of them: the lees of Israel shall return from captivity, and be converted to the Lord. Isaiah xlix. 6, 7. God threatens by Zephaniah, to visit those who are settled on their lees, defixos facibus suis, hardened in their sins. Zeph. i. 12.

LEGIO, a town in Palestine, celebrated by Jerom and Eusebius. It lay at the foot of mount Carmel, fifteen miles west from Nazareth: in all probability the place still called Legune. It was a camp, where the Romans kept a legion of soldiers, to defend the passage from Ptolemais to Cæsarea Palestine.

LEGION. The Roman legions were composed each of ten cohorts, a cohort of fifty maniples, a manipule of fifteen men; consequently, a full legion contained six thousand soldiers. Jesus cured one who called himself "legion," as if possessed by a legion of devils; Mark v. 9.

He also said to Peter, who drew his sword to defend him in the olive-garden: thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, who shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? Matth. xxvi. 53.

[LEGS, are properly those limbs of an animal, by which it moves from place to place; yet, to manifest the Divine Omnipotence, and that God is not confined to one mode of action, many creatures have no legs, yet they move, (and some swiftly too) witness, serpents, worms, snails, &c. and various kinds of fishes, which pass from one place to another, not having even the rudiments of legs. N. B. Linneus classes some kinds of fishes by the situation of their fins, which he considers as answering the purposes of legs, or feet, to land-animals.]

But, beside being the instruments of motion, the legs of the human frame are the supporters of the body, and great means of strength they are, when in health, firm, stable, secure: as such Scripture often alludes to them, Psalm cxlvii. 10. Leg is sometimes used modestly, in the same manner as foot, vide FOOT, and FRAGMENTS, No. CLII.]

LEHABIM, לִהָבִים, flames, or, which are inflamed, or, the points of a sword; לִהָב lehab.

LEHABIM, third son of Mizraim. Some think Lehabim denotes the Lybians, one of the most ancient people in Africa. Part of them dwelt near Egypt, west of Thebais; others, along the Mediterranean. Lybia is very much scorched by the heat of the sun.

[Vulgate, Labeim: LXX. Labeim. 2 Chro. xii. 3. xvi. 8. In Nahum iii. 9. and Dan. xi. 43. we find mention of the Eubim, which the Vulgate and LXX. every where render Lybians: or, what comes to the same in Nahum and Daniel, they render Nubians. It is clear that this name describes colonies of Egyptians; whether to the west, or south, is the question. Vide LUDIM.]

It is probable that we should restrain our researches after this people to the continent of Africa. Certainly we ought to distinguish them from the Lydians of Lesser Asia.

Jonathan seems to read the Lybians: though some have understood the Lycians. The Arabic, in the Polyglott, reads, the inhabitants of Bahanis:—could this possibly be corrupted from Berenice? The Targum of Jerusalem reads Pentapolitanos; which was a region in the country of Cyrene, including the cities of Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, and Cyrene. Pliny, lib. v. c. 5. This is usually considered as a very probable situation for the Lehabim.]

LEHEM, לֶחֶם, bread; from לָחַם lechem: or war, fighting; from מִלְחָמָה milkamah, battle.

LEHI, לֶהֱי, the jaw-bone. Samson having vanquished vanquished the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, after the conflict threw away the jaw which had been his weapon; and called the spot where it fell, "the place of the lifting up of the jaw-bone—Ramath Lehi": becoming quickly very thirsty, he cried to the Lord and said, It is thou, Lord, who hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised. Hereupon God opened one of the large teeth in lechi, the jaw-bone, and a fountain sprung out of it, to allay Samson's thirst; and the place retained the name of Lechi, or the Jaw-bone. Judges xv. 18.

The Hebrews sometimes called naked, sharp, and steep rocks, teeth. 1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5. Job xxxix. 28. Now, God opened a rock called Mahtes, or the Cheek-Tooth, which was at the place where Samson obtained his victory, and which, for this reason he called Lehi, the Jaw-bone. This fountain issuing out of a rock called the Cheek-Tooth, at a place named the Jaw-bone, has persuaded some persons, that this fountain came immediately out of a tooth-hole in the ass's jaw-bone, which would be a very surprizing miracle. But as we have now explained the matter, the miracle of the fountain issuing out of the rock at Samson's prayer is acknowledged; and wonders are not to be multiplied without necessity. This opinion is followed by Josephus, by the paraphrast Jonathan, and by many commentators. This fountain subsisted long, and still subsists, probably, in Palestine. Glycas, and the martyr Antoninus, speak of it, as in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis. Joseph. Antiq. lib. v. cap. 10. Arias Mont. Drus. Pisc. Amama, Castell. Cleric. Schmid. Glycas, Annal. part. ii. p. 164. Anton. Martyr. in Itinerario.

[Perhaps this fountain gushed out at the very point in the rock where the jaw-bone of the ass struck when thrown away by Samson: though the water really issued from the rock, it might seem to issue from under the jaw-bone. But some think that the word Ramath should be taken in the sense of height; "the height of the jaw," i. e. of Lehi. However that might be, the name Lehi denoted a place so called; not the jaw-bone itself, of the ass. So there was in Laconia a place named Onon Gnathos, "the jaw-bone of the ass:" and many other places have been named from animals, or from their parts.]

LEMUEL, למנח, ירוֹ בֵּהּ, God with them, or, with him; from the preposition בְּ I, with, בְּ am, them, and לֵאלֹהִים, God. Prov. xxxi. 4.

LENTIL, a species of pulse. Esau sold his birthright to Jacob for a mess of lentils. Gen. xxv. 30. The lentils of Egypt were very much esteemed among the ancients. St. Austin says, they were carried into several parts of the world.

LENTISK, or Mastic-tree, in Latin, schinus; in Greek, schinos; the leaves are always green, the bark reddish, gummy, and pliable. It produces a kind of grape; and shoots out little hulls like the shell of a pea, containing a clear liquor. Mastic is taken from the lentisk-tree by making incisions in it. There is much of it in the islands of Chio and Candia, in Egypt, and the Indies.

There is mention made in [the apocryphal] Daniel of the lentisk-tree. One of the Elders, who accused Susanna, said—he saw her talking with a young man under a lentisk-tree,—sub schino. Daniel alluding to the sound of schinus, answers him: the angel of the Lord will cut thee in two, schisei se meson. From this allusion some have imagined, that the story of Susanna could have been written only in Greek; consequently that Daniel was not the author of it. In answer, it is said, perhaps the Greek translator changed the Hebrew name of the tree, and substituted schinos, which furnished him with this allusion; or, that there really was a like allusion between the Hebrew name of the tree, and the punishment threatened by Daniel. Vide MASTIC.

LENTULUS. There has been often printed a letter from Lentulus, a supposed proconsul of Judea, to the Roman senate. Vide Fabric, Oper. N. T. tom. i. p. 301. tom. ii. p. 486, 487. The following is a translation of it. "There has a man appeared here, who is still living, named JESUS CHRIST, whose power is extraordinary. He has the title given him of the Great Prophet; his disciples call him the Son of God. He raises the dead, and heals all sorts of diseases. He is a tall, well proportioned man; there is an air of serenity in his countenance, which attracts at once the love and reverence of those who see him. His hair is of the colour of new wine from the root to his ears, and from thence to the shoulders it is curled, and falls down to the lowest part of them. Upon the forehead it parts in two, after the manner of the Nazarenes. His forehead is flat, and fair, his face without any defect, and adorned with a very graceful vermilion: his air is majestic and agreeable. His nose and his mouth are very well proportioned, and his beard is thick and forked, of the colour of his hair; his eyes are grey, and extremely lively; in his reproofs he is terrible, but in his exhortations and instructions amiable and courteous: there is something wonderfully charming in his face, with a mixture of gravity. He is never seen to laugh, but he has been observed to weep. He is very strait in stature; his hands are large and spreading, and his arms very beautiful; he talks little, but with great gravity, and is the handsomest man in the world."

This letter is not to be regarded; but the reader perhaps will not be displeased to find it here.

LEOPARD, נמר nimr, pardus, a fierce animal, spotted with a diversity of colours; it has small white eyes, wide jaws, sharp teeth, round ears, a large tail; five claws on its fore-feet, four on those behind. It is said to be extremely cruel to man. Its name leopard, implies that it has something of the lion and of the panther; the word leopard is not met with in Latin authors till after the fourth century. The ancients read pardus in Latin, and παρδαλις pardalis, i.e. panther in Greek: the Vulgate uses always pardus, never leopardus.

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, in his Epistle to the Romans, uses the word leopard; which was a reason with Bochart for regarding that epistle as spurious, and not composed till the fourth century; but Pearson and Vossius acknowledge that epistle to be genuine; and reject the remark, that the word leopard was not known before Spartian, who uses it in the life of Geta.

The Eastern people call the leopard sometimes pars; the Arabians, beber; the Turks, jos; the Cathaians, jem; the ancient Greeks, jos, which the Latins sometimes translated lynx, or lupus-cervarius. The Persians, Turks, and Indians use a kind of leopard in hunting antelopes and hares. Thamurath, king of the first dynasty of the Persians, is said to have been the first who tamed this creature, and had it taught to hunt antelopes. Togrul-Ben-Arstan, sultan of the race of the Selgimides, trained four hundred of those animals for hunting, all having gold chains, and scarlet coverings.

It seems from Scripture, that this animal could not be rare in Palestine. We find a town there called Beth-nemrah, leopard's-house, [or temple] or simply Nemrah, or Nemrin, leopard, or leopards; Numb. xxxii. 3. 36. Is. xv. 6. Isaiah describing the happy reign of the Messiah says, chap. xi. 6. the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together. Jerem. says, chap. v. 6. that the leopard lies in ambuscade near the cities of the wicked; that all they who go out thence shall be torn in pieces by this animal. And Hosea, chap. xiii. 7. that the Lord will be unto them as a lion, and as a leopard, lurking in the way of the Assyrians, to devour those who pass by. [Probably, the animal called tiger, in the article on LIBANUS.]

The Hebrew נמר, nemor, a leopard, denotes something speckled with a variety of colours. Jeremiah speaks of the leopard's spots. Can the Ethiopian change his colour, or the leopard his spots? Scripture often joins the leopard with the lion, as animals of equal fierceness. Habakkuk says, i. 8. that the Chaldean horses are swifter than leopards. The spouse in the Canticles speaks of the mountains of the leopards, Cant. iv. 8. that is to say, of mountains such as Libanus, Shenir, and Hermon, where dwelt wild beasts. Brocard says, that the mountain called by the name of Leopards is two leagues from Tripoli northwards, and one league from Libanus. I can scarcely believe that Solomon in the Canticles had this mountain in view. See Bochart, de Animalib. Sacr. lib. iii. cap. 7. p. 785. See FRAGMENTS, on SOLOMON'S SONG, No. CCCXC.

LEPER. The law excluded lepers from society. It banished them into the country, and to places uninhabited: Levit. xiii. 45, 46. However persons attacked with this disease often got together, and composed a kind of companionship. We instance the four lepers without the city of Samaria, while Ben-hadad king of Syria besieged it; 2 Kings vii. 3, &c. and the ten lepers who came to Jesus Christ, and desired to be healed, Luke xvii. 12. This law was observed so punctually, that even kings, under this disease, were expelled their palaces, shut out of society, and deprived of the government, as Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah, who was afflicted with this malady for attempting to offer incense in the temple. 2 Kings xv. 5. 2 Chr. xxvi. 20.

When a leper was cured he appeared at the city gate, and the priest examined whether he were truly healed or not. Lev. xiv. 1. &c. After this he went to the temple, took two clean birds, made a wisp with a branch of cedar, and another of hyssop, tied together with a scarlet ribbon made of wool; an earthen vessel was filled with water, and one of these birds was fastened alive to the wisp we have mentioned. The leper who was cured killed the other bird, and let the blood of it run into the vessel filled with water. Then the priest took the wisp with the live bird, dipped both in the water tinged with the blood of one of the birds, and sprinkled the leper with it. After this the live bird was let loose, and the person healed, and purified in this manner, was again admitted to the society of the healthy, and to the use of things sacred.

Lepers were formerly frequent in Europe. Some are of opinion, that the Jews, who abounded here, contributed to the spreading of leprosy. Others, that they proceeded from the frequent frequent voyages made to Palestine in the time of the Croisades. These lepers were called ladres in French, and many lazarettoes were built for them, consecrated to St. Ladre, or Lazarus, brother to Mary and Martha, [rather, to LAZARUS II.]; or to St. Job. Matthew Paris says, there were nine thousand hospitals in Europe for lepers. They were obliged to keep close in their lazarettoes; and had marks fixed on them whereby they might be known. They generally carried clappers about them, that they might be distinguished and avoided.

For these last three hundred years leprosy has almost entirely ceased in Europe, or this disease has changed its name; and remedies have been found for it. The ablest physicians have believed, that it differed only in name from the venereal disease. M. Tournefort, who saw several lepers in the Levant, makes no doubt of it: some are incurable, because their distemper is inveterate, and has corrupted the whole mass of blood and humors; others are capable of being healed, by anti-venereals. Many are of opinion, that Job's disease was a leprosy, but in a degree of malignity which rendered it incurable, and produced a complication of diseases.

Manetho the Egyptian, Lysimachus, Molon, Appion the Grammarian, Tacitus, and Justin, affirm seriously, that the Jews left Egypt because of their leprosy. Each of these historians relates the story in his own way, with additional circumstances: but they all agree, that the Hebrews, who departed from Egypt, were attacked with a leprosy. Appion apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion, lib. ii. initio; & Tacit. lib. v. Justin lib. xxxvi.

Tacitus's account of the matter is as follows: Hist. lib. iii. "Several authors agree, that the distemper of the leprosy having spread itself very much in Egypt, king Bocchoris consulted the oracle of Ammon, to learn a remedy for this disease. The Oracle answered, that he must purge the kingdom from this sort of people, and remove them out of the country as hateful to the gods. Bocchoris hereupon gathered all those together who suffered under this disease, and ordered them to be conducted into a vast wilderness, there to perish with want. These unhappy wretches being reduced to this condition, not knowing what to do, were continually weeping and bemoaning themselves; but Moses, who was more resolute and considerate, told them that it was to no purpose to implore assistance from either gods or men, because they were detestable to one and the other; but, if they would have confidence in him, and follow him, as a guide sent from heaven, they might under his conduct come into a place of rest. They accompanied him therefore at all hazards. And as they were extremely incommoded with thirst, and expected nothing but death, Moses perceived a company of wild asses, which had just been feeding, he traced them, and having met them in a place covered with green grass, he conjectured that underneath it there might be a spring of water; he ordered the people to dig; and found enough to satisfy the thirst of all the multitude which followed him.

"After seven days' march they came into Judea, and made themselves masters of it: hence they observed rest on the seventh day, as the end of their journey and calamities; and they honoured an ass, as the means of saving their lives by showing them the spring of water. They preserved a great aversion to hog's flesh, in memory of the leprosy with which they had been afflicted, to which this animal is said to be very subject."

There are almost as many mistakes as words in this recital of Tacitus: nevertheless, other authors, who have discoursed on the origin of the Jews, speak of it in a still more wretched manner. The leprosy wherewith they are said to have been attacked, has engaged us to notice it. But if they had been all lepers, how came they to have so great an aversion to those who had this disease? See Josephus against Appion.

LEPROSY. Moses mentions three sorts of leprosy; In 1. men; 2. Houses; and, 3. Clothes. [The Jewish doctors distinguish several species of this disease. Chanina reckons sixteen only; R. Doza, thirty-six; but Ahiba multiplies them to seventy-two. See Mishnah, tom. iv. Tractatus de Plagis Lepre, cap. i. p. 213, 215.]

1. Leprosy in Men; this disease affects the skin, and sometimes increases in such a manner, as to produce scurf, scabs, and violent itchings, and to corrupt the whole mass of blood. At other times it is only a deformity, and nothing more, as Hipponetus informs us; and as the fathers say, speaking of the lepers in the gospel, cured by Jesus Christ. The Jews looked on the leprosy as a disease sent from God, and Moses prescribes no natural remedy for the cure of it. He requires no more than that the diseased person should shew himself to the priest, and that the priest should judge of his leprosy; if it appeared to be a real leprosy, capable of being communicated to others, he separated the leper from the company of mankind. He appoints certain sacrifices and particular ceremonies for the purification of a leper, and for restoring him to civil society, and to the participation of things holy.

The marks which Moses gives for the better distinguishing distinguishing a leprosy, are signs of the increase of this disease. An outward swelling, a pimple, a white spot, bright, and somewhat reddish, created just suspicions of a man's being attacked with it. When a bright spot, something reddish or whitish appeared, and the hair of that place was of a pale red, and the place itself something deeper than the rest of the skin; this was a certain mark of leprosy. They who have treated of this disease, have made the same remarks, but have distinguished a recent leprosy, from one already formed and become inveterate. A recent leprosy may be healed, but an inveterate one is incurable. Travellers who have seen lepers in the East say, that this disease attacks principally the feet. Prosper Alpinus, de Medicina Aegypti. lib. i. cap. 13. says, it is very common in Egypt. Maundrell, who had seen lepers in Palestine says, that their feet are swelled like those of elephants, or horses' feet, swelled with the farcy.

The common marks whereby physicians tell us an inveterate leprosy may be discerned are these. It makes the voice hoarse, like that of a dog which has been long barking, and the voice comes through the nose rather than the mouth: the pulse is small and heavy, slow and disordered: the blood abounds with white and bright corpuscles, like millet seeds: it is all a scurfy serum, without due mixture; so that salt put into it does not melt. It is so dry, that vinegar mixed with it bubbles up; it is so strongly knit together by imperceptible threads, that calcined lead thrown into it swims easily on the surface of it. The urine is undigested, settled, ash-coloured, and thick; the sediment like meal mixed with bran. The face is like a coal half extinguished, shining, unctuous, bloated, full of very hard pimples, with small kernels round about the bottom of them: the eyes are red and inflamed, and sparkle like those of a cat, they project out of the head, but cannot be moved either to the right or left. The ears are swelled and red, corroded with ulcers about the root of them, and encompassed with small kernels. The nose sinks, because the cartilage rots. The nostrils are open, and the passages stopped with ulcers at the bottom. The tongue is dry, black, swelled, ulcerated, shortened, divided in ridges, and beset with little white pimples. The skin of it is uneven, hard and insensible; even if a hole be made in it, or it is cut, instead of blood, a putrid sanies issues from it.

The nature and causes of leprosy have been much debated. The generality are of opinion, that the cause is internal, in the blood and humors; and that it does not appear outwardly, till it has corrupted every thing within. Others are of opinion, that it is owing to some outward cause.

I think it necessary to distinguish two sorts of leprosy, one proceeding from inward corruption, the other received by outward communication. Corruption of the blood may be in different respects, the cause, and the effect of a leprosy. It is the cause of it, when the blood being inwardly corrupted, either by bad diet, or other means, produces external effects. Corruption of the blood is the effect of this disease when it has been caught by touching any person infected with it, or any thing belonging to him; for a leprosy is very easily communicated: hence Moses has taken so much precaution to prevent lepers from any communication with persons in health. And his care extended even to dead bodies thus infected, directing that they should not be buried with others.

We have endeavoured to shew that leprosy, and other diseases related to it, are caused by imperceptible animalculæ, between the skin and flesh, which gnaw the epidermis and cuticula, and afterwards the extremity of the nerves and flesh.

We are of opinion likewise, that the venereal disease is a kind of leprosy, which the ancients were but too well acquainted with, though they have not given it the same name, nor ascribed the same origin to it, as we do to the French disease. See our Remarks on Job's Distemper.

[I think it is Peters, who, writing on Job, supposed he discovered an allusion to the riotous justice of a mob, in chap. xxxi. 22.

If I have lifted up my arm against the fatherless
When I saw my help in the gate,
Then let my arm fall from my shoulder-blade,
Yea, let my arm be broken from the bone.

i. e. "May I be pulled in pieces by the multitude." Whether the following disease may rather be hinted at, as a visitation from heaven, we need not determine; but, if leprosy can corrode the joints of the wrists, why not also the joints of the elbow, and of the shoulder? and, as a species of leprosy so terrible as this, could hardly escape being attributed to Divine infliction, as other species of this disease undoubtedly were, it seems to be possible, at least, that Job may intend to say, "though human power cannot punish me, my party being too prevalent, yet may Divine Omnipotence dismember my person by the most inveterate of diseases."

To add no farther remarks: we can hardly fail of observing the character, and terror in consequence, of this disease: how dreadful is the leprosy in Scripture! how justly dreadful, when so fatal, and so hopeless of cure!

"The

"The Negroes are subject to a leprosy of the very worst kind; it appears at the beginning, in scurfy spots upon different parts of the body; which finally settle upon the hands or feet, where the skin becomes withered, and cracks in many places. At length, the ends of the fingers swell and ulcerate; the discharge is acrid and fetid; the nails drop off, and the bones of the fingers become carious, and separate at the joints. In this manner the disease continues to spread, frequently until the patient loses all his fingers and toes. Even the hands and feet are sometimes destroyed by this inveterate malady, to which the Negroes give the name of batta-jou, incurable." MUNGO PARK'S Travels in Africa, p. 276.]

[Mr. Grey Jackson, in his "Account of Marocco," p. 192. informs us, that the species of leprosy called jeddem, is very prevalent in Barbary; it is common in Haka where oil argannick is much used, which is said to heat the blood. The lepers of that province are seen in parties of ten or twenty together, and approach travellers to beg charity. At Marocco there is a separate quarter, outside of the walls, inhabited by lepers only. Those who are affected with it are obliged to wear a badge of distinction whenever they leave their habitations, so that a straw hat, with a very wide brim, tied on in a particular manner, is the signal for persons not to approach the wearer. Lepers are seen in many parts of Barbary, sitting on the ground, with a wooden bowl before them, begging. They intermarry with each other."

Niebuhr gives the best account of the various kinds of leprosy in Arabia.]

2. The leprosy of Houses, mentioned Leviticus, xiv. 34, &c. must have been known to the Israelites, who had lived in Egypt, and must have been common in the land of Canaan, whither they were going, since Moses says to them: When ye come into the land of Canaan which I give you for a possession, if there be a house infected with a leprosy, he to whom the house belongs, shall give notice of it to the priest, who shall go thither. If he sees as it were little holes in the wall, and places disfigured with pale or reddish spots, which in sight are lower than the wall, he shall go out of the house, and direct it to be shut up for seven days. At the end of this time, if he finds that the leprosy is increased, he shall command the stones infected with the leprosy to be taken away, and thrown without the city into some unclean place. New stones shall be put in the room of those which were plucked out, and the wall shall be again rough-cast. If the leprosy does not return, the house shall be thought clean; but if it returns, it is then an inveterate leprosy; the house shall be declared unclean, and immediately be demolished: all the wood, stone, mortar, and dust, shall be cast out of the city into an unclean place.

The Rabbins and some others conclude, that this leprosy of houses was not natural, but was a punishment inflicted by God on wicked Israelites. But we believe this kind of leprosy to be caused by animalculæ which erode the stones: [Journal des Sçavans, A. D. 1668]. These animalculæ are black, about two lines in length, and three-quarters of a line broad, inclosed in a greyish shell, with a very large head, ten very black and very round eyes, four kind of jaws disposed like a cross, which are continually stirring, and open and shut like a pair of compasses with four branches. The mortar is eaten by an infinite number of little worms, which are somewhat black, about the size of mites in a cheese, and like mites, they have four pretty long feet on each side. [Query, the Dry-rot in timber—in stones, a Salt-petre wall!]

3. The leprosy in Clothes is likewise noticed by Moses, as common in his time: he says, if any greenish or red spots be observed on any woollen or linen stuffs, or on any thing made of skin, they shall be carried to the priest, who shall shut them up for seven days; and if at the end of this time these spots increase, and spread, he shall burn them, as infected with a real leprosy.

If these spots are not increased, the priest shall command the clothes to be washed; and if he afterwards observe nothing extraordinary in them, he shall declare them to be clean. If the greenish or red spots remain, he shall order the garments so spotted to be burnt, as unclean: or, if they spread and increase, he shall order the garment to be burnt; or, if the place suspected of a leprosy be in colour like a singed garment, and deeper than the rest; this part of the garment shall be taken away, and the rest preserved.

To explain the nature and causes of this leprosy in clothes, we are of opinion, (and experience confirms it,) that wool ill scowered, stuffs kept too long, and some particular tapestries in Auvergne, are subject to worms and moths which eat them. It is very credible, that the leprosy in clothes and skins mentioned by Moses, was caused by vermin. In hot countries, and in times when arts and manufactures were not so perfect as now, woollen stuffs and works were probably more exposed to vermin, than in our cooler climates, and at present.

We know not who was the inventor of letters and writing. All agree that it is an admirable and divine art. To paint speech, and speak to the eyes, and by tracing out characters in different forms, to give colour and body to thought.

Some have been of opinion, that God when he inspired man with reason and speech, communicated to him likewise writing. Josephus speaks of certain columns, erected before the deluge, by the sons of Seth, upon which they had written astronomical observations and inventions. Adam and Enoch have been reputed authors of certain books, by some, who consequently supposed that they had the use of writing.

Others maintain, that the use of letters is much later: some give the honour of them to Abraham; others to Moses; others to the Phœnicians others to Saturn; others to the Egyptians. Others, more rationally, divide the honour of this invention among several, and acknowledge that it began among the Eastern people, and was much later among those in the West; that some invented, and others perfected the invention: that letters in the beginning were uncommon in their use, and imperfect in their forms: that afterwards they were perfected, and their use rendered more familiar.

Crinitus says, that Moses invented the Hebrew letters; Abraham the Syriac and Chaldee; the Phœnicians theirs, which they communicated to the Greeks, who carried them into Italy; Nicostratus those of the Latins, Isis the Egyptian, Ulphila those of the Goths. But all this is probably affirmed at random; for it is beyond question, that the Hebrew and Phœnician letters were anciently the same, or differed very little. The Greek and Latin letters are no new invention; the Greek are taken from the Phœnician, and the Latin from the Greek. The writing used by Ulphila is taken from the Greek or Latin.

The Egyptian writing, we are assured, was in the beginning hieroglyphics, or figures of animals, and other things, engraven on stone, or painted on wood, by help whereof the Egyptians preserved the memory of great events. This way of writing is perhaps the most ancient. We still see many instances of it on Egyptian obelisks and marbles. Marsham is of opinion, that this way of writing was invented by the second king of Memphis, Thauth, whom the Greeks call the First Mercury; another Thauth, or the Second Mercury, put into common characters what the first had written in hieroglyphics. All this was in times of the most remote antiquity, if Menes the first king of Memphis, was Ham the son of Noah.

Lucan affirms, that the Phœnicians invented the common letters before the Egyptians were acquainted with the use of paper, or with the art of writing in hieroglyphical characters.

Phœniceæ primi, famæ si creditur, ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris
Nondum fluminae Memphis contexere biblos
Noverat, & laevis tantum volucresque feræque
Sculptaque servabant magicas animalia linguae.

Lucan. lib. iii.

It was probably therefore in imitation of the Phœnicians, that the Egyptians used letters in their writing. We cannot be certain that the Egyptians borrowed them from the Phœnicians or Canaanites their neighbours; but two things we know, first, that there were great resemblances in the ancient characters of the two people; secondly, that Moses, who was instructed in all the learning of Egypt, wrote in Phœnician characters. The old Egyptian letters are at present unknown, though many of them remain. This people lost the use of their writing ing when under the dominion of the Greeks, and the Coptic or modern Egyptian character is formed from the Greek.

The Phœnicians spread the use of their letters throughout all their colonies. Cadmus carried them into Greece; the Greeks perfected them, and added others. They communicated them to the Latins, and, after the conquests of Alexander, extended them over Egypt, and Syria: so that the Phœnician writing, which is so ancient, and the parent of so many others, would at this day be entirely forgot, had not the Samaritans preserved the Pentateuch of Moses, written in the old Canaanite or Hebrew character; by the help whereof medals, and the small remains of Phœnician monuments, have been deciphered.

What I have said of the old characters of the Samaritan Pentateuch, is not assented to by all. Some learned men, as Postellus, Buxtorf the Son, and certain Talmudists, maintain, that the square Hebrew character of the Jews at this day, is the same as was used by Moses. Others, in greater number, as Origen, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Jerom, Bede, Genebrard, Bellarmine, many of the Rabbins, and the most learned critics suppose, that the Jews gradually quitted their old characters while in captivity at Babylon, and substituted the Chaldee, which are used at this day, while the Samaritans preserved their Pentateuch written in old Hebrew, or Phœnician characters. Lastly, other men of learning, as Rabbi Azarias, Abdias de Bartenora, Postellus, Buxtorf, Conringius, and father Sghambati, distinguished two sorts of characters among the old Hebrews, civil and sacred. The civil is that of the Samaritans, the sacred that of the Jews; but, of this distinction there is no proof produced.

It is generally said, that the Hebrews have no vowels, and that to supply the want of them, they invented the vowel-points, sometimes used by them in their books. But it is certain, that they have vowels, though they do not always express them in their writing; and that the sound, powers, and quantity of these vowels are not always the same, as happens likewise in other languages. א Aleph, ו Vau, י Jod, and י Hain are vowels; ה He is an aspirate only. The vowel-points are modern, and the invention of the Massorets, about the middle of the ninth, or the beginning of the tenth century. The honour of them is ascribed principally to the Rabbins Asher and Naphtali, who lived at that time. The vowel points are ten in number, and express the five vowels according to their different changes and pronunciations. See F. Morinus's Exercitationes, Walton's Prolegomena, &c. [The inquisitive reader may find the substance of the dispute for and against the Antiquity of the vowel-points clearly and concisely represented by Dr. Prideaux in the first Part of his Connection, &c. Book v. and from thence may have a distinct view of the chief arguments produced pro and con in this controversy, by those eminent antagonists Capellus, the two Buxtorfs, &c.] Vide POINTS, MASSOR, MASSORETS.

The Hebrews have certain acrostic verses, which begin with the letters ranged in alphabetical order: they may be called likewise alphabetical, as if they had been composed with design of teaching children their alphabet, and the order of the letters. The most considerable is Psalm cxix. which contains twenty-two stanzas of eight verses each, all acrostic; i. e. the eight first begin with א Aleph, the next eight with ב Beth, and so on. Other Psalms, as xlv. xxxiii. have but twenty-two verses each, beginning with one of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. Others, as cxi. cxii. have one half of the verse beginning with one letter, and the other half with another. Thus:

.... Blessed is the man who feareth the Lord,
.... Who delighteth greatly in his commandments.

The first half of the verse begins with א Aleph; the second with ב Beth. The lamentations of Jeremiah are likewise in acrostic verse, as well as the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, from the eighth verse to the end.

The Jews use their characters not only for writing, but for numbers, as did the Greeks, who in their arithmetical computations fixed a numerical value on their letters. But I do not believe the ancient Hebrews did so, nor that letters were numerical among them. I see no evidence of this in Scripture. The sacred authors always write the numbers intire and without abbreviation. I know that some learned men have attempted to rectify dates, or supply years, on a supposition that the letters served for numerals in the Scripture; but it was incumbent on them first, to prove that the ancient Hebrews used that manner: as the present Jews do.

The cabalists have refined much on the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Other Rabbins have likewise found mysteries in certain letters of the Hebrew text, some whereof are turned topsy turvy, [or reversed] others suspended, others closed; all which, according to these doctors, is mysterious, and deserves particular consideration; but be this done designedly or accidentally, we may affirm, that the letters in themselves, separately from the word which they compose, have no sense, and include no mystery. If any will refine on their order and forms, and discover in in them morality, or mystery, let them; provided they do not pretend to use their ideas or reflections as proofs of any thing. See CABALA.

Our Saviour says, Matt. v. 18. That not one jot or one tittle of the law shall pass away till all be fulfilled: this is a proverbial way of speaking, that all, whatsoever is written, shall, without exception, be accomplished. The same may be said of these words of Jerom, Quæ minima putantur in lege Domini, plena sunt sacramentis.

Some of the ancients have spoken of the book of Heaven, legi in tabulis cæli, and the letters as it were engraved there, by the help whereof they who understood it, discovered what was to come, and saw into ineffable mysteries. Picus of Mirandola, in Astrolog. lib. viii. cap. 5. who had studied the Cabalists, said, that as the astrologers saw certain images in heaven, from whence they drew their consequences; so the Jewish masters have their alphabet in heaven, and maintain, that they find there the elements and characters of their language. Agrippa affirms the same, de Occult. Philosoph. lib. iii. cap. 20.

Postellus says he made the experiment. Perhaps, says he, I may pass for an impostor, if I affirm, that I have read in the heavens in Hebrew characters, whereof Ezra left the key, whatsoever there is in nature; nevertheless, God and his Son are my witnesses that I do not lie; I will only add that I so read it implicitly only. I do not question but an imagination powerfully struck, may read what it pleases, and in what characters it pleases in the heavens, and in the stars. To support this whimsical opinion, these doctors misapply the words of Psalm xix. 1. 5. The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work: their sound is gone out into all lands, &c.

The letter contrary to the spirit. A way of speaking in St. Paul's epistles; very common in the ecclesiastical style, Rom. ii. 27, 29. vii. 6. 2 Cor. iii. 6, 7. God hath made us ministers of the New Testament, not by the letter, but by the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit quickneth. i. e. the law of Moses is incapable of giving life to the soul, and justifying before God those who are most servilely addicted to the literal observance of it. To obtain holiness we must join with it the spirit of faith, hope, and charity; must supply what is deficient in literal observances, by spiritual actions of a more sublime, perfect, and excellent nature; for example, instead of bloody sacrifices, the sacrifice of a humble and contrite heart: the mortification of passions; death unto sin, &c.

After Sicheu, the son of Hamor had violated Dinah, Jacob's Daughter, and sister to Levi and Simeon: these two brethren fraudulently engaged Sicheu to receive circumcision, and, on the third day, when the pain was greatest, they entered the town of Sicheu, slew all the males, retook their sister Dinah, and pillaged the place. Genes. xxxiv. 25, 26. This action was very displeasing to their father Jacob; Simeon and Levi replied, "Should they violate our sister?" &c.

Levi went down into Egypt with his father, having three sons, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari. When Jacob blessed his sons, he said to Simeon and Levi: "Ye are brethren, and too much united in doing mischief; ye are the instruments of unjust war. God forbid that I should be a partaker in their evil designs, and that my honour should be concerned in their combinations; for in their fury they killed a man, and in their resentment they pierced a wall. Cursed be their anger for it was fierce, and their wrath for it was cruel. I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." Gen. xlii. 11. xlix. 5, 6.

Accordingly, Levi was scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but cities in the portions of other tribes. Nevertheless, he was not the worse provided for, since God chose the tribe of Levi for the service of his temple, and for the priesthood, bestowed many privileges on it, above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life; all the tithes, first-fruits, and offerings, presented at the temple; several parts of all the victims, &c.

The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, an ancient, but apocryphal book, informs us, that the priesthood should be settled in the family of Levi; and that the Saviour of the world should be born of his tribe, and that of Judah. It was the opinion of many of the ancients, that the blessed Virgin was of the two tribes of Levi and Judah; of Judah by her father, and of Levi by her mother. Levi, as this book says, died in Egypt, aged an hundred and thirty-seven years, and his sons, at their return into the land of Canaan, buried him in the cave of Hebron.

LEVIATHAN, לֵוִיתָן, Δράκων. This word the fathers understand generally, in a moral sense, sense, of the devil, the enemy of mankind, the serpent. 2 Esdras vi. 47, 51. The word leviathan, according to its etymology, signifies a large fish, or a sea monster. לֵוִיָּאֵת leviath may signify what is joined, fastened, or tied together; and יָתָן than, a great fish; q. "the great fish covered with scales, stuck close one upon another." The crocodile we know is very long and large, and has scales so strong, and thick, that the darts of huntsmen and the hooks of fishermen cannot penetrate them. In our opinion, leviathan signifies a crocodile.

Job gives an admirable description of the leviathan in chap. xli. which may be very naturally explained of the crocodile. Others interpret it of the whale, or what the French call the mulart, which is a very large fish in the Mediterranean: others, by leviathan, understand, generally, all large fish and sea monsters. Bochart, de Anim. Sacr. Part i. lib. i. cap. 7. and Part. ii. lib. v. cap. 16, 17. shews at large that it is the crocodile. He quotes the Talmud, in the treatise on the sabbath, where it is said, that the calbit, or sea-dog, is the terror of the leviathan.

Job speaking of the leviathan, asks, Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook, or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Is the crocodile one of those fish which may be caught with a hook, and fastened by the tongue; or strung through the mouth and gills, to be carried about? This question implies a thing impossible, which no one could attempt without great temerity. Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 70. relates a way of taking the crocodile with a hook; but this probably was not invented in the time of Job. That historian says, they threw a piece of hog's flesh fastened on a large strong hook, into the Nile. The fishermen standing on the shore, made a pig cry: the crocodile immediately came forward, and swallowed the bait; the fishermen drew it on shore, threw mud into its eyes, (which are very small in proportion to the size of the head) and then killed it.

Canst thou put a hook through his nose, or bore his jaws through with a thorn? as they did beasts of service, as camels and buffaloes, which were guided in this manner, and directed at pleasure: Is the crocodile one of those gentle and tractable animals? See Isaiah, xxxvii. 29. where the prophet speaks of piercing in this manner the muzzles of beasts of burden. I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy mouth. The Hebrew of Job may be otherwise interpreted. Wilt thou put light into his nostrils, or pierce his jaw with a thorn? like those small fish which are carried to market, strung together in this manner. [See PLATE I. of ARABIAN DRESSES.] Shall the companions make a banquet of him? Shall they part him among the merchants? Or, as others propose, shall the enchanters cut him up, and the Canaanites divide him in pieces for sale? Shall they charm him like a serpent, and cause him to burst with their enchantments?

Lay thine hand upon him, remember the battle, and talk no more; according to the Hebrew, Lay thine hand upon him and never think of the battle: behold, the hope of him is in vain; shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? The crocodile is a very dreadful creature; the hardest warrior will not dare to appear before him. Heliodorus, Æthiopic. lib. i. reports of one Artemidorus, who lighting by chance on a crocodile while he was sleeping on the sands, was so scared, that he instantly lost both his understanding and memory. Job continues, None is so fierce that he dare stir him up. It would be very great rashness to attempt it. Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Tentyra destroyed crocodiles wherever they could find them.

Who can discover the face of his garment, or who can come to him with his double bridle? The crocodile sleeps in the day time on the sands, with his mouth open; but notwithstanding his being asleep, who will dare to harness him? His body is like shields of cast brass; it is covered with scales pressed close one upon another. The crocodile is one of the largest inhabitants of rivers that is known; some have been seen five-and-twenty, or thirty feet in length: the scales of its back are so hard, there is no piercing them: Under the belly the skin is tender, and this is the only place where it may be wounded. Who shall open the entrance of his jaws? Terror dwells about his teeth. The head of this animal is oblong, and the mouth extremely large. It has thirty-six very solid, sharp teeth, in its upper jaw, and as many in the lower. His teeth shut one within another like the teeth of a saw. When he opens his mouth, the opening is so wide, that he could swallow a man, or even a heifer, entire. His head is oblong, and divided almost up to his ears. There have been some seen in India so large, that a tall man might stand upright between the jaws. They are said to move the upper jaw, whereas other animals move the lower jaw only.

By his weesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or cauldron: his breath kindleth kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth. This poetical description admirably expresses the vivacity of the crocodile's eyes, when he springs out of the water, the rapidity wherewith he pursues his prey, and the rapacity with which he devours it. Strength is in his neck, and famine walketh before him. The crocodile is in shape like a lizard. His strength consists principally in his neck and head. He ravages every thing; he kills animals of all kinds, and lays waste the fields; which cannot be expressed better than by saying, "famine walketh before him."

The flakes of his flesh are joined together, they are firm in themselves, they cannot be moved. His body is all nerve and muscle; it is, as it were, impenetrable and invulnerable. His heart is as firm as a stone, yea as hard as a piece of the nether millstone. These expressions describe most justly the strength, courage, and intrepidity of the crocodile. Nothing frightens him. Neither swords, darts, nor breast-plates, can stand before him. Travellers agree, that the crocodile's skin is proof against swords, darts, arrows, and fire-arms: if any would pierce him, he must strike him under the belly. He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood. The arrows cannot make him flee; slingers are turned with him into stubble.

He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.

In the oriental style, great rivers and lakes are called seas. There are crocodiles not only in the Nile, but in lakes. Those of the lake Mæris were adored in Egypt; they carefully prepared provision for them, they put rich pendants in their ears, and costly bracelets on their legs. When the crocodile stirs himself with impetuosity, or casts up water through his mouth, he makes the lake or river he plays in, to boil like a cauldron; his odour is like that of musk; not only while he is alive, but his flesh after his death retains this scent.

He beholdeth all high things, he is a king over all the children of pride; this some explain by saying, that the crocodile is the king of other fish; but it may be better understood of the Egyptians, who are often called in scripture children of pride; or proud. Ezek. xxxii. 12. Psa. lxxxix. 10. Is. li. 9. Job xxvi. 12. The crocodile was their king, their god. In Hebrew the word king often means the god of any nation; every one knows, that the Egyptians worshipped the crocodile, and that the crocodile was an emblem or figure of Egypt. See the PLATES, MEDALS of EGYPT.

In chapter iii. 8. he says; Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up a Leviathan. He means, in our opinion, the Atlantes, and the people of Upper Egypt, who curse the sun, because they are burnt by the excessive heat of it. Vide Strabo lib. xvii. p. 563. Pliny, lib. v. c. 8. Herodot. lib. iv. cap. 184; and who are so daring, as to wake the crocodile in order to attack, kill and eat him. Psalm lxxiv. 14. Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 69. Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 25. lib. xxviii. cap. 3. Ezekiel describes the king of Egypt by the name of great Than, i. e. great dragon; great fish. Isaiah, xxvii. 1. threatens with death leviathan the piercing serpent; Visitabit Dominus super leviathan, serpentem vectem, & super leviathan serpentem tortuosum; i. e. the king of Babylon; and leviathan, the crooked serpent, i. e. the king of Egypt. The royal prophet says, that the Lord created the leviathan to play in the waters. Psalm civ. 26.

LEVIR, LEVIRATE. We use this term, as other authors have done, to denote particularly that law of Moses, which obliges one brother to marry the widow of another, who died without children; and to raise up seed to him. From levir, which signifies in Latin the husband's brother, the brother-in-law; the word levirate has been formed. See Deut. xxv. 5. [Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXXVI. CXXV.]

This law is an exception to that which condemns marriages between brothers and sisters, and between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law. This law seems to have been in force among the Hebrews and Canaanites, before Moses; since Judah gives Er, his first-born, and Onan his second son, to Tamar, and obliges himself to give her likewise Shelah, his third son.

The instance of Ruth, who married Boaz, is an evidence of this practice under the judges. Boaz was neither the father of, nor the nearest relation to Elimelech, father-in-law to Ruth, the widow of Mahlon, yet he married her, after the refusal of the next of kin. The Rabbins suggest many exceptions and limitations to this law; as, that the obligation on the brother of marrying his sister-in-law, regards only brothers born of the same father and mother; that it has respect only to the eldest brother of the deceased; and farther, supposes that he was not married; for if he were married, he might either take or leave his brother's widow. If the deceased brother had left a natural or adoptive son or daughter, a grandson or grand-daughter, the brother was under no obligation to marry his widow. If the dead person left many wives, the brother could marry but one of them: if the deceased had many brothers; the eldest alone had a right to all his estate, and enjoyed the property property which his wife had brought him. —They add, that the marriage of the widow with her brother-in-law was performed without solemnity; because the widow of the brother who died not having children, passed for the brother-in-law's wife, without any occasion for more ceremony. Notwithstanding, custom required that this should be done in the presence of two witnesses, and that the brother should give a piece of money to the widow. The nuptial blessing was added, and a writing to secure the wife's dower. Some believe, that this law was not observed after the Babylonish captivity, because, since that time there has been no distinction of inheritances among the tribes. The present Jews do not practise this law, or at least very rarely.

The ceremony of the refusal is described by Leo of Modena in the following terms:

"Three Rabbins and two other witnesses the evening before, choose a place where the ceremony may be performed. The next day when they come from morning prayers, they all follow the Rabbins and witnesses, who in the appointed place, sit down, and order the widow and her brother-in-law to appear before them, who declare that they there present themselves, in order to be free. The principal Rabbins propose several questions to the man, and exhort him to marry the widow, then, seeing him persist in his refusal, after some other interrogatories, the man puts on one of the Rabbins' shoes, which is fit for any foot; and the woman in the meantime draws near to him, and assisted by the Rabbins, says to him in Hebrew, My husband's brother will not continue the posterity of his brother, in Israel, and refuses to marry me, as being my brother-in-law. The brother-in-law answers, I have no mind to take her. Hereupon the woman stoops down, loosens and pulls off the shoe, throws it upon the ground, spits before him, and says in Hebrew to him, with the help of the Rabbins. So shall it be done unto that man who will not build up his brother's house; and his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed. These words she repeats three times, and they who are present answer as often, He that hath his shoe loosed. The Rabbins immediately tells her, that she may marry again; and if she requires any certificate of what is done, the Rabbins deliver one to her." Leo of Modena, p. 4. cap. 7.

From this it appears, that the Rabbins do not understand Moses's words literally, that the woman shall spit in his face; but explain it, she shall spit in his presence, she shall spit on the ground before him; yet the text is express for the former meaning, and Josephus took it literally in the history of Ruth, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 11. (πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐν τῷ πρόσωπῳ, instead of ἐν τῷ ὤφει.) To spit in any one's face is a mark of the highest contempt, Numb. xii. 14. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXVI.

What is said of giving his brother's name to the eldest son which he shall have by her, may be understood two ways. 1. He shall bear the name of the deceased; if that was Abraham, the son shall be called Abraham. 2. He shall bear the name of the deceased; he shall pass for his son; shall support his name, family, &c. Hebrew literally Deut. xxv. 6. וְנָקָם עָלָיו בְּיָמָיו. He shall be raised upon his brother's name, he shall be like a young sucker shooting out of his father's name. The example of Ruth, who called her son by Boaz, Obed, not Mahlon, the name of her first husband, proves, that it was not necessary the child should receive the name of his mother's first husband.

Leo of Modena observes, that the Jews sometimes from avarice, keep their sisters-in-law long in suspense, without declaring whether they will marry them or no, to tire their patience, and draw money out of them; wherefore some fathers, if they marry their daughters to men who have several brothers, stipulate, that they shall set the widow at liberty gratis. Others oblige the husband, in case he falls sick, and is in danger, to divorce his wife, that she may not come into the power of her brother-in-law. The marrying a sister-in-law the Jews call ibum, and the pulling off the shoe and setting a woman at liberty, they call chaleza.

LEVITES. All descendants of Levi may be comprised under this name: but principally, those who were employed in the lower ministries of the temple, whereby they were distinguished from the priests, who being descended from Aaron, were likewise of the race of Levi by Kohath, but were employed in higher offices.

The Levites were descendants of Levi, by Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, excepting the family of Aaron; for the children of Moses had no part in the priesthood, and were only common Levites. God chose the Levites instead of the first-born of all Israel, for the service of his tabernacle and temple. Numb. iii. 6, &c. They obeyed the priests in the ministrations of the temple, and brought to them wood, water, and other things necessary for the sacrifices. They sung, and played on instruments, in the temple, &c. They studied the law, and were the ordinary judges of the country; but subordinate to the priests.

God provided for the subsistence of the Levites, by giving them the tythe of corn, fruit and cattle: but they paid to the priests the tenth of their their tythes; and as the Levites possessed no estates in land, the tythes which the priests received from them, were looked on as the first-fruits which they were to offer to the Lord. Numb. xviii. 21, 22, 23, 24.

God assigned them for their habitations forty-eight cities, with fields, pastures, and gardens. Numb. xxxv. Of these, thirteen were given to the priests, six whereof were cities of refuge. Joshua xx. 7. xxi. 19, 20, &c. While the Levites were actually employed in the temple, they were subsisted out of the provisions in store there, and out of the daily offerings; and if any Levite quitted the place of his abode, to serve the temple, even out of the time of his half-yearly, or weekly, waiting; he was received there, and provided for, in like manner as his other brethren, who were regularly in waiting, Deut. xviii. 6, 7, 8. The consecration of Levites was without much ceremony. See Numb. viii. 5. 2 Chr. xxix. 34.

They wore no peculiar habit to distinguish them from other Israelites, and God ordained nothing particular concerning their mourning.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. xxi. cap. 8. says, that in the reign of Agrippa king of the Jews, about A. D. 62, six years before the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the Levites desired permission from that prince to wear the linen tunic, like the priests; which was granted. This innovation was displeasing to the priests; and the Jewish historian remarks, that the ancient customs of the country were never forsaken with impunity: adding, that Agrippa permitted likewise the families of the Levites, whose office it was to guard the doors, and perform other troublesome offices, to learn to sing, and play on instruments, that they might be qualified for the temple-service as musicians.

The Levites were divided into different classes; the Gershomites, Kohathites, Merarites, and the Aaronites, or priests. See Numb. iii. &c.

The Gershomites were in number 7,500. Their office in the marches through the wilderness was to carry the veils and curtains of the tabernacle. Eliasaph, son of Lael, was their chief.

The Kohathites were in number 8,600, they were employed in carrying the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle. Elizaphan, son of Uzziel, was their chief.

The Merarites were in number 6,200. They carried those pieces of the tabernacle which could not be placed on chariots. Zariel, son of Abihail, was their chief.

The Aaronites, were priests who served the sanctuary. Eleazar, son of Aaron, was their chief.

When the Hebrews incamped in the wilderness, the Levites were placed round about the tabernacle: Moses and Aaron at the East, Gershom at the West, Kohath at the South, Merari at the North. Moses ordained, that the Levites should not begin service at the tabernacle till they were twenty-five years of age, Numb. viii. 24. or, as he says elsewhere, from thirty to fifty years old. Numb. iv. 3. But David finding they were employed no longer in those grosser offices, of transporting the vessels of the tabernacle, appointed them to enter on service at the temple, at twenty years of age. The priests and Levites waited by turns, weekly, in the temple. They began their weeks on one sabbath day, and on the sabbath day in the following week went out of waiting. 1 Chr. xxiii. 24. 2 Chr. xxxi. 17. Ezra iii. 8. When an Israelite made a religious entertainment in the temple, God required, that the Levites should be invited to partake of it. Deut. xii. 18, 19.

LEVITICUS. The third book in the Pentateuch: called Leviticus, because it contains principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests, and Levites, and the sacrifices; for which reason the Hebrews call it the priests' law. The Jews term it likewise vajicra, because in Hebrew it begins with this word, and he called. The first seven chapters of Leviticus prescribe the ceremonies in offering burnt-sacrifices, meat-offerings, bread and cakes, peace-offerings or thanksgivings, and sin-offerings; they regulate what parts were to be consumed on the fire of the altar, and what were to be given to the priest, who offered them. After this are related in what manner the priests were consecrated, and what sacrifices were offered on that occasion; also, the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, for attempting to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire. On this occasion Moses appoints the mourning of the priests, and forbids them to drink wine while waiting in the temple.

Chapters xi. to xv. give rules for distinguishing beasts clean and unclean; also, the leprosy of men, of houses and of habits; for the purification of men indisposed with gonorrhœa, and of women after child-birth. After this, the ceremonies on the day of solemn expiation are regulated; also the degrees of relation, permitted or forbidden in marriage. Then prohibitions of alliances with the Canaanites, of idolatry, theft, perjury, calumny, hatred, Gentile superstitions, magic, divination, soothsaying, prostitution, and adultery; explaining, also, the blemishes which unfitted animals for sacrifice. Chap. xxii. notices the principal festivals in the year, the Passover, Pentecost, the Feast of Tabernacles, nacles, the Great Day of Expiation, the Feast of Trumpets, or beginning of the civil year, (including the story of a man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed the sacred Name) the sabbatical years, and the jubilee year: also, directing vows, and tythes.

All agree that Leviticus is a canonical book, and of divine authority. It is generally held to be the work of Moses, as well as the rest of the Pentateuch (but see FRAGMENTS, No. 1.) It contains the history of the eight days of Aaron's and his sons' consecration, A. M. 2514, ante A. D. 1490. The laws prescribed in it on other subjects beside sacrifices, have no chronological marks, whereby we may judge at what times they were given.

LEUMMIM, לֵעֻמִּים Leaumim, Vulgate, Loomim. Gentiles; from לֵעֻם, leum, people, nation: or, without water; from לֵעֻם le, without, and מַיִם majim, waters. Gen. xxv. 3.

LIBANUS, לִבְנוֹן, Libanon, Λίβανος, white; from לָבַן laban: otherwise, incense; from לִבְנוֹן, libnah.

LIBANUS, a famous mountain which separates Syria from Palestine. It forms a kind of horse-shoe in its length, beginning three or four leagues from the Mediterranean above Smyrna, and going from north to south towards Sidon, from thence bending from west to east, towards Damascus; and returning from the south northward, from the streight of Damascus, as far as Laodicea Scabiosa. The western part of this chain of mountains is properly Libanus.—The other part, eastward, extends from south to north, and is called by the Greeks, Anti-Libanus. Between these two mountains is a long valley called Cæle-Syria, or Hollow Syria; the Valley of Libanon, Josh. xi. 17. at present Bekah, from the Hebrew Bekah, a plain. For the Cedars of Libanus, vide CEDARS. Its name was given it, in all probability, by reason of the snow, with which it is always covered in many places. Jeremiah speaks of the snow of Libanus, chap. xviii. 14. and Tacitus, Mirum dicitur tantos inter ardores opacum, fidumque nivibus. Hist. lib. v. cap. 6. The ground, Maundrell tells us, where not concealed by the snow, appeared to be covered with a sort of white flakes, thin and smooth. Mount Libanus, in M. de la Roque's opinion, who visited it in his travels, is higher than the Alps or Pyrenees. Voyage du Mont Liban, tom. i. p. 90.

Libanus is about a hundred leagues in circumference. It has Mesopotamia east, Armenia north, the Holy Land south, and the Mediterranean west. Four rivers issue out of Libanus, Jordan, Rocham, Nahar-Rossien, and Nahar-Cadiça. It is composed of four enclosures of mountains, which rise one on the other. The first is very rich in grain and fruits; the second is barren, abounding in thorns, rocks and flints; the third, though higher than this, enjoys a perpetual spring, the trees being always green, and the orchards filled with fruit: it is so agreeable and fertile, that some have called it a terrestrial paradise. The fourth is so high, that it is always covered with snow; and is uninhabitable by reason of the great cold.

[Libanus is a very high mountain, says Ptolemy, lib. v. in Syria; so called from the incense gathered there, say some, [but of this I have not met with any proof.] It was the extreme of the promised land northwards; and gave name to the districts round it. There are two causes, either of which might have given name to this mountain. 1. Some parts of it, at least, consist of slate-coloured stone, or the superficies are of a slate colour; which greyish tint having more of white than black in it, the general name of whitish was applied to the whole mountain. 2. The snow, which in winter covers this mountain, and in summer remains on some parts of it, might induce observers to give it this name.

That snow lies all the year on Lebanon, we have the testimony of many travellers who have found it there at all seasons. Tacitus, Hist. lib. vi. calls it Fidum nivibus. Philip à Sanct. Trinit. in his Itin. lib. iii. cap. 2. says, "in the northern aspect of Libanus the snow is always lying: in the month of October I saw the snow of the preceding season; and at the close of November the whole mountain was covered with fresh snow," &c. The Samaritan and Chaldee interpreters, also Abulfeda, describe Mount Hermon by the appellation of the snow-mountain: and Hermon, we know, is part of the same chain as Lebanon. The Arabs are understood to take the name Lebanon in the same sense.

D'Arvieux expresses himself to this effect:

"Mount Lebanon, so famous in Scripture, is a chain of many mountains, which extends in length from the ports of Cilicia to Phenicia; one might even say as far south as Nazareth and Tabor. This chain borders the rich and beautiful plain of Mageddo in Esdraelon. Its length is four days' journey, and in some places more; that is to say, from forty to fifty leagues.

"These are not barren mountains, but almost all well cultivated, and well peopled. Their summits are in many places level, and form vast plains, wherein are sown corn [comp. Ps. lxxii. 16,] and all kinds of pulse. They are watered by numerous sources, and rivulets of excellent water, which diffuse on all sides a freshness and fertility, even in the most elevated regions. The soil of their declivities, and of the hollows which occur between them, is excellent, and produces abundantly, corn, oil, and wine, which is the best in Syria; and this is praising it highly in a single word. Drinkers, who esteem themselves judges, make no difference between this wine and that of Cyprus.

"Their principal riches, at present, is the silk which they produce. They are inhabited by Christians, Greeks and Maronites; also, by Druses and Mahometans. The Christians here have many privileges, and in some places complete liberty. Though the mountains which compose Lebanon are of this considerable extent, yet the vulgar restrain the name to that district whereon the cedars grow; and they give other names to other portions which compose this famous mountain.

"After travelling six hours in pleasant valleys, and over mountains covered with different species of trees, we entered a small plain on a fertile hill, wholly covered with walnut-trees and olives, in the middle of which is the village of Eden. This village has a bishop. In spite of my weariness, I could not but incessantly admire this beautiful country. It is, truly, an epitome of the terrestrial paradise, of which it bears the name. Eden is rather a hamlet than a village. The houses are scattered, and separated from each other by gardens, which are enclosed by walls made of stones piled up without mortar. The inhabitants are Christians, honest, charitable, sociable with each other, and in easy circumstances.

"We quitted Eden about eight o'clock in the morning, and advanced to mountains so extremely high, that we seemed to be travelling in the middle regions of the atmosphere. Here the sky was clear and serene above us, while we saw, below us, thick clouds dissolving in rain and watering the plains.

"After three hours of laborious travelling, we arrived at the famous Cedars, about eleven o'clock. We counted twenty-three of them. According to appearances they were formerly more numerous than they are at present. These few remaining are so large, that six men, holding each other by the hand, can with difficulty clasp the trunk of one of them! Supposing then that the extent of a man's arms may be six feet, the circumference of these trees is thirty-six feet. Some have supposed that these cedars date from the creation of the world, because the royal prophet mentions in Psalm ciii. the Cedars of Lebanon, which the Lord hath planted: but that appears to be an inference forced from the text.

"The bark of the Cedar resembles that of the pine. The leaves and cones also bear considerable resemblance. The stem is upright, the wood is hard, and has the reputation of being incorruptible. The leaves are long, narrow, rough, very green, ranged in tufts along the branches: they shoot in spring, and fall in the beginning of winter. Its flowers and fruits resemble those of the pine. From the full grown trees, a fluid trickles naturally, and without incision: this is clear, transparent, whitish, and after a time, dries and hardens. It is called by some gum-cedria, but very improperly. It is supposed to possess great virtues. When a more considerable quantity of this gum is desired, it is procured by means of incisions in the trees. [Can this be the incense, from which some have supposed that this mountain derived its name?] Christians are forbid, on pain of excommunication, from breaking off any part, or boughs of these trees. What they find fallen by accident, they carry to the patriarch of the neighbouring monastery. The place where these great trees are stationed is a plain, of nearly a league in circumference; on the summit of a mount, which is environed almost on all sides by other mounts, so high, that their summits are always covered with snow. This plain is level, the air is pure, the heavens always serene. On one side of this plain is a frightful precipice, from whence flows a copious stream, which descending into the valley, forms a considerable part of the Holy River, or Nahar Kadisha. The view along this valley is interesting; and the crevices of the rocks are filled with earth of so excellent a quality, that trees grow in them; and, being continually refreshed with the vapours rising from the streams below, attain to considerable dimensions. Nor is the sense of smelling less gratified than that of sight, by the fragrance diffused from the odoriferous plants around." [Comp. Cant. iv. 11.]

He afterward says, "The banks of the river appeared enchanted. This stream is principally formed by the source which issues below the cedars, but is continually augmented by a prodigious number of rills and fountains, which fall from the mountain, gliding along the clefts of the rocks, and forming many charming and natural cascades, which communicate cooling breezes, and banish the idea of being in a country subject to extreme heat. If to these enjoyments we add that of the nightingale's song, it must be granted that these places are infinitely agreeable."

De la Roque, after commending in strong terms the beauty of the valley watered by the Kadisha, says, "In pursuing our route, and tracing up the source of this agreeable river, our sight was still more gratified. The trees rise higher than before, being for the most part plantanes, pines, cypresses, and ever-green oaks, forming a continual assemblage of verdure of different different kinds; among which peeps out from time to time, either a chapel, or a grotto, always situated on some spot apparently impossible to be attained, and absolutely astonishing to the sight.

"We passed twice or thrice over the Kadisha, by means of stone bridges, or of trees laid along to form a passage: we proceeded in this manner two or three leagues, by a very easy and agreeable road, walking almost constantly among groves and covered alleys formed by the hand of nature, and too abundant in foliage to be penetrated by the rays of the sun.

"After quitting the Kadisha, we continued to find every where a wonderful abundance of water, issuing from divers sources, forming rivulets; and proceeding to unite their waters with those of that river.

"CANOBIN, the convent established on Lebanon is a large irregular building, situated on the declivity of a high mountain. Its environs are, nevertheless, very cheerful, the lands adjacent are well cultivated, and are adorned with hedges, gardens, and vineyards. It would be difficult to find any where superior wine to that which was offered us; from which we determined, that the reputation of the wine of Lebanon, as alluded to by the prophet [Hosea xiv. 7.] was extremely well founded. These wines are of two sorts; the most common is the red; the most exquisite is of the colour of Vin Muscat, and is called golden on account of its colour."

He mentions his fear, in some of his excursions, of meeting with tigers, or with bears, which are in great numbers on Lebanon; and come down during the night to drink. He also mentions the finding of a quantity of Eagle's feathers on the mountain, at the cedars. He describes the cedars as green with leaves all the year: adding, that the heads of the old form a kind of globe, or ball at the top; but those of the younger form a pyramid: a fragrant scent issues from their wood. The bark of the cedar is smooth, except on the stem; its colour is brown. The wood is white and tender immediately under the bark, but it is hard and reddish internally, and extremely bitter, which renders it incorruptible, and almost immortal. The cedar also yields an odoriferous resin. He passed a night at the cedars, where he says he saw no snow, nor experienced any cold. He speaks of the view from the summit of Lebanon as satisfactory enough, but soon confused, and lost in the distant and different objects to which it extends.

The Maronite monks affirm, that when the snow falls on the cedars, those trees raise their branches, and close them into a kind of pyramid, in order the better to bear the great weight which they have to sustain, and which might injure their branches, if they were extended horizontally, at full length.

Lebanon furnishes many rivers and streams. The first described by De la Roque, is the Orontes, which rises in the northern district, and during a course of more than thirty leagues runs almost due north, passing Emesa and Apamea; then turning to the west, it passes Antioch and Seleucia; its whole course being about seventy-five leagues.

The river Eleutherus also rises in the heights of Lebanon. It falls into the Mediterranean between Orthosia and Tripolis: but is not easily ascertained, because four or five rivers discharge themselves in this space. The first (perhaps the Eleutherus), about half way between Tortosa and Tripolis, is the Nahr Kibir, or Great River: the second, advancing towards Tripolis, is the Nahr Abrach, Leper's River: the third is Nahr Aochar, Red River: and there is a fourth, less considerable; it is called Alma Albarida, or the Cold Waters. Following the coast southward, we find the Nahr Kadisha, or Holy River, which receives many streams, by which it is greatly enlarged in its passage to the sea. Among others, Ras Ain, Fountain Head, in itself a small stream, but which is greatly swelled by the melting of the snows, and contributes a considerable body of water. The next stream is the Nahr Ebrahim, Abraham's River, which discharges itself about two leagues from Gebilee: it is the Adonis of the ancients. After this follows the Nahr Kalb, Dog's River: the Lycus, or Wolf's River of antiquity. About an hour and half from this river is Nahr Bairuth, so called because it is the nearest stream to the city of Berytus. Between Berytus and Sidon is the Nahr Damer, pronounced by Europeans d'Amour, the Jamyra of former times: the passage of it is very dangerous during the rains. About a league south of Sidon, is the river called Awle by the peasants; by the Franks called Fiumere: the source of this river is perhaps in Anti-Libanus. About an hour short of Tyre, is the river Kasemisch, which rises in Anti-Libanus, and is increased by the waters of the Letani, which flows along the valley of Bekaa. These are all the rivers which, rising in Lebanon, fall into the Mediterranean. The Barrady rises in Anti-Libanus, not far from the territory of Damascus, which city it visits: and being divided into streams and canals, contributes to the delights of that place, and its environs. A little river, called Banias, [perhaps, the Abana of Naaman, 1 Kings v. 12.] discharges itself into the Barrady; it is seen on the route from Sidon to Damascus. After having passed Damascus these streams issue in a great lake and marshes. The course of the Barrady is southerly. The author of Syria Sacra is mistaken in supposing the river which passes Damascus to be navigable. The Jordan is the last river which remains to be described: its source is in the mountain of Anti-Libanus, in the region now called Wad-et-tein, which includes the Mount Hermon of the ancients, not far from the celebrated spot which pagan antiquity called Panium, or Paneas. This stream is at first trifling, till it is joined by other rivulets, and forms, about two or three leagues from its source, what is now called the marshes of Jordan, formerly Lake Moron, Maron, or Merom, which overflows a space of about two leagues in circuit, during the melting of the snows on Lebanon; but, in summer, during the great heats, it is nearly dry. This marsh is almost wholly covered with shrubs; and with that kind of reed which is used to make writing pens, and arrows. All the borders of the lake are full of tigers, bears, and even lions: which come down from the neighbouring mountains. Jordan afterwards continues its course to the south." Vide JORDAN.

The following is Volney's account of this celebrated mountain: Travels, vol. i. pp. 293. 301.

"A view of the country will convince us that the most elevated point of all Syria is Lebanon, on the south east of Tripoli. Scarcely do we depart from Larneca, in Cyprus, which is thirty leagues distant, before we discover its summit capped with clouds. This is also distinctly perceivable on the map, from the course of the rivers. The Orontes, which flows from the mountains of Damascus, and loses itself below Antioch; the Kasmia, which, from the north of Balbec, takes its course towards Tyre; the Jordan, forced, by the declivities, toward the south, prove that this is the highest point. Next to Lebanon, the most elevated part of the country is Mount Akkar, which becomes visible as soon as we leave Marra in the desert. It appears like an enormous flattened cone, and is constantly in view for two days journey. No one has yet had an opportunity to ascertain the height of these mountains by the barometer; but we may deduce it from another consideration. In winter their tops are entirely covered with snow, from Alexandretta to Jerusalem; but after the month of March it melts, except on Mount Lebanon, where, however, it does not remain the whole year, unless in the highest cavities, and towards the north-east, where it is sheltered from the sea winds, and the rays of the sun. In such a situation I saw it still remaining, in 1784, at the very time I was almost suffocated with heat in the valley of Balbec. Now, since it is well known that snow, in this latitude, requires an elevation of fifteen or sixteen hundred fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon, and that it is consequently much lower than the Alps, or even the Pyrenees.

Lebanon, which gives its name to the whole extensive chain of the Kesraouan, and the country of the Druses, presents us every where with majestic mountains. At every step we meet with scenes in which nature displays either beauty or grandeur, sometimes singularity, but always variety. When we land on the coast, the loftiness and steep ascent of this mountainous ridge, which seems to enclose the country, those gigantic masses which shoot into the clouds, inspire astonishment and awe. Should the curious traveler then climb these summits which bounded his view, the wide extended space which he discovers becomes a fresh subject of admiration; but completely to enjoy this majestic scene, he must ascend to the very point of Lebanon, or the Sannin. There, on every side, he will view an horizon without bounds; while, in clear weather, the sight is lost over the desert, which extends to the Persian Gulph, and over the sea which bathes the coasts of Europe. He seems to command the whole world, while the wandering eye now surveying the successive chains of mountains, transports the imagination in an instant from Antioch to Jerusalem.

"If we examine the substance of these mountains, we shall find they consist of a hard calcareous stone, of a whitish colour, sonorous like free-stone, and disposed in strata variously inclined. This stone has almost the same appearance in every part of Syria; sometimes it is bare, and looks like the peeled rocks on the coast of Provence.

"The same stone, under a more regular form, likewise composes the greater part of Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, the mountains of the Druses, Galilee, and Mount Carmel, and stretches to the south of the Lake Asphaltites. The inhabitants every where build their houses, and make lime with it. I have never seen, nor heard it said, that these stones contain any petrified shells in the upper regions of Lebanon; but we find, between Batroun and Djebail, in the Kesraouan, at a little distance from the sea, a quarry of schistous stones, the flakes of which bear the impressions of plants, fish, shells, and especially of the sea onion.

"Iron is the only mineral which abounds here; the mountains of the Kesraouan, and of the Druses, are full of it. Every summer the inhabitants work those mines which are ochreous.

"It appears equally extraordinary and picturesque to a European at Tripoli, to behold, under his windows, in the month of January, orange.

orange-trees loaded with flowers and fruit, while the hoary head of Lebanon is covered with ice and snow.

"If in Saïde or Tripoli, we are incommoded by the heats of July, in six hours we are in the neighbouring mountains, in the temperature of March; or, on the other hand, if chilled by the frosts of December, at Besharrai, a day's journey brings us back to the coast, amid the flowers of May. The Arabian poets have therefore said, that "the Sannin bears winter on his head, spring on his shoulders, and autumn in his bosom, while summer lies sleeping at his feet."

"At the end of February, I left at Tripoli a variety of vegetables which were in perfection, and many flowers in full bloom. On my arrival at Antoura, I found the plants only beginning to shoot; and, at Mar-hanna every thing was covered with snow. It had not entirely left the Sannin till the end of April, and, already, in the valley it overlooks, roses had begun to bud. The early figs were past at Bairout, when they were first gathered with us, and the silk-worms were in cod, before our mulberry-trees were half leaved."

From the foregoing information the reader may conceive, not only with what warmth Moses might desire to see "that goodly mountain, even Lebanon," Deut. iii. 25. but, what a supreme gratification a man who had been all his life habituated to a flat and arid desert, to a low and level country, must have felt, had he been permitted to have enjoyed the verdant hills and murmuring cascades of Lebanon. The renown of these paradises must have stimulated his curiosity, as a man and a naturalist, independant of his wishes as a sovereign and legislator for the welfare and settlement of his people.

Almost all travellers who have visited these places have felt and noticed the propriety of the bridegroom's address to the bride, Cant. iv. 15. wherein he compares her to "a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon;" but they have not observed the climax of this passage, which appears to stand thus, 1. a fountain, 2. a source, 3. numerous and lively streams, communicating refreshment and pleasure, together with fertility.

These descriptions may also contribute to place in a new light a passage of the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xviii. 14. which stands thus in our translation; "Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field; or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?" I presume, that the whole of this verse refers to the same object, Mount Lebanon, though to different events which occur in that mountain.

It might be supposed, that the "cold flowing waters" of the prophet, were the Nahr el berd, or Nahr al barida of Maundrell and De la Roque: but, when they are said to come from another place, the very awkwardness of the phraseology induces suspicion that the meaning of the passage has escaped the translator. The original word is צַרִּים tzarim, which, probably, imports condensed masses of ice; and this acceptation would render the parallelism of the place complete:

*Will any one relinquish the rills [literally drippings] from the hard frozen snows of Lebanon, when they flow?
Or shall he forego the cold waters which stream from condensed ice, when it thaws?*

"Nevertheless, my people have forsaken me: they have burned incense to vanity," &c. The prophet seems to think that no waters could be so refreshing as those which flowed from recently thawing congelation: and to persons who highly valued the addition of snow to their beverage, to cool it, nothing could be more refrigerating than drinking from streams which trickled down the sides of that mountain, the great Syrian reservoir of snow and ice. The narrations we have inserted shew the vigour and energy of these similies.

The reputation attached to the wine of Lebanon, and the character given of it by our travellers, render very credible the idea that in this wine Damascus traded with Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 18. and that Helbon was in the eastern part of Lebanon. The comparison of the wine of Lebanon to Vin Muscat, by de la Roque, includes, I presume, the scent as well as the colour: and justifies the allusion of the prophet Hosea, xiv. 7.

It is not easy to determine, with certainty, what can be intended by the prophet Isaiah in the phrase, "the glory of Lebanon:" but, very likely it refers to the verdure constantly maintained on this mountain, and to the stately trees which cover it; for so we may best explain Isa. xxxv. 2. the glory of Lebanon, magnificent cedars, plantanes, pines, cypresses, &c. the excellency of Carmel, "pines, oaks, olives, and laurels," (Vide CARMEL.) and the meadow productions, flowers, shrubs, &c. of Sharon." This agrees perfectly with chap. lx. 13. "the glory of Lebanon—the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box tree together." Perhaps, by some scientific traveller, who has noticed the trees growing upon Lebanon, we may ascertain those intended by the prophet. Is it the Cedar, eminently?

The discovery of Eagles' feathers by De la Roque, in great quantity, at the cedars of Lebanon, where they must have been dropped by the birds themselves, serves to justify the idea of the prophet Ezekiel, chap. xvii. 2. of "a great eagle, with long wings, visiting Lebanon, and plucking plucking off a branch from among the young twigs," &c. (meaning Nebuchadnezzar, who destroyed the temple, and carried away its treasures.) It shews that nature was considered in this particular of the parable.

The bears which frightened De la Roque, and the lions, which he says come down to the marshes of Jordan to drink, may point out the quarter that furnished those sanguinary animals which destroyed the new settlers in the land of Israel, 2 Kings xvii. 25, 26. as the country is the same; and, it is likely, that, during the interval of population, these wild animals should have roamed over a greater tract of country than usual; out of which they were not easily expelled. I think it likely too, that when the prophet Jeremiah threatens that the king of Babylon shall come "as a lion from the swelling of Jordan," chap. xlix. 17. l. 44. he may not so much allude to the stream of Jordan, where it runs in a considerable body, between its banks, as probably lions are rarely seen so low, but to the marshes of Jordan, to which, says De la Roque, they come down from the neighbouring mountains: which marshes, being at some times dry, and at other times overflowed, annually, may justly be described as the swellings of Jordan. Comp. Zech. xi. 3. The same place may also be intended under this description, Jer. xii. 5. "If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, how canst thou contend with horses? And if in the land of peace (solid land, firm footing) thou hast been wearied, how wilt thou do, when called to exert thyself in such slippery and uncertain footing as the marshes (swellings) of Jordan are?"—pretty much, I suppose, resembling the bogs of Ireland.

I know not what to make of the Tigers of De la Roque: the true tiger is a native of India, and certainly not of Lebanon: but what creature is his representative on this mountain deserves enquiry. It is likely, however, that the wild beasts enumerated by this traveller, with such others as we may suppose inhabit, or haunt, the various branches of this mountain, may furnish the true import of the expression, Habb. ii. 17. "The violence of Lebanon shall cover thee; even the terrific ravages of wild beasts;" to which that mountain affords shelter and covert.]

[LEBANON is certainly taken for Cedars of Lebanon; as, Solomon's palace, the "house of the forest of Lebanon:" I suppose it was supported by pillars of cedar, as numerous as trees in a forest. When we read "the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon," I suppose the majestic cedars furnish the simile: so, "he cast forth his roots as Lebanon," not the mountain but the cedars on it: and the smell of Lebanon, is that of the cedars. [But, comp. D'Arvieux, ante.]

The temple of Jerusalem is also called Libanus. Open thy doors O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars, says Zechariah xi. 1. speaking of the future desolation of the temple by the Romans.

TOWER OF LIBANUS. Solomon in the Canticles, vii. 4. compares his spouse's nose to the tower of Libanus, which looketh towards Damascus. Travellers speak of a tower seen on Libanus on the side next Damascus, which seems to have been very high. Benjamin of Tudela assures us, that the stones of this tower, the remains whereof he had seen, were twenty palms long, and twelve wide. Gabriel Sionita says, that this tower was a hundred cubits high, and fifty broad. Maundrell speaks likewise of the same, but he saw it only at a distance.

LIBATION. This word is used in sacrificial language, to express an affusion of liquors, poured upon victims to be sacrificed to the Lord. The quantity of wine for a libation was the fourth-part of a hin; rather more than two pints.

Libations among the Hebrews were poured on the victim after it was killed, and the several pieces of it were laid on the altar, ready to be consumed by the flames. See Leviticus vi. 20. viii. 25, 26. ix. 4. xvi. 12, 20. xxiii. 13. These libations consisted in offerings of bread, wine and salt; vide BREAD, CAKES, &c.

Libations were offered among the Greeks and Latins, with the sacrifices, but were poured on the head of the victim, while it was living. So Æneid. ii. ver. 130, 131. Sinon relating the manner in which he was to be sacrificed, says, "he was in the priest's hands ready to be slain, was loaded with bands and garlands; that they were preparing to pour upon him the libations of grain and salted meal,"

Jamque dies infanda aderat, mihi sacra parari,
Et salsæ fruges, & circum tempora vittæ.

And Dido, Æneid. iv. beginning to sacrifice, pours wine between the horns of the victim,

Ipsa tenens dextra pateram pulcherrima Dido,
Candentis vaccæ media inter cornua fudit.

St. Paul describes himself, as it were, a victim about to be sacrificed, and that the accustomed libations of meal and wine were already, in a manner, poured upon him: 2 Tim. iv. 6. "for I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand."

LIBERTINUS, Λιβέρινος, Lat. a freed man. Or,

LIBERTINE: Synagoga Libertinorum, Acts vi. 9. See SYNAGOGUE.

[It may be proper here to observe that this Synagogue of the Libertines, obviously stands connected with the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, both of which were of African origin: it is therefore, most probable, that the Libertines were of African origin also; and without taking the entire history of the liberation of the Jewish captives in Egypt, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, in its utmost extent, as to their numbers, it is credible, that there may be sufficient truth in it, to warrant our believing that many Jews and Jewish families did obtain their liberty, by the munificence of that prince; the descendants of which freedmen, remaining in Egypt, would be known under an appellation answering to the Latin, libertini; moreover, their residence would naturally connect them with their fellow Africans, the Cyrenians and Alexandrians. They are, evidently, separated by the construction of the language, from "those of Cilicia, and of Asia": and if St. Luke were of Cyrene, we see the reason why this conduct of his compatriots excited his particular observation.]

LIBERTY, as opposed to servitude and slavery, denotes the condition of a man, who may act independently of the will of another. There is frequent mention of this liberty in Scripture. The Jews valued themselves mightily on their liberty; they boasted in our Saviour's time, that they had never been deprived of it: we were never in bondage to any man, John viii. 33. This from them was ridiculous: since we know that they were often subject to foreign powers, under the judges, and afterwards, to the kings of Assyria, Chaldæa and Persia. Tacitus observes of them, that under the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, they were the meanest and most abject of slaves: Dum Assyrios penes, Medosque & Persas oriens fuit, despectissima pars servientium fuit. Hist. lib. v. n. 8. [N. B. They were at this very time subject to the Romans.]

It is however true, that the Israelites, according to the intention of Moses, were never to be reduced entirely to a state of bondage. They might be sold, or fall into servitude among their brethren; but always had a power of redeeming themselves, or procuring themselves to be redeemed by their relations, or of being liberated in the sabbatical year, or in the jubilee year, which restored all Hebrews to their liberty, and to their inheritances. Probably, on this account they boasted, that they never had been reduced to slavery. Their whole nation was equally free and noble; Saul, David, and Jeroboam, who ascended the throne, were of no better quality than the meanest shepherd in Israel. Vide SABBATICAL YEAR, JUBILEE, and SLAVE.

LIBERTY, freedom, is likewise applicable to people living according to their own laws, independent on any other state. The kings of Syria, after they had long persecuted the Jews, granted them liberty, when Simon Maccabæus was high priest: 1 Macc. xiv. 26. they suffered them to live according to the law of Moses, and freed them from tributes and other services, which before they had paid to the kingdom of Syria: 1 Macc. xv. 6.

Domus libera, a house separated from the commerce of other men. King Azariah being smitten with a leprosy, was separated from mankind, and reduced to the condition of a private person. Habitavit in domo liberâ seorsum. 2 Kings xv. 5.

The Psalmist says, lxxxviii. 5. he is as one destitute of all help, free among the dead, inter mortuos liber. This is explained of our Saviour shut up in the grave; nevertheless, having it absolutely in his power to issue from thence when he pleased, by his resurrection. The Hebrew may be translated: I am as these dead men of liberty, like those who are dead of their wounds, and sleeping in the grave; or otherwise, like those men of liberty, those ancient heroes, who boasted of liberty and independency, and are nevertheless dead of their wounds, and sleep in the grave.

LIBERTY of the Gospel, in opposition to the servitude of the law. St. Paul speaks of this liberty; We are not the children of the bond-woman, but of the free, Gal. iv. 31. We are not derived from Hagar, who with her descendants are slaves, but we are sons of Sarah the free woman: we enjoy the liberty of God's children, by virtue of the adoption procured for us by Jesus Christ. Which liberty delivers us from the yoke of legal ceremonies, from the obligation of observing purifications and distinctions of meats, and many other troublesome and uneasy practices, to which the Jews were subjected. See Rom. viii. 21. 1 Cor. x. 29. 2 Cor. iii. 17, Galat. ii. 4. 5. James i. 25. ii. 12.

LIBERTY to righteousness, in opposition to the bondage of sin. This is part of the justification which Jesus Christ hath procured for us, which we acquire by faith in him, and preserve by a holy life, the practice of Christian virtues, &c. [Or, it is one effect of justification by Christ. But, compare Rom. vi. 20. Gr. and Eng. margin.]

LIBERTY, and free-will, in opposition to constraint and necessity: man is at liberty to do good or evil, Ecclus. xv. 14. &c. God hath made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his counsel. If thou wilt, to keep the commandments, and to perform acceptable faithfulness. He hath set fire and water before thee: stretch forth thy hand unto whether thou wilt. There is however a great difference between our liberty of doing good and of doing evil. We have in ourselves the unhappy liberty of doing evil, we are prompted to it by our concupiscence, which indeed we ought always to resist, yet shall not really and effectually resist, without the assistance of God's grace; whereas, as to good, though we have the liberty of doing or not doing it, we cannot perform it as it should be, and advantageously to salvation, without the help of grace, which without violating our liberty, incites us agreeably, gently, (nevertheless, efficaciously) to prefer what is pleasing to God before what is desired by self-love and concupiscence.

The Rabbins consider liberty and free-will, very differently from Christian authors. They acknowledge, that man has liberty, without which he would not be man: if he loved good, and followed evil, without discernment, or by instinct, he would cease to be reasonable. What would become of rewards and punishments, the threats, promises, and precepts, of the law, if it were not in the power of man to fulfil, or to violate them? They admit liberty of indifference in its full extent; they are persuaded that people dissemble their opinion as often as they diminish liberty from free-will.

Maimonides confutes the fatality of astrologers, but he makes every thing to depend on constitution: as God, says he, has created man upright in stature, and with hands and feet, so hath he likewise given him a will to move and act as he pleases; and it is the goodness of his constitution which makes things easy or difficult to him. The fear of God, he says, is not in the hand of heaven; i.e. it is in the power of man to observe, or not to observe, the law, and the precepts. The fear of God is of this class; it depends not on God, but on the will of man.

Manasseh Ben Israel, another famous Rabbi, maintains, that the preventing grace acknowledged by some Rabbins, is an opinion that does not agree with tradition. That if the will were prevented by grace, it would cease to be free. He allows but two sorts of aid from God; one, whereby he produces favourable opportunities of executing the good designs which any man has formed; the other in assisting man when he has begun to live well. He says farther, that we stand in need of the concurrence of Providence in all virtuous actions; and as a man, who is going to take a heavy burden on his shoulders, calls somebody to help him up with it: so the just man first endeavours to fulfil the law, and God like the arm of another person, comes to his assistance, that he may be able to execute his resolution.

[This seems to be exactly the idea of the Apostle, Rom. viii. 26. which he expresses by using the word avtλαυβavovai, which Doddridge renders "lendeth us his helping hand"; and Macknight says it properly signifies "I bear together with another," by taking hold of the thing borne on the opposite side, as persons do who assist one-another in carrying heavy loads." Ambrose, very properly, refers this to the weakness of our prayers, (and of our minds, too,) without such aid.]

[But, beside this Rabbi's acknowledgement of "favourable opportunities for executing good designs," he certainly might have acknowledged that very important part of "preventing grace" which so arranges circumstances as to diminish, or to disappoint, opportunities of doing evil. There is scarcely any thing in life that more strongly and more intelligibly calls for gratitude, than those preservations from evil, those preventions of bad consequences, those counter-actions of perverse bias, of which every one must be conscious, and none more conscious than the most virtuous. Comp. David, 1 Sam. xxv. 32. Also, Jer. iii. 5.]

LIBNAH, a city of Judah, in the south. Josh. xv. 42. given to the priests, and declared a city of refuge, 1 Chr. vi. 54, 57. Eusebius and Jerom say, it was in the district of Eleutheropoli. It is the Libna, or Lebna, in the neighbourhood whereof (between Rimmon-Parez and Rissah) the Israelites encamped, on their journey through the wilderness. Numb. xxxiii. 20. See MAP of the TRAVELS of ISRAEL.

[Zieglerus in his Descript. Palæst. is decidedly of this opinion; adding, that the superficies is composed of a glittering sand, among a loose covering of white earth. Whether this writer may have fixed on the very spot where Libnah stood, does not appear: but he mentions a chalk soil, and chalk hills, in Arabia Petræa, as we learn from his Itinerar. Terræ S. p. 193, 296, 297, 310. and Neitzchitz, p. 180. Diodorus Siculus, lib. xix. describes the land of the Nabatheans as argillaceous.

I have however doubted, whether the Libnah of Judah were not rather near the station of the Israelites, as this white district was of some, if not of considerable, extent; so that the different sides of it might be described as some way in the desert, or as adjacent to the cultivated land, according to the situation of a person travelling.

LIBNATH, לִבְנַת, white, or whiteness.

LIBNATH, a city of Asher. Joshua xix. 26. We believe it to be the whole promontory, between Ecdippa and Tyre. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 19. The Hebrew here reads, Sikor & Libaneth, the Vulgate, Shicor-Libeneth, [Eng. Tr. Shihor-Libnath.] which induces us to think, that these two words denote the same place, and that Shichor is the name of a rivulet; q. d. the rivulet of foul water which flows on the white promontory.

LIBNI, לִבְנִי, Λόβετι, white. Son of Gershom, Numb. iii. 18.

LIBRA; a pound weight. The Roman pound was twelve ounces: the Hebrews, at least in the Old Testament, and before the empire of the Greeks in the East, never calculated by pounds. The word libra occurs only in the New Testament, John xii. 3. xix. 39. The ancient Hebrews used the word siclus, when mentioning common weights; and talent, when speaking of large weights. A shekel weighed an ounce, or four Roman drachms.

[LIBYA, heart of the sea, otherwise the cords. See LUBIM. LUDIM.]

This appellation has been by some referred to Alexandria, Ezek. xxxviii. 5.

In Nahum iii. 9. Lubim is rendered Lybia, because of its connection with Phut, which implies Africa; and probably, that part of Africa near and around Carthage, rather than Nubia. Josephus says, "Phut was the conductor of Libya, whose settlements were from him called Phutaei. It is beyond the river in the region of Mauritania. By this name it is well known in the Grecian histories; adjacent to the region which they call Phut."

We read of the Lubim, 2 Chron. xii. 3. xvi. 8. Nahum iii. 9. Dan. xi. 43. The name is derived from Lub, thirsty, scorching. This is also the meaning of the Arabic word.

The word is spelt differently from Lehabim. Some have supposed they were the same people: but they should not be confounded. Vide LEHABIM.]

LICE, pediculi. לִצְּבִים, chinnim, LXX. and Vulgate sciniphes, signifies lice, according to the Rabbins, and the generality of modern interpreters. Exod. viii. 16.

Swarms of lice were one of the Egyptian plagues. LXX. Κνίπες. Hesychius says Κνίψ is ζων πτηνόν ὁμοίον κώνωπι. Diodorus Siculus, lib. iii. cap. 3. speaking of the Acridophagi, or eaters of locusts, says, that when they grow old, their bodies breed a kind of winged lice, by which they are devoured. It is the conjecture of Pererius, and approved by Rivet, that it was some new kind of creature, called analogically by an old known name.

LIFE, future, eternal life, or simply life, signifies the state of happiness of the righteous after death, in heaven.

Narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, says our Saviour, Matth. vii. 14. If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments: Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life? Matt. xix. 16. 17.

Jesus Christ is sometimes called the Life: John xiv. 6. I am the way, the truth, and the life. And again: I am the resurrection and the life. John xi. 25. And elsewhere: In him was life, and the life was the light of men, John i. 4. And, He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son, hath not life, 1 John v. 12. Jesus Christ is the life of the soul, he enlightens it, fills it with graces, leads it to eternal life: is himself the life of it, its sustenance, light, and happiness.

BOOK of LIFE. See BOOK.

TREE of LIFE. See TREE.

In the Old Testament God promises to those who observe his laws, long life, and temporal prosperity, which were the figure and shadow of eternal life, and of those future blessings expressed more clearly in the New Testament. The carnal Jews confined their hopes to these transitory blessings; but the holy patriarchs, the prophets, and more enlightened Hebrews, carried their views and expectations farther. Moses says in Deut. xxx. 15, 19, 20. See I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; and a little lower: I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that thou and thy seed may live; that thou mayest love the Lord thy God; for he is thy Life, and the length of thy days. Hence Baruch calls the law of God, the commandments of life, chap. iii. 9. And the Psalmist, the path of life xvi. 11. [rather here hinting at his resurrection from the dead: or at that of Jesus Christ, particularly. Vide Acts ii. 28.]

Wisdom, knowledge of truths relating to salvation, a wise and regular conduct, are called likewise, the way of life, the truth of life, the fountain of life; or life, simply. As life is the first of blessings belonging to the body, so wisdom is the supreme happiness of the soul; it promotes our well-being in this world; and is the source of felicity to eternity. The principal wisdom, the most serious study of the Hebrews consisted in the knowledge of their law: wherefore the Holy Spirit terms the law as well as wisdom, life; and the source of life; because, both the one and the other produce the same effects for time, and for eternity.

Life is sometimes used for subsistence; initium vitæ hominis aqua & panis, Eccl. xxix. 26. And again, panis egentium pauperum est vita, Eccl. xxxiv. 25. In these passages vita is synonymous to victus; it is said Mark xii. 44. that a poor widow who put two very small pieces of silver, duo minuta, into the treasury of the temple, gave more than any of the rest, because it was all she had, omnem victum suum, even all her living. Luke xxi. 4.

It is said sometimes, figuratively, that God restores to life or revives from the dead, those whom he delivers from great danger. This expression is frequent in the Psalms; where captivity is represented as death, and liberty as life.

Life is also taken for conduct. We fools accounted his life madness, Wisd. v. 4. His life (course of conduct) was different from that of others. Your life is hid with Christ in God. Col. iii. 3. [The principle, fountain, or source of your life is in Heaven.]

We find an expression in Moses and in Job, which requires explanation, Deut. xxviii. 66. Job xxiv. 22. Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life. Some of the fathers understood this of Jesus Christ, crucified in the sight of the unbelieving Jews, who rejected the belief of that Saviour who was their life and salvation. Rather, ye shall be under perpetual fear and uneasiness, and shall have no assurance of your own lives. The following words of Job must be interpreted in the same sense. Cum steterit non credet vitæ suæ. When the wicked man appears most resolute, he shall not be assured of his life; or according to the Hebrew, when he riseth in the midst of his guards, he shall not be sure of his life. [Eng. Trans. "He riseth up, and no man is sure of life."]

LIFE, to live: these words, as well as death and to die, are equivocal, and understood properly for the life of the body, figuratively, for the life of the soul; for the life of faith, grace and holiness, for temporal life, and life eternal. A living soul signifies a living animal, a living person: my soul shall live because of thee, Gen. xii. 13. my life will be preserved in consideration of thee. No man shall see me and live, Ex. xxxiii. 20. i. e. whoever has a supernatural vision of God, is in danger of death: no man can be able to sustain the splendor of my majeaty, if beheld by his bodily eye. As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, 1 Sam. xx. 3. I swear by the life of God and by thy life. The Lord swears by his own life; I lift up my hand to heaven and say, I live for ever. Deut. xxxii. 40. Jehovah was called the living God in opposition to the gods of the Gentiles, who were but dead men, stars, or animals, whose lives are transitory; whereas Jehovah is living, immortal, the author of life, to every thing; in him we live; from him we derive motion, and existence, Acts xvii. 28.

The just man lives by faith, says St. Paul, Rom. i. 17. Faith gives life to the soul, but this faith must be animated by charity, and accompanied with works; for faith without works is dead, Gal. v. 6. James ii. 20. Even they who are dead in sin rise again, and lead a new life, when they believe in Christ, and put on Christ; and they who have a lively and entire faith never die, or rather after death enjoy eternal life, John xi. 25, 26. I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. The widow who lives in delights is dead, though she appear to be alive, 1 Tim. v. 6. Jesus Christ, says St. Paul, is my life, Phil. i. 21. To me to live is Christ: I desire nothing passionately but his glory; I live only for him, and if I can lay down my life for him I shall be happy: To die is gain.

LIFE, to make alive, to raise to life, is taken literally, 1 Sam. ii. 6. For example, the Lord destroys, or raiseth to life: he sends down to the grave, or bringeth up from it: and Hosea, vi. 2. He will restore us to life, after two days; he will raise us up on the third day. Elisha restored the widow's son to life: 2 Kings viii. 5.

Also for preserving life: David spared neither man nor woman of those he took in the enemy's country; he gave life to none. 1 Sam. xxvii. 11.

Pharaoh commanded the Israelites to expose their children, and not to bring them up, nor to preserve their lives: Acts vii. 19. When the wicked shall be converted, and do that which is right, he shall save his soul alive, Ezek. xviii. 27. Let the Lord preserve him, and vivify him; may he grant him health and long life. Psalm xli. 2.

In a figurative sense, to give life is used for delivering from a great danger, to bring out of captivity, to heal of a great sickness, to defend in a great peril. The captives in Babylon often ask of God in the Psalms to restore them to life, to deliver them from a state of death, of oppression, oppression, of trouble, under which they groaned. Comp. Psalm cxix. 25, 107.

To restore to life, is used in Hebrew to express the repairing of a city, a house, or a wall: for example, Nehem. iv. 2. Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burnt? will they rebuild the walls of Jerusalem? David built the walls of Jerusalem from Millo all round, 1 Chron. xi. 8. and Joab repaired (or revived) the rest of the city, וימַח ויחַי אֶת-שְׂאֵר הָעִיר. Habakkuk, iii. 2. desires the Lord to cause his old wonders to be shewn forth anew: in medio annorum vivifica illud. And St. Paul says, Thou fool, that which thou sowest in not quickened (enlivened) except it die. 1 Cor. xv. 36.

In the writings of the Apostles, to vivify, to quicken or to revive, is often used for giving life to the soul, in a spiritual sense; which life consists in faith, charity, justice, grace, holiness, &c. He that would save his life at the expense of truth, will lose his soul; and he that shall lose his life to preserve his faith, and to maintain the truth, shall save his soul, Luke xvii. 33. vivificabit eam. The letter kills, but the Spirit makes alive, 2 Cor. iii. 6. The law cannot make alive: Galat. iii. 21. It cannot communicate righteousness, without gospel faith, and charity.

TO LIFT UP ONE'S HANDS, is the gesture of a man taking an oath: I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, says Abraham, that I will not take the least thing that belongs to you. Gen. xiv. 22. And: I will bring you into the land concerning which I lift up my hand, Ex. vi. 8. which I promised with an oath.

To lift up one's hand against any one, to attack him, to fight him. Blessed be the Lord thy God which hath delivered up the men that lift up their hand against my lord the king. 2 Sam. xviii. 28. And; Sheba, son of Bichri, hath lift up his hand against David, hath rebelled against him: Scripture speaking of the revolt of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, uses the same expression. 1 Kings xi. 26.

TO LIFT UP ONE'S FACE in the presence of any one, to appear boldly in his presence. I should not dare to hold up my face to Joab thy brother, 2 Sam. ii. 22. And Esdras; O Lord my God I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, Ezra ix. 6. See Job x. 15. xi. 15.

To lift up one hands, eyes, soul, or heart, unto the Lord, are ways of speaking common in Scripture, to describe the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly, and beseeches God with all his heart to impart the assistance he needs. Lifting up the eyes frequently means no more than barely looking: I lift up mine eyes and saw.

To lift up one's soul to any thing, to desire it with ardor. But to the land whereunto they lift up their mind to return, thither shall they not return. We find this expression in the Psalms. Lord, I lift up my soul unto thee: I beseech thee with all the ardor of my soul.

To lift up one's eyes towards idols, to honour, to invoke them, to put one's trust in them, to worship them.

To lift up one's heel against any one, to kick, to rise up against any one.

To lift up one's horn, to be exalted with pride, to threaten any one with blows, to insult. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXIV.

To lift up, or take up a lamentation, to begin a mournful song.

To lift up a prayer, to address one's prayers to God.

To be lifted up, to rise, surgere; there arose a new king in Egypt, a new king reigned, [q. a new dynasty?] Exod. ii. 8.

In the Scripture men generally rose early in the morning, and even before day, like the heroes in Homer.

Surgere, to rise, signifies frequently simply to begin an action. Arise and go;—rise and do this, &c.

To rise up against any one, is said of accusers and false witnesses; two false witnesses arose and accused Jesus, Mark xiv. 57. Acts vi. 9.

LIGHT. Moses says, that after the creation of heaven and earth, darkness being spread over the chaos, God said, Let there be light, and there was light; and God saw the light that it was good, and he separated the light from the darkness. This was the first day. Some demand, what this light of the first day could be, different from the sun, which was not created till the fourth day? Certain Rabbins maintain, that it was the light of the sun, and that what is said afterwards concerning the creation of the sun, moon, and stars on the fourth day, is a recapitulation. Others believe, that God on the first day created a luminous body, much like that which gave light to the Israelites in the wilderness, in the night time. [or, meteoric; like the Star at Bethlehem?] Something like this must of necessity be admitted, if we would maintain a successive creation.

Light is often put for prosperity, as night is for adversity. The light shall shine upon thy ways, God shall favour thy conduct. Thou hast lifted up on us the light of thy countenance. Thou hast granted us thy favour.

The light of the living, literally signifies a happy happy life, great prosperity ; but in a moral and spiritual sense, it signifies the felicity of eternal life ; as the misery of the wicked is described by the darkness of death, Ps. lvi. 13. cxxix. 12. cxlviii. 3. and Job xxxiii. 30. God is styled the Father of lights, James i. 17. the Author of all graces ; and Jesus Christ is called the Light of the world, a Light to enlighten the Gentiles, Light of Righteousness, the Light of Life. John viii. 12. i. 8. Comp. Isaiah lx. 1.

The apostles are the light of the world, Matt. v. 14.

LIGURIUS, a precious stone. Heb. לִשְׁמֶה, leschem. Theophrastus and Pliny describe the ligurius as being like a carbuncle, of a brightness sparkling like fire : Epiphanius and Jerom took it for a kind of hyacinth. Some have asserted, that it is the same as lyncurius, or the lynx-stone, formed, as was said, of the lynx's urine, congealed into a shining stone, as soon as it comes out of that creature's body : but this is fabulous, as Pliny observes, lib. viii. cap. 38. xxxvii. cap. 3. Ælian, de Animal. lib. iv. c. 17. The ligurius was the first stone in the third row on the high priest's pectoral, and the name of God was inscribed on it.

LIKHI, לִקְחִי, Λοχεῖ, law, doctrine ; from לקח lacach : otherwise, taking away ; from the same, and the pronoun ' i, my.

LILITH, לִילִית, the night. Lamia, Jerom.

LILITH, the Rabbins say, was Adam's first wife, [i. e. Adam passed a night previous to his reception of Eve.] See CIRCUMCISION.

Some Jewish doctors are of opinion, that lilith is the moon, and is so called from לִיל lil, which signifies night, the influences whereof may be beneficial or hurtful to new-born children ; herein intimating the superstition of the Heathen, who invoked the goddess Lucina, or the moon, when women were in labour.

Montium custos nemorumque virgo,
Quæ laborantes utero puellas
Tervocata audis, adimisque letho,
Diva triformis.

Horat. Carm. lib. iii. Ode xii.

We are of opinion that this word signifies a bird of night, and of bad omen, such as the screech-owl, the bat, or the lapwing. Isaiah says, " Edom will be reduced to a frightful solitude, wherein there will be nothing to be seen but wild and ominous beasts, demons, satyrs, screech-owls," &c.

LILLY, lilium, לוֹלֵא, susan, or schuschan, perhaps by reason of the number of its leaves, which are six, in Heb. ses, or schesch. There are lilies of different colours, white, red, yellow, and orange coloured. They were common in Judæa, and grew in the open fields. Consider the lilies of the field, says Jesus Christ, Matt. vi. 28. how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin ; yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith ? Luke xii. 27.

Father Souciet, a Jesuit, affirms, that the lilly mentioned in Scripture, לוֹלֵא, sousan, is the crown imperial ; this is the Persian lilly, the tusai of the Persians, the royal lilly, or lilium basileium of the Greeks. In reality it appears from the Canticles, that the lilly spoken of by Solomon was red, and distilled a certain liquor : Cant. v. 13. There are crown imperials with yellow flowers ; but those with red are the most common. They are always bent downwards, and disposed in the manner of a crown at the extremity of the stem, which has a tuft of leaves at the top. At the bottom of each leaf of this flower, is a certain watery humor, forming, as it were, a very white pearl, which gradually distils very clear and pure drops of water. This water is probably what the spouse in the Canticles calls myrrh : labia ejus lilia distillantia myrrham.

Judith speaks of an ornament belonging to the women, which was called lilly : Judith x. 3. Assumpsit dextraliola, & lilia & inaures. χλιδῶνας καὶ τὰ ψέλια, καὶ τὰς δακτυλίδας. What these lilies were, we cannot tell. In the judgment of Grotius, they might be something which hung about the neck. Perhaps lilia may be a fault of the copyist, who instead of monilia, bracelets, which he did not understand, might insert lilia. The Greek says pselia, and the Syriac the same. [Chains, necklaces, or bracelets.]

LIMITS, bounds. Moses forbids any one's altering the bounds of his neighbour's inheritance, Deut. xix. 14. Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's land-mark, which they of old time have set on thine inheritance which thou dost inherit, &c. All the people curse the man who should remove the bounds planted by their ancestors, Deut. xxvii. 17. Job, xxiv. 2. reckons those who are guilty of this crime among thieves and robbers, and oppressors of the poor. Boundaries are sacred things, and matters of public right. Sículus Flaccus, de Conditionib. Agrorum, says, that when they were settled, they were anointed and crowned, and covered with rich veils : unguento velaminibusque & coronis eos coronabant. The Jewish doctors condemn those who transfer their neighbour's bounds, to be scorched scorched twice; first, because of stealing another's inheritance, and secondly, by reason of their violation of the law, which expressly forbids touching it.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. has interpreted this law of Moses in a very particular sense. "He says, that it is not lawful to change the limits, either of the land belonging to the Israelites, or that of their neighbours with whom they are at peace; but that they ought to be left as they are, having been so placed by the order of God himself: for the desire which avaricious men have to extend their limits, is the occasion of war and division; and whosoever is capable of removing the boundaries of lands, is not far from a disposition to violate all other laws."

Among the Romans, if a slave, with an evil design, changed any boundary, he was punished with death. Men of condition were sometimes banished, and private persons were punished according to the circumstances of their crime, by pecuniary fines, or corporal punishment. The respect of the ancients for boundaries proceeded almost to adoration. Numa Pompilius, king of the Romans ordained, that offerings should be made to boundaries, with thick milk, cakes, and first-fruits. Ovid says, that a lamb was sacrificed to them, and that they were sprinkled with blood.

Spargitur & cæso communis terminus agno.
Ovid. Fest.

Juvenal speaks of cake and pap, which were laid every year upon the sacred bounds:

Etsacrum effodit medio de limite Saxum,
Quod mea cum patulo coluit puls annua libo.
Sat. xvi.

LIMITS of the sea. The Scripture reckons it among the effects of God's omnipotence, to have fixed bounds to the sea: Ps. civ. 9. thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over, neither turn again to cover the earth. And Job xxvi. 10. He hath compassed the waters with bounds until the day and night come to an end. Solomon introduces Wisdom saying, When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandments; when he appointed the foundation of the earth, then I was by him, Prov. viii. 29. And in Jeremiah v. 22. the Lord says, that he has appointed the sands to be a boundary to the sea: posui arenam terminum mari.

LINE, to extend a line over a city, to destroy, to raze it. Perpendiculum extenditur super Jerusalem, says Zechariah i. 16. And Jeremiah, in his Lamentations, ii. 8. The Lord hath proposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion, he hath stretched out a line.

LINNEN, לב, bad, a plant well known, whose bark being prepared, serves to make fine, and much esteemed, linnen clothes. [FLAX.]

Another sort of linnen Scripture calls עץ, schesch; which we believe to be cotton. See COTTON.

Under the name of linen, לב, byssus is included; but this was something different from both linen and cotton. It was a kind of silk yielded by a fish of the mussel kind, which Rondelet calls pinna magna. See BYSSUS.

The plant linum is in Hebrew named pish-tah, Exod. ix. 31. חפשתה happishtah, linum vivens, as well as that whereof clothes were made. [Flax-stalks: under flax-stalks Rahab hid the spies, Josh. ii. 6.]

LINUS, Λίνος, nets.

LINUS, mentioned by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21. Linus and Claudia, and all the brethren greet thee. Linus, say some, was son of this Claudia. Irenæus, Eusebius, Optatus, Epiphanius, Austin, Jerom, and Theodoret, affirm that Linus succeeded Peter as bishop of Rome. He governed twelve years and some months. The Apostolical Constitutions say, that Linus was ordained bishop of Rome by St. Paul, long before the death of St. Peter. Ruffinus asserts, that Linus and Anacletus having governed the church of Rome, while the apostles Peter and Paul were living, but in their absence, Peter a little before his death chose Clement to succeed him at Rome: Epiphanius adds, that Clement out of modesty declined to exercise this office, till after the deaths of Linus and Cletus. From all which we may easily conclude, that we are very imperfectly acquainted with the history of Linus. The Greeks keep his festival Nov. 5. the Latins, Sept. 23.

[It was not possible that CALMET could have access to the Welsh Triads, which only within these few years have appeared in English. To me there seems little hazard in taking LINUS for the British CyLLIN: if so, it agrees with the history that Christianity had made converts in the family of Brennus King of Britain, and Caractacus, his son, then prisoners at Rome; and the first (Gentile) bishop of Rome was a Briton.]

LION, a beast well known; and frequently spoken of in Scripture. The lion is esteemed the king of four-footed beasts. His hair is light brown, inclining to red. The forepart of his head is square, his nose flat and large, his eyes terrible, his mouth wide, his neck covered with with a bushy mane, his belly slender, his legs and thighs large and nervous, his tail long, large and very strong. He has five claws on his forefeet; four on those behind.

The lion is the most fierce and courageous of beasts. It was common in Palestine; the sacred authors frequently mention it, and borrow similitudes and comparisons from it. Its tongue is sharp, and stuck thick with points of a very hard substance like that of the finger-nails, about two lines in length. No animal more closely resembles a lion than a cat. The paws, teeth, eyes, and tongue of a lion are of the same figure with those of a cat. He throws his urine behind him, and copulates with the lioness like hares and camels. His bladder is small, because he drinks very little. The female differs from the male by having no mane or long hair upon her neck. It is a popular mistake to think, that lions are afraid of cocks. Lions have been tamed. It is likewise a fable, that lions sleep with their eyes open. Lions were consecrated to the sun, and the Heathen represent the chariot of their goddess, Cybele, as drawn by lions.

The Hebrews have seven words to signify the lion in different ages. 1. גור Gur or Gor, a young lion, a whelp. 2. כפיר Chephir, a young lion. 3. ארי vel אריה Ari, or Arieh, a young and vigorous lion. 4. שחל Schachal, a lion in the full strength of his age. 5. שחז Schachaz, a vigorous lion. 6. לבי Lèbi, an old lion. 7. ליש Laisch, a decrepit lion worn out with age. But these distinctions are not always used in speaking of the lion.

The Lion of the tribe of Judah, Rev. v. 5. is Jesus Christ, who sprung from the tribe of Judah, and the race of David, and who overcame death, the world, and the devil. [It is supposed, that a lion was the device of the tribe of Judah: whence this allusion. Comp. Gen. xlix. 9.]

The lion from the swelling of Jordan, Jer. 1. 44, is, figuratively, Nebuchadnezzar marching like a lion against Judæa. He is compared to a lion by reason of his strength and fierceness: to a lion driven by the rising waters from the neighbourhood of Jordan, where he had lain amidst the thickets which cover the banks of that river; a lion which in his anger falls with fury on every thing he meets in the fields. The Scripture speaks in several places of this swelling of Jordan, thereby describing the inundations of that river. Jer. xii. 5, xlix. 19. l. 44. Zach. xi. 3. Vide JORDAN, and LIBANUS, Add.

Samson going to Timnath, tore a young lion to pieces with his hands, Judg. xiv. Some time after, he noticed as he passed by, that bees had made their honey in the skeleton of this lion, which was then dried up. This furnished him with a riddle which he proposed to the young men his companions at his wedding: The devourer furnished meat, and the strong yielded sweetness. Vide SAMSON.

David boasts, that he had killed a lion and a bear, 1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35. Ecclesiasticus says, xlvii. 3. that this prince played with bears and lions, as he would with lambs.

The two lions of Moab, 2 Sam. xxiii. 20. denote in all probability, the city of Ar, the capital of the Moabites, [divided into two parts, by streams, and therefore] described under the name of the two lions of Moab. Ariel in Hebrew, signifies the lion of God, 1 Chr. xi. 22. Vide AR.

Isaiah, xi. 6. describing the happy time of the Messiah says, the calf, the young lion and the fatling shall lie down together, and a little child should lead them; and that the lion should eat straw like the ox, signifying the peace and happiness of the church of Christ.

The roaring of the lion is terrible, Amos iii. 8. The lion roars, who shall not fear? The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion: whoso provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul, Prov. xix. 12. xx. 2. He seeketh his own death. The lion, when angry, beats his sides with his tail, bristles up his mane, and roars dreadfully, to the great terror of other animals.

A living dog is better than a dead lion, Eccl. ix. 4. says the wise man: death renders those contemptible who living were the greatest and most terrible.

There has been great perplexity about the reading of Psalm xxii. 17. Heb. כאר sicut leo, כאר, foderunt. LXX. ὥρυξαν, foderunt, Vulg.: Aquila, ἥρυξαν, fadaverunt. They pierced my hands and my feet. The Hebrew, in our printed bibles, with the generality of manuscripts, reads; like a lion my hands and my feet, which makes no sense: but, in order to make it intelligible, the Rabbins distribute the verses of this Psalm, thus: verse. 17. The assembly of the wicked have enclosed me, like a lion my hands and my feet; ver. 18. They tell all my bones. Kimchi and Abenezra say, that the lion encompasses the hands and feet of the Jews, in the present state to which they are reduced, that their enemies enclose them on every side, and hinder them not only from defending themselves, but from flying too.

Kimchi hereupon relates a fable. The lion, says he, when he is hunting describes a large circle with his tail upon the ground; all the wild beasts which are within this circle continue tinue there shut up, as if they were encompassed with nets. They roll about with their feet gathered under their belly, without daring to fly or to defend themselves; thus the lion devours them, successively, without resistance. Such, adds he, is our condition since our last dispersion. We are, as it were, shut up within a circle among our enemies, the Ishmaelites on one side, and the uncircumcised on the other; there we continue, detained by our fears, without being able to use our hands for our defence, or our feet for our escape.

But, it is to no purpose to rack our brains for a literal sense to a bad reading. The LXX. Aquila, and other old Greek translators, read in the Hebrew, caru, "they pierced:" Origen, Jerom, Justin, and other ancient fathers read so too, and never made any difficulty of the passage. The Rabbins themselves own that in the old manuscripts, caru was in the text, or, at least in the margin. And some exist at this day with this reading. It makes very good sense, and is authorized by all antiquity. This therefore should be followed; not that of the modern Jews, which makes no good sense.

LIP, is sometimes used for the bank of a river, for the border of a vessel, (or table, Exod. xxv. 24.) 2Chron. iv. 2. speaking of the Brazen Sea—from lip to lip. Lip signifies likewise language; they had all but one language, one lip, Gen. xi. 1. I am of uncircumcised lips, Exod. vi. 12. I cannot easily explain myself, I have an imperfection, a thickness, in my speech. That which cometh forth out of his lips, Lev. v. 4. Deut. xxiii. 23. that which he hath promised, the vow which he pronounced. Job hath not sinned with his lips, Job i. 22. ii. 10. God removeth the lip of the faithful, does not always give them eloquence, or a facility of speaking. Job xii. 20.

The fruit of the lips. Isaiah lvii. 19, God giveth peace which is the fruit of his promises: otherwise, he giveth peace which is a new occasion of praise to him. A man's belly shall be satisfied with the fruit of his mouth, and with the increase of his lips shall he be filled, Prov. xviii. 20. A man shall be esteemed, according as he [wisely] governs his tongue. We will render thee the calves of our lips, says Hosea, xiv. 2. i. e. sacrifices of praise, instead of bloody victims. Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers. Ezekiel xxxvi. 3. you have been exposed to the raillery and injurious tongues of your enemies. Stultus cadetur labiis, Prov. x. 8, 10. a fool shall be punished because of his defamatory discourses; otherwise, he whose lips are foolish, who cannot govern his tongue, shall be chastised: [or, who cannot on proper occasions maintain his own silence.] Prov. xvi. 10, 15. The lips of the king pronounce oracles. A little after: kings love righteous lips. I do not send thee, says the Lord to Ezekiel, iii. 5. to a people deep of lip, of an unknown language. He who answers uprightly kisses the mouth of him he speaks to, Prov. xxiv. 26. [Vide TO KISS.] The Hebrews used in times of mourning to cover their lips, or the lower part of their face. See Ezekiel xxiv. 22. and Mich. iii. 7.

LIZARD. Moses names two sorts of lizards among the unclean creatures, stellio and lacerta. Several sorts of lizards are well known. There are some in Arabia, of a cubit long; but in the Indies they say are some of twenty-four feet in length. In America they eat lizards. Probably, they were eaten sometimes in Arabia and Judæa, since Moses forbids them as food. See the NATURAL HISTORY.

[The lizards in the East, "twenty-four feet in length," are crocodiles, or alligators, which haunt stagnant waters, as well as rivers. Several kinds of lizards are eaten in the West Indies, as the guano or iguana, which is boasted of as the greatest of delicacies: and others. The flesh of lizards, a French writer says, has cured inveterate leprosy: eaten slightly broiled.]

We find several sorts of lizards in Scripture; לטא letæa; חמט chomet; תינשמת tinschemeth; Lev. xi. 30: and שממת semamith. The two former are translated stellio and lacerta. The third is translated mole; but Bochart maintains it is the chamelion (which is a kind of lizard.) The fourth, in Prov. xxx. 28. is rendered stellio, a lizard. Bochart, to whom we have a great regard in these matters, maintains the version of the Vulgate and LXX. against those who translate—an ape, a leech, or a spider. *De Animal. LOCUSTS. The Hebrews have many names for locusts, probably indicating several sorts. God smote Egypt with locusts, which ravaged every thing in the fields of that country. Historians and travellers remark, that locusts are very numerous in Africa, and in many parts of Asia; they sometimes fall like a cloud upon the country, and eat up every thing; the quantity of them is so large, that they obscure the Sun; and the people discerning them in the air, are in consternation, being uncertain whether they will settle, or not, on their lands. The prophet Joel, chap. i. ii. speaking of a great dearth which happened in Judea, after it had been laid waste by a multitude of locusts, describes them as an enemy's army, which had committed dreadful devastations. Isaiah remarks, xxxiii. 4, 5. that when the locusts were carried away into the sea, and were afterwards thrown up in heaps on the sands, great holes were dug in the earth to bury them; or else they were burnt, to prevent infection: in reality, it has happened, that great plagues have been occasioned by them. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLIV: also the PLATES of LOCUSTS; and their explanations.

Moses declares all creatures that fly and walk on four feet, to be impure, but he excepts those which having their hind-feet longer than the others, skip, and do not crawl upon the earth. Afterwards, Lev. xi. 22. he describes four sorts of locusts, called אֲרֵבָה arbeh, סָלְעָם salam, חֲרָגוֹל chargol, and חֲחָבִיב hachagab, which Jerom translates bruchus, attacus, ophiomacus, and lcousta. See Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. Part ii. lib. iv. cap. 1—8.

There are reckoned thirty several sorts of locusts, some in India (if we dare believe Pliny) three feet long. Gregatim sublata vento in maria aut stagna decidunt. Deorum iræ pestis ea intelligitur, &c. Nat. Hist. lib. xi. cap. 29.

As these creatures were, [and are] commonly eaten in Palestine, and in the neighbouring countries, there is no difficulty in supposing, that the word acrides used by Matthew, iii. 4. speaking of the food on which John subsisted, might signify locusts. The ancients affirm, that in Africa, Syria, Persia, and almost throughout Asia, the people did commonly eat these creatures. Some nations were called Acridophagi, or eaters of locusts, because they formed their principal food. Clenard, in a letter from Fez, A. D. 1541, assures us, that he saw waggonloads of locusts brought into that city for food. Kirstenius in his notes on Matthew, says, he was informed by his Arabic master, that he had often seen them on the river Jordan; that they were of the same form as ours, but larger; that the inhabitants pluck off their wings and feet, and hang up the rest, till they grow warm and ferment; and that then they eat them, and think them good food. A Monk who had travelled into Egypt, assures us, that he had eat of these locusts, and that in the country they subsisted on them four months in the year.

Ludolphus, in his Comment on the History of Æthiopia, endeavours to shew, that what is explained of quails sent by God for the sustenance of his people, Exod. xvi. 13. Numb. xi. 31. should be understood of locusts. See QUAILS.

[The latest traveller who has paid much attention to the subject of this insect, and has published his remarks, is Mr. Morier, who in his Second Journey in Persia, informs us, that,

“The south-east wind constantly brought with it innumerable flights of locusts; but those which fell on this occasion we were informed, were not of the predatory sort. They were three inches long from the head to the extremity of the wing, and their body and head of a bright yellow. The locust which destroys vegetation, is of a larger kind, and of a deep red. As soon as the wind had subsided, the Plain of Bushire was covered by a great number of its poorer inhabitants, men, women, and children, who came out to gather locusts, which they eat. They also dry and salt them, and afterwards sell them in the bazars as the food of the lowest peasantry. When boiled, the yellow ones turn red, and eat like stale or decayed shrimps. The locusts and wild honey which St. John ate in the wilderness, are perhaps particularly mentioned, to show that he fared as the poorest of men, and not as a wild man; as some might interpret.” March 23—26.

“On the 11th of June, while seated in our tents about noon, we heard a very unusual noise, that sounded like the rustling of a great wind at a distance. On looking up we perceived an immense cloud, here and there semi-transparent, in other parts quite black, that spread itself all over the sky, and at intervals shadowed the sun. These we soon found to be locusts, whole swarms of them falling about us . . . These were larger, and of a red colour, and I should suppose are the red predatory locust, one of the Egyptian plagues; they are also the “great grass-hopper,” mentioned by the prophet Nahum; no doubt, in contra-distinction to the lesser, chap. iii. 17. As soon as they appeared, the gardeners and husband-men made loud shouts, to prevent their settling settling on their grounds. It is to this custom that the prophet Jeremiah perhaps alludes, when he says "surely I will fill thee with men, as with caterpillars, and they shall lift up a shout against thee," chap. li. 14. They seemed to be impelled by one common instinct, and moved in one body, which had the appearance of being organized by a leader. Their strength must be very great, if we consider what immense journeys they have been known to make." p. 99.

"At Smyrna, in 1800, they committed great depredations. About the middle of April the hedges and ridges of the fields began to swarm with young locusts, which then wore a black appearance, had no wings, and were quite harmless. About the middle of May they had increased triple the size, were of a gray cindery colour, and had incipient wings about half-an-inch long. They still continued to be harmless; but, at the end of June they had grown to their full size, which was three inches and a half in length; the legs, head, and extremities red; the body a pale colour, tending to red. They seemed to march in regular battalions; crawling over every thing that lay in their passage, in one straight front. They entered the inmost recesses of the houses, were found in every corner, stuck to our clothes, and infested our food.

"The husband-men and vine-dressers knew whether eggs had been deposited by them, and were most active in discovering them. Sometimes it would happen that none had been deposited at one village, while they were found at the next; and they calculated their harvests and vintages accordingly."

Undoubtedly, there are many kinds of locusts; and several of them could not but be known to the Hebrews; no doubt, also, they had different names: nevertheless, it is equally evident that the locust, in the course of its growth is of different colours, — blackish, — cindery — pale red, — deep red. There is still some difficulty, therefore, to know whether the Hebrews had not (as the Arabs now have) different names to express these states; and whether such are used in Scripture. Mr. Morier adds two particulars, which deserve notice: he says, "It is an extraordinary circumstance, that the barn-door fowls eat them before they were quite full grown; and that when such was the case, the yolk of the eggs which the hens laid was of a dark reddish colour, partaking of that of the locust." He says also, that "when the female has laid all her eggs, several male locusts surround and kill her. This very extraordinary circumstance of the killing of the female by the male, I myself never saw, but have heard from such very indubitable eye-witnesses, that I fully credit it."

Nor is it absolutely certain that John Baptist ate flying locusts: if I do not mis-understand the account given of him by his disciples, he lived wholly on vegetable diet, and ate nothing that had life: and it should seem that it would be difficult to mingle animal locusts among the wheat, grapes and nuts, now eaten by his disciples as commemorative food. There is a mealy kind of podded fruit, of the Carob tree, called St. John's bread, by some, which would well agree with his vegetable diet; but, whether this were known by the Greek name acrides, or by the Syriac word to which it answers, is uncertain. It is a very coarse food: and is eaten (in Europe) only in times of great scarcity.]

LOD, לוֹד, Vulgate, Lud. Birth, generation: from לוֹד jalad. [Perhaps while this city was building, the founder had a son born to him.]

LOD. See LYDDA; and 1 Chron. viii. 12. where it is said, that Elpaal had three sons, Eber, Misham, and Shamed, and that he built Ono and Lod.

LODEBAR, לוֹדְבָר, to him the word; from דָּבָר dabar, the word, and לוֹ, him; and לוֹ, to: or, the loss, and the word: also from דָּבָר deber.

LODEDAR. Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, dwelt at Lodebar, after the death of his father, when David sent for him to court. It was probably beyond Jordan, 2 Sam. ix. 4, 5.

Lodebar, may signify Lod on the other side, in opposition to Lod on this side, which is Diospolis.

[LODEBAR, his own word, otherwise, his own pest, or death: otherwise, elect generation, or, from the Hebrew and Syriac, nativity of a son. Comp. LOD. Simon thinks this has a negative sense—"flock-less."]

[LOG, a Hebrew measure, which held five-sixths of a pint, called a fourth-part of a cab, 2 Kings vi. 25. Lev. xiv. 12. xii. 24. The word log signifies that measure of oil, which lepers were to offer at the temple after their cure.

Log, says Dr. Arbuthnot, was a measure of liquids; the 72d part of the bath, or ephah, and the 12th part of the hin, according to all the accounts of the Jewish writers. Tables of Ancient Coins, &c.

LOIS, Λῶϊς, better: from λῶϊον, better.

LOIS, Timothy's grand-mother. St. Paul commends her faith, 2 Tim. i. 5.

LONGINUS. The soldier who pierced our Lord's side with his spear, John xix. 34. is called by this name. We have many stories of Longinus, but none very authentic. That which the Bollandists have published, in the Acts of the Saints, on March 15, imports, that Longinus was one of the soldiers appointed to guard the cross, and the persons crucified; that observing the miracles which happened at the death of Jesus Christ, he was converted, and acknowledged him to be a just man; afterwards, having been set as one of the guard over our Saviour's sepulchre, he refused the money offered by the priests to corrupt him; which provoked Pilate to resolve on his destruction, but he did not accomplish his design. In order to his devoting himself entirely to Jesus Christ, he renounced a military life without Pilate's leave, and retired to his own house in Cappadocia, with two of his fellow soldiers, who followed his example. In Cappadocia he began to preach the gospel, whereupon the Jews solicited Pilate that these deserters might be punished. Pilate accordingly sent soldiers into Cappadocia, who cut off their heads, and brought them to him.

Chrysostom tells us, Homil. 89, in Matth. that in his time some people maintained, that the centurion mentioned Matth. xxvii. 54. who gave glory to God, saying "Of a truth this was the Son of God;" was so confirmed in the faith, as to suffer martyrdom, and that the Acts of his martyrdom were extant. But he does not affirm that this was he who pierced our Saviour's side; much less that his name was Longinus. The Greeks assert, that Longinus suffered martyrdom at Andrales, or Sandrales, near Thyane in Cappadocia, and they honour him October 6. The Latins believe Longinus not to be the centurion, but the soldier who pierced the Son of God. They keep his festival March 15. See Bollandus on Mar. 15; and M. de Tillemont's Ecclesiastical History, tom. i. note 38.

[It is thought that Longinus has derived both story and name from the spear λόγχη, longché, that pierced the side of Jesus: it was rather a weapon of a foot-soldier than of a horseman; a long spear, whence Longinus: but, others think, a short spear; and say, that the Pretorian soldiers which carried these lances, were called λογχοφόροι, lance-bearers.]

LOOKING-GLASSES. Moses says, that the devout women who sat up all night at the door of the tabernacle in the wilderness, offered cheerfully their looking-glasses to be employed in making a brazen laver for the purifications of the priests, Exod. xxxviii. 8. These looking-glasses were, without doubt, of brass, since the laver was made out of them. Nevertheless, some interpreters are of opinion, that they were of glass, with only a border of brass. Others, that they were placed about this brazen vessel, that the priests might view themselves therein: but recourse to these explanations is needless, since we know, that looking-glasses [mirrors] were formerly made of brass, tin, silver, and a mixture of brass and silver. The last of these were the most valued; optima apud majores fuerunt Brundusina stanno et ære mistis, Pliny, lib. xxiii. cap. 9. There are some still extant of metal, which are much esteemed. St. Cyril of Alexandria, de Adorat. in Spiritu. lib. ii. says, that when the Ægyptian women went to the temple dressed in linen, they carried a looking-glass [mirror] in the right hand, and a sistrum in the left.

The looking-glasses of the ancients were generally round. Seneca inveighs against the luxury of the women in his time, which was arrived to such a height, that looking-glasses were as large as human bodies, and cost more than formerly was required to endow the daughter of a Roman general. Do you believe, adds he, that Scipio's daughters had looking-glasses set in gold? they, to whom the senate gave a moderate portion, which now would not be sufficient to purchase a looking-glass for the daughter of a freed-man.

Sophocles, cited in Athenæus, lib. v. represents Venus viewing herself in a looking-glass, after having perfumed her whole body. This shews the antiquity of looking-glasses among the Greeks. Pausanias, lib. vii. cap. 21. speaks of another use of the looking-glass, to know whether sick persons were recoverable or not. It was fastened to a packthread, and let down gently to the surface of water, so that the circle, extremity, or edge of it touched the water; then they presented their prayers, burning incense to the goddess, and in the looking-glass they saw the sick as they were to be after their sickness, whether dead, or in health.

Magicians sometimes used looking-glasses in their superstitions and diabolical operations; and some affirm, that Solomon and Alexander had such, by help of which they knew all things, natural, and sometimes even supernatural. The mode of divining by looking-glasses was in use among the ancients. They would hoodwink, they say, the eyes of a child, yet, notwithstanding, he should see in the looking-glass what people had a mind to know. The sorcerers of Thessaly who boasted that they could draw down the moon, wrote the particulars respecting which they were consulted, on a looking-glass; and he who consulted them, read the answer, not on the the looking-glass, but on the moon, which, as was said, they caused to descend from heaven, lunam deducere. Spartian, in Severo. [N. B. It is conjectured that they used some kind of telescope; as also our Druids.]

LORD, Dominus; Kypios, kyrios; אדוני Adoni, or Adonai; Elohim, or Jehovah; for the Greek and Latin interpreters often put Kypios, and Dominus, Lord, for all these names.

I. The name of the LORD belongs to God by pre-eminence, and in this sense ought never to be given to any creature. The Messiah as Son of God, equal to the Father, is likewise often called Lord in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

II. This name is sometimes given to angels; whether as representing the person of God, as in those visions of the Old Testament, wherein the patriarchs and prophets speak to them in the same terms as to God himself; or whether, esteemed as angels sent by God. Daniel, x. 16, 17. says to the angel, or, as he calls him, to one who spoke to him under a human form; O my Lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. For how can the servant of this my Lord talk with this my Lord?

III. When spoken to princes, great men, and persons to whom we would shew respect; it is met with in this sense, at every turn in Scripture. But generally the word, my, is joined with it: My Lord; and, though sometimes the words Adoni and Elohim, are attributed to a creature, yet the appellation Jehovah never is.

[LO-RUHAMA, or Rachamah; not-beloved. Vide AMMI.]

LOT, לוֹט, wrapped up, hidden, covered: otherwise, myrrh, rosin. [Protection, i. e. of the family. Simon.]

LOT, son of Haran, and nephew to Abraham. He followed his uncle from Ur, and afterwards from Haran, to settle in Canaan, Gen. xi. 31. A. M. 2082, and 2083, ante A. D. 1921, 1922. Abraham had always a great tenderness for him. He took him with him into Egypt, and brought him back to Canaan. They could not continue longer together: but were obliged to separate, because, as they both had large flocks, their shepherds sometimes quarrelled, Gen. xiii. 6, 7. Lot therefore chose Sodom for his abode, the country around it being very beautiful.

About eight years after, king Chedorlaomer and his allies having attacked the kings of Sodom, and the neighbouring cities, routed them, pillaged Sodom, took many captives, and Lot, Abraham's nephew, Abraham being informed of it, armed his servants, pursued the confederate kings, overtook them near the springs of Jordan, recovered the spoil which they had taken, and brought back the captives; including Lot.

Some years after, the sins of the Sodomites and of the neighbouring cities being at their height, God sent his angels to punish and destroy them: Vide ABRAHAM.

Towards evening, two of these angels being come to Sodom, Lot, who was sitting at the city gate, intreated them very earnestly to lodge in his house; they went in, and he provided entertainment for them. But before they retired to rest, all the men of the city besieged Lot's house, exclaiming, "Where are these men, who came to you this evening? Produce them, that we may know them." "Do not, I beseech you, my brethren," said Lot, "commit any thing so wicked. I have two daughters, virgins; I would rather bring them to you; use them as you please, provided you injure not my guests; men who are come to my house, as to a place of security." But they said; "Be gone; you came a stranger hither, and now pretend to be our judge." As they were on the point of breaking in the two angels drew Lot into his house, and shut the door; and struck with blindness all who were assaulting it.

Then said the angels to Lot, "Direct all who belong to you to quit this city; for we are come to destroy it." Lot went and informed his sons-in-law who had married his daughters; but this intelligence they received as an idle fancy. In the morning, ere it was day, the angels took Lot, his wife, and daughters, by the hand, and drew them forcibly, as it were, out of their house: saying, "Save yourselves with all haste, look not behind you, get as fast as you are able to the mountain, lest you be involved in the misfortune of the city." Lot intreated the angels, who consented, that he might retire to Zoar, which was one of the five cities doomed to be destroyed. But Lot's wife looking behind her, was overtaken in the flame which fell from heaven, and consumed Sodom.

Lot left Zoar, and retired with his two daughters to a cave in some mountain near it. —They, imagining that all mankind was destroyed, and that the world would end, unless they provided new inhabitants for it, made their father drink, and the eldest lay with him without his perceiving it; she conceived a son by him, whom she called Moab. The second daughter did the same, and had Ammon by him.

St. Peter says, 2 Epist. ii. 7. that God, in his mercy, delivered righteous Lot from the oppression oppression and vexation of the Sodomites.

The Mahometans have added many circumstances to the history of Lot: as that, he was sent by God to Sodom, and the four cities, in order to reclaim them from their horrible crime; the Arabians call him Louth, or Laouth. Lot acquitted himself of the duty of a preacher, for twenty years; reproaching them with being the first of all mankind who fell into this abomination, and perverted the order of nature; but his remonstrances were in vain. God therefore sent the angel Gabriel, with two others to exterminate them. He passed by Abraham's abode, and discovered God's resolution to him. Abraham contested a great while with him, saying, that perhaps there were a hundred righteous men in the five cities, and that God was too just to confound the innocent with the guilty. He afterwards descended by degrees so far as to make the angel promise, that he would not destroy the cities if he found but one righteous person in them. Hereupon Abraham observed to him, that Lot was there with his family; the angels replied, We will deliver him: therefore say no more, for the sentence of their condemnation is irrevocable.

The angels on their arrival near the city found Lot at work in the fields; he saluted them, and understanding that they intended to pass that night in the city, he was much afflicted at it, apprehending they might be insulted, by reason of their beauty. He told them, that probably they did not know what sort of people the inhabitants of Sodom were; that there were not more wicked men under heaven; which he repeated to them four times, modestly restraining him from explaining himself farther: they did not however yield to his reasons, but went into the city with him. They were no sooner entered his house, but the people of Sodom came and besieged them. Lot went out, and offered his daughters, if they would spare his guests: but their answer was, Thou knowest we have nothing to do with thy daughters, and art not ignorant of what we demand. Lot replied to them, I have not indeed strength enough to resist you, but God is my refuge, who will be able to defend me and my guests from your outrages.

Then the angels encouraged him, declared to him who they were, and told him that they were sent to destroy these wretches. At the same time they blinded them by only drawing their hands over their own faces. This chastisement dispersed them, and they cried out, that these strangers were sorcerers. The angels immediately directed Lot and his daughters to depart ant of the city. But his wife, who had been debauched by her conversation among the inhabitants, chose to stay and share their fate.

The angel Gabriel going under the foundations of these cities, raised them up in the air to such a height, that the inhabitants of heaven who were nearest to the earth, heard the music of their horns, and the barking of their dogs; then he let them fall down upon the earth, and all who dwelt in them were crushed to pieces under their ruins, God intending that their punishment should bear some proportion to their crime. After this overthrow God showered down upon them, hot burning stones baked in the furnaces of hell; upon each whereof the names of the guilty were written, so that even they who were without the compass of their city, were burnt and knocked on the head by them. It is said that one of them being at that time by chance in the temple of Mecca, built by Abraham, continued there secure for forty days; but that he no sooner set his foot out of it, but he was struck down and killed like the rest of his countrymen.

[N. B. Romantic as this account appears, it preserves traces of an earthquake, and a volcano, which were, in all probability, the natural, secondary causes of the overthrow of Sodom, and of the formation of the Dead Sea.]

LOT'S WIFE, is called Hedith by the Rabbins: this word signifies witness: as if they would denominate this woman a witness, or proof of the punishment, which God inflicts on the unbelief and imprudence of those, who obey not his word and threatenings. Scripture says, Gen. xix. 26. that she looked back from behind him, and was changed into a pillar of salt. This phrase, to look back behind, is taken sometimes for delaying, deferring, staying: it was probably, the angel's intention to hasten Lot and his family; to convince them that they had reason to fear the worst consequences from their hesitation: this, Lot's wife resisted.

Several difficulties are proposed concerning her being changed into a pillar of salt. Some are of opinion, that it signifies only, that, being surprised and suffocated with fire and smoke, she continued in the same place, as stiff and immovable as a rock of salt: others, that a column or monument of salt stone was erected on her grave: others, that she was stifled in the flame, and became a monument of salt to posterity, i. e. a permanent and durable monument of her imprudence. Others, that she was overpowered with the sulphur and flame, and fell down dead on the earth, where her body became stiff and dry like mummies, which have been salted and embalmed:

embalmed: so that a statue of salt signifies the same as a body dried, and salted.

But the common opinion is, that this woman was suddenly petrified and changed into a statue of rock salt; which not only is not melted by rain, but is as hard as the hardest rocks. Some travellers in Palestine relate, that Lot's wife was shewn to them; i. e. the rock into which she was metamorphosed. But what renders their testimony very suspicious is, that they do not agree about the place where it stands; some saying westward, others eastward; some northward, others southward, of the Dead Sea; others in the midst of its waters; others in Zoar, others at a great distance from that city. Some of the ancients, as Irenæus, lib. iv. cap. 51. and the author of a poem on Sodom, ascribed to Tertullian, assure us, that this pillar retained the form of a woman. They add something more incredible, viz. that she retained also, the infirmities natural to her sex.

[The words of the original have been much too strictly taken by translators: גלגל, rendered statue, by no means expresses form but fixation, settledness; hence a military post, i. e. a fixed station; and as the Hebrews reckoned among salts, both nitre and bitumen, so the term salt, here used, denotes the bitumenous mass which overwhelmed this woman, fixed her to the place where it fell on her, raised a mound over her, of a height proportionable to that of her figure, and was long afterwards pointed out by the inhabitants as a memento of her fate, and a warning against loitering, when divinely exhorted.]

Our Lord in the Gospel admonishes his disciples, to remember Lot's wife in their flight, and not to imitate her tardiness, Luke xvii. 32.

LOT, sors; Heb. גורל goral; Gr. κληρος; Persian, pur; whence the feast of Purim, or of Lots. We see lots used in many places of Scripture. God commanded, that lots should be cast on the two goats, offered for the sins of Israel, on the solemn day of expiation; to ascertain which of the two should be sacrificed, and which set at liberty. He required also, that the land of promise should be divided by lot. Numb. xxvi. 55, 56. xxxiii. 54. xxxiv. 13. &c. The priests and Levites in like manner had cities given them by lot, Joshua xiv, xv, xvi. In the time of David, the twenty-four classes of the priests and Levites were distributed by lot, to their order of waiting in the temple. 1 Chr. vi. 54, 61. [and it should seem from Luke i. 9. that the portions of daily duty were appointed to the priests, by lot; as Zechariah's lot was, to burn incense.] In the division of the spoil after victory, lots were cast likewise to determine the portion of each. 1 Chr. xxiv. xxv. In the New Testament the soldiers cast lots for Jesus Christ's garments, as had been foretold by the prophet. After the death of Judas, lots were cast to decide which of the persons proposed, should succeed into his place. Acts i. 26.

The manner of casting lots, we do not find described clearly in the Scripture; and interpreters disagree about it: several methods were used. Solomon in the Proverbs, xvi. 33. points out one, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord. Lots therefore were cast either into some person's lap, into a helmet, or an earthen vessel, or a vessel of some other matter; there they were shaken together, and afterwards cast, or drawn: but all this, it is probable, might depend on the inclination of those concerned. See PLATE: LOTS.

The use of lots is not prohibited, for God even enjoins it on some occasions, and the most holy persons of the O. and New Testaments practised it. The Wise man acknowledges the usefulness of this custom in these words, Prov. xviii. 18. The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty. But it cannot be denied that casting lots is sometimes forbid; as, when it is practised without necessity; or with superstition; or with a design of tempting God; or, in things wherein there are other natural means of discovering truth; lastly, when reason and religion furnish better ways to guide us. Haman, Esther iii. 7, &c. used lots, not only out of superstition, but likewise in an unjust and criminal matter, when he undertook to destroy the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar did so in a superstitious manner, when being on the way to Jerusalem, and Rabbath of the Ammonites, he cast lots to determine which of the two cities he should first attack. Ezek. xxi. 18, &c. The mariners who had Jonah in their vessel, tempted God, by drawing lots to know whence the tempest originated with which they were overtaken, Jonah i. 7. The storm might be natural, and it is possible that all of them were culpable. Lastly, God was not obliged to discover the guilty person to them by lots. Comp. ACHAN, JONATHAN.

Lot is taken likewise for inheritance. For example, Come up with me into my lot, into my inheritance, Judg. i. 3. Lord, thou maintainest my lot, Psalm xv. 5. Again, The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous, Ps. cxxv. 3: on the inheritance of God's faithful servants.

LOTAN, לוטן, from loth. Son of Seir, Gen. xxxvi. 20, 29. 1 Chron. i. 38. [powerful protection ?]

[LOVE,

[LOVE, is a natural passion of the human mind ; given to man for the most important purposes. It is denominated from its object, as

1. Divine love, love to God, love to divine things, to whatever relates to God, is appointed, or approved by him. Love generally is excited in the mind by a sense of some good, some excellence, real or supposed, in the object beloved ; wherefore, as all good is supremely excellent, absolutely certain and infinite, in God, God is entitled to our supreme affection.

2. Brotherly love, an affection arising from a sense of participation in certain enjoyments, benefits, or &c. of which both parties are conscious. In a family, brothers love each other, because they are conscious of their mutual relation, of enjoying the same family advantages, privileges, &c. the kind regards of the same parents, &c. the kindnesses which are continually rendered by them one to another, and endear them to each other.

3. Christian brotherly love, is assimilated to the sentiments and feelings of the former : it is a sympathy actuated by a sense of communion in the same hopes, the same fears, the same affections, the same aversions, the benevolence of the same parent, and the general and particular sympathies connected with the principles of piety, the union of the Christian system, and the reciprocal kindnesses of truly renewed minds.

Love is parental, filial, conjugal, spiritual, &c.

It is the excellence of the Christian system, that it ennobles this passion, regulates it, directs it to proper objects, moderates it within due bounds, and finding this principle in the human mind, it does not banish but encourage it, does not depress but exalt it, does not abate but promote it : love is conducted by piety to proper objects, is animated with the noblest expectations, and is trained up for perpetual exercise in a world where it shall be perfectly purified, perfectly extended, and perfectly rewarded.]

[LOVE-FEAST, vide AGAPÆ. Eng. Trans. Feasts of Charity. Jude 12. This apostle complains of spots in the feasts of charity, i. e. hypocrites, who abused the simplicity of Christians.

The history of the agapæ among the primitive Christians is so closely connected with the manners, customs, and opinions of times and places, that to treat it satisfactorily would lead us too far : but there seems reason to conclude, that the social intercourse of early believers might enable them to discover many excellencies in each other, which might contribute to justify and to promote the observations of heathen strangers “See how these Christians love !” Whether the revival of this rite be a duty, we do not venture to affirm : but that it might be, under proper management, and conduct, a great advantage to piety, even in the present day, need not be doubted. Endeavours have been made by some moderns to revive this practice ; but, whether it will ever again be general is very uncertain.

These agapæ, were not only very powerful means, among the primitive Christians, of cultivating mutual affection throughout their body, and of gaining the good-will of those who observed their conduct ; but, in all probability, they contributed to promote the Christian cause, by leading to conversions, and by supporting the minds of young converts under the difficulties attending their situation. Pliny seems to describe these agapæ, when, writing to Trajan, he says, The Christians “assemble on a day appointed, to take a common and innocent repast together.” And Tertullian, Apol. cap. 39. speaks of them thus : “Nothing low or unseemly is committed in them ; nor is it till after having prayed to God, that they sit down to table. Food is taken in moderation, as wanted ; and no more is drank than it becomes discreet persons to drink. Each takes such refreshment as is suitable, in connection with the recollection that he is to be engaged, in the course of the night, in adorations to God ; and the conversation is conducted as becometh those who know that the Lord heareth them. After water has been brought for the hands, and fresh lights, every one is invited to sing, and to glorify God, whether by passages from the sacred Scriptures, or of his own composition. This discovers whether proper moderation has been observed at the table. In short, the repast concludes as it begun ; that is to say, with prayer.”

These institutions, even in the time of the apostles, were attended with inconveniencies, arising pretty much from a too strong sense of the inequalities of rank in life ; at length, the rich invited only persons like themselves, or those who were expected to return the favour : consequently, the poor were excluded ; and the whole was abolished by the Council of Laodicea, Can. 28. Synod of Trullo, Can. 74. and the Council of Carthage, Can. 42.

For a rite the counterpart of the Agapæ, see the article DISCIPLES of JOHN BAPTIST.]

[LOW, is taken for station in life, for disposition of mind, for national depression, &c.

As poverty of station is not poverty of spirit, so lowliness of condition is not lowliness of mind, neither is it always connected with it. We see daily, many, whose manners and situation are low, yet the natural haughtiness of the human mind reigns in them with absolute uncontrol.

troul. Nevertheless, it is a great blessing which sometimes attends the dispensations of Providence, when they abase a person in this world, that they bring him into a more suitable disposition of mind, a more lowly habit of thought and conduct, than when his prosperity was high. So that if he have occasion to regret the loss of temporal good things, he may have much greater reason to rejoice in acquisition of mental and spiritual advantages. Vide HUMILITY, and Add.]

[LOWER PARTS of the earth. These are,

1. Valleys, which diversify the face of the globe, and are evidently lower than hills, which also contribute to that diversity. Isaiah xlv. 23.

2. The Grave, which being dug into the earth, or into rocks, &c. is the lower part of the earth, of that portion of it which is usually opened to the sons of men; this is sometimes called the deep, or abyss; and indeed it is secluded from our cognizance, till we are called to visit "that bourne from whence no traveller returns." Psalm lxiii. 9. Eph. iv. 9.

3. As to the phrase "lower parts of the earth," Psalm cxxxix. 15. in reference to the mother's womb, I confess I do not understand it: perhaps, there is a mark of assimilation כ, dropped, perhaps, the word includes the idea of a mere particle, an atom of earth,—“when I was made in secret, when I was compacted into form, put together, in the most secret of places, (the womb) and endued with life, though a minute particle of clay, an atom of earth,” as the foetus in the embryo, the chick in the egg; quasi animalcula in semine, &c. But, will the words bear this sense? Or, has the passage any reference to the first formation of man from the dust of the earth? Gen. ii. 7. It does not appear necessary to take the Hebrew word rendered "lower parts," as expressing extremely deep, or central parts, in reference to the general globe of the earth: as the grave is not very deep, in fact, yet is called the lower parts of the earth, Psalm lxiii. Eph. iv. 9. and even the superficies of the earth is thus called in reference to valleys, Isaiah xlv. 23. so, the superficial dust of the earth, whereof man was made, being taken from the moist valley, not from high hills, from a loamy soil, not from granite rock, may be understood by the phrase "lower parts of the earth." Might this be accepted, the Psalmist may intend to say, "The formation of my body, with its various members was not without thy knowledge, when I was in the secret womb, completely constituted, body, soul and spirit, (1 Thess. v. 23.) as wonderfully now, by natural generation, as man was at first compacted from the dust of the earth:" otherwise,

VOL. II. PART XVIII. Edit. IV.

"as a wonderful microcosm, a world—a human world, with its many secret combinations, and interior constructions necessary to life; as wonderful as the composition of the globe itself!"

Whoever is acquainted with the speculations of the inquisitive on the mode of impregnation, will admit the truth of this representation, notwithstanding the unremitting labours of our own Hunters, the experiments of the curious Spallanzani, and of a thousand others, which, probably, would have been thought little, if any thing, short of impiety among the Hebrews.

"The construction of my solid parts—my bones, &c. was not hidden from thee, though formed in the most secret place; and they became connected, compact, firm, under thy appointment, and inspection, though originally a mere molecule of moist matter. Comp. Job x. 9—12.]

LUCIFER. This word is taken (1) for the morning-star; (2) for Jesus Christ, the Light of the world; (3) for the devil, who by the fathers is often called Lucifer. Zophar says to Job, (xi. 17.) If thou art innocent, when thou shalt think thyself lost, thou shalt shine forth as the morning-star,—בֹּקֶר, boker. And God speaking to Job, says, xxxviii. 32. Canst thou produce the morning-star at the time when it should appear?—כִּימָה, chima. And the Eternal Father speaking of the Word; I have begotten thee in my womb before the morning,—שַׁחַר, schachar.

Isaiah, xiv. 12, &c. speaks of the fall of Lucifer, How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! Thou that appearest so bright at the break of day. In this sense several fathers, and many commentators explain it. Others are of opinion that it literally refers to the king of Babylon, who fell from his state of glory and elevation, and was cast head-long into hell, [into hades, the state of the dead.]

[It is somewhat remarkable, that although CALMET quotes three names as denoting the morning-star (which it is not likely that all the three should do) yet he leaves unexplained that which is rendered Lucifer, the immediate subject of his article, הִלֵּל. This word seems to import one unduly exalted, or, who has exalted himself unduly, a famous braggart, an upstart, intoxicated with power and supremacy, and therefore playing mad freaks, in his tyranny over neighbouring nations. Comp. 1 Sam. xxi. 13. Psalm ciii. 9. Ecol. i. 17. ii. 3. x. 13. and Parkhurst, in הן. To this agrees the scope of the passage; How art thou fallen!—therefore, he was preposterously elevated: art thou become weak as we? therefore, he had boasted of his strength: thy pomp is brought down to the grave, &c. Now, not only is this not true of the planet Venus, when, preceding the Sun, it is THE morning-star, Phosphorus; but, that star has no properties to which this term assimilates; not to insist that in the eastern languages this planet is feminine. It is probable, that this is altogether a western idea, as Virgil sweetly sings, (Comp. Iliad v.)

Qualis ubi Oceani perfusus Lucifer unda,
Quem Venus ante alios astrorum diligit ignes,
Extulit os cœlo sacrum, tenebrasque resolvit.

Æn. viii.

But, the subsequent allusions to “ascending into heaven,”—to “exalting his throne above the stars of God,”—to “sitting on the MOUNT of the congregation, i. e. of the gods,”—“on the sides of the north,” i. e. the Mount Meru, of the Hindoos, seem to be Oriental, and even Brahminical: in which case the term שחר would express exactly the dark colour of Vishnu’s complexion; and it would appear that this potentate boasted of his relation to that deity. In verse 13, the phrase “I will exalt my throne above the stars of God,” has the regular word for stars, כוכבי; and the terms for morning-stars, Job xxxviii. 7. are כוכבי בקר, which have no relation whatever to the supposed Lucifer of this place, as a supposed “morning-star”. The derivation from light is unsatisfactory; as the planet Jupiter, when a morning-star, is no less bright; and it is absurd to call a bright star son of schachar—the dark-coloured,—the gloom of the morning.]

St. Peter, 2 Epis. i. 19. tells the faithful, that they have the word of prophesy whereunto they do well that they take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in their hearts. This morning-star, this light, set in opposition to the oracles of the preceding prophets, and over which it has so much advantage by its clearness, denotes the gospel and doctrine of Jesus Christ. St. Peter in this passage hints at three degrees of light. 1. The oracles of the prophets, which shine in obscurity; this is the state of the Jews.

2. The morning-star, the dawn of day, to those who have embraced the faith. Some translate the Greek, ἕως οὗ ἣ ἡμέρα διαύγασω, καὶ Φωσφόρος ἀνατελῇ, till the day appear, and the sun rises. They pretend, that Phosphorus and Lucifer sometimes signify the sun.

The Arabians call Lucifer, Eblis, also, Azazel, which is the name of the scape-goat that was sent into the wilderness, laden with the sins of the Jews. They relate, that the angels having God’s order to fall prostrate before Adam immediately after his creation, all complied, except Eblis, who obstinately refused, alledging, that he and his companions having been derived from the element fire, which is much purer and more excellent than that of earth, whereof Adam was formed, it was not just that they should be obliged to pay submission to their inferior. Whereupon God said to him, Be gone from hence, for thou shalt be deprived for ever of my peace, and shalt be cursed to the day of judgment. Eblis desired of God that he would grant him respite till the time of the general resurrection; but all the delay he could obtain was till the sound of the first trumpet, that at which all men shall die, in order to rise again at the second sound of the trumpet; i. e. forty years after. Eblis therefore died according to the Mahometans, but he will hereafter rise with all men, in order to be plunged into flames. I relate these idle traditions for no other reason but to shew, that the theology of the Eastern people is but a corruption of Christianity.

LUCIUS, Λέκιος, light; from the Latin lux.

I. LUCIUS of Cyrene, mentioned Acts xiii. 1. one of the prophets of the Christian church at Antioch. While employed in his ministry with the others, the Holy Ghost said; Separate me Paul and Barnabas, &c. Some believe Lucius was one of the Seventy. Usuard and Ado assert, that the apostles ordained him first bishop of Cyrene. The Latins honour him, May 6. See LUKE.

II. LUCIUS, mentioned Rom. xvi. 21. and styled St. Paul’s kinsman, is, say some, the same as Lucius the Cyrenian; but, the generality with reason distinguish them. We know nothing of this Lucius; unless he and St. Luke be the same person; which, seems very credible. Vide LUKE.

LUD, לוד, לוד, birth, generation; from לוד.

LUD, fourth son of Shem, Gen. x. 22. peopled, say the generality of ancients and moderns, Lydia, a province of Asia the Less. Arias Montanus places the Ludim where the Tigris and Euphrates meet, and M. le Clerc, between the rivers Chaboras, and Saocoras or Masca.

LUDIM,

LUDIM, לודים, Ardia, blrth; from ly-jalad. [Gr. Ard, Judith ii. 23.]

[Perhaps issue, or addition to the family; to which sense the Arabic and Ethiopic agree.

In Gen. x. 13. it is written with a single l only; but in Chronicles, Ludim, and very properly, as it should seem; the LXX. writing Loudeim. The Samaritan writes Lehudim. These people are frequently mentioned in Scripture: Isaiah lxvi. 19. Jer. xlv. 9. Ezek. xxvii. 10. xxx. 5. We must however distinguish between the children of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. or rather, a people or colony migrated from Egypt, and Lud the son of Shem, in verse 22.

These African Lydians are usually mentioned with Phul, with Ethiopia, and with Phat. They were also mercenary auxiliaries to Tyre; we must therefore expect to meet with them in a country which admits of all these particulars. Bochart inclines to Abyssinia; but Abyssinia seems to have other characters.

In Isaiah lxvi. 19. Lud is associated with Pul, or Phul, and described as a nation which draws the bow: also Jer. xlv. 19. In Ezekiel xxx. 5. it is in our translation taken for Lydia, being however mentioned with the mingled people, or Abyssinia; it is distinguished from that country, but plainly placed in Africa. We may therefore admit of two countries under this name.

1. Lydia in Asia.

2. Lydia, or Ludim, in Africa.]

LUDIM, son of Misraim, Gen. x. 13. Josephus affirms, that the descendants of Ludim had been long extinct, having been destroyed in the Ethiopian wars. The Jerusalem paraphrast translates Ludim, the inhabitants of the Mareotis, a part of Egypt: but Bochart maintains, that we should read Meroitis, or the land of Meroë. The paraphrast Jonathan translates it, those of the canton of Neut, or Neout, in Egypt; the Arabic, the inhabitants of Tenezus, near Pelusium. Ezekiel places the Ludim with Cush and Phut, and elsewhere with Phut and Pharas, or perhaps Pathros. These people were in Egypt: but it is not easy to shew exactly where the Ludim dwelt.

[LUHITH, a story, or scaffold: or greenness.

A mountain, in the opinion of Lyra, and the Hebrew commentators on Isaiah xv. 5.; but Eusebius thinks it to be a place between Areopolis and Joara: Others suppose between Petra and Sihor.

Simon derives this name from the Arabic root denoting show, glitter, height; and he thinks it means appearance,—a high place commanding an extensive prospect. From Jer. xlviii. 5. it is evident that it was an elevated station, but whether a town on a hill, or a place for prospect, or simply, the prospect up a hill, the road lying that way, does not appear. It might be such a road, leading to a town on the top of the hill; as it seems to be associated with other places which we know to be towns. The order of the places named is not the same in both prophets, though both refer to the calamities of Moab, to which dominion Luhith belonged.]

LUKE, Λουκᾶς, from the Latin, lux, luminous.

LUKE, the Evangelist, is by some ancient authors called Lucas, Lucius, or Lucanus. He was a Syrian, a native of Antioch, and by profession a physician. They who believe him to be Lucius, Rom. xvi. 21. must acknowledge likewise, that he was St. Paul's kinsman: Lucius and Jason—my kinsmen. It is not agreed whether he were by birth a Jew or a heathen. They who maintain that he was one of the Seventy, must believe he was a Jew, both by religion and descent. Epiphanius thinks, he was one who left Christ, on hearing those words, John vi. 51, He who eateth not my flesh, and drinketh not my blood, is not worthy of me; but that he returned to the faith on hearing St. Paul's sermons at Antioch. Gregory the Great, Moral. lib. i. cap. 1. and some others in Theophylact, believe St. Luke was Cleophas's companion, and went with him to Emmaus, when Jesus Christ joined them. In an addition, found at the end of St. Jerom's treatise of Eminent Men, we read that St. Luke lived always a single life, having neither wife nor children.

LUKE was St. Paul's companion in several journeys, undertaken for preaching the Gospel, 2 Tim. iv. 11. Phil. 23, 24. Col. iv. 14. but where, or when they first joined company, we cannot tell. They who maintain that he was converted by St. Paul at Antioch, believe that after that time, he never forsook him: others think they met at Troas; and St. Luke himself favours this opinion, Acts xvi. 8, 9, 10. immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia from Troas. He begins in this place to speak in the first person plural, as being then one of St. Paul's company. It is commonly believed, that St. Luke was a painter, and in some places there are pictures of the Virgin shewn as of his drawing, or, at least, as copies taken from originals by him. The ancients knew nothing of St. Luke's being qualified in this art; and Nicephorus is the first author who mentions it. But if he did not paint the personal portraits of the Virgin and her Son, he has left us many particulars concerning the Blessed Virgin, and the infancy of Jesus Christ, from which we may judge, that he had seen, and was acquainted with that admirable person, and that he had even a share in her confidence, Vide Grot. ad Luc. ii. 15. [As Luke, more than either of the other evangelists notices the Virgin Mary, this was perhaps the origin of the notion that he had painted her: i. e. he described, delineated, &c. that holy mother.]

Epiphanius believes, Hæres. 5. that he preached the Gospel in Dalmatia, Gaul, Italy, and Macedonia; Metaphrastes, that he preached in Egypt, Libya, and Thebais. Some are of opinion that he survived St. Paul many years, and died in Achaia, being eighty, or eighty-four years old, Jerom, de Viris illustr. Gaudent. Homil. xvii. Nicephorus, lib. ii. cap. 43. says, he died at Thebes in Bæotia, where is shewn a tomb, called St. Luke's, [but, by modern travellers found to be much posterior to the Evangelist.] Hippolytus, in MS. Bodlei. apud Mill. Præ. in Luc. informs us, that he was crucified at Elea in the Peloponnesus. Dorotheus in his Synopsis, tells us, that he died and was buried at Ephesus. Bede, Usuard, Ado and the Roman Calendar agree, that he died in Bithynia. Some believe he suffered martyrdom; the modern Greeks affirm, that he was crucified on an olive-tree. Elias of Crete, on the contrary, is very clear, that he did not die a violent death; and many of the moderns are of this opinion. Elias Cretens. in Orat. iii. Greg. Nazianzen.

Besides the Gospel of Luke, and the Acts of the Apostles, some other works are ascribed to him; as the translation, or even the composition, as to style, at least, of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Clemens of Alexandria, apud Euseb. lib. vi. Hist. Eccl. and Jerom, de Viris illustr. believe him to be the author of a disputation between Jason and Papiscus; which is now lost. Others, insist that the Gospel of Luke was properly St. Paul's gospel; who dictated it to St. Luke: and that when St. Paul speaks of his Gospel, Rom. ii. 16. xvi. 25. 2 Thess. xi. 13. he means the Gospel of Luke. Vide Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 4. vi. 25. Hist. Eccl. ex Origine. But Irenæus says no more, than that St. Luke digested into writing what St. Paul preached to the Gentiles; and Gregory Nazianzen says, that the evangelist wrote with the help of St. Paul. It is certain, that St. Paul generally quotes the gospel according to Luke: compare 1 Cor. xi. 23, 24, 25. with Luke xvii. 18, 19, 20. and 1 Cor. xv. 5. with Luke xxiv. 24. but Luke no where says that he was assisted by St. Paul. He addresses the Gospel and the Acts to Theophilus, of whom we have no knowledge; and many of the ancients took this name in an appellative sense, for one who loves God. The Marcionites received only the Gospel of Luke; and even this they curtailed in many places, as is observed by Tertullian, contra Marcion. lib. v. and Epiphanius, Hæres. 42.

As to the Acts of the Apostles, see ACTS.

St. Luke's style is generally purer Greek than that of the other evangelists; notwithstanding, several expressions are remarked in it peculiar to the Hellenistical Jews, several which have some resemblance to the genius of the Syriac; and, in Grotius's judgment, even to the Latin. See M. de Tillemont. [He frequently latinizes.]

LUNATICS, Σεληνιαζόμενοι, lunatici. Matt. iv. 24. Thus those sick persons are called, who suffer most severely on the changes of the moon; for example, epileptical persons, or those who have the falling-sickness, insane persons, or those tormented with fits of morbid melancholy; and lastly, persons possessed by the devil, for often those have been believed to be really possessed by the devil, who were tormented only with great degrees of melancholy, or fury. Jerom on Matt. iv. 24. is of opinion, that the lunatics in the gospel were possessed persons, whom the people through mistake called lunatics, because they saw them most tormented during the change of the moon; the devil affecting to make them suffer most in these circumstances, that simple people might impute the cause of it to the moon, and from thence take occasion to blaspheme the Creator. Others maintain, that all the difference between an epileptic and a lunatic was, that one was more disordered than the other. Persons subject to epilepsies are not all equally attacked. Some fall more frequently, others more rarely: some every day. Lunatics are affected only [chiefly] on the declension of the moon. Comp. Matt. xvii. 15.

LUNULA. God threatens the daughters of Sion, Isaiah iii. 18. that he would take away the rich ornaments which they wore about their legs, their little moons or crescents. The Roman senators wore about their ankle-bone above the heel, a sort of buckle which they called moon, because it resembled a crescent; patriciâ clausit vestigia Lunâ. Some have believed, that they wore it before, and at the lower part of the leg; but this opinion is singular; the ancient figures represent it otherwise. Bruduas, brother to Herodes Atticus, wore this little moon above his heel on the ankle-bone: it was of ivory. The Hebrew word, לֵבָנָה LXX. μηνίσκος, which Jerom has translated lunulas, signifies in reality moon; moon; and meniscos adopted by the Septuagint may signify the same. Scripture uses the same word, Judg. viii. 21. 26. where mentioning the chains of gold or of precious stones, hung upon the necks of the camels belonging to the Midianites: they were golden crescents. See the PLATES: EASTERN DRESSES.

LUST. A word used by St. John, 1 Epist. ii. 6. to signify the irregular love of pleasure, riches, or honours; all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. Lust is not a sin; but is the effect and cause of sin:—the effect of original sin; the cause of all evils committed in the world. As in both Testaments, evil desires, as well as evil actions, are equally proscribed, so the first care of every man who would please God, is to bridle his lust.

LUST, GRAVES OF; Kibroth-hattaavah; an encampment of the Hebrews in the wilderness, whither they arrived, after they decamped from Sinai: called the Graves of Lust, because 23,000 Israelites died there, who were smitten by God, by means of eating to excess of quails, which fell about the camp. Numb. xi. 34. Deut. ix. 20, 22.

LUTE. Vide MUSIC.

LUZ, לוז, separation, departure; from לוז luz, [the almond-tree,] called afterwards Bethel.

I. A city of the Canaanites, Gen. xxviii. 19. xxxv. 6. Josh. xviii. 13. in Benjamin.

II. A city attached to the sons of Joseph, near to Sichem; say some, three miles from Sichem. Josh. xvi. 2.

It is principally on Josh. xvi. 2. that the second of these is distinguished from the first. There might, however, be a small distance between the place where Jacob slept, and the ancient town of Luz; and indeed the text in Joshua, by alluding to Mount Bethel, seems to suppose, that the travelling patriarch slept on a hill apart: and we know that hills were always esteemed the most proper places for the establishment of altars, &c. as was afterwards the case at Bethel. This supposition also accounts for the facility with which Jacob might perform his devotions, &c. without interruption from the townsmen of Luz.]

III. LUZ, Judg. i. 25, 26. a city in Arabia Petræa, built by a man of Bethel, who while the tribe of Ephraim besieged Bethel, shewed a secret entrance to them, whereby they took the city: for which they spared him and his family. He retired into the land of the Hittites, and built Luz, otherwise Lesa, Lasa or Lussa.

LYBIA, לִיבִי, libin, Λίβυς, heart of the sea; from לִבִּי, lebab, heart, and יָם jam, the sea: otherwise, a nation that has a heart; from lebab: otherwise hearts, in the plural; from לִבִּים lebinim, hearts. Dan. xi. 43.

LYBIA, a province of Egypt, which, in our opinion, was peopled by the descendants of Lehabim, son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. This province reached from Alexandria to Cyrene, perhaps farther, Nahum iii. 9. Comp. LEHABIM.

LYBIA. Sometimes all Africa is called Lybia: but I do not believe it occurs in this sense in Scripture.

LYCAONIA, Λυκαονία, she-wolf; from the Greek λυκαίνης. [lupines?]

LYCAONIA, a province of Asia Minor, and part of Cappadocia, having Galatia north, Pisidia south, Cappadocia east, and Phrygia west. St. Paul preached in Lycaonia, in the cities of Iconium and Lystra, Acts xiv. 6, &c.

[Under the article Cappadocia, we have hinted at the nations settled in those parts being named Leuco-Syrians, or White Indians; this may, also, more or less, include their adjoining neighbours, the Lycaonians; and to this foreign extraction I would refer the peculiarity of their dialect, which is noticed by the sacred writer, apparently, because it was not strictly according to the idiom of the Greeks. As the subject of their exclamation is Deity, it is likely that they had peculiar rites and objects of worship, and retained peculiar terms to express them.

This Lycaonia should be carefully distinguished from that of Arcadia.]

LYCAONIAN language. St. Paul preaching at Lystra, cured a man who had been lame from his mother's womb, and had never walked. Whereupon, the inhabitants of Lystra said, in the speech of Lycaonia, "the Gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker." The question is, what this speech of Lycaonia, was? It is generally believed to have been a corrupt Greek; it is certain that Greek was spoken in Asia Minor; but, as is common in remote provinces, the language varied from the politeness of large cities and places, where studies flourish.

Paul Ernest Jablonski has written a learned dissertation on the Lycaonian tongue; he supposes it was the same with the Cappadocian, i. e. Greek, mingled with a great deal of Syriac; an opinion, which has been followed by Grotius, and is very probable, by reason of the neighbourhood of Syria, Cappadocia, and Lycaonia; and if there had been no more in it than a difference of dialect, Luke never would have said, that that these people cried in the speech of Lycaonia;—a dialect is no particular language.

LYCIA, Λυκία, belonging to a wolf. [lupines?]

LYCIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Asia Proper north, the Mediterranean south, Pamphilia east, and Caria west. 1 Macc. xv. 23, Acts xxvii. 5. St. Paul landed at the port of Myra in Lycia, when going to Rome, A. D. 60.

LYDDA, in Hebrew לוד, Lud or Lod, by the Greeks and Latins called Lydda, or Diospolis, in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea Philippi. It lay east of Joppa; four or five leagues. Lydda belonged to Ephraim. It seems to have been inhabited by the Benjaminites, after the Babylonish captivity, Neh. xi. 35. Lydda was one of the three toparchies which were dismembered from Samaria, and given to the Jews, 1 Macc. xi. 34. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 8. St. Peter coming to Lydda, cured Æneas, who was sick of the palsy, Acts ix. 33, 34.

The Jews inform us, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, they set up academies in different places of Palestine, of which Lydda was one; where the famous Akiba was a professor, for some time. Gamaliel succeeded him, and was obliged to retire to Japhna. After them appeared Tasphe or Trypho, another famous Rabbīn, whom some have confounded with Trypho the Jew, who bears a part in Justin's dialogue.

[This place, says Josephus was a village, not yielding to a city in greatness. It was esteemed a day's journey from Jerusalem; and the second tenths of its fruits were carried to Jerusalem to be eaten there. It is probable that Lydda was somewhat elated with this distinction, and was forward in shewing its piety; for the Jews have a proverb among them, importing that "the women of Lydda knead their dough, go up to the temple, pray, and return home, before it be leavened;" the meaning seems to be, that they so arranged their household affairs, that they were no impediment to their religious exercises. But probably, the fact was, that from the heights of their houses, they could see the temple, and that to these, they went up, prayed towards the temple, and came down again to their customary employments. When the Sanhedrim sat in Jabneh, there flourished eminent schools in Lydda; and Lydda preserved this advantage long after Jabneh had lost her distinction.

Lydda, says D'Arvieux, "is situated on a plain, about a league from Rama. It is so entirely ruined, as to be at present but a miserable village, noticeable only on account of the market which is held here, once a week. The dealers resort to it to sell the cotton and other commodities, which they have collected during the week. Here was formerly a handsome church, dedicated to St. George, a saint who is equally in favour with Turks and Christians.

Dr. Wittman says, Trav. p. 203. January 12, "I rode across the plains of Jaffa and Lydda. We approached the town of Lydda, or Loudda, and saw the Arab inhabitants busily employed in sowing barley. The soil of these fine and extensive plains is a rich black mould, which, with proper care and industry, might be rendered extremely fertile."

"Lydda is denominated by the Greeks Diospolis, [city] or Temple of Jupiter, probably because a temple had been dedicated in its vicinity to that deity. Since the crusades it has received from the Christians the name of St. George, on account of its having been the scene of the martyrdom and burial of that saint. In this city tradition reports that the emperor Justinian erected a church." p. 205.]

LYDIA, Λυδία. See LUD, or LOD.

LYDIA, a woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple, who dwelt in the city of Philippi in Macedonia, Acts xvi. 14, 40. She was converted by St. Paul's preaching, and was baptized, she and all her family. She offered her house to St. Paul so earnestly, that he was prevailed on by her intreaties. This woman was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte. The Roman Martyrology commemorates her August 3. Lydia is perhaps the name of her country, and she might be commonly called Lydia, q. the Lydian.

LYDIA, a province of Asia Minor peopled by the sons of Lud, son of Shem, Gen. x. 23. We have very little notice of these Lydians in Scripture. They are mentioned Isaiah lxvi. 19. or, perhaps, the Lydians in Egypt. Comp. 1 Macc. viii. 7.

[It had Phrygia on the east, Mysia on the north, part of Caria on the south. The music of these people was soft and effeminate. Pliny, vii. 56. Strabo, lib. xiii. Vide also Pliny, lib. v. cap. 29.]

LYDIA, a province of Egypt, peopled by Ludim, son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. Jer. xlvi. 9. Ezek. xxvii. xxxv. We do not know distinctly the situation or extent of this country. See LUDIM.

LYDIANS, לודים, Λύδοι, Lydii. See LUDIM. Jer. xlvi. 9: famous archers.

LYING, is condemned in many places. Ex. xxiii. i. 7. Lev. xix. 11. Prov. xii. 22. xiii. 5. xix. 22. Wisd. i. 11. Eccl. vii. 13. xx. 10. xxv.

23. Hosea iv. 1. Acts v. 4. Ephes. iv. 25. James v. 12. Our Saviour requires his disciples to be so plain and sincere, that their word might be equivalent to the most solemn oath; and that in all their assertions, they should say only, It is, or, It is not: Matt. v. 37. It is in vain therefore to attempt to justify some particular persons who have told lies; which persons are in other respects commended in Scripture.—Scripture never praises their lying, but their good actions. That which is in itself evil, never can become good. When Abraham calls Sarah his sister, not his wife; and Isaac says the same of Rebekah; when Jacob by a lie defrauds Esau of his father's blessing; when the Egyptian midwives declare, that the Hebrew women are delivered without their assistance; and when the Hebrews before their departure out of Egypt borrow things which they have no intention of returning; they are not any of them in this particular to be commended: but the evil which they committed might be mitigated by circumstances not known to us. When we condemn lying, we do not condemn stratagems, hyperboles, or certain railleries and discourses, [or fables, or parables] which custom and general consent do not rank among lies. See St. Austin in his books of lying, and against lyars.

God put a lying spirit into the mouths of false prophets; i. e. he permitted them to follow the impressions of the evil spirit, and that others should hearken to them, Kings xxii. 23. Prov. xxiii. 3. the bread of lying or of lyars, in Heb. one who boasts (falsely) of the entertainment of which he has been partaker at a prince's table: or, be not desirous of his good cheer, for it is the bread of lying; it is food that pleases the taste, but does not nourish; deceitful, [Eng. Tr.] good only in appearance. In another place he calls that deceitful bread, or bread of lying, which is acquired by injustice; Prov. xx. 17. We have made lies our refuge, Isaiah xxviii. 15. We have placed our confidence in falsehood: in deceitful allies, or in the delusive promises of false prophets; or lastly, in the assistance of idols, whom they call vanity and lying; and afterwards, the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, verse 17; the vain hopes, mentioned by him a little higher. And in another passage, A deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? am I not in the wrong, thus to adore wood? Isaiah xlv. 20. also Jer. viii. 8. The pen of the doctors of the law has written nothing but falsehood. They have promised peace, and behold it is war. Their promises are vain and delusive. Waters that fail, that lie, are those that flow part of the year only; they may be said to be false, for they should flow perpetually. My grief which should pass away like waters that dry up in summer, continues and increases every day. Jer. xv. 18.

Lying hills, Jer. iii. 24. are those which after they have made a fine appearance to the eye, produce nothing. Hosea ix. 2. The vine shall lie to them; the vintage shall fail. Habakkuk iii. 17. The olive trees shall lie, i. e. fail. The Latins have the same way of speaking. Horace, Epist. lib. i. Spem mentita seges.

LYSANIAS. Λυσάνιας, that destroys, or drives away sorrow; from λύσις, solution, and αῖα, sorrow.

LYSANIAS, or LYSIAS, Tetrarch of Abilene, Luke iii. 1. This Lysanias was probably son or grandson of another Lysanias known in history, Dio. lib. xlix. p. 44. and put to death by Mark Antony, who gave part of his kingdom to Cleopatra.

Lysanias, the son or grandson, is placed by Luke, among the princes who governed in Judæa, or in the country round about, when John Baptist began his ministry. But either he must have made no great figure in the world, or his government must have been of small extent, since profane historians do not mention him. Abilene was a small province, between Libanus and Anti-libanus, its capital was Abila. See ABILA, and PLATES; MEDALS. Joseph. Ant. lib. xv. cap. 4.

LYSIAS, Λυσίας, that dissolves, or scatters: from λύσις.

LYSIAS. A friend and relation of king Antiochus Epiphanes. That prince going beyond the Euphrates, to collect money, left the regency of Syria to Lysias, with orders to make war on the Jews, and utterly to destroy them: Lysias therefore sent Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, Nicanor, and Gorgias, into Judæa with a powerful army. But Judas Maccabæus having routed it, he came himself the year following with greater forces: but was overcome, his army put to flight, and he himself obliged to retire to Antioch. The same year Antiochus Epiphanes dying beyond the Euphrates, Lysias took on himself the regency of the kingdom, under the minority of young Antiochus, though king Antiochus Epiphanes had given the government of the kingdom, and the tuition of his son, to Philip, one of his friends, who was at that time with him, 1 Macc. vi. 16, 15, &c. Notwithstanding the king's last will, Lysias kept the government of Syria, and continued by his generals the war against against the Jews, and came a second time into the land of Judah, as far as Bethsura: but the Jews beat him, and obliged him to fly. He sent proposals for an accommodation to Judas Maccabæus, and peace was concluded on conditions very advantageous to the Jews. A. M. 3481, ante A. D. 163.

This peace was of short duration. Judas Maccabæus having been obliged to take arms, against the particular enemies of the Jews, in several places of the country, and to repulse the general of the Syrian troops, which were continually molesting his brethren the Jews, Lysias returned towards the close of the year, and brought the young king Eupator with him, with the choice of all his troops. They laid siege to Bethsura, and advanced to Jerusalem, the siege whereof was formed by them. The city, or rather the temple wherein Judas was shut up, was very much straitened; for as this was the seventh year, there was a great want of provisions. It happened, as Providence appointed, that at this time Philip, who had been left regent of the kingdom by Epiphanes, came into Syria to assume the exercise of his employment. Lysias on receiving this intelligence, made propositions of peace to the Jews, which were accepted.

Eupator and Lysias entered Jerusalem, honoured the temple, and promised the Jews, that they should be permitted to live according to their own laws. But they falsified their word by demolishing the wall which secured the temple from the insults of the citadel; then in possession of the Syrians. They afterwards retired in haste to Antioch, where they found Philip had fortified himself: but they attacked him, took the city by force, and killed him.

The next year, Demetrius son of Seleucus, king of Syria, to whom the kingdom of right belonged, being returned from Rome, where he had remained a hostage ever since the death of the king his father; and coming into Syria, was received at Tripolis, a city of Phœnicia, and having gathered some troops, he marched directly to Antioch, entered the city, seized young Eupator and Lysias, and killed them both. Such was the end of Lysias, who had governed the kingdom of Syria about five years.

LYSIMACHUS, Λυσίμαχος, who disperses an army, and puts it to flight; from λυσις, dispersion, and μαχη, battle.

I. LYSIMACHUS, fifth son of Ptolemy, a Jew of Jerusalem, who translated the Book of Esther out of Hebrew into Greek. His translation was carried from Jerusalem to Alexandria by Dositheus, who called himself a priest of Levi's family, and by Ptolemy his son, in the fourth year of Ptolemy Philometor. A. M. 3827, ante A. D. 177. Esth. Apoc. xi. 1.

II. LYSIMACHUS, brother of Menelaus, high-priest of the Jews. Menelaus purchased the high-priesthood with a large sum of money, which he promised to Antiochus Epiphanes, but he took no care to pay it, and thereupon was cited to appear at Antioch. In his absence he left his brother Lysimachus at Jerusalem, who in order to raise the sums for which Menelaus had contracted, began to pillage the treasury of the temple, 2 Macc. iv. 39, 40. The people rose and would have prevented him; but he set three thousand men upon them, who killed a great number. The people arming themselves with whatever they could lay hands on, some taking stones, others clubs, and others throwing handfuls of dust, which was in the court of the temple, at Lysimachus; this sacrilegious man was himself killed near the temple-treasury. He is sometimes reckoned among the high-priests, because he was vicegerent to his brother Menelaus: but he never himself possessed that dignity. There can be no wonder that the high priesthood of the Jewish nation should become contemptible, when it was so notoriously venal. Comp. ONIAS IV. V.]

III. LYSIMACHUS, Alexander Lysimachus, Alabarch of Alexandria. See ALEXANDER XIV.

LYSTRA, Λύστρα, that dissolves, or disperses; from λύσις.

LYSTRA, a city of Lycaonia, whereof Timothy was a native. Paul and Barnabas having preached there, A. D. 45. and healed a man who had been lame from his birth, were taken for gods; Paul for Mercury, and Barnabas for Jupiter. These apostles with great difficulty prevented the people from offering sacrifices to them: but very soon after, certain Jews of Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia coming thither, animated the populace against them, who thereupon began to throw stones at Paul and Barnabas, and dragged them out of the city, supposing they were dead, Acts xiv. 6. 20. xvi. 1. Vide LYCAONIAN language.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, MAACHATI, or BETH-MAACHA, a little province of Syria, east and north of the sources of Jordan, toward Damascus. Abel or Abela was in this country, whence it was called Abel-beth-maacha. Joshua observes, xiii. 13, that the Israelites would not destroy the Maachathites, but permitted them to dwell in the land. The king of Maachah assisted the Ammonites against David, 2 Sam. x. 8, 9. Sheba, son of Bichri, took refuge in Abel of Beth-maachah, 2 Sam. xx. 15, 16, &c. The lot of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan extended to this country. Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 5.

MAACHAH, מַעְכָּה, to squeeze; from מַעַךְ mahac. See MAACHATH below.

I. MAACHAH, son of Nabor, by his concubine Reumah, Gen. xxii. 24. He may be father of the Macetes, in Arabia Felix. There is a city called Maca, towards the streights of Ormus.

II. MAACHAH, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, wife of David, and mother of Absalom and Tamar, 2 Sam. iii. 3.

III. MAACHAH, daughter of Abishalom, wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and mother of Abijam his successor, 1 Kings xv. 2. In 2 Chron. xiii. 2, she is called Michaiiah, daughter of Uriel of Gibeah. In Kings the mother may easily have been mistaken for the daughter, by ascribing to each Abishalom as father. [but, vide FRAGMENTS, No. XVI.]

IV. MAACHAH, daughter of Abishalom, wife of Abijam, king of Judah, and mother of Asa his successor, 1 Kings xv. 10, 13, 14. Asa deprived his mother Maachah of the office of priestess of the groves.

V. MAACHAH, concubine of Caleb, and mother of Sheber and Tirhauah, 1 Chr. ii. 48.

VI. MAACHAH, wife of Machir, and mother of Peresh, 1 Chron. vii. 16.

VII. MAACHAH, father of Achish, king of Gath, 1 Kings ii. 39.

VIII. MAACHAH, sister of Machir, 1 Chron. vii. 15.

IX. MAACHAH, father of Shephatiah, head of Simeon in David's time, 1 Chron. xxvii. 16.

[MAACHATH, squeezed, or ground; otherwise, fixed, or sorrow of the belly. A city of the Amorites, on the Jordan, near Mount Hermon. Josh. xii. 5. xiii. 13. 1 Chron. iv. 19.

Perhaps "compression of the belly." Probably the mother of the child, to whom this name was given, was with difficulty delivered by this action. Beth-Maachah, may signify, the temple of the goddess presiding over child-birth, Diana Lucina; or a residence built by a person named Maachah. It appears to have been a town of Naphtali, 2 Sam. xx. 14. 1 Kings xv. 20. 2 Kings xv. 29. From 2 Sam. xx. 15. it may be thought to have had a district of considerable extent belonging to it.]

MAACATI, מַעְכָּתִי, Maacathi, Machati, or the Maachathite, bruised, or bruising of the belly; from מַעַךְ mahah, the belly, and כָּתַת cathath, to bruise. Father of Jaazaniah; Vulgate, Jezonias. 2 Kings xxv. 23. [English translation, Jaazaniah, son of a Maachathite.]

MAADAI, מַעְדִּי, Moadias, Vulgate, Maaddi, feast, ornament, passage; from מַעַד hadah: otherwise, that wavers; from מַעַד mahad: otherwise, that lifts me up; from מַעַד hoded: or that takes away my ornament; from מַעַד mahadi. Son of Bani, one who after the captivity dismissed their wives, taken contrary to the law. Ezra x. 34.

MAADIAH, מַעְדִּיָּה, Moadias, solemnity, feast, ornament, or passage of the Lord; from מַעַד hadah: and ה' the Lord: otherwise, testimony; from מַעַד hud. Neh. xii. 5. written Moadiah, verse 17.

MAAI, מַעִי, Maia, bowels; from מַעַד mahah; otherwise, heap, or mass; from מַעִי hi, or מַעִי haiah. A priest, a musician, Neh. xii. 26.

MAARAH-SIDONIORUM, מַעְרָה, Sidoniorum, cavern; from מַעַר mahar: otherwise, who discovers himself, or spreads himself; from מַעַר harah: or awakes; from מַעַר har. Josh. xiii. 4.

MAARATH, מַעְרָת, cavern; from מַעַר harah: otherwise, that discovers, spreads, awakes; from מך hur. A city of Judah, Joshua xv. 59.

MAASEIAH, מַעֲשֵׂה, my work; from מַעַשׂ hashah, to do, or make, and י, my. 1 Chr. ix. 12.

MAASEIAH, מַעֲשֵׂה, or Maasias, work of the Lord; from מַעַשׂ hashah, to make, and יָהּ jah.

I. MAASEIAH, or MAASAI, son of Adiel, a Levite, 1 Chron. xv. 18.

II. MAASEIAH, son of Ahaz, king of Israel: assassinated by Zichri. 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

III. MAASEIAH, son of Adaijah, one to whom the high-priest Jehoiadah discovered his design, of setting Joash on the throne. 2 Chron. xxiii. 2.

MAASEIAH, מַאֲסִיָּה, Maasios, confidence of the Lord, or hope of the Lord; from מַאֲסִיָּה chashah, hope, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Jer. xxxii. 12.

[MAATH, Luke iii. 26, one of our Saviour's ancestors.]

MAAZ, מַעַז, wood; from מַעַז hetz: or council; from מַעַז huts. [strength? 1 Chr. ii. 27.]

MAAZIAH, מַעַזִּיָּה, Maa'ziac, strength of the Lord; from מַעַז hazaz, to be strong, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Chief of the twenty-fourth family of the priests. 1 Chron. xxiv. 18.

MABARTHA; a name given by the inhabitants to the city of Shechem, otherwise Neapolis, or Naplouse, in the time of Josephus; de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4.

MABDAI, son of Maani, perhaps the Maadai already mentioned. Ezra x. 34.

MACCABEES. This name may be derived, 1. From the Hebrew caba, I extinguish; q. d. one that destroys, one that extirpates, the enemies of the Lord. 2. Or, from the Hebrew macha bi, מַכָּה בִּי, the wound is in me; God has struck me; humbled me. See Isaiah liii. 3, 4, where the Messiah is called (Ish Macoboth) a man of sorrows, and (Muccah Elohim) smitten of God. See also 1 Chron. xii. 13. where Machbanai is a proper name. 3. Or, we may derive Maccabæus, or Maccabaihu, according to Hebrew pronunciation, from makkà bajah מַכָּה בִּיה, one that smites in the name of the Lord. 4. Others derive it from the Heb. מַחֲבֵה machabeh, absconsus. See 1 Sam. xiv. 22. Or by deriving it from מַקֵּב, which also signifies to dig, to make hollow: מַקֵּב, is used for a subterraneous cell or cave, whence mechubbeh, or muchabeh, secret, hidden. The Maccabees at first hid themselves in caverns, to avoid persecution; but afterwards they came forth, and opposed their persecutors. 5. Or, it may be a derivative from מַקֵּב makab, to pierce: makkebah is taken for a hammer. 6. Makkabei may signify, those who supplant, from מַקֵּב akab, to supplant or undermine. 7. Lastly, the most popular opinion is, that they inscribed on their ensigns, or on their bucklers, the letters, מ Mem, כ Caph, ב Beth, י Jod, which begin these words, Mi Camoca Be-elohim Jehovah; מִי כַמֹּכָה בְּאֱלֹהִים יְהוָה. Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the Gods? Exodus xv. 11. after the manner that the Romans put on their ensigns, S. P. Q. R.—Senatus Populusque Romanus. This etymology is certainly the most probable.

It is well known that the Hebrews compose such artificial words, uniting initial letters. So, instead of saying Rabbi Levi Ben Gerson, they spoke it, Ralbag, and wrote it R, L, B, G. Instead of Rabbi Moses Ben Maimoni, they pronounced Rambam, and wrote R, M, B, M. Nothing is more frequent among them than this custom, and without a key to these abbreviations, it would be impossible to understand the books of the Rabbins. To facilitate this study, Buxtorf composed his book, De abbreviaturis Hebraicis.

What raises a doubt whether the word Maccabee was so derived, is, that Judas Maccabæus bore this name before the beginning of the war; for very early in the first book of the Maccabees, speaking of Mattathias and his five sons, the writer gives to each the surname he then bore. John, surnamed Gaddis; Simon, surnamed Thasis; and Judas, surnamed Maccabæus. 1 Macc. ii. 4.

The tradition of the Orientals, related by Abulfarage, is, that the mother of the seven brethren, martyred under Antiochus Epiphanes, was called Ashmunah, or Shamunah, from the Hebrew Chashmanim, or Kashmenim, which signifies great men or princes; given to the Maccabees, as to the princes of their nation. Hence the Greeks and the Latins formed the word Asmoneans.

But whatever were the etymology of this name, it was given to Judas, son of Mattathias, from whom it passed to his brothers Simon and Jonathan; and in general, to all, who under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, signalized their zeal and constancy, in defence of the liberty and religion of their country. Thus the seven brethren are called Maccabees, who suffered death with their mother, in defence of their law; and the title Books of the Maccabees is given to those books which contain the history of those times. It is also given (but certainly very improperly) to the book which gives an account of the persecution of Ptolemy Philopator, against the Jews of Egypt, which was several years before the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria.

Maccabæus is applied chiefly to Judas Maccabæus; and this name when alone, means that general. Vide JUDAS MACCABEUS.

For

For the catalogue of Maccabean or Asmonean princes, vide the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

The history of the martyrdom of the seven brethren of the Maccabees, A. M. 3837, is related, 2 Macc. vii. and more at large in the book of the Government of Reason. The martyrdom of Eleazar is in 1 Macc. vi. 18. See ELEAZAR.

The ancient Latin translation of the book concerning the Government of Reason, which we shall mention presently under the name of the fourth book of the Maccabees, names the seven brethren, 1. Maccabæus. 2. Aber. 3. Machiri. 4. Judas. 5. Achus. 6. Areth. 7. Jacob. They have other names in some ancient MSS. but the original Greek of the second and fourth books of the Maccabees, makes no mention of them. Josephus and some others believe they suffered at Jerusalem; but it is much more likely it was at Antioch, where their tombs were shewn in the time of St. Jerom, in loc. verbo Modin; and where was a church dedicated under their name, in the time of St. Austin, Serm. 1. de Macqab.

The first of the seven brethren having declared to the king, that he would die rather than violate the law of God, was seized by the executioners, had his tongue cut out, and the extremities of his hands and feet cut off, and the skin of his head torn off. While yet alive, he was thrown into a burning pan, which was heating over a great fire. Thus it is told 2 Macc. vii. 2, 7; the Government of Reason declares, that the executioners having stripped off his clothes, tied his hands behind his back, and whipped him to pieces with scourges, without his shewing the least sign of pain. Afterwards, they fixed him upon a wheel, where having his limbs broken to pieces, he expostulated with Antiochus, reproached him with his barbarity, and insulted him on the failure of all his attempts. Then the executioners raising the wheel upon which he was extended, and lighting a fire under it, consumed him thus by a new torture. He died exhorting his brethren to shew the like constancy.

The other brothers suffered also by the most cruel tortures the king could inflict: the particulars are too horrid to repeat; and the variations in the history of them between the books of the Maccabees and the Government of Reason, are of little importance and less entertainment to the reader.

The mother of these holy martyrs suffered death also. The second book of the Maccabees says nothing by what means. But the book of the Government of Reason mentions, that some of Antiochus's attendants having suggested to this prince, that he ought to put her to death also, and to deal with her as he had dealt with her children; she had no sooner heard these words, but she cast herself into the fire, to prevent those ministers of cruelty from laying their hands on her. In some ancient manuscripts this holy woman is called Salome, or Salamonis: but her name is not found in any certain or authentic document. The church of Rome celebrates these seven brethren, and their mother, August 1. They were the first, and for a long time the only martyrs of the Old Testament, in honour of whom altars and temples were set up; they are the only saints of that kind, for whom there remains an office or commemoration in the Roman Breviary.

THE BOOKS OF THE MACCABEES. There are four books of the Maccabees, of which the first two are canonical, and the other two apocryphal, in the church of Rome. [Among Protestants the first two are esteemed pretty good historical authority; the last two are little known: the third is sometimes seen among us: the fourth never.] In order of time, the third book of the Maccabees ought to be placed first, and the first to be placed third.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE MACCABEES, was written originally in Hebrew, or in Syriac. The style and turn of expression proves this, as well as the title, mentioned by Origen, apud Euseb. lib. vi. cap. ult.—Sarbet sar-bane el,—The sceptre of the prince of the children of God, or, the sceptre of the rebels of the Lord. As if hinting that the Maccabees held the sceptre and government of the Lord in Israel, against all opposers. Jerom says also, prolog. Galeato, that he had found the first book of the Maccabees in Hebrew: but the Greek is now held for an original. [It is remarkable that the Syrian Christians in India, have all the four books of the Maccabees in Syriac; but, though these have been examined by Mr. Yeates, in the copies at Cambridge, brought over by Dr. Buchanan, yet evidence of their being the originals of the Greek we have, is wanting.]

It is probable, this book might be composed from public memoirs, kept by the Jews, of remarkable occurrences among them. Judas Maccabeus made a collection of them, 2 Macc. ii. 14. and this first book towards the conclusion refers to the Memoirs of John Hircanus, 1 Macc. xvi. ult. which has induced some to believe, that John Hircanus might be its author.

This book contains the history of forty years, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, to the death of Simon the high-priest; A. M. 3829, to A. M. 3869. ante A. D. 136. The author is unknown: he must have lived after the pontificate of John Hircanus, because he quotes Memoirs of his government. In his chronological computations he uses the Hebrew manner of reckoning, beginning at the month Nisan, the first month of the holy year; whereas, the Syrians, or the Greeks who reigned in Syria, began it six months later, about the beginning of October.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE MACCABEES is an abridgment of a larger work, composed by one Jason, which contained the history of the persecutions of Epiphanes and Eupator against the Jews. The author of this abridgment is not known, and the entire work of Jason is not extant. They were both Greeks, and followed the manner of reckoning of the Seleucidæ, according to the custom of the Syrians. The last two chapters contain events under the reign of Demetrius Soter, successor of Antiochus Eupator; with such varieties of style, as render it doubtful whether they were written by the same author as the rest of the work. This book contains the history of about fifteen years, from the execution of Heliodorus's commission to fetch away the treasures of the temple, to the victory of Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor; from A. M. 3828, to A. M. 3843, ante A. D. 157.

At the beginning of this book are two letters; one from the Jews of Jerusalem to those of Alexandria, to inform them of the celebration of the feast of purification, and of the dedication of the temple of Jerusalem, by Judas Maccabæus. The other from the senate of Jerusalem, and Judas to Aristobulus, preceptor to king Ptolemy, on the same subject. This last letter being written A. M. 3380, there is reason to believe, that the book itself was composed about that time, under the pontificate of Hircanus. The elegance of style in this piece has induced some to ascribe it to Josephus or to Philo. Serrarius believed it was the work of Judas the Essenian, mentioned by Josephus. Leo Allatius conjectures, that Simon Maccabæus, brother of Judas, might be the author of it. But all this is very uncertain.

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE MACCABEES. This book contains the history of the persecution of Ptolemy Philopater king of Egypt, against the Jews of his kingdom. This prince after his victory over Antiochus the Great, went to Jerusalem, and offered sacrifices of thanksgiving in the temple of the Lord. But, afterwards, thinking to enter the sanctuary, he was hindered by the priests and people. Persisting in his design, he was struck down to the ground, by a divine power; so that not being able to stir, they were obliged to carry him away. After his return to Egypt, his resentment broke out against the Jews, who were very numerous in that country. He endeavoured to make them forsake their religion; but not being able to accomplish that, he assembled them at Alexandria, and shut them up in the Hippodrome, that they might be trod to death by his elephants. God delivered them from this danger, by causing the king to forget the orders he had given. Afterwards, God sent two angels to their assistance, which so terrified the king, that he honourably dismissed them. A. M. 3787, ante A. D. 217.

The name of the third of the Maccabees has been given to this book improperly enough, since it has no relation to Judas Maccabeus, or to any of his brethren, nor to the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria; the story related happened in Egypt, fifty years before the persecution of Epiphanes. Josephus in his history makes no mention of this persecution; he just speaks of it in his first book against Appion; but what he says of it, agrees very little with what we read in this third book of the Maccabees.

The Greeks and Latins reject this book as apocryphal. The ancient Latin writers nowhere quote it, as I remember, and do not seem to have known it. But it was known to the Greeks. Athanasius in his Synopsis, and Nicephorus at the end of his Chronology, place this among controverted books, as well as the two first books of the Maccabees: Grotius believes it was written after the two first books, and shortly after the book of Ecclesiasticus; which is the reason it had the name of the third book of the Maccabees.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE MACCABEES is so uncommon among the Latins, that we do not clearly know what it is. In the ancient Greek manuscripts of the bible, and in some Greek editions, we find the book concerning the Government of Reason, ascribed to Josephus, placed after the first three books of the Maccabees. But the learned have much doubted whether this were the book known to the ancients, as the fourth book of the Maccabees. However, several manuscripts, and some printed Greek bibles, call it so. Philostratus, Eusebius, and Jerom, knew the book of the Government of Reason, and ascribed it to Josephus, by the name of the book of the Maccabees. Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, and Chrysostom, in the characters they have given of the seven Maccabees, and of old Eleazar, have plainly followed what we find in this book. Marinus Victorinus Africanus, who taught rhetoric at Rome under the emperor Constantius, in his poem of the Maccabees, appears also to have had this book before before him. [In the Indian-Syriac copy, it is ascribed to Josippon: i. e. Josephus.]

The author has enlarged and adorned the history of the holy old man Eleazar, and of the seven brothers the Maccabees, who suffered martyrdom at Antioch with their mother, as related 2 Macc. vi. vii. One might suspect this piece to be a fragment of Jason's performance, before it was abridged, if the author had not prefixed a long preface, which shews that this is a separate and independent work. He supposes that the scene of the martyrdom of the seven brethren was at Jerusalem. He says that Apollonius, governor of Syria and Phœnicia, was sent to Jerusalem by king Seleucus Nicator, to take away the treasures from the temple; whereas the true history informs us, that it was Heliodorus who was sent for this purpose by Seleucus Philopator. This work is found among the works of Josephus, and it bears his name in the printed books, and in several manuscripts. But I can hardly believe him to be the author; not only because of the difference of style, but also because of the accounts of certain facts differing from Josephus, in several passages of his history.

MACEDONIA, Μακεδονία, adoration, prostration, according to the Hebrew; but elevated, eminent; from the Greek μακεδνός.

[High or eminent. Perhaps "the heights;" or the mountainous district.

A kingdom, 1 Macc. i. 1.

A province, Acts xvi. 9. xix. 29.]

MACEDONIA, a kingdom of Greece, having Thrace to the north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the Ægean sea east. We believe that Macedonia was peopled by Kittim, son of Javan, Gen. x. 4. and that by Kittim in the Hebrew text, Macedonia is to be understood. See CHITTIM and KITTIM.

Alexander the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, having conquered Asia, and subverted the Persian empire, the name of the Macedonians became very famous throughout the east; and is often given to the Greeks, the successors of Alexander in the monarchy. Esther Apoc. xvi. 10, 14. and 2 Macc. viii. 20. And in like manner the name of Greeks is often put for the Macedonians, 2 Macc. iv. 36.

St. Paul being invited by the angel of this province, (say some) which appeared to him at Troas, to preach the gospel in Macedonia, concluded that God had called him to that country; and the success that attended his preaching there, confirmed him in his opinion. There he founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi, and had the satisfaction of seeing them flourishing, and abounding in spiritual gifts and graces. Acts xvi. 9, &c. A. D. 55.

[Macedonia is certainly comprehended under the term Chittim, by which the prophet Daniel describes Greece in general; but, as his subject has special reference to the leader of the expedition against Persia, Alexander the Great, who was king of Macedon, it is of great consequence that the symbol by which this power is described, should be proved to be that proper to Macedonia: for, if Macedonia had no such emblem belonging to it, but this emblem must be appropriated to another kingdom, we must certainly look to that kingdom for a fulfilment of the prophecy; which would be contrary to the truth of history, and would produce inextricable confusion. See the PLATES: MEDALS OF MACEDONIA.]

MACEDONIAN. In the apocryphal books written in Greek, this word is sometimes used as an appellative, for an enemy to the Jews. Thus in the additions to the book of Esther, it is said, Haman was a Macedonian by nation and inclination, [or, party;] that he was desirous to transfer the empire of the Persians to the Macedonians; i. e. to the greatest enemies of the state, taking matters as they were when these additions were written, which was evidently after the overthrow of the Persian empire by Alexander the Great. For before his time the Macedonians gave but little umbrage to the Persians; and in the time of Esther and Mordecai, they were not much feared at Shushan. [This looks very like a mark of late and ill conceived suppositious history; which therefore should not be received without much qualification. See ALEXANDER THE GREAT.]

MACHÆRA. General of the Roman forces in the army of Marc Anthony; was sent to assist Herod against Antigonus, with two legions and a thousand horse. But being corrupted by Antigonus, he not only declined to assist Herod, but joined his troops to those of his enemy. Yet Antigonus did not trust him, but the contrary. This so exasperated Machæra, that he retired to Emmaus, and put to the sword all the Jews whom he found in his march. After this he took part with Herod, and, joining his own troops to those commanded by Joseph, Herod's brother, they made war together against Antigonus, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 27. A. M. 3965, ante A. D. 39.

MACHBANAI, מכבני, Μαχαβανι, my son, poor, or miserable; from מכב macac, misery, poverty, בן ben, a son, and י i, my: otherwise, poverty of the understanding, or of the building; from מכב macac, poverty, and בנה banah, to build, or בינה binah, understanding. [Syriac, bond.] A valiant man in David's army, 1 Chr. xii. 13.

MACHBENAH,

MACHBENAH, מַכְבְּנָה, Μαχβανᾶ, beating of the understanding, or of the building; from בִּנְיָה banah, or בִּינָה binah: or the humiliation, the poverty of the daughter. Son of Shevah, and father of Gibeah, 1 Chr. ii. 49.

[Poverty, or stroke of his son; or poverty, or stroke of understanding, or of building.

The name of a place, (perhaps) 1 Chr. ii. 49.

Thought to be the same as Cabbon, the chain; a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 40.]

MACHÆRUS, or MACHERONTE, a city and fort beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben, north and east of the lake Asphaltites, two or three leagues from Jordan, and not far from where that river discharges itself into the Dead Sea. This castle had been fortified by the Asmoneans. Gabinius demolished it, and Aristobulus fortified it anew. Herod the Great made it much stronger than before. Either here, or in the neighbourhood, was a spring of hot waters, very salutary. John the Baptist was imprisoned, and beheaded at Machærus, by order of Herod Antipas. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10.

MACHI, מַכִּי, he that strikes, or is poor and miserable. Father of Guel, of Gad. Num. xiii. 15.

MACHINES OF WAR; proper for besieging cities and fortresses, are of late invention, in respect of early antiquity. They are not mentioned in Homer; and Diodorus Siculus observes, lib. ii. p. 80, that Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, sustained a siege of seven years in Nineveh, because at that time machines fit for demolishing and taking cities, were not invented. But about the same time we read, that Uzziah king of Judah, had stored up in his magazines, "shields, and spears, and helmets, habergeons, and bows, and slings, to cast stones." And that "he made in Jerusalem engines invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal; and his name spread far abroad, for he was marvellously helped till he was strong. 2 Chr. xxvi. 14, 15. Here we see perhaps the first instance of Machines of war: or at least, of a collected armory of them. [Or, of "cunning men," who devoted their talents to this invention.]

About seventy years after, A. M. 3416, and 3419, in the sieges of Tyre and Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar used battering rams and slings. The Hebrew car, כָּר, Ezek. iv. 1, 2. xxi. 22. in Greek κρίος krios, which scripture uses to express this machine, signifies a real ram; by metaphor, a machine with which they battered down gates, and walls of cities. Ezekiel, xxvi. 8, 9, speaking of the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, alludes to the ancient manner of besieging places. "He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field, and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee. And he shall set ensigns of war against thy walls, and with his axes he shall break down thy towers."

When the ancients besieged a place, they usually surrounded it with mounds, towers, and trenches, that the besieged might neither make sallies, nor receive succours from without. To lift up the buckler may intimate what the Romans called facere testudinem, to make a tortoise; when they caused their soldiers to close each other to join their bucklers, in the form of a tortoise, in order to sap the walls, to beat down gates, or to burn them. The engines of war here mentioned, or machines of cords, were the Balistæ or Catapultæ, used for casting stones or darts; or great hooks fastened to cords, and thrown on the tops of walls, to tear them down. Of these iron hooks or fangs, may be understood 2 Sam. xvii. 13. "If he be got into a city then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not one small stone found there." See the PLATES: WARLIKE IMPLEMENTS and CROW.

MACHIR, מַכִּיר, he that sells, or that knows; from מָכַר macar, [he who was sold?]

I. MACHIR, son of Manasseh, and grandson of Joseph; chief of the family of the Machirites. Numb. xxvi. 29. His sons were Peresh and Sberesh, his daughter married Hezron of Judah. She was mother to Segub, and grandmother to Jair. 1 Chron. ii. 21, 22. vii. 16.

II. MACHIR, son of Ammiel, of Lodebar, with whom Mephibosheth was brought up, 2 Sam. ix. 5. xvii. 27.

[MACHMETHAH, gift of the poor, or of the striker; otherwise, death of the striker, or of the humble, or, the place of hiding; a lurking hole. Josh. xvi. 6. xvii. 7. A town in the confines of Ephraim and Manasseh.]

MACHNADEBAI, מַכְנַדְבַּי, poor: otherwise, he that strikes; from מָכַךְ macac, poor, and נָאָה naca, that strikes: otherwise, the prince, or he that vows, or that acts of his own motion; from נָדַב nadab, that acts voluntarily, or that vows and makes a present; or from נָדִיב nadib, a prince. Ezra x. 40.

MACTESH, מַכְתֵּשׁ, jaw-tooth, mortar, pestle. See LEHI, and SAMSON.

MACHPELAH, or MACHPELA, מַכְפֵּלָה, signifies double; the Vulgate takes it in this sense, speaking of the cave that Abraham bought of Ephron, wherein to bury his wife Sarah. Gen. xxiii. 9. But others with more probability think, that in this place Machpelah is the name of the plain wherein this cave was situated, q. "The cave which is at Machpelah:" and verse 17, the the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah; [as the English translation.] A person of skill in the Arabic has informed us, that in that language Machpelah signifies shut up, or walled up. He believes that the cave called Machpelah, was a tomb hewn into a rock, and closed up, or walled up, that no one might enter therein, or that thieves might not make it a retreat; or that it might not be violated or profaned. Tombs thus shut or walled up, are still used in the east. This conjecture is at least very probable; so that it might be translated, "the cave that was shut up," instead of the cave of Machpelah. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCX. CCXI. CCCCLXXXVIII. PLATES; GATES OF HADES, and TOMBS.

MACRON, Μάκρων, tall. 1 Macc. iii. 38.

[MAD, MADNESS. Insanity, or deprivation of reason: medically defined to be delirium without fever. Our Lord cured by his word, several who were deprived of the exercise of their rational powers: and the circumstances of their histories prove, that there could neither be mistake nor collusion respecting them. How far madness may be allied to, or connected with, demoniacal possession, is a very intricate inquiry; and whether in the present day, (as perhaps anciently,) evil spirits may not take advantage from distemperature of the bodily frame, to augment evils endured by the patient, is more than may be affirmed, though the idea seems to be not absolutely repugnant to reason. Nevertheless, what may be is probably different on most inquiries from what we can prove really is.

The epithet mad, is applied to several descriptions of persons in Scripture; as 1. to one deprived of reason, Acts xxvi. 24. 1 Cor. xiv. 23.—2. To one whose reason is depraved, and over-ruled by the fury of his angry passions, Acts xxvi. 11.—3. To one whose mind is perplexed and bewildered, so disturbed that he acts in an uncertain, extravagant, irregular manner, Deut. xxviii. 34. Eccl. vii. 7.—4. To one who is infatuated by the vehemence of his desires after idols, and vanities, Jer. l. 38.—or 5. after folly, deceit, and falsehood, Hosea ix. 7.]

[MADNESS, David's, 1 Sam. xxi. 13. Some persons have supposed that this was not a feigned madness in David, but a real epilepsy, or falling sickness, with which he was afflicted; and it must be owned the LXX. use words which strongly indicate this sense. It is urged in support of this opinion, that the troubles which David underwent might very naturally weaken his constitutional strength; and that the force he suffered in being obliged to seek shelter in a foreign court, would disturb his imagination in the highest degree. We do not determine this question; we only state it.]

MADAI, מַדַּי, measure; from מַד mad, measure: otherwise, covering, or clothes.

MADAI, third son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2. It is commonly thought he was father of the Medes; but, beside that Media is too distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth; it cannot be comprehended under the name of The Isles of the Gentiles, which were allotted to the sons of Japheth. These reasons have induced some learned men to suggest, that Madai was father of the Macedonians. Macedonia was otherwise called Æmathia, as if from the Heb. or Greek Ei, an island, and Madai; q. d. the isle of Madai, אִי מַדַּי, insula Madai, Aia Maḏai:—Near this country is mentioned a people called Mædi or Madi. Aristotle, de Mirabil. Ptolemy, cap. xi. tab. 9, Europ. also, in Macedonia, a king called Medus.

The name Media given to the country beyond the Euphrates, seems not to be more ancient than Medea, or the voyage of Jason to Colchis. See MEDES, also MACEDONIA, and the PLATES, MEDALS OF MACEDONIA.

MADMANNAH, מַדְמָנָה, measure of number; from מַד mad, measure, and מְנָה manah, to number: otherwise, preparation of clothing; from מְנָה manah, preparation, and מַד mad, clothing, or covering: otherwise, dung; from מַדְמָנָה mad-menah: or ordure; from דְּמֵן domen.

I. MADMANNAH, or Madmenah, son of Shaaph, 1 Chr. ii. 49.

II. MADMANNAH, or Medemene, a city of Simeon. (Josh. xv. 31.) first given to Judah; it was very far south in Judah. Eusebius places it towards Gaza. See Isaiah x. 31. 1 Chr. ii. 49.

[3. The Jakes, or Dunghill: a city of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 2.]

MADON, מַדֹּן, process, dispute; see MADAN: otherwise, his measure; from מַד mad, measure; and the pronoun an, his, or theirs.

MADON, a city of Canaan. Jobab, king of Madon, confederated with Jabin, king of Hazor, and others, against Joshua; but was taken and killed, and his city destroyed. The situation of Madon is unknown, it is mentioned only Josh xi. l. xii. 19. I believe the true reading is Maron, instead of Madon; we know a place called Maronia in Syria, about thirty miles from Antioch, north of Mount Libanus.

MAGBISH, מַגְבִּישׁ, height, eminence; from gabish. Of his children 156 returned from the captivity. Ezr. ii. 30. 1 Ezdr. v. 21. Probably, the same as the Persian name Megabyes.

MAGDALA, מַגְדָּלָא, tower, or greatness; according to the Hebrew.

[Magdala was not far from Tiberias; it is sometimes sometimes called, by the Jews, Magdala of Gadara. From hence, probably, Mary of Magdala, or Mary the Magdalene, was named, Matth. xxviii. 1. Luke viii. 2.]

MAGDALEN, Μαγδαλήνη, tower: from מגדל migdal: otherwise, grand, elevated, magnificent; from גדול gadol; in Syriac, curling; from גדל gadal, to curl. See MARY MAGDALEN.

MAGDIEL, מגדיל, who publishes, or proclaims God; from הגיד higgid, who proclaims, and אל el, God; or, fruits of God, or God is the most precious thing I have; from מגד meged.

L MAGDIEL, five miles from Dora, toward Ptolemais. We think it to be Megiddo or Magdolos.

II. MAGDIEL, prince of the Idumeans: succeeded Mibzar. Gen. xxxvi. 43.

MAGDOLOS, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 159. probably the Megiddo of 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30.

MAGED, Μακεδ, a press; from גת gath. A city beyond Jordan, taken by Judas Maccabæus, 1 Mac. v. 36. Maked in the Greek is probably the same as Maucath, מעכת. Comp. Josh. xiii. 13.

[MAGETH, wine-press, or liquefaction.

A city of Gilead, 1 Macc. v.]

MAGEDAN, or MAJEDAN. Maiedan may signify the waters of Dan. See DALMANUTHA.

MAGI, Μάγοι, interpreters of sacred mysteries. Others think this word is Persian. The Hebrew may signify, those who inspire fear or discouragement; from מג to be discouraged, to melt away: or, deriving it from הגה hagah, to meditate, those who apply themselves to the study of holy things.

[Mag seems to be a Chaldean word, importing the wise, rather by study and reflection than by natural talent: one learned in divine and human things: afterwards, by abuse of the term (in consequence, no doubt, of mere pretenders to science being frequently detected) it came to signify a fortune-teller, a quack, a conjurer: one who practices evil arts.]

MAGI, or MAGIANS. The Magi of Persia are worshippers of fire, and disciples of Zoroaster, whom they confound with Abraham, [as has been said.] They have three books, which contain the whole of their religion. These they call Zend, Pazend, and Abesta, Bibl. Orient, art. Abesta, &c. They ascribe them to Abraham, Abesta is a commentary on the other two. The Magi say, that Abraham read books in the midst of the furnace, into which Nimrod ordered him to be thrown. Following their master, Zoroaster, they maintain the existence of two principles; one of good, which they call Oromazd, the author of good; and the other of evil, named Aherman, the author of evil. They worship fire; in temples called Atesch-kana or Atesch-kade; i. e. the house of fire, where they carefully maintain the flame. There were formerly many of these buildings on the mountain Alborz, in the province of Adherbigian, (Media.) To fire they give the name of bab, q. part, because they acknowledge this element as the principle of all things; which system was embraced by Anaxagoras among the Greeks.

The Magi observe a mysterious and religious silence, when they wash or eat, having first said certain words. Pythagoras, very likely, might imitate this silence of the Magi; as well as their reverence for fire, which he inculcated on his disciples. To every month of the year, to every day, to every star, to mountains, mines, waters, trees, they ascribe particular genii, angels, created before man, who sinned by infidelity and disobedience, and therefore were confined to what they call the country of Genii, not unlike to our notions of Fairy-Land. (See ZOROASTER.) The three books which the Guebres, or fire-worshippers, ascribe to Abraham, but which really belong to Ibrahim Zerdoust (Zoroaster,) are very rare, and little known, because the Guebres keep them religiously secret among themselves. They are written in the ancient Persian language.

Some think the word Magi signifies a man whose ears are cut off. And indeed, in the language then used in Persia, Mige-gusch had that signification, at the time when the false Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the throne of Cyrus. That usurper had no ears, and by that token he was discovered. The Magi went by another name before, and their reputation was very great in Persia; but was diminished by this accident of Smerdis.

These philosophers represented the good principle by light, the evil principle by darkness; they owned both as gods, and addressed prayers and adorations to both: yet they were divided in their opinion, because some thought both had existed from eternity; others, that only the good principle was eternal, and the evil one was created: as we believe, the devil to be a creature, fallen from his original dignity.

These two principles, say they, are in continual opposition, and will so continue to the end of the world, when the good principle will prevail; after which, each will have his own distinct world; the good will reign with all good people; and the bad with all the wicked. The Magi paid divine honours to light, to the sun, to the consecrated fire in their temples, and even to the fire in their houses, Vid. Th. Hyde

On the contrary, the Magi held darkness in the greatest horror; this they considered as the symbol of the evil principle, as we do the devil. In their writings, when they found the name Aherman, (the evil principle) they wrote it backwards; and when Xerxes heard that the Athenians had banished Themistocles, he directed his prayer to this evil deity, (not to Oromazdes, or the good God) beseeching him to inspire his enemies always with the resolution, of driving out all brave men from among them. Plutarch, in Themistocles.

Such were the ancient Magi of the Persians; and such are still the Guebres, or worshippers of fire, among the Persians and Indians.

ADDITION.

[The principles of the most ancient Magi, though still imperfectly known, have been lately communicated to Europe in several translations from the works of their sect, obtained from its adherents in India. Among these the most considerable is the Zend-Avesta, attributed to Zoroaster; translated into French by M. Anquetil Du Perron, 4to, 3 vols. Paris, 1771. That this is really the work of the most ancient Zoroaster, and therefore of the Magi, it would be difficult to prove; but it contains the prayers, ceremonies, and maxims of those who now call themselves his disciples, in India. It has some traces of ancient simplicity and superstition; but, interpolated with much later and burdensome additions and amplifications.

More recently has been published at Bombay, 1818, by Mulla Firuz bin Kaus, the learned chief priest of the Parsee religion at Bombay, "The Desatir, or Sacred Writings of the ancient Persian Prophets, with an English translation." It is written in a dialect now wholly extinct; and would have been unintelligible, but for the fortunate circumstance of being attended with a Persian translation and glossary. Among these writings is one attributed to Zoroaster, who stands here as the thirteenth in order. The last is the fifth Sasan, who lived in the time of Khosroo Parvez, who was contemporary with the Emperor Heraclius; and died only nine years before the destruction of the ancient Persian monarchy. No account is given of the times of the other prophets, whose works precede.

The doctrines inculcated in these writings are—the Eternity and self-existence of the Supreme Deity; who created another intelligence, who made the worlds, who made several heavens, and gave to each a soul, and a body, also the stars (the planets, and the fixed stars, called slow-moving stars)—that the elements, meteors, &c. have each its guardian angel;—that in a former state ferocious animals have been guilty of crimes, for which they now suffer punishment, in being hunted, &c. and that men who now commit crimes, will be punished by becoming such, or like, animals, or vegetables, or minerals: "And meet with due retribution, says his Commentator, till in some way their guilt is removed: whether at the first time, or the second time, or the tenth, or the hundredth time." But, the text also says, "If a man be possessed of excellent knowledge, yet follow a wicked course of action, when this vile body is dissolved, he doth not get another elemental body, nor doth his soul get admittance into the upper abode, but his evil dispositions becoming his tormentors, assume the form of burning fire, of freezing snow, of serpents, dragons, and the like, and inflict punishment on him. And far from the happy abode, and from Mezdâm (God) and the angels, and from a material body, he broileth in tormenting flames: and this is the most horrible stage of Hell." The ineffable attributes of Deity are emphatically celebrated in these works; which contain much laudable theism, but, little or nothing of rites and ceremonies. They direct that prayer be made to light, or fire, not as being themselves deities, but, as conveying the sacrifice to divine intelligences.]

MAGI, or WISE-MEN, who came to adore Jesus Christ at Bethlehem, Matt. ii. 1. Many questions have been started concerning these Magi. Who they were? Whence they came? How many there were? At what time they arrived at Jerusalem? And what was the star that appeared to them?

I. It is commonly thought, these Magi were philosophers, who had the knowledge of future events, and whose chief study was astronomy. That those who came to worship Jesus Christ were disciples and descendants of Balaam, who had prophesied several ages before, "of a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel," Numb. xxiv. 17. This opinion is founded on Scripture, which says, "wise men came from the East," (from Arabia Deserta, or from Mesopotamia, which the sacred authors express by the word East.) Balaam himself says, he came from Aram, out of the mountains of the East, i. e. from the city of Pethora, on the Euphrates, Numb. xxiii. 7. Isaiah, speaking of Abraham's coming into the Land of Promise, says, "who brought the just man from the East," 1 Kings iv. 30. Isaiah xlix. 7. Obadiah vi. 8. Vide KEDEM, and the MAPS OF CANAAN.

II. The Arabians, Idumæans, Chaldeans, all eastern people in respect of Judæa, valued themselves on their wisdom. The name of Magus in those countries signified a philosopher, a man who studied wisdom. Tertullian, cont. Judæos, et lib. iii. contra Marcion. Justin Martyr, Dial. cont. Tryph. Epiphanius, Epitom. fidei Cathol. and among the moderns, Tostat, Mariana, Barradius, Grotius, Cornelius à lapide, and others, suppose the Magi came from beyond the Euphrates, or from Mesopotamia, i. e. from the east of Judæa. But some pretend that the Magi came from Persia, or from Armenia; or from Africa, or from Ethiopia: or from the three several parts of the world, Asia, Africa, and Europe!

III. Some of the ancient fathers seem to have thought, that the Magi were three in number, and that they were kings. Tertullian wishes zealously to maintain their royalty, but his proofs are insufficient. He supposes that the Orientals had commonly Magi for their kings, which is far from certain. St. Ambrose, or rather Cæsarius of Arles, gives them the title of kings; but it is suspected that this word has been foisted into the text, serm. 139, in Append. tom. 5. S. Aug. nov. edit. St. Cyprian is quoted in a sermon on baptism, as saying they were kings; but this sermon belongs to an abbot of Bonnevalle, named Arnold, who lived in the time of St. Bernard. Ser. ii. de sept. Cardin. Operibus. Paschasius Radbertus, who lived in the ninth century, in the abbey of Corbie, affirms that nobody acquainted with profane history, can be ignorant that the Magi were kings. Lastly, Theophylact, on Matt. ii. among the Greeks, has expressly contended that they were kings. This is all that has been delivered by the ancients with any assurance; as to the moderns, their authority can be of no moment, in a matter of this nature. What has contributed most to give the Magi the title of kings, is Psalm lxxii. 10. "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles, shall bring presents; the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts." [We believe, that in the most ancient pictures of the Magi they have no signs of royalty annexed to them.]

IV. Opinions are equally divided as to the profession of the Magi. Some have imagined, that they exercised curious, and even diabolical, arts of divination, judicial astrology, and incantment. The ancient "Gospel of the Infancy" of our Saviour, calls them disciples of Zoroaster. Others form a more favourable opinion, thinking their magic natural and lawful. Epiphanius believes that they were of the race of Abraham and Keturah. Abbot Rupert calls them prophets and inspired persons. Origen, lib. i. contra Celsum, imagines, that the Magi having perceived by their magical operations, that the power of the devil was much weakened, they were inquisitive to discover the cause of it; and observing at the same time a new star in the heavens, they judged it was that predicted by Balaam, which was to mark the birth of a new king of Israel. This made them resolve to seek him, to pay him adoration. Basil, de human. Christ. gen. and Ambrose, in Luc. lib. ii. have pretty nearly the same thoughts. Jerom on Isaiah xix. says, that they had learned from demons, or rather from the prophecy of Balaam, that Christ was born; and Tertullian seems to say, that they found out the birth of the Messiah by astrology, since (as he maintains) this science was allowed till the time of Christ, but afterwards was forbidden, that no one thenceforward might take upon him to calculate nati- vities by the stars.

V. The number of the Magi has long been fixed to three. Leo supposes it in several places: Cæsarius affirms it. The same is said in two sermons, formerly ascribed to St. Austin, but one of which is Leo's, and the other is found under the name of Eusebius Emesius. Bede, abbot Rupert, and after them a multitude of commentators, say the same. This opinion seems chiefly to be founded on the three sorts of presents mentioned in the gospel: gold, myrrh, and frankincense. Their names are said to have been Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar; but these names were unknown to antiquity, as well as other names given them in some writings, which are modern enough. As likewise the Greek names, Apellius, Amerius, and Damascus; or the Hebrew Magalat, Galgalat, Saraim: or Ator, Sato, Paratoras.

The author of the imperfect work on Matthew, (Homil. ii.) quotes ancient apocryphal books, which bear the name of Seth; these say, that the Magi were twelve in number, chosen out of their nation, and succeeding each other from father to son, for several ages, to observe the moment of the appearance of the star, foretold by Balaam. For this purpose they used to ascend a mountain, whence they observed the rising of the stars. At last the star appeared to them, having a young child in the middle of it, and a cross over it. The child spoke to them, and bid them go into Judæa. St. Thomas went into Persia, and there instructed and baptized the Magi; after which they preached the gospel with him: and suffered martyrdom in a city of Arabia. The author of the common Gloss contents himself with saying there were several Magi. The Armenians maintain that they preached and suffered in their country, Char-

lin's Voyage to Persia, tom. iii. The governor of Armenia sent word to king St. Lewis of France, that they came from Tangat, in Armenia, Spiciteg. tom. vii. p. 217. An. 1249. [The Chaldean Christians have a tradition that the Magi preached in their country: one of them is called Chesad, or the Chaldean, by some writers; but the whole is without authority.]

VI. The time which the Magi took in their journey to Judæa, has much exercised chronologers. Those who suppose they came from the remotest parts of Persia, allow them two years for the journey; supposing the star appeared to them two years before the birth of our Saviour. The text is something favourable to them, Matt. ii. 16, saying that Herod slew the children of Bethlehem, from two years old and under, according to the time that the Magi had shewed him. Others believe, that departing from home at the time of our Saviour's birth, they did not arrive at Bethlehem till two years after. Others make them set out at our Saviour's birth, and arrive at Bethlehem thirteen days after, supplying them with swift dromedaries for greater speed. Some believed that the star appeared from the time of the conception of John the Baptist, or from that of Christ. Most have agreed that their arrival at Bethlehem should be on the thirteenth day from our Lord's birth. If they came from the banks of the Euphrates, I believe they might arrive at Jerusalem in less than twenty days, crossing Arabia Deserta on camels, as the common way of travelling. From the Euphrates to Jerusalem, is two hundred leagues.

VII. As to the Star that appeared to the Magi: some ancient authors asserted, that it was a new star purposely created, to declare the birth of the Messiah. Origen in his first book against Celsus, also Maldonatus, and Grotius, take it for a kind of comet, which appeared preternaturally in the air. Lightfoot thinks, that the same light which appeared to the shepherds near Bethlehem, might also be visible afar off to the Magi, hanging over Judæa, and so guide them. Others think it was an angel clothed with a luminous body in form of a star, who taking his course toward Judæa, determined the Magi to follow him. The author of the treatise de Mirabilibus Sacre Scripturæ, published in St. Austin's name, assures us, that some writers believed this star was the Holy Ghost, which appeared to the Magi under the form of a star, as it appeared at the baptism of Jesus Christ, under the form of a dove.

Chalcidius, in Timæum Plat. p. 19. [It is not known when this philosopher lived, but it is well known that he was a Christian.] a Platonic philosopher, who composed a commentary on Plato's Timæus, speaks thus of this phenomenon: We must observe another history much more holy, and more worthy of veneration; which tells us of the appearance of a star, which foretold neither diseases nor mortality, but the descent of God upon earth, to live among men, and to heap his favours upon them. Wise men of Chaldæa having perceived this star in the night, as they were skilful in the science of astronomy, they betook themselves to find out the new-born God; and having found him, they offered him presents suitable to so high a majesty.

It is disputed whether this star were seen generally, or by the Magi alone. Some believe it was seen only by the Magi; others that they saw it only twice or thrice, first in their own country, and again at quitting Jerusalem for Bethlehem. Chrysostom, Ambrose, Austin, Bernard, and the author of the imperfect commentary on Matthew, maintain that they saw it constantly, from the time it first appeared to them, till it disappeared on their arrival at Jerusalem, and so put them under the necessity of inquiring in what place the Messiah should be born.

Ignatius the martyr, and the "Gospel of the Infancy," suppose it appeared to the whole world, that all might see it, and that it was their own choice if they did not follow it. The Magi on their arrival at Jerusalem seem to suppose, that every one had seen it:—Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship him.

As for ourselves, we believe that this star was an inflamed meteor, in the middle region of the air, which having been observed by the Magi with miraculous and extraordinary circumstances, was taken by them for the star so long foretold by Balaam; and that, afterwards, they resolved to follow it, and to seek the new-born king, whose advent it declared. It was therefore a light that moved in the air before them, something like the pillar of clouds in the desert. Inward inspiration, the light of the Holy Ghost, the solicitations of grace, were the motives which engaged them to follow this phenomenon. [Comp. the history of ABRAHAM's birth as related by the Orientals, at the close of his article; also STAR.]

MAGICIANS. MAGICIAN, MAGUS, MAGI, occurs pretty often in Scripture. Generally it signifies a diviner, a fortune-teller, &c. Moses forbids recourse to such on pain of death, Levit. xix. 31. xx. 6. "The soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and even cut him off from among his people." The Hebrew is אֱלֹהֵי חַיִּים וְאֱלֹהֵי מוֹת, Oboth and Jedonim signify, literally—the first, those possessed with a spirit of Python, or a demon that foretels future events; the second—Knowers, they who boast of the knowledge of secret things. It was such sort of people that Saul extirpated out of the land of Israel, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3.

Daniel also speaks of magicians, and diviners in Chaldæa, under Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 20, &c. וְלִכְשָׁדִּים, וְלִמְכַשְׁפִּים, לְאַשְׁפִּים, וְלִחְרָטְמִים, He names four sorts: Chartumim, Asaphim, Mecasphim, and Casdim. chap. ii. 2.

The first, Chartumim, according to Theodotion, signifies enchanters; according to the LXX. sophists; according to Jerom, Hariolos, diviners, fortune tellers, casters of nativities.

The second word Asaphim, has a great resemblance to the Greek word sophos, wise men; whether the Greeks took this word from the Babylonians, or vice versa. Theodotion and Jerom have rendered it, Magicians, the LXX. Philosophers.

The third word, Mecasphim, by Jerom and the Greeks, is translated Malefici, enchanters, such as used noxious herbs and drugs, the blood of victims, and the bones of the dead, for their superstitious operations.

The fourth word, Casdim, or Chaldæans, has two significations: first, the Chaldæan people, over whom Nebuchadnezzar was monarch: the second, a sort of philosophers, who dwelt in a separate part of the city, who were exempt from all public offices and employments: their studies were physic, astrology, divination, foretelling of future events by the stars, interpretation of dreams, augury, worship of the gods, &c. Diodor. Sicul. lib. i. ii. Strab. lib. vi.

[Comp. the Magicians of Egypt, Exod. vii. 11. in their classes; they were wise men, sorcerers, and magicians; חֹזְמִים, מְכַשְׁפִּים, חֹכְמִים. Whoever is acquainted, though but little, with the manners of the East, knows, that to this day, the astrologers who calculate lucky and unlucky days, and times of the day, are persons of great importance in the retinue of the great. A grandee cannot stir without having previously consulted them, and they direct the steps of kings. They are the worthy successors of the Magicians of antient times; and we may guess from these at the functions and influence of their predecessors, which certainly were highly important.]

All these inquisitive and superstitious arts were prohibited among the Israelites; and to restrain their inclination of imitating the other Eastern people, who all had their diviners, enchanters, and magicians, God sent them prophets, who discovered future events in a sure, clear, and easy manner; whereas the predictions of diviners were always obscure, enigmatical, doubtful, and dangerous, as well in respect of those who consulted them, as of those who were consulted; for the law condemned both parties to death. See JANNES and JAMBRES, PYTHON, &c.

MAGIC. There are several sorts of magic. All those arts are forbidden by the law of God, wherein any conjurations or invocations of the devil are used; the black art; superstitious ceremonies of magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, witches, wizards, necromancers, exorcists, astrologers, soothsayers, interpreters of dreams, fortune-tellers, casters of nativities, &c. in practising their diabolical arts, whether to hurt or to benefit mankind. God has forbid to consult magicians on pain of death, Levit. xix. 31. He threatens to destroy those who consult them in secret, Lev. xx. 6. Saul did what he could to extirpate them from Israel: yet many remained, and the Israelites were always much addicted to these superstitions, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3. Pharaoh's magicians counterfeited the miracles of Moses. See JANNES and JAMBRES; EPHEBUS, Ephesia grammata, &c.

MAGIC ROD, or WANDS. It is said, Ezekiel xxi. 21. "The king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of two ways, to use divination; he made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver." Jerom, Theodoret, Grotius, and most modern interpreters, on this passage, tell us, that the Chaldæans had a custom, when they commenced an undertaking, or a journey, to write on wands or arrows, which they mingled together in a quiver, the names of the cities whither they intended to go, or the things they intended to undertake; afterwards, drawing the arrows out of the quiver, at a venture, they were decided in their undertaking by the inscription on the arrow that came forth. This custom of divining by rods or arrows is very ancient. The Scythians, says Herodotus lib. iv. cap. 67. and the Alans, Ammian, lib. xxxi. divined by certain branches of willow or myrtle. The modern Arabians use arrows inclosed in a bag. On one they write, Lord command me; on another, Lord prevent me; a third they leave blank. If the first arrow drawn out has the inscription, Lord prevent me, it sets aside the thing in question, D'Herbelot. Biblioth. Orient. under the word AIDAD. We find something like this among the Turks, Thevenot's Travels, chapter xxvi. among the Chinese, Gonzales, Gonzales, and Mendoza, lib. ii. cap. 4, and anciently among the Medes, Dio Chrysost. and the Hebrews, Hosea iv. 12. Maimon. tract. de Idololat. cap. 6. Tacitus observes it also among the ancient Germans. They cut into pieces a bough of some fruit tree, which they marked with certain characters, and threw them at hazard on a white cloth: the father of the family picking up these pieces one after another, took auguries by inspection of their marks. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CXXIX.

MAGOG, מגג, roof, or that covers; from מגג: otherwise, that dissolves; from מגג mag.

MAGOG, son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2. father of the Scythians or Tartars, as is believed. The name Scythian was heretofore of great extent, comprehending the Getæ, the Goths, the Sarmatians, the Sacæ, the Massagetæ, and others. The Tartars and Muscovites possess the country of the ancient Scythians, and retain several traces of the names Gog and Magog. They were formerly called Mogli, and in Tartary are the provinces Lug, Mongug, Cangigu, and Gigui; Engui, Corgangui, Caigui, &c. St. Ambrose was of opinion, that Gog and Magog were the Goths, who in the fifth and sixth centuries ravaged the Roman empire, ad Gratian. lib. ii. cap. 4. Gog and Magog have in a manner passed into a proverb, to express a multitude of powerful, cruel, barbarous, and implacable enemies, to God and his worship. See Gog.

[Simon thinks that this name expresses augmentation, spreading, of the family, or of the influence and connection: from the construction of the word in Ezekiel there seems to have been several tribes of Magogites; or, this name includes several families.

Suidas says Magog is the Persians: whence we might guess, that Ezekiel, who describes the army of Magog, intended the army of Xerxes.

Josephus says, the people named Magoges, were so called from their leader Magog, who, by the Greeks, is called a Scythian. It should seem, therefore, that Josephus speaks of a name and a people, well known in his own time.

The name of a town in Pliny written Magog, is an error for Mabog, as appears from Syriac authorities in Asseman, tom. ii. Bibl. Orient. [It should be Maha-Baga, "the great goddess."] Asseman places Magog in Chorasán and Bukharia.

Ebedjesu in the thirteenth century says, that Adeus planted Christianity "throughout Persia, the regions of Assyria, Armenia, Media, Babylonia, the land of Huz, (in the south of Persia, not far from the Tigris, whose metropolis is marked Ahvaz in D'Anville, about lat. 40.) to the confines of India, and even to the land of Gog and Magog." Elias Damascenus, who lived about A. D. 898, says, Alpheus, disciple of Adeus, called to the faith of Christ, Gebal, (i. e. Parthia) and Persia, and Ahvaz, to the borders of Sind, (i. e. India) and Gog and Magog." Amraa says, "Persia and Gebal, and the country beyond, even to Gog and Magog." These authorities clearly point to the country which we now call Tartary, largely taken, as what was formerly called Magog.

These regions used the Syriac language. Moses has only Magog as a people; the name Gog seems to have been added by Ezekiel among the Jews, and from him to have been received by Christian writers on the Apocalypse. The Arabs, Persians, and Turks, says D'Herbelot, always associate Jagiouge and Magiouge, (Gog and Magog) and they understand by these names the same as by Tsin and Matsin, the Chinese of the north, and those of the south.

But this prophet also seems to take Gog for the king, and Magog for the people: as if Gog were the chief of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal; and these were military tribes under his orders.

The above are the sentiments of Michaelis. It is certain that the Arabs and Turks take Jiouge and Majiouge for northern nations: and during late wars of the Russians and Turks, they were anxious to be informed of events, expecting, as we learn from Bruce, and others, that they might precede the advent of those northern powers, from which they await interesting occurrences.]

MAGPIASH, מגפיש, Mayaß, clothing, or body that perishes; from מגפא gapk, a body, and ווּי hashash, to perish, to decay; otherwise, the moth of the body; from ווּי hash, a moth: or, assembly; from ווּי hush. Neh. x. 20.

MAHALALEEL, מַחֲלֵלֵל, he that praises God; from מַחֲלֵל hillel, or halul, to praise: otherwise, illumination of God; from hillel, and לֵל God.

MAHALALEEL, or MALALEEL, son of Canaan, of the race of Seth, Gen. v. 15, 16, &c. He begat Jared at the age of 65 years. He lived afterwards 800 years, in all 865 years; died A. M. 1290, ante A. D. 2714.

The Orientals affirm, that this patriarch was the first who dug mines in the earth, in search of metals;

metals: that he first built houses; and founded the cities Shuster and Babel. Some confound him with the giant Dondash, who entered into the service of Seth, whom they acknowledge as prophet and universal monarch before the flood. They say the giant Dondash used no weapons, offensive or defensive, but fought by the strength of his arms only, d'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 582.

MAHALATH, מַחֲלָת, Μαελλῆθ, melodious song; otherwise, infirmity; from מַחֲלָה chalah.

MAHALATH, wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah, 2 Chron. xi. 18.

II. MAHALATH, or Basemath, daughter of Ishmael, and wife of Esau, Gen. xxviii. 9.

III. MAHALATH, Maheleth, or Maeleth, title of Psalms liii. and lxxxviii. "To the chief musician on Mahalath:" some ancient copies read Amalech. מַחֲלָת מְשִׁבֵּי לְדָוִד אֱמֶלֶךְ. Aquila, Ἐπὶ χορεία. Theodot. ὑπὲρ τῆς χορείας, for the dance. Sym. διὰ χορῶν, by the choir. Some think Mahalath signifies a musical instrument, but this has no foundation: we rather think it imports dancing, which is certainly its proper signification in Hebrew; as if the title of the Psalm imported to be, "An instructive Psalm of David, for the chief master of dancing;" or, for the chorus of singers and dancers.

MAHALI, מַחֲלִי, choir of singers; from מַחֲלָה machol. See MAHALAH. Eldest son of Merari, chief of a family, Exod. vi. 19. Numb. iii. 33.

MAHANAIM, מַחֲנַיִם. The two fields; from מַחֲנֶה mochanah. [The two camps; or, the double camp—either of Jacob's family, or referring to the angels. Comp. Psalm xxxiv. 7.]

[Nothing is so common among ourselves as the name of a town derived from a camp or military station, as Winchester, Colchester, &c. which were, in all probability, originally British stations, afterwards Roman camps, and of course termed castra. That the same took place in foreign parts, we may readily conclude; hence Stratos was the metropolis of Acarnania, Castra Cyri was a place in Cilicia, Castra Cornelia, in Africa Zengitania, &c. MAHANAIM, a city of the Levites of the family of Merari, in Gad, on the brook Jabok. Josh. xxi. 38. xiii. 29, 30. 1 Chron. vi. 80. Jacob gave it this name, because here he had a vision of angels, Gen. xxxii. 2. Mahanaim was the seat of the kingdom of Ish-bosheth, after the death of Saul, 1 Sam. ii. 9, 12. Hither David retired, during the usurpation of Absalom, who was subdued and slain not far from hence, 2 Sam. xvii. xviii. &c. In the Vulgate it is sometimes called simply Castra, or the camp, Gen. xxxii. 2. 2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, 29. xvii. 24. xix. 32.

MAHARAI, מַחֲרַי, Macharai, he that hastens, or urges; from מַחֲרָה mahar: otherwise, my mountain, or portion; from מַחֲרָה har, and 'i, my. A Netophtite, of the race of the Zarthites, chief of the 24,000 men who attended David as guards in the tenth month, (January) 2 Sam. xxiii. 28. 1 Chron. xxvii. 18.

MAHATH, מַחֲת, he that blots out, or suppresses; from מַחֲת mahah: or that breaks, or dreads; from מַחֲת chathath. 1 Chron. vi. 35.

MAHAVITE, מַחֲוִי, he that declares, from מַחֲוִי chivah: otherwise, that blots out, or suppresses; from מַחֲוִי machah: otherwise, marrow; from מַחֲוִי moach. A valiant man, 1 Chr. xi. 46.

MAHAZIOTH, מַחֲזִיּוֹת, who sees a sign, or the letter; from מַחֲזִי chazah, to see, and מַחֲזִי oth, a sign or letter. Son of Heman, chief of the twenty-third family of the Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 4.

[MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, making speed to the spoil, he hasteneth to the prey.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, a name given to one of the sons of the prophet Isaiah. This is an instance of an allegorical name, or a name of allusion, imposed on a child by way of prediction. The prophet observes, that his children were for signs and wonders, and this name is evidence of the truth of that observation. Whether this were the only name of this child, or whether in after life he might not be called by another appellation, Scripture does not inform us. See the history, Isaiah viii. 1—3. But, as we have no reason to suppose that Pashur dropped his name Pashur, to assume that of Magor Misabib, (See MAGOR MISSARIB.) or that he was known by the latter name in general appellation, so we can by no means conclude that the allegorical appellation of this son of Isaiah, would be his constant denomination among his own family, or his countrymen at large. Of the same nature we are to consider Emmanuel, and some other names.]

MAHLAH, מַחֲלָה, dance, or song; from מַחֲלָה machol: otherwise, infirmity [of the mother;] from מַחֲלָה chalah, or מַחֲלָה machalah, disease.

MAHLAH, MAALA, or MAHALA, a daughter of Zelophehad, who with her sisters received their allotment in the land of Canaan, because their father died without male issue. Numb. xxvi. 33. xxvii. 1. Josh. xvii. 3. 1 Chron. vii. 15.

MAHLON, מַחֲלֹן, song, or infirmity. Son of Elimelech and Naomi. Ruth i. 2, 3, &c. In the country of Moab he married Ruth a Moabite woman, but died without children; his widow Ruth followed her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehem, where she married Boaz.

MAHOL, מַחֲוֹל, song, choir, infirmity; otherwise, sandy; from מַחֲוֹל chol, sand. [rejoicing.]

MAHOL,

MAHOL, or MACHOL, father of Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda. 1 Kings iv. 31. Some conjecture that Mahol was the mother, and not the father of Ethan, &c. or, that Mahol is a generical name, signifying the choir; in which sense Ethan, Heman, and Chalcol would be sons of the choir, alluding to their profession as singers or musicians.

[MAIMED, implies the loss of a limb or member: often the absolute loss of it, not a suspension of its use, by a contraction, or diminution, sprained, or shrivelled, only. This total loss is clearly the import of the original word, "If thine hand or foot offend thee cut them off, and cast them from thee—enter into life maimed—rather than having two hands, &c. Matth. xviii. 8. And this should be rather be observed, to distinguish it from withered, contracted, &c. and because it may be asked, what we should think of a person who could restore a lost limb, or member. Perhaps we are not always sensible of the full import of this word, when reading the history of the miraculous cures performed by our Lord.]

MAKAZ, מקצ, end, extremity; from קצ ketz: or, to shorten; from קצץ katsatz: or, trouble: or summer, thorn, watch; from קוצ kutz.

[The name of a place called "the end:" being at the extremity of a district. But it is not uncommon among ourselves for a place to derive a like name from its proprietor: as "such an one's end:" sometimes, because it is situated at the end of his estate: or North End, West End, &c.]

MAKAZ, or MACCES, a city probably of Dan, 1 Kings iv. 9. I suppose it to be the Maktesh, the jaw-tooth, or En-hakkore, Judges xv. 19. Zephaniah i. 11. Vulg. Habitatores Pilæ. Heb. מכתש שפתי maktesh.

MAKELOTH, מקלות, Μακεδδωδ, rods, or wands; from מקל makel: otherwise, voices; from קל kol; or lightness, or contempt; from קלל kalal, to despise. But with ה he, Macheloloth signifies assembly, congregation, [crowd] from קהל kahal.

MAKELOTH, or MACELOTH, an encampment of Israel in the desert, Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26. Probably Malathis, which Eusebius and Jerom place twenty miles from Hebron, in the south of Judah. See MALATHA. Ptolemy places Maliattha near Eluza or Luza.

MAKKEDAH, מקדח, adoration, or prostration, according to the Hebrew: otherwise, raised, eminent; from the Greek μακεδνός.

MAKKEDAH, or MACEBA, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 41. Eusebius says, this city is eight miles from Eleutheropolis, east. Joshua marched from Libnah towards Makkedah, Josh. x. 29. called Maked, 1 Macc. v. 26. 38.

[A place of pasture grounds for feeding, says Simon, supposing it to be the same as Nokhedim, by transposition.]

MALACHI, מלך, Ἀγγελος, my angel, or my ambassador or envoy; from מלך laac: or from מלאך malac, an angel, or messenger.

MALACHI, the last of the twelve minor prophets, and so little known, that it is doubted whether his name be a proper name, or only a generical name, signifying the angel of the Lord, a messenger, a prophet. It appears by Haggai i. 13. and by Mal. iii. 1. that in these times the name of Malach-Jehovah, messenger of the Lord, was given to prophets. The LXX. have rendered Malachi, his angel, instead of my angel, as the original expresses: and several of the fathers have quoted Malachi under the name of "the angel of the Lord." The second book of Esdras and Tertullian unite the name, Malachi, and angel of the Lord. Origen thought, that Malachi was an angel incarnate, rather than a prophet; but this opinion is insupportable. It is much more probable that Malachi was Esdras; and this is the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, of the Chaldee paraphrast, of Jerom, Præfat. in Malach. et Comment. in eundem pluribus locis; and of abbot Rupert.

The author of the Lives of the Prophets, under the name of Epiphanius Dorotheus, and the Chronicon Alexandrinum, say, that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and native of Sapha; that the name Malachi was given him because of his angelical mildness, and because an angel used to appear visibly to the people, after the prophet had spoken to them, to confirm what he had said. He died very young, as they say, and was buried near the place of his ancestors.

It appears certain that Malachi prophesied under Nehemiah, and after Haggai and Zechariah, at a time of great disorder among the priests and people of Judah; which he reproves. He inveighs against the priests; he reproaches the people with having taken strange wives; he reproves them for inhumanity to their brethren; for too frequently divorcing their wives; for neglect of paying tythes and first-fruits. He seems to allude to the covenant that Nehemiah renewed with the Lord, together with the priests and the chief of the nation. Malachi is the last of the prophets of the synagogue, and lived about four hundred years before Jesus Christ. He prophesied of the coming of John the Baptist, and of the twofold coming of our Saviour, very clearly. Mal. iii. He speaks of the abolition of sacrifices under the Old law, and of the sacrifice of the new law. Chap. i. 10, 13. iv. 5, 6. The

The Jews maintain, that in the time of Darius Hystaspes, a general assembly of the heads of their nation was held, to determine the canon of scripture: That Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi presided in this council, and that Esdras was their secretary. But it is very dubious whether there ever was such an assembly, and it is certain that Daniel could not have lived to this time. The death of Malachi is put in the Roman martyrology January 14.

MALATHA, a castle in Idumæa, to which the younger Agrippa retired, after he had at Rome squandered his estate. We think Malatha may be the Makheloth, of Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26. Eusebius speaks of Malatha; and by comparing the passages in which it is mentioned, it appears that this city was in the south of Judah, about twenty miles from Hebron. See MOLADAH or NOIATHA, Josh. xv. 26. xix. 2.

MALCHAM, מלכא, their king; from מלך melech, and נא am, theirs. Son of Bela and Hodesh, 1 Chron. viii. 9. See MILCOM.

MALCHIAH, מלכיה, the Lord is my king, or, the Lord rules me; from מלך melec, a king, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. MALCHIAH, or Melchias, chief of the fifth family, of the twenty-four sacerdotal families. 1 Chron. xxiv. 9.

II. MALCHIAH, of the Levites, son of Ethni, and Father of Baaseiah, 1 Chron. vi. 40.

III. MALCHIAH, father of Pashur, 1 Chron. ix. 12.

IV. MALCHIAH, a Jew who put away his wife, because she was a foreigner. Ezra. x. 25.

V. MALCHIAH, son of Harim; assisted at the building of half a street of Jerusalem, after the Babylonish captivity, Neh. iii. 11.

VI. MALCHIAH, son of Rechab, chief or lord of Beth-haccerem; rebuilt the gate at Jerusalem, called the dung-gate, Neh. iii. 14.

VII. MALCHIAH, son of a goldsmith; built several houses, &c. in Jerusalem. Neh. iii. 31.

VIII. MALCHIAH, son of Enan, father of Achitob, and grandfather of Judith, Judith viii. 1. Vulg.

IX. MALCHIAH, father of Peshur: a considerable man at Jerusalem, Jerem. xxi. 1.

X. MALCHIAH, son of Ham-melech, keeper of the prisons at Jerusalem. By his orders Jeremiah was let down into a cistern in which was no water, but mud only, where he was in danger of his life, had he not been quickly delivered by Ebed-melech, Jer. xxxviii. 6, &c.

MALCHIEL, מלכיאל, the king my God, or God is my king; from מלך melec, a king, י i, my, and אל el, God. Son of Beriah, son of Asher; chief of the family of the Machielites, under Moses, Numb. xxvi. 45. Gen. xlv. 17.

MALCHIJAH. See MALCHIAH.

MALCHIRAM, מלכיראם, my king is exalted; from מלך melec, a king; and רם ramam, to exalt. Son of king Jecoviah, 1 Chron. iii. 18.

MALCHISHUA, מלכישוא, Μελχίζουα, my king is a saviour; from מלך melec, king, or council, and שוא jashah, a saviour: otherwise, magnificent king; from שוא shuah. Third son of Saul, killed with his father, and brethren, in the battle of Gilboa, 1 Sam. xxxi. 2.

MALCHOM, מלכום, or MOLECH, their king; from מלך melec, a king, and נא am, theirs. A God of the Ammonites. See MOLOCH. 1 Kings xi. 33.

MALCHUS, Μελχους, king, or kingdom; from מלך malac.

I. MALCHUS, or Malichus. Josephus speaks of Malchus king of the Arabs, who received great obligations from Herod son of Antipater, afterwards king of the Jews. Antigonus, by the assistance of the Persians having forced Herod to retire from Jerusalem, desired to take refuge with Malchus; but that prince forbade him to enter his dominions. This obliged Herod to go to Egypt, whence he proceeded to Rome. Ante A. D. 40.

II. MALCHUS, or Malichus; assassinated Antipater father of Herod. Antiq. lib. xiv. 10.

III. MALCHUS, a servant of the high-priest Caiaphas, who in the garden of olives among those sent to apprehend Jesus, was smote by St. Peter, and his right ear cut off. John xviii. 10. Though it is not certain whether it was entirely separated from his head, or was only cut off in part: the latter is most probable, because Jesus only touched it to heal it. Luke xxii. 51, 52. Some believe that Peter struck this servant in his own defence, and to prevent him from seizing him, also. There is great probability, that Peter intended to cut off his head, and not his ear. Cornelius à Lapide thinks that Malchus became a convert; others think, it was he who struck our Saviour on the face, and asked him, Dost thou answer the high-priest thus? But St. John does not favour this opinion, for he says, chap. xviii. 22. he that struck our Saviour was one of the officers belonging to the high-priest Annas; without insinuating that it was Malchus, of whom he had spoke a little before.

MALICE, MALITIA. This Latin word expresses not only that evil disposition of the mind and heart, which we call malice, but also punishment and correction; so 1 Sam. xxi. 7. Scito quia completa est malitia ejus. Be sure that evil (or punishment) is determined by him: (thus David speaks to Jonathan) literally, know that evil is completed by him; Saul has definitively resolved that I shall perish. 1 Sam. xxv.

17. the servants of Nabal tell their mistress Abigail, that David had resolved on the destruction of her husband, Quoniam completa est malitia adversus virum tuum. See also Isaiah xl. 2.

Solomon, Eccles. xi. 10. says, Amove malitiam à carne tua, put away evil from thy flesh. The wise man in this place, by the term evil, or malitia, according to Jerom, means all shameful pleasures. So Eccles. vii. 3. Per tristitiam vultus corrigitur animus delinquentis. The Hebrew has Malitia vultus latificat cor. By the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better, i. e. That severity of countenance, with which we behold any one who departs from his duty, renders him sensible of his fault, and amends his heart. [A habit of gravity has its effect on the conduct?] Our Saviour says, Matth. vi. 34. Sufficit diei malitia sua; Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, or the trouble and calamity thereof. St. Paul requires, that the faithful should be children in malice, but men in prudence and wisdom. 1 Cor. xiv. 20.

In some passages of Ecclesiasticus, as xi. 29. malitia is taken in the same sense as pœna. Malitia horæ oblivionem facit luxuriæ magnæ. The evil of a moment makes us forget the greatest pleasures. And chap. xii. 9. In malitia viri amicus agnitus est. A friend is known in adversity. Also, chap. xxx. 14. Melior est pauper sanus, quam dives flagellatus malitiâ. A poor man in health is preferable to a rich man afflicted with diseases.

MALLE, a city beyond Jordan. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 12.

MALLOTÆ, Μαλλώται, he that fills or finishes, or is filled; from מלל malle, full.

MALLOTES, the inhabitants of Mallos, a city of Cilicia, on the river Pyramus. They revolted from Antiochus Epiphanes, because he had given them, with the city of Tarsus, to one of his mistresses named Antiochis. 2 Macc. iv. 30. In this manner the kings of Persia used to give whole cities sometimes to their mistresses, to find them in necklaces, girdles, &c.

MALLOTHI, מלתי, fulness, circumcision; from מל mul: otherwise, my words; from לל malal, to speak, and י i, my. Son of Heman, chief of the tenth family of the Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 26.

MALLUCH, מלך, Μαλῆκ, Vulgate, Maloch, he that reigns; from מלך malac, to govern.

I. MALLUCH, or Maloc, a Levite of the family of Merari, son of Hashabiah, and father of Abdi, 1 Chron. vi. 44.

II. MALLUCH, or Mellus. One of those who separated from their strange wives, at the return from Babylon, Ezra x. 29.

VOL. II. PART XVIII. Edit. IV.

MALTA, Μάλτα, affording honey, from whence honey distills; from μέλι, honey.

MALTA, or MELITA, [Eng. Tr.] a famous island in the Mediterranean sea. It is thought to have been named Melita, from the great quantity of honey found there formerly. Its length is from east to west, and its breadth from north to south. Its circumference is about sixty miles, or twenty leagues. This island is ascribed to Africa by geographers, because if we draw a line from east to west, it will be included in the African sea. Its soil is stony and barren, yet it bears excellent fruits, melons and cotton. St. Paul suffered shipwreck on Malta, and with his companions was well used by the inhabitants, who gave them shelter, and lighted a fire, to dry them by. Acts xxviii. A. D. 68. St. Paul taking up a faggot of twigs to throw into the fire, a viper that lurked therein feeling the heat, seized him by the hand: he, without any emotion, shook it into the fire. The people expected every moment to see him fall down dead; but finding that did not happen, they changed their sentiments, and began to think him some deity.

Publius, governor of the island, received St. Paul courteously. His father being sick of a fever, and a bloody flux, St. Paul went and healed him. Then all who had any sick, brought them to the Apostle, who restored them to health. When St. Paul and his company sailed from thence, the people abundantly supplied them with necessaries for their voyage.

We are assured, that since that time there are at Malta no vipers, or other venomous animals; and that if any are brought thither from other places, they die presently. Several of the Maltese were converted by the preaching of St. Paul; and the house of Publius, the first bishop of Malta, was changed into a church. St. Paul continued there three months. Vid. Chrysost. Homil. 54, in Acta.

A native of this island, a religious belonging to la Charité, has sent me information, that Malta was an ancient colony of the Carthaginians, and had always spoke the language of Africa, as it continues to do. For this reason those of St. Paul's company, who were Greeks or Latins, called the Maltese, Barbarians. That the Romans never introduced their language among this people; that still the ordinary people speak Arabic; that at la Valletta they speak Italian, because of the knights who reside there, but that the country people understand not this tongue; that indeed at la Valletta are two Greek churches, but they are for the Grecians who quitted Rhodes with the knights, and followed their fortune to Malta.

, Besides

Besides which, he acquaints me, that the place where St. Paul came ashore, is a neck of land washed by the sea on all sides, lying to the north of the island, and extending towards the west, which has ever since been called St. Paul's road: That there is a tradition in the island, that St. Paul was really bit by a viper, and that when he shook it off into the fire, he cursed all the vipers of the island, and all that have been seen there since are without poison; for some are still found there, but not dangerous. Some of them, out of curiosity, have been transported into Sicily, and immediately on their arrival have become as venomous as others; and being then carried back to Malta, have presently lost their venom. See the PLATES; MEDALS of MALTA: with their Explanations.

[There is no need to caution any naturalist against receiving this idle tale; as all know that the venom of serpents is a fluid secreted through proper organs in the head: no change of place, therefore, could create those organs in a species which had them not, naturally; nor could obliterate them in a species to which they naturally belonged. See SERPENT'S HEAD, PLATE II.

The island of Malta is at present under British authority; and by Act of Parliament is reckoned to Europe. It was taken by Buonaparte on his voyage to Egypt, 1798, and was taken from the French by the British in 1800.]

MALTHACE, wife of Herod the Great, and mother of Archelaus king of Judæa. She died while her son was at Rome, endeavouring to have his father's will confirmed by the emperor Augustus. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 12.

MAMMON, מַמְּוֹן, Mammōnā. A Chaldee or Syriac word, signifying riches. The true reading is Matmon, avarice, desire, riches.

MAMMON. Our Saviour says, we cannot at the same time serve God and riches; Matth. vi. 24. that we ought not to make ourselves adherents of Mammon, or of the riches of unrighteousness, i. e. of worldly riches, which are commonly the instruments of iniquity, and are acquired but too often by unrighteousness and iniquity. Some have asserted, that Mammon signified the God of riches, but there is no proof of this. Matmon in Hebrew signifies concealed, and Mammona riches. St. Austin observes, de Serm. Dom. in monte. lib. ii. cap. 14. n. 47. that in the Punic or African tongue, Mammona signifies gain. Mammona apud Hebræos divitiæ appellari dicuntur. Congruit et Punicum nomen; nam lucrum Punicè Mammon dicitur.

MAMRE, מַמְרֵי, rebellious; from מַרְרָה marah: otherwise, bitter; from מַרַר marar: otherwise, that changes, that barbers; from מַרַם mar: otherwise, fat, or elevated; from מַרָא mara.

MAMRE, or MAMRE, an Amorite, brother of Aner and Eschol, and a friend of Abraham. With these three persons, their domestics, and his own, he pursued and overcame the kings, who had plundered Sodom and Gomorrah. Gen. xiv. 13.

[A city, Gen. xiii. 18. said to be the same as Hebron, and Arba. Gen. xxiii. 17. 19. xxxv. 27.

Others think it is a place called the Oaks; about six stadia distant from Hebron. Gen. xiv. 13. 24.

Heights? whence perhaps the Oaks of Mamre; the Oaks on the Heights; or the Oaks themselves, being high. For the situation of it, Vide HEBRON.]

MAMZER, מַמְזֵר, Ek porvñs, illegitimate, or a bastard; from מַזֵר mazer.

MAMZER. God forbids the admittance of Mamzers, or bastards, into the congregation of his people, to the tenth generation. Deut. xxiii. 2. Non ingredietur Mamzer (מַמְזֵר) id est, de scorto natus, in Ecclesiam Domini. LXX, 'Εκ πορνῆς. Zech. ix. 6. Ἀλλογενής, an alien. Vulg. separatos.

The Rabbins distinguish Mamzers into three kinds. 1. Those born in marriage, of parents contracted in cases prohibited by the law. 2. Those born from a criminal conjunction, punishable by the judges, as are the children of adulterers. 3. Those born in incest, and condemned by the law. They also distinguish between Mamzers certain and uncertain. The first are those whose birth is notoriously corrupted, and who without difficulty are excluded from the congregation of the Lord. Doubtful Mamzers are those whose birth is uncertain. These could not be excluded in strictness, yet the Scribes would not admit them, for fear that any certain Mamzers should slip in among them.

But the Vulgate, the LXX, and the authors of the canon law, take Mamzer for the child of a prostitute. The distinctions between the different sorts of bastards, as acknowledged by the law, are shewn in these three Verses,—

*Mamzeribus scortum, sed moecha nothis dedit ortum.
Ut seges à spica, sic spurius est ab amica.
Dant naturales, quæ nobis sunt speciales.*

Some interpreters take Mamzer for a generic term, which signifies illegitimate children, whose birth is impure in any manner whatever. Others believe the Hebrew Mamzer rather signifies a stranger or foreigner, than a bastard. Jephthah, who was the son of a concubine Judg. xi. 1. בֶּן אִשָּׁה זֹנָה. Vulgate Filius mulieris meretricis, became head and judge in Israel. Pharez and Zerah, sons of Tamar, conceived from a kind of incest, are reckoned among the ancestors of David. Among the Hebrews the children followed the condition of the mother. How then could a bastard-son, born of a mother, an Israelite, be excluded the congregation of Israel to the tenth generation, since the Egyptians and Idumæans might be admitted after the third generation? So that there is great probability that Mamzer means more than barely a bastard, perhaps a bastard born of a woman, a stranger and an idolater. The LXX. render the word Mamzer, Zec ix. 6. a stranger, or an alien; and Deut. xxiii. 2. the son of a prostitute. The Hebrew word occurs only in these two places, and its signification is by no means certain. The author of traditions concerning the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, believes that Solomon was of the number of the Mamzers; and that when Bathsheba says to David, 1 Kings i. 21. I and my son Solomon shall be counted offenders, or sinners; she means, my son shall be treated as a Mamzer, and myself as a prostitute. And that David, desirous to secure them from this disgrace, declared his son Solomon his successor. [But see FRAGMENTS, No. CXXIV.]

The words, They shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation, cannot mean that this sort of children may not be converted, or be admitted into Judaism, till after ten generations; but, that they shall not enjoy the employments, dignities, or privileges of true Hebrews, till the blemish of their birth is entirely obliterated, and forgot.

MAN. It is said, Gen. i. 27. that man was created male and female; say some, an hermaphrodite; or that the man and woman were united together at their sides; but the most simple and most natural meaning, is, that God created man and woman as he created animals, by pairs or couples, male and female: But whereas other animals were created together, and by one fiat alone, God created man and woman separately. The woman was created in paradise, and taken out of Adam's side while he slept.

Man was created after the image and likeness of his creator: consisting chiefly in the qualities of his soul; free, intelligent, immortal, capable of virtue, justice, wisdom and happiness: by sin he degraded this resemblance. Also, man has some resemblance to God, by the dominion God has given him over the creatures: as it were, a vice-God upon earth. See ADAM.

Man is sometimes taken for mankind in general; sometimes particularly for Adam.

A man of God, generally signifies a prophet; a man devoted to God; to his service. Moses is called peculiarly the man of God. Deut. xxxiii. 1. Josh. xiv. 6. also David, Shemaiah, and other prophets, &c.

Son of man denotes man in general, Psal. viii. 4. sons of men are taken in the same sense. The Lord, or angels, speaking to men, often calls them sons of man. Thus the Lord calls Ezekiel, ii. 1 et passim. The angel Gabriel speaks thus to Daniel, viii. 17. Jesus Christ frequently calls himself the son of man.

MANACHAS. Josephus, Ant. lib. iii. cap. 8. gives this name to the high-priest's breeches, which the Hebrew calls Michnesim, or Machnes, Exod. xxviii. 42. מְכֻנְסִים. LXX. Περισκελῆ, Vulg. Fæminalia. Josephus says, they were of twisted thread, put about the legs, and joined together on the side, being there divided half their length. [a kind of drawers, fitting close to the waist and lower parts of the person. Query, should not the Vulgate read Femoralia? trousers.]

MANAEN, or MANAHEM, a Christian prophet, foster-brother of Herod Antipas, Acts xiii. 1. A. D. 44. He was at Antioch with other prophets, when the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. It is thought Manaen was one of the Seventy disciples. The Latin martyrologies put his feast May 24, and say he died at Antioch. No particulars of his life are known.

MANAHATH, מְנַחַת, gift or present; from מְנַחַת minchah, or מְנַחַת manah: otherwise, rest; from מְנַחַת nuach: otherwise, fear, or breaking prepared; from מְנַחַת minah, preparation, and מְנַחַת chathath, fear, or breaking. Gen. xxxvi. 28.

MANAHEM, מְנַחֵם, comforter; from מְנַחֵם nacham: or he that conducts them; from מְנַחֵם nachah, to conduct, and the pronoun מְנַחֵם am, them: or preparation of heat; from מְנַחֵם minchah, preparation, and מְנַחֵם chamam, heat.

MANAHEN, or MANAHEM, the sixteenth king of Israel, general of the army of Zachariah, was at Tirzah, when he heard of his master's murder. He immediately marched against Shal-lum, who had shut himself up in Samaria, killed him, and reigned in his stead. He returned to Tirzah; but that city shutting its gates against him, he vented his passion on Tiplah, a town in the neighbourhood of Tirzah, and probably sharers in its resolution. Afterwards, he took Tirzah, ruined it intirely, and exercised many barbarities in it. He reigned in Samaria ten years, and did evil in the sight of the Lord.

Pul, king of Assyria, probably the father of Sardanapalus, having invaded Israel during the reign of Manahem; obliged this prince to pay him a thousand talents. To raise this sum, Manahem was forced to tax all his subjects fifty shekels a head; after which Pul returned into his own country. Hosea says, chap. v. 13. "Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb; Vulg. misit ad regem ultorem. But Scripture seems to insinuate, that the king of Assyria came into the country as an enemy, 1 Chron. v. 26, "and the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul, king of Assyria," &c. and so Josephus thinks, Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11. This is easily reconciled by supposing, that, at first Pul invaded Israel as an enemy, but that Manahem bought him over to his interest by this great sum. Manahem slept with his fathers, and his son Pekahiah reigned in his stead, 2 Kings xv. 13—22. A. M. 3232—3222.

II. MANAHM, of the sect of the Essenians: was vicegerent to Hillel. Manahem was a learned man for that age, and of great consideration among his sect. He foretold to Herod the Great, being then a young scholar, that he should one day be king, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13. Recommending to him the virtues of justice and moderation; yet anticipating that he would tread those under foot, with all the duties of religion and humanity; nevertheless, he would live in great glory and prosperity: but, added he, "You cannot conceal yourself from the eyes of God, who will chastise you at the end of your life, for all the evils committed by you."

Herod at first slighted these predictions, but, when raised to the regal dignity, he sent for Manahem, and inquired of him, how long he should reign? Manahem not answering directly, the king asked, Shall I reign ten years? Manahem replied, not ten only, but twenty, yea thirty; without explaining himself any farther. Herod sent him away, giving him his hand as a token of friendship, and always shewed much esteem for the sect of the Essenians. Afterwards, Herod took him into his own service, from his situation in the Sanhedrim.

The Jews speak of one Manahem, vicegerent of the Sanhedrim under Hillel. I believe him to be the same person, Lib. in Chasim. fol. 19. apud Lightfoot.

III. MANAHM, or Manaim, son of Judas the Galilean, or Gaulonite. He drew to his party some persons of quality; several robbers, and others who had nothing to lose: having taken the castle of Massada, he pillaged the magazines of the late king Herod the Great, armed his people, and went to Jerusalem; of which making himself master, he drove out the Romans, and caused himself to be proclaimed king. He put to death the high-priest Ananias, and soon became insupportable by his cruelties and excesses. Two men of the party of Eleazar encouraged the people to free themselves from his tyranny; Manahem was assaulted, and after some resistance, was forsaken by his adherents, and forced to hide himself in a place called Ophlas; whence he was taken the day following, and led to punishment. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 32. in Græco, p. 811. A. D. 66.

MANASSEAS, son of Addi, one who after the return from Babylon, separated from his foreign wife, Ezr. x. 30.

MANASSEH, מְנַשֶּׁה forgetfulness, or he that is forgotten; from נָשַׁח nashah, to forget.

I. MANASSEH. Eldest son of Joseph, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob, Gen. xli. 50, 51. born A. M. 2290, ante A. D. 1714. Named Manasseh, forgetfulness, because Joseph said; "God has made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house." When Jacob was about to die, Joseph brought his two sons to receive his father's last blessing, Gen. xlviii. 1, 2, 3, &c. Jacob adopted them; made them come to his bed-side, and kissed them. Joseph having placed Ephraim at Jacob's left hand, and Manasseh at his right, Jacob put his right hand on Ephraim, and his left on Manasseh; which Joseph observing, would have had him altered this disposition, But Jacob told him, "I know what I am doing, my son, the eldest shall be father of a great people, but his younger brother shall be greater than he." He continued to bless them, and said; in thee shall Israel be blessed, and it shall be said, "God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh."

The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt, in number 32,200 men, upwards of twenty years old, under the conduct of Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur, Numb. ii. 20, 21. This tribe was divided in the Land of Promise. One half tribe of Manasseh settled east of the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan, from the river Jabbok, to mount Libanus; and the other half tribe of Manasseh settled west of Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim, south, and the tribe of Issachar north, having the river Jordan east, and the Mediterranean west, Josh. xvi. xvii. Vide the MAP.

II. MANASSEH. Fifteenth king of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. 21. xxi. 1, 2. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, 2, &c. A. M. 3306, ante A. D. 968. He was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years. His mother's name was Hephzibah. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; worshipped the idols of Canaan; rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal, and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven, in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honour to Moloch; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Astarte in the house of God: finally, finally, he involved his people in all abominations of the idolaters to that degree, that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites, which the Lord had driven out before them. To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty; and he shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem.

It is believed, that the prophet Isaiah raised his voice loudly against these enormities: he was father-in-law to the king: had been in great credit at court, in the reign of Hezekiah: and was of high birth, being of the blood royal. He thought it incumbent on him to endeavour to reclaim the king; but this so exasperated him, that he caused Isaiah to be apprehended, and put him to death, by sawing him in two with a wooden saw, Origen, in cap. xxiii. in Matt. et Ep. ad Jul. Afric. et Homil. in Isa. Tertul. lib. de Patient. cap. xiv. et Scorpiac. cap. iii. Justin, cont. Tryph. Chrysost. ad Cyriac. Hier. in Isai. lib. xv. Aug. de Civit. lib. xviii. cap. 24.

The calamities which God had threatened began towards the twenty-second year of this impious prince. The king of Assyria sent his army against him, who seizing him among the briars and brambles where he was hid, fettered his hands and feet, and carried him to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. We think it was Sargon or Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, who sent Tartan into Palestine, and who taking Azoth, attacked Manasseh, put him in irons, and led him away, not to Nineveh, but to Babylon, of which Esar-haddon had become master, and had united the empires of the Assyrians and the Chaldeans.

Manasseh, in bonds at Babylon, humbled himself before God; who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem; and Manasseh acknowledged the hand of the Lord. We have a prayer which, it is pretended, he made in prison. The church does not receive it as canonical, but apocryphal. It is in the Euchologium, or book of prayers, of the Greeks. The Rabbins relate, that Manasseh was cast into a brazen vessel full of holes, and exposed to a great fire. That in this extremity he had recourse to all his false deities; but receiving no assistance from them, he found the vanity of his hopes. Then he remembered what he had heard his father king Hezekiah say, "When you shall invoke me in your misfortunes, and convert yourselves to me, I will hear you." Deut. iv. 29, 30. He therefore was converted to the Lord, was delivered, and carried in a moment into his kingdom; like as the apocryphal Habakkuk was transported from Judaea to Babylon, and back again from Babylon to Ju-deæa. Vide Tradit. Hebr. in lib. Paralip. et Targum, in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. The author of the imperfect comment on St. Matthew says, Manasseh being in bonds, had only a little barley-bread daily, and water mixed with vinegar, just enough to keep him alive. In the midst of his affliction he had recourse to the Lord, when a miraculous flame encompassed him suddenly, and melting his chains, set him at liberty. Fables!! [rather hyperbolic expressions of sudden deliverance.]

Manasseh was probably delivered out of prison by Saosduchin, successor of Esar-haddon, 2 Chron. xxiii. 13, 14, &c. Being returned to Jerusalem he restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but he did not destroy the high places: which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fortified; inclosed with a wall another district, which in his time was built west of Jerusalem, and which since his reign, goes by the name of the second city, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. He put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah.

The rest of the actions of Manasseh, his prayer, the manner in which God was pleased to answer his prayer; in a word, his sin and his reformation, were related in full in the book of the prophet Hozai; who is the same as Isaiah, according to some: the LXX. take this in a general sense; in the writings of the Seers: the Syriac calls him Hanan; the Arabic, Saphan. Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza, 2 Kings xxi. 18. His son Amon succeeded him, A. M. 3361, ante A. D. 648.

Many believe that the history of Holofernes happened under Manasseh. See JUDITH.

III. MANASSEH. Husband of Judith, who lived but a little while with her. He had been dead three years, when Holofernes's war began. Manasseh was of the tribe of Simeon, and died in the time of barely-harvest, of a stroke of the sun, which had affected his head. Judith viii. 2, 3.

IV. MANASSEH, High-priest of the Jews, son of John, and brother of Jaddus. He succeeded Eleazar his great uncle, and was succeeded by Onias II. his nephew. Manasseh had married Nicaso, daughter of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. The Jews and priests, displeased at this marriage, (she being of another religion) declared he must either quit his wife, or his priesthood. Manasseh seeing himself become so obnoxious, withdrew to his father-in-law, who promised that he would procure him the first place of the province; that he would build build him a temple on mount Gerizim, like that of Jerusalem, and there he should be the first high-priest.

Manasseh thus flattered, settled with his father-in-law Sanballat; several other Israelites engaged in like marriages, settled with him; and Sanballat gave them houses and lands. When Alexander the Great came into Syria, and besieged Tyre, Sanballat assisted him with eight thousand men, and submitted the whole province of Samaria. He obtained permission from Alexander, to build a temple on mount Gerizim; and gave the chief priesthood of it to his son-in-law Manasseh. The same God was worshipped in this temple, as in that of Jerusalem, and many who frequented it were Jews as well as Manasseh. But this temple was held in detestation by the priests and Jews of Jerusalem, who looked on those as schismatics who worshipped here. Therefore it must needs be, that Manasseh had renounced his schism, when after the death of his great uncle Eleazar, he succeeded in the high-priesthood, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. iii. p. 401. Josephus does not acquaint us how this change and succession was brought about, and what he does relate on this matter appears very hard to believe, and includes a contradiction not easy to reconcile.

Nehemiah, xiii. 28. mentions Sanballat the Horonite, who had given his daughter in marriage to a son of the high-priest Joiada, son of Eliashib; and acquaints us, that Nehemiah was obliged to drive away from Jerusalem this son-in-law of Sanballat, because he had taken a strange woman to wife. It does not mention his name, or what became of him; but Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 7, 8, calls him Manasses, and assures us, that he withdrew to his father-in-law at Samaria, under the reign of Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia. Here is a manifest anachronism. Nehemiah could not live under Darius Codomannus; he came the second time into Judæa, A. M. 3555, under Artaxerxes Longimanus, and died A. M. 3580. Darius Codomannus did not come to the throne till about A. M. 3670.

Some learned men have been of opinion, that we must admit two Sanballats and two Manassehs, the first lived under Nehemiah, the other under Darius Codomannus. Others have thought, that Josephus has perplexed this history, by confounding the years, and referring facts to the time of Alexander the Great, and the later Darius, which happened long before under Nehemiah. Dr. Prideaux is of this opinion. Connect. vol. iii. lib. 6. He maintains that Josephus has confounded the high-priest Joiada with his grandson Jaddus, and that his history ought to be corrected by that of Nehemiah. On this hypothesis, also, it must be allowed, that Manasseh the high-priest, who succeeded Eleazar, was a different person from the son-in-law of Sanballat, whose name Nehemiah does not mention.

Manasseh is allowed a pontificate of twenty-six years, A. M. 3745 to 3771, ante A. D. 288.

V. MANASSERH, son of Asom, one who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his strange wife, 1 Esdras ix. 38.

MANDIA, the name, in Josephus, of a certain place near Bethlehem, where Johanan son of Kareah overtook Ishmael the murderer of Gedaliah, Jerem. xli. 17. Jeremiah calls it Gheruth Chimham: Vulgate, Peregrinantes in Chama-ham. [Eng. Tr. habitation of Chimham.]

MANDRAKE. A plant that stupifies, and sometimes causes phrenzy: said to be provocative, and used in philters. There are two sorts: one is black, called the female mandrake, having leaves not unlike lettuce, though smaller and narrower, which spread on the ground, and have a disagreeable scent. It bears berries something like services, pale, of a strong smell, having kernels within like those of pears. It has two or three very large roots, twisted together, white within, black without, and covered with a thick rind. The other kind, or the male mandrake, is called Morion, or folly, because it suspends the use of the senses. It produces berries as big again as those of the female, of a good scent, and of a colour approaching towards saffron. Its leaves are large, white, broad, and smooth, like the leaves of the beech-tree. Its root resembles that of the female, but is thicker and bigger. This plant stupifies those who use it; sometimes depriving them of understanding; and often causes such vertigoes and lethargies, that if those who have taken it have not present assistance, they die in convulsions.

What has given to mandrakes the name of Anthropomorphos, or man-shaped, is only because most of the roots are parted from the middle downwards, somewhat resembling thighs and legs: Matthioli adds, that the roots made like a man's body, and called mandrakes, or hands of glory, which quacks pretend to be of singular virtue to assist barren women, are roots of reeds, white briony, &c. He informs us also, that these impostors put grains of barley or millet into these figures when so cut, in the places where hair grows in men, and then bury them in the ground, till the barley or millet begins to shoot (about three weeks) then digging them up, and adjusting the small fibres, they appear to have a beard on the chin, and hair on the head.

Moses informs us, that Reuben, son of Leah, being being in the field, happened to find mandrakes, which he brought to his mother. Rachel desired them, and obtained them from Leah, on condition that Jacob should visit her that night. Some Rabbins translate dudaim by violets, others by lillies, or jessamin; Junius calls it agreeable flowers; Codurquus, truffle, or mushroom. We have conjectured it might be citrons. It appears by Scripture, that dudaim are fruits, ripe about wheat harvest, have an agreeable scent, may be preserved, and are placed with pomegranates. Those who would support the translation of mandrakes remark that Rachel having very great desire for children, it may be presumed she coveted Leah's mandrakes with that view. The ancients named mandrakes the apple of love, and Venus they named Mandragoritis. The emperor Julian, in his epistle to Calixenes, says, he drinks the juice of mandrakes to excite amorous inclinations. See Bauhin. Hist. of Plants, tom. iii. p. 614, Matthiolus on Dioscorides, and Brodeus on Theophrast. Vid. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXCIX. VINDICATION, p. 220.

Ludolff, in his history of Ethiopia, maintains that Dudaïm signifies a certain fruit, which the Syrians call mauz, in figure and taste greatly resembling the Ficus Indica, or Indian fig; it is as big as a small cucumber, and sometimes upwards of forty hang on the same stalk. As to the mandrake, the Persians call it Abronzanam, the human figure, because the Orientals, and in particular the Jews, so artificially dress up the root of the mandrake with hairs and filaments, that it appears to have the figure of a man or woman, as remarked above.

Josephus calls this plant Baaras. He says it was found in a valley north of the castle of Macherus. That towards evening it appeared glittering like the sun; that when any one came near it in order to pull it up, it withdrew itself and seemed to fly, unless there were thrown upon it any menstruous blood, or the urine of a woman. That even then it was not safe to pluck it up, unless he that undertook it had a root of the same plant hanging on his arm; without which precaution he exposed himself to certain danger of dying.

There is however a way of taking it up without danger. They dig all round the root, so that it sticks to the earth only by its extremities. Then they fasten a dog to the root by a string, and the dog striving to follow his master who calls him away, easily tears up the plant, but then he dies on the spot; and the master can take this wonderful root in his hand without any danger. Now the use that is made of this root deserves well that they should take all this trouble to obtain it. For those devils or evil spirits that had animated the greatest profligates, if they enter into the body of a man, and seem ready to choke him, if he be not presently assisted; these demons, I say, cannot bear the smell, nor the presence, of this plant. They fly immediately if it be applied to the body of the possessed. Such is the relation of Josephus! I have also read a traveller who confirms the greatest part of this relation. P. Eugene Roger, Recolet, Description of the Holy Land, 4to.

The Arabians sometimes call mandrake by the name of Serag-al-Coshrob, or the Devil's Candle, because in the night it appears luminous. The cause of this brightness is glow-worms, who are fond of this plant, and love to be about it. Lutfalla-al-halimi, (d'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient. p. 141,) a physician, assures us, that all the wonderful things written of this plant are fictions. That he has often gathered them without danger, that the shriek attributed to them when gathered is none at all; and that all the uses to which they are applied are vain and superstitious.

Some think the Ginseng of the Chinese is a species of the mandrake, and they say it so wonderfully restores the sinking spirits of dying persons, that there is, often, time for the use of other means, and thereby of recovering them. E. Tachard says, that this root has sometimes something of the human shape; others say, it has the name of Ginseng, because it resembles the figure of a man who puts his legs in a straddling posture, which the Chinese call Gin. Another author derives the name Ginseng from the Chinese word Gin, signifying a man, and Sem which denotes a plant; q. the human plant, or the plant with a human shape. [The Ginseng which has been imported into England, and used medicinally, has not justified the reputation of this plant in its own country: perhaps the long voyage, or its being dried, injures its virtues.]

MANETHO, priest of Heliopolis. Being often quoted by Josephus, it is proper to give some account of his work. He had written in Greek the history of the several Egyptian dynasties, from the foundation of the monarchy to the time of Nectanebus, the last king of the Egyptian race, and till Darius Ochus invaded and conquered this country, fifteen years before the expedition of Alexander the Great against Persia. Manetho was secretary, or writer, to the temples of Egypt; he lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom he dedicated his work. Ante A. D. 283. He admits thirty dynasties, of one hundred and thirty generations, in Egypt, from the beginning of the Egyptian government to Nectanebus, tanebus. He places in this succession, gods, demigods, and men; and assigns to each a certain number of years, the total of which far exceeds the number of years which appears in Scripture.

We are obliged to Syncellus for the abstract of this ancient historian, which he has preserved. His work was divided into five parts. The first contained the history of the gods; the second that of the demigods of Egypt; the third that of the kings of that country. In the abridgement which yet remains, we only find the names of the princes, and the years of their reigns. Nor must we imagine that they all reigned successively; they were princes of different parts of Egypt, and sometimes reigned as contemporaries in several provinces of that country. Josephus, in his first book against Appion, makes large extracts from this author, in which he distinguishes what Manetho had taken out of the ancient records of the temples of Egypt, from what he says of his own, or what he borrows from the fabulous reports of the Egyptians. He found in the sacred monuments of this kingdom, that the Hebrews [rather, the Ethiopians; called the "Shepherd Kings," Hycsos.] had penetrated into Egypt with a great army, and had subdued the country; that being afterwards driven out again, they had conquered Judea, where they had built Jerusalem and its temple. So far is agreeable to truth. But, what he adds, that under the reign of a king called Amenophis, they were expelled Egypt, with a multitude of lepers, and other diseased persons, deserves no credit, as having no foundation but vulgar tradition. Vide LEPER.

MANGER, wherein was laid the infant Jesus after his birth. Luke relates, ii. 7, that the Holy Virgin and Joseph could not find accommodation at the public inn, and therefore were obliged to retire to a stable, where the Virgin Mary brought forth Jesus, and having swaddled him, she laid him in a manger. The ancient fathers, who speak of the birth of our Saviour, all concur that he was born in a cave dug in a rock. Origen, in Cels. lib. i. Athanasius, Ambrose, in Luc. p. 27. Epiphanius, Heres. 51. Nyssen, de sancta Christi Nativ. Theodoret, lib. viii. de Græc. affect. curatione. Justin, (Dialog. p. 304.) and Eusebius say, that this place is not in the city of Bethlehem, but in the country near to that city. Euseb. Demonst. lib. vii. cap. 4, & Vita Constantini, lib. iii. cap. 41. They ought to know this circumstance better than others, because Justin was a native of that country, and Eusebius had dwelt there. Jerom places this cave in the suburbs of Bethlehem, south. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXIII. CCLXI. and BETHLEHEM, Add.

MAN-HU, מן חו, ri éori rûro; What is this? Thus the Vulgate, and the LXX: otherwise, it is a gift, or it is manna; from מנח mincha, a present or gift, and מן hu, this. See MANNA.

MANIATH, מניא, reckoned, prepared. Judg. xi. 33. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 60. Jephthah beat the Ammonites from Aroer to Maniath.

MANNA. This is generally put for the man-na, wherewith the children of Israel were fed in the wilderness. See the following article. In Baruch i. 10. it is a corruption used for an offering, in Hebrew, mincha, [as in the English margin.]

MANNA was the food of the children of Israel, which God gave them in the deserts of Arabia during forty years, from their eighth encampment in the wilderness of Sin. Manna began to fall on Friday morning, the sixteenth day of the second month, which from thence was called Jiar, which according to Usher was Friday the fifth of June. Exod. xvi. 14, 15. It continued to fall daily in the morning, except on the Sabbath, till after the passage over Jordan, and to the passover of the fortieth year from the Exodus, i. e. from Friday June 5, A. M. 2513, to the second day of the passover, Wednesday May 5, A. M. 2553, ante A. D. 1451.

The manna was a little grain, white, like hoar-frost, round, the size of coriander-seed. Exod. xvi. 14. Numb. xi. 1. It fell every morning with the dew, and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying on the rocks, or the sand, Ex. xvi. It fell every day except the Sabbath, and only about the camp of the Israelites. It fell in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey in the wilderness, that it was sufficient to feed the entire multitude, of above a million of souls, every one of whom gathered, for his share every day, the quantity of an omer, about three quarts. It maintained all this multitude, and yet none of them found any inconvenience from the constant eating of it. Every Friday there fell a double quantity of it, Exod. xvi. 5, and though it putrified and bred maggots when kept on any other day, yet on the Sabbath it suffered no such alteration. And the same manna that was melted by the heat of the sun, when left in the field, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the house, that it was beat in mortars, and would even endure the fire, was baked in pans, made into paste, and so into cakes. Numb. xi. 5.

Scripture gives to manna the name of bread of heaven, and food of angels: whether intimating, that angels sent, and prepared, this food, or that angels themselves, if they had need of food, could not have any that was more agreeable able than manna, Psalm lxxviii. 25. Wisdom says, xvi. 20. that the manna so accommodated itself to every one's taste, that every one found it pleasing; that it included every thing agreeable to the palate, and fit for nourishment: which expressions some have taken literally; others understand them figuratively. Some even think, that it took the form of such things as a man liked best. Josephus understood it more simply: saying, those who eat of it found it so delicious, that they desired nothing else; and St. Austin observes very discreetly, that the sacred author only says, manna had the quality to conform itself to the taste of those who ate it, in favour of the children of God: ut dulcedinem tuam in filios demonstrares. And how could the Israelites complain, that manna was nauseous to them, if it had always accommodated itself to their tastes. Numb. xi. 6.

At this day manna falls in several places: In Arabia, in Poland, in Calabria, in Mount Libanus, and elsewhere. The most common and the most famous is that of Arabia, which is a kind of condensed honey, found in the summer time on the leaves of trees, on herbs, on the rocks, or the sand of Arabia Petræa. It is of the same figure as Moses describes. That which is gathered about Mount Sinai has a very strong smell, which it receives from the herbs on which it falls. It easily evaporates, insomuch that if thirty pounds of it were kept in an open vessel, hardly ten would remain at the end of fifteen days. This Arabian manna is sold by the apothecaries at Grand Cairo. Salmasius thinks, that the manna wherewith the Israelites were fed was like that now found in Arabia. Several moderns are of the same sentiment. It is true, the Arabian manna has a medicinal quality, and is rather purgative and weakening, than nourishing or strengthening. But they pretend, that by use the stomach might be accustomed to it, as people may be brought to a diet, which naturally is but little conducive to health. But we ought also to acknowledge, that the manna of Moses had miraculous qualities, not found in common manna, and which probably subsisted only while the Israelites were fed with it. Consult the Dissertations of M. Saumaise, Buxtorf, and Bochart; our Commentary on Exodus, and Altomare's Treatise of Manna.

Critics are divided about the origin of the word manna. Some think man is put instead of the Hebrew mah, What is this? And that the Hebrews on first seeing this new food which God had sent, cried to one another, man-hu, instead of mah-hu, What is this? Others maintain, that the Hebrews well knew manna, and said to one another, manhu, This is manna. M.

VOL. II. PART XVIII. Edit. IV.

Saumaise, and some other moderns, are of this opinion. They imagine that the manna was simply a fat and thick dew, which still falls in Arabia; which was quickly condensed, and served for food: that it is the same with the wild honey, Matt. iii. 4. on which John the Baptist fed; and that the miracle of Moses did not consist in producing a new substance, but in the exact and constant manner in which it was dispensed by providence, and in the quantity of it that fell daily, for so long time.

On the contrary, the Hebrews and orientals believe, that the fall of the manna was wholly miraculous. The Arabians call it The Sugar Plumbs of the Almighty, and the Jews are so jealous of this miracle, that they pronounce a curse against all who presume to deny the interposition of a miraculous power. Akiba contends, that manna was produced by the condensation of the heavenly light, which became material, and proper for the nourishment of man. Vid. Buxtorf, de Manna, cap. 2. p. 851. But Rabbi Ishmael rejected this opinion, and opposed it on the principle, that Scripture calls manna the bread of Angels. But Angels, says he, are not nourished by light become material, but by the light of God himself!

That which is sold in apothecaries shops, and commonly called manna of Calabria, is a white and sweet liquor, which distils of itself, or by incision made in the branches and leaves or keys of the ash-tree, both common and wild. In the dog-days, or a little before, it is found on the trees. It is gathered in the open sun-shine, which hardens and dries it. In July it issues freely out of the tree; in August they make incisions in the tree, which then affords a certain quantity: and when this has ceased running a third sort exudes out of the nervous part of the leaves. Manna purges moderately. Eusebius says, that the country people about Mount Libanus eat the manna found there, as others would eat honey.

[Burckhardt is the latest traveller who mentions manna: he says, "In the valley of Ghor, the manna is still found; it drops from the sprigs of several trees, but principally from the Gharrah: it is collected by the Arabs, who make cakes of it, and who eat it with butter; they call it Assal Beyrouk, or Honey of Beyrouk." Though this valley of Ghor has hitherto been unknown to all our Geographers, there can be no doubt but what Moses was well acquainted with it, and that he led Israel through it, in part, at least. The manna that then supplied Israel is said to have had the taste of wafers made with honey, Exod. xvi. 31, so the Arabs call it honey of Beyrouk: in Numb. xi. 8, it is said to have resembled the taste of fresh oil;" this is not contradictory; as that gathered from different plants, or from different places, or at different seasons, might not be always exactly alike. The Arabs who collect it make cakes of it: so did Israel, loc. cit. (Could a similar man-na be the wild honey on which John the Baptist lived? Does it fall near the Jordan?)

It is somewhat extraordinary that our author should think the "entire multitude" of Israel, subsisted wholly on the manna. Certainly, the daily sacrifices were offered; and, no doubt, other offerings, affording animal food, on which the priests and Levites subsisted, according to their offices. That considerable flocks and herds also accompanied the camp of Israel is clear from various passages: we must therefore make proper allowances for the proportion of food these supplied to their owners, &c. Burckhardt further says of this valley, "it furnishes indigo, gum arabic, the silk tree called Asheyr, whose fruit encloses a white silky substance, of which the Arabs twist their matches. It is inhabited near the Dead Sea in summer time, by a few Bedouin peasants only, but during the winter months it becomes the meeting place of upwards of a dozen powerful Arab tribes;" doubtless, because it affords pasturage in plenty, at that time: for so many powerful tribes would never make it their meeting-place, if it furnished nothing but manna. Could their cattle live on manna?

MANOAH, מָנוֹחַ, Manwé, rest; from מָנוּחַ nuach; otherwise, present; from מִנְחָה mincha.

MANOAH, or MANUEH, father of Samson, of the tribe of Dan, and of the city of Zorah. Judg. xiii. An Angel of the Lord having appeared to the wife of Manoah, and having promised her a son; Manoah, whether moved by jealousy, says Josephus, Ant. lib. v. cap. 10. or by gratitude, says Ambrose, Ep. 70. desired of the Lord that he might see him who had thus appeared, that he might know from him how to treat this son when born. The Lord heard his prayer, and the Angel appeared again to his wife, being then in the fields: who ran to acquaint her husband. Manoah went to him, and obtained from him directions respecting his son. Manoah then said, My lord, I pray you be pleased to let us prepare you a kid. The angel replied, I must not eat any food; but you may offer it for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. Manoah said to him, (not knowing him to be an angel) What is your name? that we may pay you honour and acknowledgment, if that shall happen which you have foretold. He answered, Why ask you my name? which is a secret. verse 18. לָמָּה זָכַרְתָּ אֶת שְׁמִי לֵשׁ מִן הַשָּׁמַיִם. Which may be translated, "Why do you ask my name, which is Peli? Or, why do you ask my name? and it was admirable; or else, and God is admirable." [q. and he kept it secret?]

Manoah therefore took the kid, with the wine for the libations; and put them on the fire which he had lighted on a stone. Josephus, who is followed by most commentators, believes that the Angel touched the flesh with a rod in his hand, on which there issued a flame that consumed the burnt-sacrifice: this circumstance is not mentioned in Scripture. As the smoke began to ascend, the angel also ascended in the midst of the flame, towards heaven. Then Manoah perceived that it was an angel, and said to his wife, "We shall certainly die since we have seen the Lord." But his wife answered him, "If the Lord designed to kill us, he would not have conferred such favours on us; he would not have received our burnt-offering, nor would he have predicted to us the birth of a son." This happened A. M. 2848, and Samson was born in 2849, ante A. D. 1155.

MAOCH, מָוֶךְ, He that is pressed and bruised; from מָוֶה mahac. Father of Achish, king of Gath, 1 Sam. xxvii. 2.

MAON, מָוֶן, [the little house] or habitation: otherwise, crime; from מָוֶן havon: otherwise, by sin; from the same, and מָוֶן.

MAON, a city of Judah, in the most southerly part. Josh. xv. 55. See also 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25. xxv. 2. Nabal the Carmelite had great possessions in the desert of Maon, and David dwelt a good while hereabouts. We think Maon to be capital of the Meonians, Heb. 1 Chron. iv. 40, 41. and 2 Chron. xx. 1. The Vulgate in this last place reads Ammonites instead of Maonim; and in the other passage Habitatores; the LXX. Minas. The city of Maon, which gave name to the desert, is probably the Mænois, or Mæonis, which Eusebius places in the neighbourhood of Gaza, Onomastic. voce Μηνεβνῶ; and the Menæum of the Codex Theodosianus, which is near Beersheba, or Versabinum Castrum. It is called Minois in the subscriptions of the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. See Cellarius and Reland under Minois or Menois.

[1. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 55.

2. The name of a wilderness near Jeshimon, 1 Sam. xxv. 2.

3. A district in Arabia, Judg. x. 12.

But, observing that this appellation is connected with an edifice, as Beth Maon, and a deity, as Baal Maon, I conceive that we may expect a deity in this Ann, much like others. What strikes me as most probable is "the Ann of dwelling," or residence: the deity which invented

invented dwellings, protected dwellings, &c. the Janus of the Romans, the Ganessa of the Hindoos; or perhaps the Lares, those domestic gods of antiquity. I think it not unlikely that the idea of small also connects with this title, as the images of these deities are never found large, but of diminutive size, and convenient for carriage. See TERAPHIM; also PLATE, and explanation.]

MARAH, מָרָה, Μερίμᾶ, or Πικρία, bitter, or bitterness; from מָרַר marar.

I. MARAH, or Mara. When the Israelites coming out of Egypt, were arrived at the desert of Etham, they there found the water so bitter, that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink it. Exod. xv. 23. Therefore they began to murmur against Moses, saying, What shall we drink? Moses praying to the Lord, he shewed him a kind of wood, which being thrown into the water, made it potable. Vide ALVAH.

II. MARAH; Naomi, after her return from Moab, said to those who called her Naomi, which signifies handsome; call me rather Marah, or bitterness, because the Lord has overwhelmed me with affliction, Ruth i. 20.

MARALAH, מָרְעָלָה, bitterness of elevation, or of the leaf; from מָרָה marah, bitterness, and עָלָה halah, elevation, or leaf: otherwise, the holocaust of myrrh; from מוֹר mor, myrrh, and עָלָה halah, holocaust: otherwise, drunkenness, or stupidity, or consternation; from רָעַל rahal. A boundary city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 11.

[The place of concussions, i. e. a place subject to shakings by earthquakes. Salmasius on Solin, p. 82. 584. observes, that Laodicea was called Reas from *Roi*as, because of the frequent shakings it experienced from the earthquakes to which it was liable. See LAODICEA.

As there are many kinds of concussions besides those occasioned by earthquakes, possibly this place might be named from some of them:—so the shock of contending armies, the shock of blows of any kind; of a defeat, &c.: this would agree with an idea of Simon, that it imports terror to the enemies, i. e. it shocks those who wage war against it.]

MARAN-ATHA, Μαράν-ἀθά, The Lord comes, compounded of two Syriac words; maran, signifies the Lord, or master, and atha, signifies to come. מָרָן אָתָּה. A form of threatening, cursing, or anathematizing among the Jews. St. Paul pronounces Anathema Maran-atha against all who love not Jesus Christ. 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

Commentators inform us, that Maran-atha is the greatest Anathema among the Jews, and equivalent to Sham atha, or Shem-atha, the name comes, or the Lord comes: q. d. “Mayest thou be devoted to the greatest of evils, and to the utmost severity of God’s judgments; may the Lord come quickly to take vengeance of thy crimes.” But Selden and Lightfoot maintain, that Maran-atha is not found in this sense among the Rabbins. Maran-atha may be understood in an absolute sense, Let him that does not love our Lord Jesus Christ be Anathema. The Lord is come, the Messiah has appeared; evil to whosoever receives him not. The writer particularly addresses unbelieving Jews. Consult Selden de Synedriis, lib. i. cap. 8. Lightfoot, &c. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXX.

[MARBLE, a stone of a fine grain, and beautiful appearance, which takes a very brilliant polish. Marble could not be unknown to the ancients, who studied the art of architecture; but the variety of marbles is so great, that it is not easy to ascertain any one kind by its Scripture denomination. David prepared marble, i. e. a brilliant stone, in abundance, for building the temple, 1 Chron. xxix. 2. Vide EATH. i. 6.]

MAREON. So the Greeks call Samaria, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 7. Compare Josh. xii. 20. where it is called Shimron-meron, or Shomeron-maron.

MARESHAH, מָרֶשָׁה, from the head, or from the beginning; from the preposition מִן min, from, and רוֹשׁ rosh, head, or beginning: otherwise, bitter woman; from מָרָר marar, bitter, and אִשָּׁה ishah: otherwise, inheritance; from יָרַשׁ jarash, to inherit.

[A principal city. q. “Head-town.” Josephus calls it a powerful city, Ant. xiv. 27.]

MARESHAH, מָרֶשָׁתָה, Μαρίσσα, from the same root. Morasthi, Mic. i. 1.

I. MARESHA, or MARESA, son of Laadah; perhaps Laadah is called father of Maresha, because he peopled this city with his family. 1 Chron. iv. 21.

II. MARESHAH, or Marissa, a city of Judah. Also called Moresbeth and Morasthi. The prophet Micah was native of this city. In the time of Eusebius it was forsaken: it was two miles from Eleutheropolis. Near Maresha, in the vale of Zephathab, was fought a famous battle between Asa king of Judah, and Zerah king of Cush, in which Asa defeated a million of men. 1 Macc. v. 66. reads Samaria instead of Marissa. In the later times of the Jewish commonwealth, Mareshab belonged to Idumæa, as did several other southerly cities of Judah. It was peopled by the Jews, and their allies, in the time of John Hyrcanus. King Alexander Jannæus took it from the Arabians. Pompey restored it to its first inhabitants. Gabinus rebuilt it, and lastly, the Parthians destroyed it in the war of Antigonus against Herod. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. xiv.

I. MARIAMNE. Daughter of Alexander, son of king Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, daughter of Hyrcanus high-priest of the Jews, was the most beautiful princess of her age. She married Herod the Great, by whom she had two sons Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters, Salampso and Cypres; also a son called Herod, who died young, during his studies at Rome. Herod was excessively fond of Mariamne, who but slightly returned his passion. Nay, she began to hate him, after he had put to death Aristobulus her brother, to whom he had given the high-priesthood but a year before.

After the victory of Augustus over Marc Antony, Herod who had sent succours to Antony, was forced to solicit Augustus's clemency. When he left Jerusalem, he gave secret orders to Josephus and Sohemus, whom he deputed to govern in his absence, that if they should hear of any misfortune befalling him, they should put to death Mariamne, and her mother Alexandra. Mariamne having cunningly got this secret out of Sohemus, conceived an implacable hatred against Herod, who at length could no longer support her contempt; being otherwise exasperated by the ill reports continually circulated respecting her, and by the accusations of Salome, his sister, her sworn enemy: who suborned a cupbearer of the king to depose, that Mariamne had solicited him to give a potion to the king, on pretence to render her more beloved by him.

Herod believing that Mariamne could never have got his secret out of Sohemus, if there had not been other correspondence between them, caused Sohemus to be seized, and led to punishment. After this he called his friends together, and accused the queen in such bitter terms, that they easily perceived he desired her death. This therefore they voted unanimously, and Mariamne walked to her execution with such an air of grandeur and intrepidity, as astonished all who saw her. After her death Herod's affection for her became stronger than ever. Often he called her by her name, as if she were still living. He bewailed her in a manner little becoming his high station, and whatever endeavours he made to divert himself, he could never get her out of his mind. He was even compelled to relinquish the care of state affairs, and he delivered himself up so entirely to his grief, that sometimes he ordered his attendants to call Mariamne, as if she had been still living. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. Josephus mentions a tower that Herod built in Jerusalem, which he named Mariamne. It was the finest and best adorned of all. It was fifty-five cubits high, and had a square base of twenty cubits wide.

de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 6. seu ry Gr. Vide Herod.

II. MARIAMNE. Daughter of the high-priest Simon, and wife of Herod the Great: she had a son by him called Herod-Philip, who married first, the famous Herodias, who afterwards lived with Herod Antipas, who put to death John the Baptist. Mark vi. 17, Matth. xiv. 3.

MARK, Μάρκος, Polite, shining; from πρὸς.

I. MARK, the evangelist, according to Papias, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 14. Irenæus, lib. iii. cap. 1. and the greater part of both ancients and moderns, was the disciple and interpreter of St. Peter; and several ancients believe, that St. Peter speaks of him, 1 Epist. chap. v. 13. calling him his son, in the spirit; probably because he had converted him. It is thought he was of the number of the seventy disciples; some of the fathers add, that Mark was one of those who forsook our Saviour. John vi. 66. [Comp. LUKE.] But after St. Peter had recovered him to the faith, he continued steadfast in it, and went to Rome with him, where he wrote his gospel.

Some have not distinguished him from John Mark, mentioned Acts xii. 12, 25. xv. 29. and by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 11. but this notion is now almost intirely given up. That St. Mark was of the race of the priests, and wore their bonnet, is affirmed by the anonymous author of his Acts. It is also said that he was nephew to St. Peter, being a son of one of his sisters. Niceph. Callist. lib. iii. cap. 43. This apostle going to Rome about A. D. 44, Mark accompanied him thither, and there he writ his gospel, at the request of the brethren, who desired that he would give them in writing what he had learned from St. Peter by word of mouth. When that apostle was informed what his disciple had done, he commended his undertaking, and gave out his gospel to be read in the churches as an authentic work. (Clem. Alex. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 15. Epiphani. Hæres. 51. Nazian. car. 34. et Orat. 25. Hieron. de Viris illust. &c.) Tertullian, lib. iv. cont. Marcion. ascribes this gospel to St. Peter, and the author of the Synopsis imputed to Athanasius says this gospel was dictated to Mark by St. Peter. Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria asserts, that St. Peter writ it himself. Some mentioned by Chrysostom were of opinion, that Mark writ it in Egypt. Others affirm, that he writ it after St. Peter's death. Homil. i. in Matt. i. 5. These different sentiments are enough to prove, that the circumstances of time and place are uncertain, when and where St. Mark composed his gospel.

As to the language in which it was composed, some say it was Greek; others say Latin. The ancients, ancients, and most of the moderns, support the Greek, which at this day passes for the original. But some MS. Greek copies insinuate, that it was writ in Latin. The Syriac and Arabic concur in this. It should seem probable, that writing it at Rome, and for the use of Romans, he might write it in their language. Baronius and Selden have declared for this opinion, which, however, has few followers. They shew at Venice some loose sheets, which they pretend to be the original in St. Mark's own hand. If this were certain, and if the manuscript could be read, it would decide the dispute; but it is doubted whether this be St. Mark's original writing; and it is so perished by its antiquity, that scarcely a letter can be made out. Montfaucon affirms that it is writ in Latin, and that he never saw so ancient a manuscript. It is written on Egyptian paper, very thin and fine. He thinks it may fairly be attributed to the fourth century. In 1564 it was put into a vault, in marshy ground, the roof of which was lower than the neighbouring sea, so that the water perpetually trickled into it. It was legible when deposited there, in 1564. An author that had seen it before Montfaucon, believed that he had observed Greek characters in it.

Several of the moderns think, that Mark was sent by St. Peter from Rome to Aquileia, where he continued two years and a half, and founded a church; but this has no proofs from antiquity. It is thought that A. D. 49, the ninth of the emperor Claudius, the Jews being expelled from Rome, St. Peter and Mark were expelled also. St. Peter sent Mark into Egypt. He first went to Cyrene in Pentapolis, where he made many converts. Thence he went to Alexandria, where he converted Anianus, whom he ordained first bishop of that city. The number of Christians there increased, and they lived in so exemplary a manner, that in the judgment of several, Philo the Jew, was willing to give the honour of it to his own nation, by describing the manner of life of these primitive Christians, under the name of Therapeutes. See THERAPEUTES, or ESSENES. Vide also ANIANUS.

The number of Christians augmenting, the pagans opposed Mark, as one come to overthrow the worship of their gods. He returned to Cyrene; but after two years he revisited Alexandria, where he beheld with joy, that the faithful were increased both in grace and number; and then he departed. Probably he went to Rome, if it be true, as the Chronicon Alexandrinum affirms, that he was present there at the death of St. Peter and St. Paul, A. D. 66. He returned to Alexandria, where the pagans, provoked by the great number of his miracles, and by the reproaches of the Christians, sought him to put him to death. They found him celebrating the holy communion, on the Lord's Day, April 24, A. D. 68. They put a rope about his neck, and drew him along the whole day, saying, they must lead this ox to Bucolos, a place near the sea, full of rocks and precipices. At evening they put him into prison, where in the night he had two visions. One of an angel, assuring him that his name was written in the book of life; and another of our Saviour, to give him peace and tranquillity of mind. The day following, the infidels again dragged him through the streets till he gave up his soul to God. Several have said, that he ended his life by fire; probably they burnt his body after death. Eutych. Alex. in Chronic. Hyppolyt. in MS. Bodlei. & Anonym. apud Mill. in cap. Evang. secundum Marco.

Several ancient heretics, as Irenæus reports, received only the gospel of St. Mark. Among the catholics some rejected the last twelve verses of this gospel, Now when Jesus was risen early, &c. Probably, because they imagined that in one place St. Mark opposed St. Matthew, and related circumstances contrary to the other evangelists. The ancient fathers, the old oriental versions, and almost all the old copies, whether printed or manuscript, Greek or Latin, read these last twelve verses, and acknowledge them as genuine.

So far as may be judged by comparing the gospels of Mark and Matthew, the first is an abridgment of the second. Mark often uses the same terms, relates the same facts, and notices the same circumstances. He sometimes adds particulars, which give great light to St. Matthew's text. There are also two or three miracles in Mark, which are not in Matthew. See Mark i. 23, and chap. i. v. ix. xvi. What is most remarkable is, that though he follows Matthew in almost every thing else, yet he forsakes him in the order of his narration, from chap. iv. 12. to chap. xiv. 18. of Matthew. In these places he pursues the order of time as noted by Luke and John. This has induced chronologers to follow Luke, Mark, and John, rather than Matthew. He begins his gospel with the preaching of John the Baptist, and omits several parables related by St. Matthew, chap. xx. xxi. and xxv. also several discourses of our Saviour to his disciples, and to the Pharisees, chap. v. vi. vii. xvi. xviii.

[Though it may be admitted that Mark accompanied Peter at Rome, yet it will by no means follow that he wrote his gospel under the dictation of Peter. If he were son to that Mary, Acts xii. 12, who resided at Jerusalem, and whose whose house was the resort of the faithful, Mark must have known many things which passed at Jerusalem, as well as Peter, himself. He must also have been sufficiently versed in the Syriac language, and able to make use of whatever materials for true history were in circulation, which, probably, were many, though incomplete. Some also, he would receive, with corrections of others, from Peter. It appears from his history that Mark was very much engaged in journeying; sometimes with or for Barnabas, at other times, with or for Paul; and Peter also. It is probable, that he composed his gospel at intervals of such journies, as Luke did; and he is no more an epitomizer of Matthew than Luke is, with whom he agrees in many particulars.

We may be allowed to doubt whether Mark were sufficiently familiar with the Latin tongue to be able to compose a work in it; and, if such an original ever existed, it is hardly possible that it should have been totally lost at Rome.

As to the Latin MS. at Venice, its history has been traced, and it proves to be part of a copy of which the remainder was at Aquileia in the time of Charles IV. and lately in Friuli, and has been published by Blanchini; who has given a plate of the letters of the MS. which shews the cause of Misson's error in supposing it to be Greek. The reported autograph of St. Mark, proves, therefore, to be only a part of a Latin translation.

To the history of St. Mark the evangelist, and of the copy of his gospel said to be preserved at Venice, may be added the account given by the Venetians of the theft of his body from Alexandria in Egypt, A. D. 829, by Buono and Rustico, who brought it away in a trading vessel. The Doge Giustiniano placed it in the chapel of his palace: the saint was declared protector of Venice; and churches were built to his honour. But after a while his body was lost, till after 265 years it was discovered again by a miracle, concealed in a pillar. After so long an interval, it wanted indeed a miracle to ascertain the identity of this body, together with some little explanation of its reasons for chusing such a place of repose, and by what means it accomplished its purpose.]

1. For the MARKS borne in his body by St. Paul, vide No. CVII. 2. For the mark set on the forehead, Ezek. ix. 4. It may not be amiss to hint, that some of the fathers understood this mark as having been made in the form of a Greek tau T, or cross; whence they referred it to the cross of Jesus, as a means of security and salvation: this allusion holds only in the Greek, for the Hebrew letter τ tau, has not that form.

The MARK, or goal, where the prizes were displayed, and distributed to competitors in the public games, (Olympic, &c.) alluded to Phil. iii. 14. may easily be understood by the bounds of the course, and the place where prizes are distributed, at our own races, &c.]

[MARKET. The Market or Forum, in the cities of antiquity, was different from the market in our English towns, where flesh meat, &c. is usually sold. When we read, Acts xvii. 17. of the apostle Paul disputing with philosophers in the "market" at Athens, we are tempted to wonder what kind of philosophers these market-folks could be; or why these disputants could not engage in a place fitter for investigation, and discussion, of abstruse and difficult subjects. So when Paul and Silas having expelled the Pythonic spirit, Acts xvi. 19, were haled to the market-place, and accused, we are not aware of the fitness of a market for the residence of a tribunal of justice. But those conversant with the manners of antiquity know, that the forum usually was a public market, on one side only, or during one part of the day only; and that temples, theatres, courts of justice, and other public buildings, occupied the other sides of the area. In short, the forums were sumptuous squares, surrounded by decorations, &c. of various, and often of magnificent kinds. Here the philosophers met, here they taught, here laws were promulgated, and here devotions, as well as amusements, occupied the populace.

The nearest approach to the composition of an ancient forum, that I recollect in England, is Covent-garden market; where we have a market in the middle, a church at one end, a theatre at one corner, and sitting magistrates close adjacent: under the piazzas, too, supposing them to be the resort of philosophers, much philosophic discussion might take place, and many an intricate subject might be examined. In our climate, such a shelter from the cold, or rain, would hardly be thought sufficient, but in the East, such a shelter would be sought from the heat, and the cool shade, or the covered settle, would be the place chosen, no less than the sequestered groves of Academus, at Athens. In short, if we add such a school, or any other, for philosophical instruction, or divinity lectures, we have pretty nearly the composition of an ancient forum, or market-place. This removes entirely the seeming incongruity between discourses and disputations on the principles of Theology and Christianity, Christianity, and those commercial avocations which we usually assign to a market-place.

On the same principle, when the Pharisees desired salutations in the market-places, Mark xii. 38, it was not (merely) from the country people who brought their productions for sale, but, as they loved to be admired by religious people at the temple, the synagogues, &c. so they desired salutations from persons of consequence, judges, magistrates, dignitaries, &c. in the forum, in order to display their importance to the people, to maintain their influence, &c. &c.]

MARRIAGE, Wedding, and Nuptial festivity. The Hebrews commonly used the word mishkeh, מִשְׁכָּה, nuptia, convivium, (Gr. Γάμος) which comes from the verb shathah, to drink, to signify a feast in general, and a marriage-feast, or a marriage, in particular. The Greeks used gamos in the same sense, for a marriage, a wedding, and the feasting that usually accompanies it. Sometimes this word seems to be put for a feast in general. See Luke xii. 36. xiv. 13.

Marriage is among the Hebrews a matter of strict obligation. They understand literally, and as a precept, those words addressed to our first parents, Gen. i. 28. "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." They believe that he who does not marry his children deprives God of the glory due to him, becomes in some sort a homicide, destroys the image of the first man, and is a reason why the Holy Ghost withdraws himself from Israel. This question is moved in the Talmud. Who is he that prostitutes his daughter? It is answered, The father that keeps her too long in his house, or that marries her to an old man. [Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 36.] The age at which wedlock becomes an obligation is at twenty years. But generally the Jews marry their children sooner. However, if a father marry his daughter before the age of puberty, which is at twelve years and an half, she may be separated from her husband for any slight disgust.

In the first ages, marriages between brothers and sisters were necessary, because of the small number of persons then in the world. After mankind was become numerous, they were unlawful, and were prohibited under great penalties. However, the patriarchs long espoused their near relations, even after the world was greatly peopled, intending to avoid alliance with families corrupted by the worship of false gods; or, to preserve in their own families the worship of the true God, and the maintenance of the true religion, of which they were the depositories. For this reason Abraham married his sister, or niece, Sarah; and also sent his steward Eliezer, to fetch a wife for his son Isaac, from among the daughters of his nephews; and Jacob espoused the daughters of his uncle. Vide ABRAHAM III.

The Hebrews generally married young. Whoever is not married at 18 or 20, say the Rabbins, offends against the commandment given by God to increase and multiply. They may anticipate this age, but not exceed it. After thirteen years they may marry; and they think a man cannot live in celibacy without sin, or at least without great danger of sin. The virgins are contracted very early; but are not married till after twelve years complete; whence come these expressions, the spouse of one's youth, Prov. ii. 17. or, one espoused in early life; also the guide of one's youth, expressing a husband married young.

From these principles it is easy to account why celibacy and barrenness was a reproach in Israel; and why the daughter of Jephthah went to bewail her virginity, Judges xi. 37. i. e. because she was to die unmarried, and childless. Hence proceeds their exactness, in causing the brother of a husband who died without issue, to marry the widow; and the disgrace that attended him who should refuse this duty. Gen. xxxviii. 11. Ruth iv. 5. Also, hence those threatenings of the Lord by Isaiah iv. 1. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach:" that we may have it to say—such an one is our husband; and that we may no longer be regarded with contempt. See also Jeremiah, xxxi. 22. "A woman shall compass a man," or women shall solicit men to become their husbands. [Certainly, this is not the sense of that passage: it more probably imports 'a feeble woman shall repel a powerful man, a hero.'] And Cant. viii. 1. "I should not be despised," or I should be delivered from the disgrace of living single. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCXLIV.

Maids before their marriage seldom appeared in public. They were called alma, virgin, secret, shut up. Often they were sought in marriage, without having seen the persons who desired them. [Comp. ALMAH, Add.] Jesus son of Sirach says, Ecclus. xlii. 2. "The father waketh for a daughter when no man knoweth, and care for her taketh away sleep; when she is young, lest she pass away the flower of her age; and being married, lest she should be hated." See also St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 36. "If any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age," &c. It

It is a kind of shame to a father, if he does not marry his daughter in due time.

One may see the manner in which a daughter was demanded in marriage, in the instance of Hamor, the father of Shechem, and by Shechem himself, when they demanded Dinah of Jacob. Gen. xxxiv. 8, 9, &c. "The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter; I pray you give her him to wife. Let me find grace in your eyes; and what ye shall say unto me I will give. Ask me never so much dowry, and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me; but give me the damsel to wife." See also Gen. xxiv. 38. the manner in which Eliezer demands Rebekah for Isaac; and, Tobit vii. 10, 11. the demand that Tobias made of Sarah the daughter of Raguel. And lastly, Cant. viii. 8. "What shall we do for our sister in the day when she shall be spoken for?" In that day when her family shall be solicited to allow her marriage.

The husband gave a dowry to his wife; it was a kind of purchase made by the man, of the person whom he desired to marry. Before the contract, they agreed on what portion the woman should give his bride, and what presents to her father and brethren. Jacob served seven years for Leah, and seven additional years for Rachel; Gen. xxix. and the sisters complain some years after, that their father Laban had applied their portions to his own use. Gen. xxxi. 15. Saul did not give his daughter Michal to David, till after he had received one hundred foreskins of the Philistines. When it was insinuated to David, that he might be the king's son-in-law, he answered, that he was not rich enough to offer a proper dowry. But it was told him, the king required no dowry, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, 1 Sam. xviii. 25. However the Rabbins assure us, that the father was used to give his daughter certain presents for clothes, and other necessities. This was fixed at fifty Zuzim, which was a piece of money of one fourth part of a shekel. Selden, Uxor. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 10. See DOWRY.

The betrothing was performed, either by a writing, or by a piece of silver given to the bride, or by cohabitation and consummation. This is the form of the writing: On such a day, of such a month, in such a year, N. the son of N. has said to N. the daughter of N. be thou my spouse according to the law of Moses and the Israelites, and I will give thee for the portion of thy virginity the sum of two hundred Zuzim, as is ordained by the law. And the said N. has consented to become his spouse on these conditions, which the said N. has promised to perform on the day of marriage. To this the said N. obliges himself, and for this he engages all his goods, even as far as the cloak that he wears upon his shoulder. Moreover, he promises to perform all that is generally intended in contracts of marriage, in favour of the Israelitish women. Witnesses N. N. N.

The promise by a piece of silver, and without writing, was made before witnesses, when the young man said to his mistress; Receive this piece of silver as a pledge that you shall become my spouse. Lastly, the engagement by cohabitation, according to the Rabbins, was allowed by the law, Dent. xxiv. 1. but it had been wisely forbid by the ancients, because of the abuses that might happen, and to prevent clandestine marriages. After the marriage was contracted, the young people had the liberty of seeing each other, which was not allowed them before. If during this time the bride should trespass against that fidelity she owed her bridegroom, she was treated as an adulteress. Selden, Uxor Heb. lib. ii. cap. 1. Thus the Holy Virgin, after she was betrothed to Joseph, having conceived our Saviour Jesus Christ, might have been punished as an adulteress, if the angel of the Lord had not satisfied Joseph. The Jewish doctors teach, that if those who are betrothed should make an ill use of their liberty of seeing each other, they are condemned to the punishment of the whip. Often between the time of being espoused and the marriage, there passed a considerable interval; whether because of the under-age of the persons espoused, or for other reasons of necessity or decency.

When the parties were agreed on the terms of marriage, and the time was fit for completing it, they drew up the contract.

FORM of the CONTRACT of MARRIAGE among the HEBREWS.

On such a day of such a month, in such a year, and upon the banks of such a river, [for they commonly married in the open air, and by the side of some river], N. son of N. said to N. daughter of N. be thou my wife according to the rites of Moses and the Israelites. And with the help of God I will honour thee, maintain thee, clothe thee, and feed thee, according to the custom of other husbands of our nation; who honour maintain, clothe, and feed their wives, as they ought to do. I give thee for a portion, and for the price of thy virginity, two hundred Zuzim of silver. [These two hundred Zuzim make about fifty shekels of silver,] which are due to thee according to the law. Besides which, I engage myself to provide thee with clothes, and convenient food, as also to discharge that conjugal duty which is due to thee, according to the custom of all nations.

And

And the said N. has consented to become his spouse. Moreover, the said bridegroom has promised by way of augmentation of dowry, that besides the principal sum, he will give —. And what the said bride has brought with her is estimated at the value of —, which the said bridegroom acknowledges to have received and to charge himself with, and has made us the declaration following. "I accept and receive under my care and keeping all that is above-mentioned, as well for dowry, as on any other account; and oblige myself and my heirs, under the security of all my goods, whether moveable or not, present or to come, even to the cloak that I wear upon my shoulders, to give a true and faithful account to my said spouse, of all that she has brought me as a dowry, or on any other account, during my life, or at my death. All which I promise to put in execution, according to the form and tenor of the usual contracts of marriage, in use among the children of Israel, and according to the rules of our Rabbins of pious memory. In testimony of which we have signed these presents," &c.

Leo of Modena says, that the Jews marry on a Wednesday or Friday, if the spouse be a maid, on a Thursday if she be a widow. The evening before the solemnity, several women lead the bride to the bath, with music. There is some disagreement between Selden, Buxtorf, and Leo of Modena, on the subject of marriage-ceremonies; which shews that customs vary according to places and persons. The bride is adorned with every thing rich and splendid, and is led into the open air, either on the banks of a river, into a court, or a garden. Sometimes this is performed in a hall, prepared on purpose. The bridegroom and bride are placed under a canopy, each covered with a black veil. On their heads is put another square veil, having four tufts hanging at the four corners. This veil the Hebrews call Taled.

Then the Rabbin of the place, or the chanter of the synagogue, or the nearest relation of the husband, takes a cup of wine, and having pronounced this benediction, Blessed be thou, O Lord, who hast created man and woman, and ordained marriage, &c. he presents the cup to the bridegroom, and then to the bride, who taste it. Afterwards, the bridegroom puts a ring on the finger of his bride, in presence of two witnesses, saying, By this ring thou art my spouse, according to the custom of Moses and the children of Israel. Buxtorf says, that this ring ought to be of plain gold; and that the bridegroom takes the company to witness, that it is good gold, and of a due value. After this they read the contract of marriage, which the bridegroom delivers to the bride's relations. Then they bring wine again in some brittle vessel, [a wine-glass] they rehearse six blessings, they make the married couple drink, [to each other] and they throw the rest on the ground in token of cheerfulness. The bridegroom [or priest] takes the vessel, and throws it with violence against the ground, or against the wall, and breaks it in pieces, in memory, they say, of the destruction of the temple. [Or, perhaps, imprecating a similar destruction on whoever disturbs the harmony of this married pair.]

The Rabbins inform us, that before the temple of Jerusalem was laid in ruins, the bridegroom and bride wore crowns, on their marriage; but not since that time. In Scripture we see the crown of the bridegroom, but not that of the bride: and indeed, the head dress of the women was by no means convenient for wearing a crown. Comp. Isaiah lxi. 10. Vulg. Quasi sponsum decoratum coronâ. Cant. iii. 11. "Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart." [I understand that in token of the captive state of the Jews, the Jewish brides have much of their hair cut off: which is a very painful ceremony to the young women.] The modern Jews in some places throw handfuls of wheat on the newly married couple, particularly on the bride, saying, Increase and multiply. In other places they mingle pieces of money with the wheat, which are gathered up by the poor.

We see by the gospel, that the bridegroom had a Paranympus, or brideman, called by our Saviour the Friend of the Bridegroom, John iii. 29. A number of young people kept him company during the days of the wedding, to do him honour; as also young women kept company with the bride all this time. The companions of the bridegroom are expressly mentioned in the history of Samson, Judg. xiv. and Canticles, v. 1. viii. 13. also the companions of the bride, Cant. i. 4. ii. 7. iii. 5. viii. 4. Psalm xlv. 9, 14, 15. The office of the brideman was to perform the ceremonies of the wedding instead of the bridegroom, and to obey his orders. Some think that the Architriclinus or governor of the feast, at the marriage in Cana, was the brideman, Paranympus, or friend of the bridegroom, who presided at the feast, and had the care of providing for the guests, John ii. 9. The friends and companions of the bride sang the Epithalamium, or wedding-song, at the door of the bride the evening before the wedding. Psalm xlv. is an Epithalamium intitled, A song of rejoicing of the Well-beloved. The ceremony of the wedding was performed with great decency, the young people of each sex being separate, in distinct apartments, and at different tables. The reservedness of the Eastern people towards their women required this. We see proofs of this in the marriage of Samson, in that of Esther, and in the Canticles. The young men diverted themselves sometimes in proposing riddles, and the bridegroom appointed the prize to those who could explain them, Judg. xiv. 14. The story of Samson is well known, and his riddle.

The wedding ceremonies commonly held seven days for a maid, and three days for a widow. So Laban says to Jacob respecting Leah, —“fulfil her week.” Gen. xxix. 27. The ceremonies of Samson’s wedding continued also seven whole days, Judg. xiv. 17. 18. as also that of Tobias, Tob. xi. 19. The Rabbins acquaint us that the term of seven days was of indispensable obligation to all married men; and that they were to allow seven days for the marriage of every wife they took, though they should marry several the same day. In this case they made so many wedding weeks successively as they married wives. These seven days of rejoicing were commonly spent in the house of the woman’s father, after which they conducted the bride to her husband’s home.

This part of the ceremony was generally performed with great pomp, according to the circumstances of the married couple; and for this they often chose the night. Hence, in the parable of the ten Virgins that went to meet the bride and bridegroom, Matt. xxv. it is said the virgins were asleep; and at midnight being awaked at the cry of the bridegroom’s coming, the foolish virgins found they had no oil to supply their lamps; which while they went to buy, the bridegroom and his attendants passed by. [See LAMPS; WEDDING PROCESSION: PLATES.] We read 1 Macc. ix. 37. that the children of Jambri having made a magnificent wedding at Medaba or Nadabatha, a city beyond Jordan, as they were bringing the bride with great solemnity to the dwelling of the bridegroom, and as the relations and friends of the husband went before her with instruments of music and with arms, the Maccabees fell upon, and dispersed them.

In the ceremonies of marriage, the Hebrews pretend, that they chiefly imitate Tobias’s wedding, which they justly look on as a model of a regular and happy marriage. However, the ceremonies we have described are different enough from what were then practised. First, Raguel consents that Tobias shall have his daughter, and at the same time puts Tobias’s hands into those of his daughter Sarah, and gives them his blessing. This is the essential ceremony of the marriage. After this, Raguel calls for paper, writes the contract, and has it signed by witnesses. Then the feast begins, which is kept a whole fortnight; though according to the rules of the Rabbins, they ought to have held it but three days, because Sarah was the widow of several husbands, Tob. x. 7.

When the married couple and their relations are come into the house, they sit down at table, and the bridegroom begins to sing, as musically as he can, a long blessing in Hebrew, says Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. cap. 28. After supper the most honourable person in the company takes the bridegroom by the hand, and the rest all round, and they begin to dance together. The women likewise do the same, but separately from the men. This dancing is a very ancient tradition among them; they call it the dance of the commandment, pretending that God himself commanded it, in the ceremony of marriage.

The leading the bride into the marriage chamber, is, in the opinion of the Rabbins, what completes the marriage. The woman is then a complete bride, as soon as she is entered into this chamber, even though the marriage has not been consummated: as it happens when the woman is under the inconveniences attending her sex. Before the leading of the bride into the marriage chamber, they rehearse this blessing, in the presence of ten persons of age sufficient, and free. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, king of the world, who hast created all things for thy glory. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, creator of man. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, who hast created man in thy own image and likeness, and hast provided him a companion for ever. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, creator of man. She that was barren shall rejoice in gathering her children into her bosom. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, who makest Sion rejoice in the multitude of her children. Replenish with joy these two spouses, as thou didst replenish man and woman in the garden of Eden. Be thou blessed O Lord our God, who heapest pleasure upon the bridegroom and the bride, and hast prepared for them joy, songs, gladness, dancing, love, friendship, peace, and brotherly kindness. Grant, O Lord, as soon as may be, that in the cities of Judah and in the places of Jerusalem may be heard songs of joy, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the voice of the mutual love of spouses, and the voice of singing children. Be thou blessed, O Lord our God, who replenishest with joy the bridegroom and the bride.

As

As to Marriage among Christians, Christ has restored it to its first perfection, by banishing polygamy, and forbidding divorce, except in the case of adultery, Matt. v. 32. nor leaving to the parties so separated, the liberty of marrying again, Luke xvi. 18. And this is very different from what the law allowed. Our Saviour blessed and sanctified marriage by being present himself at the wedding at Cana, John ii. 1, 2. St. Paul declares the excellence of Christian marriage, when he says, Eph. v. 32. "Let every one of you so love his wife, even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband." And a little above, "So ought men to love their wives, as their own bodies; he that loveth his wife, loveth himself. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church." The union of husband and wife represents the sacred and spiritual marriage of Christ with his church. The same apostle assures us, Heb. xiii. 4. that "marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." The New Testament prescribes no particular ceremony for solemnizing of matrimony; but it is certain that in the church a blessing has always been given to the married couple. We see by Tertullian, de Veland. Virg. cap. 11. that they put a veil over the married couple, and that in imitation of Tobias and Sarah, they gave each other their hands. St. Ambrose says, that marriage ought to be sanctified by the veil, and by the blessing of the priest. Ignatius, ad Polyc. c. 5. would have marriage contracted by consent of the bishop, that it may be according to God, and not according to the flesh. The ceremony of espousals is very ancient, as may be seen by several councils, Concil. Ancy. Can. xi. xxiv. Carthag iv. citat. iii. pars cap. xxvii. q. ii. cap. 45, 50, 51. and by St. Austin; Institutum est ut jam pactæ sponsæ non tradantur statim ne vilem habeat maritus datam, quam non suspiravit sponsus dilatum. Aug. lib. viii. Confes. cap. 3. Heretofore in several churches the married couple communicated the day of their marriage, and abstained that night from the marriage-bed. This practice is still in use in some places, as I am informed.

[MARS' HILL. Our translators have entirely spoiled the narration of the historian, Acts xvii. 19, 22. by rendering "they took Paul, and brought him unto Areopagus . . . then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill." Now as Mars' hill is the name Areopagus translated, and as both Areopagus and Mars' hill signify the same place, no doubt but the same name ought to have been preserved in both verses; in which case, the information would have stood thus:—"They took Paul, and brought him before the court of the Areopagites, or the court which sat on Areopagus . . . and Paul stood in the midst before the court of the Areopagites, and said, "Ye chief men of Athens," &c. Vide AREOPAGUS. The propriety of the apostle's discourse is greatly illustrated by considering the important, the senatorial, and even the learned, character of his auditors.]

MARSENA, מרסנא, bitterness, or myrrh of the bush; from מרר marar, and מר mur, and סנה senah, bush: otherwise, that shows the bush, or the enemy. One of the seven principal officers of king Ahasuerus, Esther i. 14.

MARTHA, Μάρθα, who becomes bitter; from מרר marar: Syriac, mistress, or who teaches.

MARTHA, sister of Lazarus and Mary, and mistress of the house where our Saviour was entertained, in the village of Bethany. Vide LAZARUS and MARY. Martha is always named before Mary, probably because she was the elder sister. Once, when our Saviour visited them, Martha was very busy in preparing supper, while Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, hearing his doctrine with great attention, Luke x. 38, 42. Martha complained to our Saviour, desiring him to bid Mary rise and assist her. But Jesus made answer, "Martha, Martha, you are very busy and in much trouble to provide indifferent or unnecessary things; there is but one thing necessary, and Mary has chosen the better part, which shall not be taken from her."

Some time after Lazarus falling sick, the two sisters sent word of it to Jesus, then beyond Jordan; but he departed not from thence till he knew Lazarus was dead. Being come almost to Bethany, Martha went out to meet him; expostulated with him on his delay; and professed her faith in him. Jesus bid them bring him to Lazarus's; tomb where he raised that beloved youth from the dead. John xi. 20, &c.

Six days before his passion, Jesus being come to Bethany against the feast of the passover, at Jerusalem, was invited to eat by a Pharisee called Simon the leper, John xii. Martha waited, Lazarus was a guest, and Mary poured a box of precious perfume on the head and feet of Jesus, Matt. xxvi. 6, &c. This is all that Scripture informs us of Martha. The ancient Latins and the modern Greeks maintain, that she died at Jerusalem, as also Mary and Lazarus, and that they were all buried there. Several ancient martyrologies put their feast January 6; others December 17. The Latins now place it July 29.

[MARTYR, properly denotes a witness: in ecclesiastical history—a witness, by the shedding of his blood, in testifying the truth; and thus a martyr is distinguished from confessors, properly so called, who underwent great afflictions for their confession of the truth, yet without suffering death; which confession every Christian is bound to make, out of regard to the truth, Matt. x. 32, 33. The term martyr occurs only thrice in the New Testament, Acts xxii. 20. Rom. ii. 13. xvii. 6.]

I. MARY, the mother of Jesus, and a Virgin at the same time, daughter of Joachim and Anna, of the tribe of Judah, married to Joseph, of the same tribe. Scripture mentions nothing of her parents, not even their names, unless Heli, Luke iii. 23. be the same as Joachim. All that is said concerning the birth of Mary, and her parents, is only found in apocryphal writings: which however, are ancient. Vide JOACHIM. Mary was of the royal race of David, as was Joseph her husband; she was also cousin to Elizabeth, wife of Zechariah the priest, Luke i. 5, 36.

Mary very early made a vow of chastity, and engaged herself to perpetual virginity, say the apocryphal gospels, which tell us, she was consecrated to the Lord, and offered in the temple, from her earliest youth, and that the priests gave her Joseph for a spouse, who was a holy and venerable old man, whom providence appointed for this purpose by a miracle; the rod which he commonly carried having become green and flowered, as Aaron's did formerly. He espoused Mary, not to live with her as a wife, but to be the guardian of her virginity. See the Gospel of the Birth of the Virgin, and the Protevangelium. Though these circumstances are evidently fictitious, yet Mary's virginity is attested by the gospel; Luke i. 34. For which reason, when Joseph perceived her pregnancy, he was extremely surprised and scandalized at it, and resolved to put her away.

The Greek text, Matth. i. 18. imports that Mary was espoused, (as well as the Latin, cum esset desponsata Mater Jesu Maria Joseph.) Μνηστεύθεισος γὰρ τῆς Μαρίας ἀντὶς Μαρίας τῇ Ἰωσήφ, and it is so taken by Origen, in divers. Evang. locis Homil. ii. St. Hilary, in Matt. i. 18. St. Jerom on Matt. i. 16, 18, 20. St. Basil de human. Christi gener. p. 507. St. Epiphanius. Hæres. 78. St. Chrysostom, Homil. iv. in Matt. v. 20. St. Bernard on missus est. Homil. ii. N. 12, and many others. I say, in this sense they understand it of a true marriage, and hold that Mary had actually married Joseph. Among the Hebrews espousals were understood to be as firm as marriage is among us. The man had the same power over his spouse, as if she were his wife. To complete the marriage no more was wanting than a few formalities, and to take the bride home to her husband. The faults she committed against her honour were punished as adultery. See MARRIAGE.

The Virgin Mary being espoused to Joseph, the angel Gabriel appeared to her, to acquaint her, that she should be the mother of the Messiah, Luke i. 26, 27, &c. Mary asked him how this could be, since she knew no man? The angel replied, that "the Holy Ghost should come upon her, and the power of the Highest should overshadow her. To confirm his message, and to shew that nothing is impossible to God, he added, that her cousin Elizabeth, who was both old and barren, was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy. Mary answered, "Behold the hand-maid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word." She set out for Hebron, to visit her cousin Elizabeth. As soon as Elizabeth heard the voice of Mary, her child, (John the Baptist) leaped in her womb; she was filled with the Holy Ghost, and cried out, "Blessed art thou among women," &c. Mary filled with acknowledgment and supernatural light, praised God, saying, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour," &c. Mary continued with Elizabeth about three months, and then returned to her own house.

When Mary was ready to lie in, an edict of Cæsar Augustus decreed, that all subjects of the empire should go to their own cities, to register their names, according to their families. Joseph and Mary, who were both of the lineage of David, went to Bethlehem, whence sprung their family. But while they were here, the time being fulfilled in which Mary was to be delivered, she brought forth her first-born son. She wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in the manger of the stable or cavern whither they had retired; as they could find no place in the public inn, because of the great concourse of people at Bethlehem, on this occasion. Or, they were forced to withdraw into the stable of the inn, not being able to get a more convenient apartment. Vide MANGER. It is commonly believed, that Jesus was born the night after their arrival at Bethlehem, December 25. Such is the ancient tradition of the church. [It seems contrary to Luke ii. 6.] See FRAGMENTS, No. XXIII. CCLXI.

Angels made this event known to shepherds, who were in the fields near Bethlehem, and who came in the night to see Mary and Joseph, and the child in the manger, and to pay him their adoration. Mary took notice of all these things, and and laid them up in her heart. Luke ii. 19. A few days after the Magi or wise-men came from the east, and brought to Jesus the mysterious presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh; Matt. ii. 8, 9, 10, 11, &c. The time of Mary's purification being come, i. e. forty days after the birth of Jesus, Mary went to Jerusalem, to present her son in the temple, and there to offer the sacrifice appointed by the law, for the purification of women after child-birth. Luke. ii. 21. There was then at Jerusalem an old man named Simeon, full of the Holy Ghost, who had received a secret assurance that he should not die, before he had seen Christ the Lord. He came at that moment into the temple by the influence of the Spirit, and taking the little Jesus in his arms, he blessed the Lord, &c. Luke ii. 25—35.

Afterwards, when Joseph and Mary were about to return to their own country, Nazareth, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, bidding him retire into Egypt with Mary and the child, because Herod designed to destroy Jesus. Matth. ii. 13, 14. Joseph obeyed the admonition, and continued in Egypt till after the death of Herod. Tradition says, that Joseph and the Virgin abode at Hermopolis; and between Cairo and Heliopolis is shewn a fountain and a garden of balm plants, in a place called Matarea, where they say the Holy Virgin stopped and washed her son's linen. This place is held in great veneration. Afterwards, Joseph and Mary returned to Nazareth.

Mary and Joseph went yearly to Jerusalem to the passover; and when Jesus was twelve years of age, they took him with them. On their return, the child Jesus continued at Jerusalem, without their perceiving it; and thinking he might be with some of the company, they went on a day's journey. Then, not finding him among their acquaintance, they returned to Jerusalem to seek him; and on the third day they found him in the temple, sitting among the doctors, hearing them, and asking them questions. Mary said to him, 'Son why have you served us thus? Your father and myself, have sought you in much affliction.' Jesus answered them, "Why did you seek me? Did not you know that I must be employed about my father's business?" Luke ii. 49. (Ὅτι ἐν τοῖς τῷ πατρὶ μὲ δεῖ εἶναι με; I must be in the house of my father; or, I must be employed in the affairs [purposes?] of my father.) He returned with them to Nazareth; and lived in filial submission to them. But his mother laid up all these things in her heart. The gospel speaks nothing more of the Virgin Mary, till the marriage at Cana of Galilee.

In the thirty-third year of Christ, A. D. 30,

Jesus resolving to manifest himself to the world, went to the baptism of John, from thence into the wilderness, then to the wedding at Cana of Galilee, where he had been invited with his mother and his disciples. John ii. 1, 2, 8, &c.

The wine beginning to fail, Mary said to Jesus, "they have no wine;" to which Jesus answered; "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." St. Chrysostom, and those who have been used to follow his explications, believe that on this occasion the Holy Virgin's vanity, was tempted with a desire of seeing her own credit raised by a miracle of her son. And this made our Saviour give her this answer, which seems indeed something harsh. But, other fathers and commentators impute what was said by the Holy Virgin, to her friendship; and the answer of our Saviour they impute, not to Jesus as man, but as the Messiah: q. d. I know when I ought to shew forth my power; nor does it belong to you to appoint me the time of working miracles." Nevertheless, on this occasion, Jesus turned six pitchers of water into wine.

After this Jesus went to Capernaum with his mother and his brethren, i. e. his parents and his disciples; and this seems to be the place where the Holy Virgin afterwards chiefly resided. Epiphanius thinks, that she followed Jesus every where, during his preaching; but we do not find that the evangelists mention her, when they speak of the holy women who followed him.

One day, as Jesus Christ was in a house at Capernaum, there was so great a crowd about him, that neither he nor his disciples had time to eat. This caused a report that he had fainted away. (The words ἔλεγον γὰρ ὅτι ἐξίστην. Mark iii. 21, [See JESUS CHRIST,] might insinuate, that he was become mad, or had lost his understanding. And the Vulgate reads, Dicebant enim quoniam in furorem versus est. The mother of Jesus and his brethren wished to take him out of the crowd. It was not they, certainly, who made so wrong a judgment of Jesus, but the ignorant people, or the Pharisees, who had said, he was possessed by a devil.) The Virgin, the brethren, (or kindred) of Jesus came to see what had occasioned this report. Jesus being informed of their arrival, looking on those around him, said; "whoever does the will of God, he is my mother, my sister, and my brother."

The Virgin was at Jerusalem, at the last passover our Saviour celebrated there: she followed him to Calvary: she staid at the foot of his cross, with admirable constancy and courage. Jesus seeing his mother, and his beloved disciple disciple near, he said to his mother, "Woman, behold thy son;" and to the disciple, "Behold thy mother." And from that hour the disciple took her home to his own house. It is not to be doubted that our Saviour appeared to his Holy Mother immediately after his resurrection, and that she was among the first, to whom he vouchsafed that consolation. She was with the apostles at his ascension, and continued with them at Jerusalem, waiting the descent of the Holy Ghost. After this time she dwelt with John the evangelist, who took care of her as of his own mother, Epiphan. Hæres. 78, cap. 10, 11. Nazian. Tragæd. p. 281. Cyril. Alex. in Johan. lib. xii. p. 1065. It is thought he took her with him to Ephesus, where she died in an extreme old age. Andr. Cretens. Hom. ix. p. 122.—There is a letter of the Œcumenical Council of Ephesus, importing, that in the fifth century it was believed she was buried there. Concil. Ephes. Homil. iii. Concil. Lab. p. 574, a.

Yet this opinion was not so universal, but what authors of the same age, think the Virgin Mary died and was buried at Jerusalem. The emperor Marcian and Pulcheria being anxious to translate the body of the Holy Virgin to the church called Blachernus at Constantinople, applied to Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, who told them her sepulchre was at Gethsemane, near Jerusalem; which sepulchre Marcian ordered to be transported to Constantinople. Johan. Diac. de Assumpt. B. M. Serm. ii. p. 394. Nicephor. lib. ii. cap. 23. lib. xv. cap. 14.—It is added, that the figure of the body of the Virgin was engraved on the stone; but not by human hands. From that time to this day, they have continued to shew the Virgin's tomb at Gethsemane, in a church dedicated to her name.

Some have believed that the Holy Virgin finished her life by martyrdom, from those words of old Simeon, A sword shall pierce through thy own soul also, Luke ii. 35. But this is generally referred to her affliction, at beholding her son's crucifixion: no history mentions her martyrdom. Epiphanius declares, that he could not affirm whether she died, or continued immortal, whether she were buried or not. Hæres. 78. cap. 11. 23. In a word, that no one knew what was her end. The sentiments of the church, at this day, are, that she is dead; but they are divided as to her rising again, or whether she awaits the general resurrection, at Ephesus, or at Jerusalem, or elsewhere.

Nicephorus Calistus, in the fourteenth century, thus describes the Holy Virgin; "She was of a moderate stature, or according to some, rather below the ordinary stature of women: her complexion was of the colour of wheat, her hair fair, her eyes lively, the eye-ball yellowish, or olive-colour, her eyebrows black and semicircular, her nose pretty long, her lips red, her hands and fingers large, her air grave, simple, and modest, her clothes neat, without pride or ostentation, and of the natural colour of the wool." It has been pretended, that St. Luke had drawn her picture, and in several places they shew pictures of her, which they affirm to be copies from St. Luke's original. But the ancients have no where informed us, that St. Luke was a painter, or that he had painted the Holy Virgin. But Theodorus, lecturer of the church of Constantinople, who lived in the sixth century, says that Eudocia sent from Jerusalem to Constantinople, to the empress Pulcheria, a picture of the Holy Virgin painted by St. Luke. Certain it is that this holy evangelist has acquainted us with some particulars of the life of the Holy Virgin, that could hardly be learned from any one but herself; which inclines us to believe, that he had the happiness of her acquaintance, and confidence. Vide LUKE.

The Jews have vented many falsities against her, in their book called Toledoth Jesu, or the Life of Jesus Christ. Vide JESUS CHRIST.

They pretend that Mary was a milliner, and married to one Johanan; that she suffered herself to be corrupted by one Panderus, who had a son by her called Joshua, or Jesus; that Panderus, or Pantherus, withdrawing to Babylon, Mary was forced to maintain her son. Aki-ba took a journey to Nazareth, on purpose to inform himself concerning the birth of Jesus; who from his childhood distinguished himself at school. He found from Mary herself, that she had been guilty of adultery. At his return, Jesus was seized, was shaved, and his head was washed with a water, which prevented the hair from growing again. Hence it is that his disciples shave their heads. (Insinuating by this, the custom that has obtained among Roman catholic priests and religious, of the tonsure.) They add, that at Mary's death they set up a stately monument for her at Jerusalem, with an inscription upon it, which cost the lives of an hundred Christians of Jesus's relations, who had distinguished themselves on that occasion.

The Mahometans on the contrary greatly respect and esteem her. But they do not confine themselves within the limits of truth and sobriety: they say, for example, that Ann, the mother of Mary, and wife of Amram, being with child of her, vowed to the Lord whatever child should be born, whether male or female: that God gave the name of Mary to the child; that Ann gave the child to keep to Zachariah the the priest, who shut her up in one of the chambers of the temple, the door of which was so high, that they went up to it by a ladder, and that he always carried the key about him.

Zachariah made her frequent visits, and whenever he came he always found with her all the most exquisite fruits of Palestine, even such as were most out of season. This put him on enquiring how she came by such fine fruits? To which Mary answered, 'Whatever you see here comes from God, who provides for those that please him all good things, without measure or number.'

As to the purity of the Holy Virgin, in her birth, in the conception of the Word, &c. they speak very explicitly.

Abulfarage writes in his Dynasties, that it was a tradition among the oriental Christians, that the Holy Virgin was but thirteen years of age when she brought forth Jesus Christ, and that she lived to be fifty one. Some Mussulmen falsely impute to Christians, that they acknowledge the Virgin Mary as the third person of the Holy Trinity; which mistake proceeds from hence, that the Christians of the East give her the name of Al-seidai, which signifies the Lady; and among the Greek fathers St. Cyril has called her, The Supplement or Completion of the most holy Trinity; but other Mahometans vindicate us from this calumny.

[It should seem that the apostle John was a man of property, Mark i. 20, John xviii. 15, and had a house at Jerusalem, John xx. 2, to which he took Mary the mother of Jesus; and that here he lived till at latest, A. D. 66, when the breaking out of the Jewish war occasioned his removal. Now, at this time, the Virgin must have been eighty years of age; or, supposing that John removed a few years sooner, she must have been so far advanced in life as to render her decease a matter of great probability, indeed, all but a certainty. She is not alluded to by John in either of his Epistles which may be dated after his settlement at Ephesus. So that, on the whole, the notion that she died at Jerusalem, before A. D. 66, seems to be the best supported.

It would, however, betray the greatest credulity to accept the "Virgin's Sepulchre," now shewn at Jerusalem, as being really the burial place of that Holy Person. It is, says Dr. E. D. Clarke "a Crypt, or cave hewn with marvellous skill, and most surprising labour, in a stratum of hard compact limestone. Whatever may have been the real history of its origin, there can be no doubt but it was intended as a repository for the dead, and, from all appearance, as the receptacle of many bodies. It seems also evident, that the persons here interred, were held in veneration by the living, from the commodious and magnificent descent leading to the interior of the Crypt, together with the dome and altar which appear within, as for a sanctuary We descended to it by a noble flight of fifty marble steps: each of these was twenty feet wide. This commodious descent may possibly have been owing to the notion entertained by the Empress Helena, concerning its origin: but the sepulchre itself is of great antiquity. It is the largest of all the Cryptæ near Jerusalem. Appropriate chapels, within a lofty and spacious vault, distinguish the real or imaginary tombs of the Virgin Mary, of Joseph, of Anna, and of Caiaphas. Struck with wonder, not only in viewing such an astonishing effort of human labour, but in the consideration that History affords no light whatever as to its origin, we came afterwards to examine it again; but could assign no probable date for the æra of its construction. It ranks among those Colossal works of the first ages," &c.

The association of Caiaphas with the Virgin and her parents, seems very extraordinary. May this great work have been a burial place for the High Priests? Certainly, it never was the Sepulchre of the Mother of Jesus; whose prudence would induce her to keep private, pretty much, while residing at Jerusalem.]

II. MARY, the mother of James and John. She was not called Mary but Salome; though she is commonly named Mary, the mother of James and John. Matthew, xxvii. 56. calls her the mother of the sons of Zebedee; and Mark, xv. 40. calls her Salome. She was therefore wife to Zebedee, and mother to James and John.

III. MARY, mother of Mark. She had a house in Jerusalem, whither it is thought the apostles retired, after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. This house was on mount Sion. Epiphanius says, it escaped the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and was changed into a very famous church, which continued several ages. After the imprisonment of Peter, the faithful assembled in this house, praying; when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the gate. Acts xii. 5, 12. See JOHN MARK.

IV. MARY of Cleophas. Jerom says, she bore the name of Cleophas, either because of her father, of her family, or some other reason not known. Chrysostom, in Galat. p. 801. Theodoret, in Galat. p. 268, and others, believe, with greater probability, that she was wife of Cleophas, and mother of James the Less, and of Simon, brethren of our Lord. These authors take take Mary, mother of James, and Mary, wife of Cleophas, to be the same person. St. John gives her the name of Mary, wife of Cleophas; and the other evangelists the name of Mary, mother of James. James son of Mary, wife of Cleophas, is the same as James son of Alphaeus. Alphaeus and Cleophas differ only as a Hebrew name, and the same in Greek.

We know very few particulars of the life of Mary of Cleophas. It is thought she was sister to the Holy Virgin; and the mother of James the Less, of Joses, of Simeon, and of Judas, who in the gospel are named brethren of Jesus Christ, i. e. his cousins-german. She believed early on Jesus Christ, and accompanied him in some of his journeys, to minister to him. She followed our Saviour to Calvary, and was with the Virgin at the foot of his cross. She was also present at his burial, and prepared perfumes to embalm him. But going to his tomb on Sunday morning very early, with other women, they learned from an angel that he was risen, of which they informed the apostles. By the way Jesus appeared to them, and they embraced his feet, worshipping him. The year of the death of Mary the wife of Cleophas is not known, but the Greeks keep April 8, in memory of the holy women who brought perfumes to embalm the body of Christ; and pretend to have their bodies at Constantinople, in a church of the Holy Virgin, built by Justin II. The Roman Martyrology places the festival of St. Mary wife of Cleophas, April 9.

V. MARY SALOME, daughter of Mary, wife of Cleophas; sister of James the Less, and of others, called the brethren of our Lord. She was cousin-german to Jesus Christ, according to the flesh, and neice to the Holy Virgin. She was properly called Salome, and without any reason has received the name of Mary, which belongs to her mother.

Others pretend that Salome was a daughter of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary; and this is the opinion of the modern Greeks, founded on the testimony of Epiphanius, Hæres. 78. cap. 8. p. 1040. a. See SALOME.

The Roman Martyrology gives the name of Mary Salome to the mother of St. James the Less. What grounds they had for this, are not known; for it cannot be found in Scripture, or in any good author, that she was called Mary, but she was certainly called Salome. Compare Matth. xxvii. 56. with Mark xv. 40. And see Origen on Matthew, p. 206. c, and the other interpreters.

VI. MARY, a Christian woman mentioned by St. Paul, Romans xvi. 6. of whom he says, that she laboured much for the faith.

VII. MARY, sister of Lazarus, who has been preposterously confounded with that woman sinner, mentioned Luke vii. 37, 39. whose name is not noticed, but who was probably Mary Magdalen. [?] Mary, sister of Martha and Lazarus, lived with her brother and sister at Bethany, a village near Jerusalem. Jesus Christ had a particular affection for this family, and often retired to their house. One day, and perhaps the first time that Jesus went thither, Martha received him with great affection, and thinking to make much of him, she prepared a handsome entertainment; while Mary her sister remained at our Saviour's feet, hearing his conversation, with great attention. Wherefore Martha said to Jesus, Do you not observe, Lord, that my sister leaves me to minister alone? Bid her come to help me:" but Jesus took occasion to justify Mary, saying, she had chosen the better part, which should not be taken from her. Luke x. 38—43.

Some time after, their brother Lazarus fell sick, and his sisters acquainted Jesus with it; but he delayed till after Lazarus was dead. He arrived at Bethany, and presently Martha came to him. Then he sent to acquaint Mary with his being there, who immediately came lamenting and complaining of Lazarus's death, &c. Jesus restored that valued youth to his sisters. Six days before the passover, Jesus came to Bethany, John xii. and was invited to supper at Simon's the leper. Martha attended, and Lazarus was a guest. Mary, taking a pound of spikenard (the most precious perfume of this kind, see SPIKENARD) poured it on the head and feet of Jesus. She wiped his feet with her hair, and the whole house was filled with the scent of the perfume. Judas Iscariot murmured at this, but Jesus justified the action, saying, that by it Mary anticipated his embalmment, and, in a manner, had declared his death and burial at hand. From this time Scripture does not mention Martha and Mary; but those who distinguish not between Mary, sister of Martha, and Mary Magdalen, say that she was present at the crucifixion of our Saviour, and went to his sepulchre to embalm him. The Roman Ordinal, apud Baron. An. 34. n. 182, and one Nicephorus, quoted by M. Coctelier, P. P. primi Sæculi, note p. 204. affirm, that Martha and Mary went to our Saviour's tomb to embalm him; but we find nothing of this in the sacred authors.

The ancient Latins, and modern Greeks believe, that Mary and Martha remained at Jerusalem, and died there. Several ancient martyrologies put their feast January 19. The Greeks put Mary's feast Mar. 18, because of the perfumes perfumes she poured that day on Jesus Christ.

VIII. MARY MAGDALEN, who has been confounded with Mary the sister of Martha and Lazarus, but very improperly, was probably that sinner mentioned Luke vii. 36, whose name is omitted. Circumstances incline one to believe, that she is that Mary Magdalen from whom Jesus drove out seven devils, chap. viii. 2. Jesus having healed the widow's son of Nain, entered into that city, and was there invited to eat by a pharisee named Simon. While he was at table, a woman of a scandalous life came into the house, having an alabaster-box full of perfume; and standing upright behind Jesus, and at his feet, (for he was lying at table on a couch, after the manner of the ancients. See the PLATE, ATTITUDE AT TABLE.) she poured her perfume on his feet, kissed them, watered them with her tears, wiped them with her hair, &c.

In the following chapter St. Luke tells us, that Jesus in company with his apostles, preached the gospel from city to city; accompanied by several women, whom he had cured of their infirmities, among whom was Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils. I own this is no proof, that the sinner mentioned before was Mary Magdalene; but this is all we can have for the support of that opinion.

Mary Magdalene took her surname, either from the town of Magdala in Galilee, beyond Jordan, and not far from Gamala, (Josephus de Vita sua, p. 1007) probably the same mentioned Matth. xv. 39. or from Magdolos, a town on this side Jordan, at the foot of mount Carmel, the Megiddo of Joshua xvii. 11. 2 Kings ix. 27. xxiii. 29. Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 159. The Rabbins speak of a Mary Magdalene, wife of Rabbi Papus, son of Judah, and of another Mary Magdalene, wife of Hamchuna, the father of Nazareen, who was surnamed Magdala, not because of her country, but because by profession she was a tire-woman or seamstress; as if it were insinuated by the term Magdala, which signifies a tower, that Magdalene in preparing head-dresses for women, built as it were towers on their heads:

——— Tanta est querendi cura decoris,
Tot premit ordinibus, tot adhuc compagibus altum
Edificat caput.

JUVEN. SAT. VI. V. 500.

Lightfoot believes, Chronic. p. 23. & Horæ Hebrææ in Matth. xxvi. 56. p. 388. that it is of this Mary Magdalene St. Luke and the other evangelists speak, and whom this author does not distinguish from Mary sister of Lazarus. Magdalene is mentioned by the evangelists among the women who followed our Saviour, to minister to him, according to the custom of the Jews. Luke, viii. 2. and Mark, xvi. 9. observe, that this woman had been delivered by Jesus Christ from seven devils. This some understand literally: others figuratively, for the crimes and wickednesses of her past life. Others maintain, that she had always lived in virginity, and consequently was a different person from the sinner mentioned by Luke; and by the seven [or many] devils, they understand a real possession, [or bodily disease] which is not inconsistent with a recluse life. She followed Christ in his last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the Holy Virgin. She continued on mount Calvary till our Saviour's death, and saw him placed in his tomb. After which she returned to Jerusalem, to prepare to embalm him after the sabbath was over. John xix. 25. Mark xv. 47.

All the sabbath day she remained in the city, and the next day early in the morning she went to the sepulchre, with Mary the mother of James and Salome, Mark xvi. 1, 2. Luke xxiv. 1, 2. Being come to his tomb, they saw two angels, who informed them that Jesus was risen. On this, Mary Magdalene ran to Jerusalem, to acquaint the apostles. Returning to the sepulchre, and stooping forward to examine the inside of the tomb, she there saw two angels sitting, one at the head, and the other at the bottom of the tomb. They asked her, why she wept? To which she replied, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. Immediately turning about, she saw Jesus, who asked her, what she looked for? She answered, Sir, if you have removed my Master, let me know it, that I may take him away. Jesus says to her, Mary! immediately she knew him, and cast herself at his feet, to kiss them. But Jesus said to her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my father. q. d. You shall have leisure to see me hereafter: go now to my brethren, my apostles, and tell them, I shall ascend to my God, and their God; to my Father and their Father. Thus had Mary the happiness of first seeing our Saviour after his resurrection. She related this to the apostles, but they did not believe her, till her report was confirmed by other testimony.

This is what the gospel informs us concerning Mary Magdalene. There is a pretended history of Mary Magdalene, said to have been written in Hebrew by Marcella, servant of Martha; but this can only relate to Mary sister of Martha, and besides, is a mere forgery. Modestus, apud Phot. cod. 275. archbishop of Constantinople, in the seventh century, says, that Mary Magdalene, lene, from whom Jesus had cast out seven devils, went to Ephesus after the death of the Virgin Mary, and abode with St. John, as long as she lived: and that she there ended her life by martyrdom. Her Acts were then in being, but they are not now. The commentary on Mark, ascribed to Jeroni, says, that Mary Magdalene was a widow. Gregory of Tours, as also Modestus, just cited, say, her tomb was at Ephesus; and had not then been opened. It was held in great reverence there, in 745, when Villebaud passed that way. The Greek annals insinuate, that she died and was buried there. The emperor Leo the Wise, who began to reign A. D. 886, caused her relics to be brought from Ephesus to Constantinople. Codinus, who speaks of this translation, understands it of Mary sister to Lazarus; but Cedrenus understands it of Mary Magdalene.

[It is by no means credible, that the woman, "the sinner," was Mary Magdalen, who is always named in the gospel, in company with women of the best character and quality; as Luke viii. with Joanna, wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susannah, and many others:] and mostly she is named first of her company, even before Mary the mother of Jesus, Mark xv. 47. She was also, a woman of property; she not only "ministered to Jesus of her substance," while he was living, but, she was one of those who bought spices to embalm him after his death. Matth. xxviii. 55, 56. Luke xxiii. 36. John xx. Probably she was not young: and therefore, the story of her following St. John to Ephesus is entitled to no attention: yet, as the name Mary was very common among the Jews, some woman of that name might, it is possible, accompany the Apostle at Ephesus: and give occasion to the mistake. Comp. VIRGIN MARY.]

MASCHIL, מִשְׁכִּיל. This term, found as a title to certain Psalms, imports he that instructs or makes to understand. Some interpreters think, but without reason, that it signifies an instrument of music. Much more probably it signifies an instructive song. Some ancient Rabbins believe, that in repeating the Psalms with this inscription, they always added an explication to it. Some Fathers think, that the word intellectus, in Hebrew Maschil, expresses the meaning of the Psalm. Others say, on the contrary, it shews the clearness and perspicuity of the Psalm, and that it needs no explication.

MASHAL, מָשַׁל, מַסָּאֵל, or MISHAL, parable, or he that governs.

MASHAL, MISHAL, or MASAL, a city of Asher, yielded to the Levites of the family of Gerson, 1 Chron. vi. 74. Eusebius says, it was bordering on Mount Carinel near the sea. [In Josh. xix. 26, called Misheal; and xxi. 30. called מִשְׁעָל, Mishal.

MASSA, מַסָּה, burden, or elevation; in a metaphorical sense, unfortunate prophecy; from נָשָׂא nasha, to carry, to lift up. Seventh son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 14. There is a city Mesa in Arabia Petraea: also one named Mesada.

MASSA, מַסָּה, the temptation; from נָסָה nasah, temptation.

MASSA. A name given to the encampment of the Hebrews at Rephidim, when the people wanting water began to murmur against Moses, and the Lord, as if they had doubted of his presence among them, Exod. xvii. 2, &c.

MASSADA, a castle or fortress in the tribe of Judah, west of the Dead Sea, or the lake Asphaltites, not far from Engedi, situated on a steep rock, of very difficult access. But at the top the rock has a plain of considerable extent, which may be even cultivated, and afford subsistence. Jonathan the Asmonean, brother of Judas Maccabæus, and high-priest of the Jews, fortified this place against the kings of Syria. Herod the Great fortified it anew, and made it impregnable. As it had no water, he caused several cisterns to be made, and stored up there a vast quantity of provisions, that if any misfortune should happen to him, or if the country should revolt, he might there find a retreat.

After the last war of the Jews against the Romans, Eleazar son of Jair, a grandson of the famous Judas Gaulonites, at the head of the Sicarii, or assassins, seized the fort of Massada. Flavius Sylva, whom Titus had left in Judæa, to reduce what yet held out in that province, besieged Eleazar. He began by putting garrisons into all the neighbouring towns, to secure the country, and surrounded the place with a wall of circumvallation, with bodies of guards at convenient distances, that no one might escape. Then he carried on the siege with great vigour, and works almost incredible. Eleazar defended himself very courageously, and seeing that he could hold out no longer against the Roman army, he persuaded all the Jews that were with him to kill one another, and the last that survived was to set fire to the castle. This counsel they put in execution, and voluntarily slew one another. Two women, who with five young children had hid themselves in the aqueducts, the day following informed the Romans of what had been done. This happened A. D. 71.

MASSORA. This Hebrew word signifies tradition: derived from the verb מסר masar, to give, present, or offer. Those Hebrew doctors are called Massorites, who have fixed the reading of the sacred text, by adding pointed vowels to it, and the notes in the margins of the printed Hebrew bibles; who have counted with most scrupulous exactness all the words, verses, and letters of every book, that in following ages no further change might be made, and that the reading of the bible might be fixed for ever. As the Hebrews often wrote their words without vowels, a tradition from father to son, is their rule for reading certain consonants, which have a variety of significations, according to the nature of the vowel supplied. E. gr. these three letters, D B R, may be pronounced dabar—a word, or he spoke; daber—death, or, the plague; dabir—a court; dabber—speak; daber—he that speaks: and so of others. As tradition teaches the Jews how to pronounce this word, in the several places in which it occurs; in consequence of this tradition, the Massorites, invented pointed vowels, to fix the reading. For this reason they are called Massorites, and their work Massora, or tradition.

These pointed vowels serve instead of the real vowels where they are wanting, and denote what sound is to be given them, when they are in the text; and whether they are to be pronounced or not, whether long or short, whether with a full sound, or slightly. These pointed vowels are commonly put under the letters, but sometimes above. They are thirteen in all, five long, five short, and three very short. Vide the Hebrew grammars. It is an error to think, that the Hebrew tongue has no vowels; for it has its vowels as well as other languages, but they are not always marked in writing. See LETTERS.

The Massorites have also marked the accents, and the stop-points. The accents serve for pronunciation, for singing, and reading of the words. The stop-points serve for distinction of sentences and verses.

The Massorites have been exact in marking letters that are either deficient or redundant in the text; whether a word is writ in a regular manner; whether one letter be put for another; if it be larger, or shorter, or inverted, or suspended. For the Hebrews have such a vast respect for the sacred books, that they scruple changing the situation of a letter, though it is plainly out of its place. They incline to suppose that some mystery has occasioned the alteration. Their ancestors it is very plain were not so scrupulous, since we find many mistakes in the text, which could proceed only from the negligence or ignorance of transcribers.

Lastly, when there are various readings of the text, or any palpable fault, they put the true reading in the margin, without daring to alter the text. That which is found in the text they call Chetib, i. e. written; what they put in the margin they call Keri, i. e. read or reading. q. d. "write in this manner, but read in that manner." For example, when they find certain words, they substitute others. Instead of the sacred name Jehovah, they substitute Adonai, or Elohim; and instead of certain terms not very decent, they pronounce others less indelicate, or more agreeable to good manners.

As to the Massorites, or authors of the Massora, and the age they lived in, and to the value of their performance, there is a great variety of sentiments. Some have very much commended this undertaking, and have looked on the work of the Massorites as an admirable invention, to deliver the text from a multitude of equivocations and perplexities to which it was liable, to stop the unbounded licentiousness and rashness of transcribers and critics, who often made alterations in the text on their private authority, according to their own understanding or humour. Others have blamed the design, suspecting the Massorites corrupted the purity of the text, substituting instead of the ancient and true readings of their fathers, other readings more favourable to their prejudices, and more opposite to Christianity, whose testimonies are proofs they would weaken as much as they could. This is very certain, that they often follow and authorize readings, very different from those followed by the ancient Greek interpreters, who lived before Christ. Sometimes they even depart from the reading of the Chaldees, which is the most ancient author of any that has interpreted the original text, in a language of near affinity to the the Hebrew. Lastly, it may be shewn, that the ancient Rabbins do not always agree with the Massorites. Whence it is easy to infer, that their tradition has not always been uniform, as to the manner of reading and interpreting the text; or that they have not been very faithful in representing it to us in their Massora.

Some among the Jews pretend, that the Massora is derived even from Moses; who communicated to the elders of Israel this manner of reading and explaining the sacred text. Others refer it to Esdras, and to the men of the Great Synagogue in his time. Others go no higher than to the beginning of the fifth century, and think the masters of the school at Tiberias were the authors of it. But it cannot be said with reason, that Moses was the author of the Massora of all the books of the Old Testament, since most of them were composed long after his time. Nor that the manner of reading and dividing the bible was fixed by Esdras, since there have been many varieties in the readings, and in the explanations of it, for several ages after him: for example, in the LXX. in Aquila, in Symmachus, and in Theodotion, who often differ from each other, only because the manner of reading the text varied in their time. Nor was it settled in the days of Origen, or Jerom, as may be gathered from several passages of those fathers.

Moreover, Jerom, who lived in the fourth century, (died about A. D. 420,) and who affirms expressly, that the manner of reading the Hebrew text was unfixed in his time, renders very suspicious what the Rabbins would persuade us, concerning the invention of the points by the doctors of Tiberias. The Talmud not being finished according to some, (Rab. Gedalias, fol. 35. Abr. Levit. Tzemach David) till A. D. 600; according to others, (Abravanel. Præf. in Pirkeavoth, Mos. Egypt. Præfat. in Jad. Chazakah) not till A. D. 645, furnishes more proofs that the pointed vowels were not then in use. It never speaks a word of them, though it had so many occasions. It relates several histories, which imply that the manner of reading the text was not determined. For example, Joab, general of the armies of David, returning from an expedition against the Amalekites, the king asked him why he had not entirely exterminated that people? Joab answered, that he had fulfilled all that the Lord had commanded against Amalek, saying, destroy all the males of Amalek; in Hebrew Sacar: David insisted that it ought to be read Secher, exterminate the memory of Amalek. But Joab replied, that his master had always taught him to read Sacar. This narrative is a mere fable, but it sufficiently proves, that the reading of the Hebrew was then not absolutely fixed.

They produce the book called Cozri, which contains a conference between king Cozar and some Jews, and in which the use of the pointed vowels is supposed as known. Here it is said, that words composed of consonants without vowels are like women undressed, who ought not to appear in public. It is pretended this conference was held A. D. 740, but the most able critics take both the book and the conference for a fable, and maintain that this work called Cozri was composed at least four hundred years after the seventh century: but nobody denies that then the points were in use.

The Jews have also commentaries on Scripture, which they call Midraschim, composed since the Talmud, which contain a multitude of grammatical observations, with niceties about letters and words, and the manner of reading and writing. But in these commentaries there is not a word of the pointed vowels, or of any labours of the Massorites. The book of the scribes, or Sopherim, which is also since the Talmud, (for the Talmud is there quoted as a work of antiquity, and as being universally approved) contains a vast number of particulars about the text and writing of the sacred books: as, the nature, the qualities, the measure of the parchment, on which these books should be written; what space should be left between each line, how many words every line should contain, and how many lines should be in every page; how many rasures make a volume profane; which letters should be capitals, and such like. In short, this work contains even the most inconsiderable niceties relating to the text, and yet there is not a word about the points, or other observations of the Massorites.

Besides, the Jews possess two other works, later than the above, i. e. The various lections of the Hebrew text, collected by the eastern and western Jews. The western Jews first began to collate the text from manuscripts, to count the letters, to notice words, &c. This work having been communicated to the oriental Jews at Babylon, and beyond the Euphrates; they examined it, and in their turn compared their text with this manuscript. They observed two hundred and sixteen passages, in which their manuscripts differed from those of Jerusalem. This difference produced two parties among them, the Jews of Jerusalem, and those of Babylon; each maintaining the fidelity of their manuscripts and their text. This was about the end of the eighth century, or the beginning of the ninth. Neither side appealed to the authority of the Massorites, or to their remarks, which they they could hardly have failed to have done, had they been then extant: so that there is great probability that they were not then known.

But a little while afterwards, in a dispute between the Rabbins Aaron-Ben-Aser, chief of the western school, and Moses-Ben-Naphtali, chief of the eastern school, much mention is made of points, accents, and other observations about the manner of reading the words of Scripture; which gives reason to conclude, that in this interval of a hundred years, between the years 840, in which the various readings of the western Jews appeared, and 940, or perhaps 1030, in which flourished the Rabbins Ben-Aser, and Ben-Naphtali, that the Massorites began their work. But it was not presently finished: it required a considerable time to perfect it. As Aaron-Ben-Aser presided at the school of Tiberias, this gave occasion to say that the Massora took its origin from that city. Vide Exercitationes of P. Morin, in Walton's Prolegomena, in Capellus's Arcanum punctuationis revelatum, in Buxtorf, &c.

Isaac Vossius affirms, that he has had in his hands more than two thousand Hebrew manuscripts, and that he saw none of them pointed, that were more than six hundred years old. He challenges all the partisans of the pointed vowels, to produce any manuscript older than this, with the points of the Massorites. That if any of them are found pointed, it is easily discoverable, that the pointing has been added to the manuscript. Lastly, a convincing proof of the novelty of this invention is, that the copies of the bible kept in rolls in the synagogues, are to this day without points. Therefore, there is great probability, that this invention has been in use, only since the Jews began to have grammars of their language, which was but in the ninth century. Then, to make the reading of Hebrew easy to beginners, they invented the pointed vowels, in order to ascertain the reading. Comp. BIBLE; HEBREW MSS. AND PRINTED.

[If we might be allowed to deduce evidence from Arabic MSS. a language of close affinity to the Hebrew, and pointed almost as much as the Hebrew, this question would be settled to the satisfaction of both parties; as the truth would be found in the medium. The oldest Arabic MSS. have certain of the principal points annexed as guides to the reading of important words; and they are often marked in red ink to distinguish them; but, the number of these bear but a small proportion to what have been introduced since; and the more modern MSS. have the greater number of these diacritical marks. The same may be said of the Persian, and other MSS. in other languages of the East.]

MASSORITES, they imagined that they performed a very considerable service to their nation, and religion, by counting even the very letters of their sacred books. In Genesis, for example, they found twelve great sections, or Paraschoth; forty-three orders, or Sedarim; fifteen hundred and thirty-four verses, and seventy-eight thousand one hundred letters. They distinguished the degrees of certainty, which they attributed to their corrections, by three words: Keri, read;—Chetib, write; and—Sbhir, conjecture. When a reading in the text was manifestly corrupt, they substituted another: this was Chetib. If the word was one whose pronunciation they used to forbear out of respect, as Jehovah, they took another whose pronunciation was allowable, as Elohi, or Adonai. In like manner, if the word was indelicate, they put one more reserved: this is Keri, read. Lastly, if the reading was doubtful, they marked it Sbhir, or conjecture.

Heretofore all these remarks were put at the end of bibles; but now they are placed in the margin. Vide POINTED VOWELS, and the foregoing article.

MASTICK-TREE. See LENTISK-TREE.

MATRED, מַטְרֵד, rod, staff, or lever that descends; from מַטְרֵד mat, a staff, &c. and יָרַד jarad, to descend; and from מִטָּה mitta, a bed. Daughter of Mezahab, mother of Mehetabel, wife of Hadar, Gen. xxxvi. 39.

MATRI, מַטְרִי, rain; from מַטְרֵר mat-tar: or prison, a place shut up and guarded; from נָטַר natar, to guard. Chief of the family of Kish, father of Saul, 1 Sam. x. 21.

MATTAN, מַתָּן, Vulg. Mathan, gift; from נָתַן nathan: otherwise, the reins; from מָתָן mathan: otherwise, the death of them; from מוֹת muth, death, and the pronoun an, their's.

L. MATTAN, or Mathan, son of Eleazar, father of Jacob, and grandfather of Joseph, husband to the virgin Mary. Luke, iii. 23, makes Heli, son of Matthat, to be father of Joseph: But we are of opinion that Heli is the same as Joachim, father of Mary, and father-in-law to Joseph: so that Matthew, i. 15, 16, gives the direct genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary.

II. MATTAN, priest of Baal, killed before the altar of his false god, by order of the high-priest Jehoiada, 2 Kings xi. 18. A. M. 3126, ante A. D. 878.

III. MATTAN, father of Shephatiah. Jer. xxxviii.

MATTANAH, מַתָּנָה, gift. An encampment of Israel in the Desert, Numb. xxi. 18, 19. Eusebius says, it was on the Arnon, twelve miles from Medaba, East.

MATTANIAH, מַתָּנְיָה, gift of God, expectation

tion, or hope of the Lord. 2 Kings xxiv. 17.

MATTANIAH, מַתַּנְיָה, Marthanias, the same.

I. MATTANIAH, or Mathania, chief of the ninth family of the Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 16.

II. MATTANIAH, or Mathanias, otherwise Zedekiah, king of Judah. See ZEDEKIAH.

III. MATTANIAH, or Mathanian, son of He-man a Levite, 1 Chron. xxv. 4.

MATTATHAH, מַתַּתָּה, Vulg. Mathata, his gift; from מַתַּת mathath, a gift, and הָ a, his.

I. MATTATHA, or Mathata, son of Nathan, and father of Menan, ancestor of Jesus Christ, Luke iii. 31.

II. MATTATHA, son of Hashum, one who at the return from the Babylonish captivity put away his strange wife, Ezr. x. 33.

MATTATHIAS, מַתַּתְיָה, Marrathias, gift of the Lord; from mathath, a gift, and יָ jah.

I. MATTATHIAS, son of John, of the family of Joarib, and of the race of the priests, made himself very famous during the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes. 1 Mac. ii. 1, 2, &c. He was at Jerusalem when Appollonius arrived there, with the wicked orders of Antiochus. Mattathias retired to Modin, his own country, to let this tempest blow over, or, expecting there, till God should give occasions of signaling his zeal for religion and his country, A. M. 3837, ante A. D. 167. Mattathias did not wait long, before the officers sent by king Antiochus came thither, to compel the people of Modin to abandon the law of God: Several complied; but Mattathias and his sons steadfastly refused, and when they came to urge him to sacrifice, because he was the chief man of the city, he lifted up his voice and declared, that though all the nations of the world, and the whole people of Judah, should obey Antiochus, he singly would never obey him in a thing of this nature. And when he had ended speaking, a certain Jew advancing to sacrifice to idols before the whole assembly, Mattathias was so transported with grief, indignation, and zeal, that he killed him, even on the altar on which he was going to offer incense. At the same time he slew the officers sent by the king, to compel the people to sacrifice; and having overthrown the altar, he cried out—"Whoever is zealous for the law, and will continue firm in the covenant of the Lord, let him follow me."

Mattathias had five sons, Joannan called Caddis, or Gaddis, Simon surnamed Thassi, Judas called Maccabeus, Eleazar called Avaran, Avaron, or Abaren, and Jonathan surnamed Apphus. He retired into the mountains with his five sons, and was followed by many Israelites, who withdrew from the persecution, chusing rather to forsake all their property, than the law of their God. The king's officers and troops at Jerusalem having heard of the opposition of Mattathias, and the others, marched immediately against them, designing to attack them on the Sabbath day. This design they executed on the poor Israelites, who suffered themselves to be massacred without resistance, because they would not violate the repose of the Sabbath. Mattathias being informed of this, made a great mourning for it, and calling his sons and friends together, they deliberated on this matter, and they came to a resolution of defending themselves on the Sabbath day.

Mattathias and his sons joined the Assideans, the most religious and most valiant of Israel. They fell on the apostates, killed a great number of them, and drove the rest for shelter among the infidels. After this, Mattathias marched through the country, destroyed the altars dedicated to false gods, circumcised the children that had not received circumcision, humbled the children of pride, and delivered the law from its subjection to strangers, and from the power of the king.

Mattathias apprehending that the time of his death drew near, he assembled his sons, and observed to them, that the kingdom of pride was strengthened, that this was a time of correction and ruin, of wrath and indignation. "Therefore my children," continued he, "be truly zealous for the law, and sacrifice your lives for the covenant of your ancestors, &c."

After this he blessed them, and was gathered to his fathers. He was buried at Modin in the sepulchre of his family, and all Israel made a great mourning for him. He had not been above one year at the head of his people. Some have pretended, that Mattathias had been high-priest of the Jews: they found their opinion on his decision, that in case of necessity they might fight on the Sabbath day. But his decision is not sufficient to prove this. Besides, Menelaus and Alcimus were then alive, and though they were intruders and very wicked men, yet they were high-priests.

II. MATTATHIAS, son of Simon Maccabæus, and grandson of Mattathias. He was killed treacherously with his father and one of his brethren, by Ptolemy, son-in-law of Simon, in the castle of Docus. 1 Mac. xvi. 14, 15, 16.

MATTENAI, מַתַּנַּי my gift, my offering. Son of Hashum, Ezra x. 33.

MATTHAN. See MATTAN.

MATTHAT, מַתַּת, gift, or he that gives; from נָתַן nathan, to give. Son of Levi, and father of Heli. Luke iii. 24.

MATTHEW, מַתְתִּי, given; from מַתַּת mathath, a gift.

MATTHEW, Apostle and Evangelist, was son of Alphaeus, a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a Publican by profession. (Vide PUBLICAN.) Mark ii. 14. Luke v. 27. The other evangelists call him only Levi, which was his Hebrew name; but he calls himself always Matthew, which probably was his name as a publican, or officer for gathering taxes. He does not dissemble his former profession, that he may the more exalt the grace of Christ, which raised him to the apostleship. His ordinary abode was at Capernaum, and his office was out of the town, at the sea of Tiberias, which was near. Here he was called by Jesus to follow him. Matt. ix. 9.

Porphyry, and Julian the emperor, accuse Matthew of inconsiderateness, in rashly following a man whom he knew nothing of. But Jerom answers, that it is very probable Matthew had a previous knowledge of the miracles and doctrine of Jesus Christ, whom he might have heard preach. Besides, the lustre of the divinity of our Saviour, though concealed under his humanity, was capable of drawing to him at once, all who obtained but a glimpse of it. St. Austin says, that on this occasion Matthew found himself influenced by an inward attraction, which determined him gently and agreeably, but powerfully and irresistibly.

Matthew invited our Saviour to eat at his house. Jesus came with his disciples, when several publicans, and other persons of Matthew's acquaintance, sat down with him, Matt. ix. 10. The Pharisees observing this, said to our Saviour's disciples, 'Why does your master eat with publicans and sinners?' Jesus, hearing them, made answer, "Not the sound, but the sick need the physician." This is all that the Gospel acquaints us with concerning Matthew.

What the Scripture says, that he was son of Alphaeus, has given occasion to some ancients, (Chrysost. in Matt. Homil. 33. Theodoret, in Psal. lxxvii. 28, Bolland, 21 Maii;) and all the modern Greeks, to say, Matthew was brother of James, son of Alphaeus, or James the Less, otherwise named the brother of our Lord; but this is not probable. See CLEOPHAS and ALPHEUS. He was an apostle the same year he was converted, and, consequently, he was called to the apostleship the first year of the preaching of Jesus Christ. He is sometimes named the seventh among the apostles, and sometimes the eighth.

Clemens Alexandrinus, Pædag. lib. ii. cap. 1. says, Matthew abstained from eating flesh, and his diet was fruits, roots, and herbs. The most general opinion of both ancients and moderns is, that he preached and suffered martyrdom in Persia, or among the Parthians, or in Caramania, which then was subject to the Parthians. Rufinus, Soorates, the counterfeit Obadiah, and several others, affirm that he preached and died in Ethiopia. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. iv. quotes Heracleon, a disciple of Valentine, for saying, that Matthew departed out of this world by a natural death; and this the Menology of Basil, with some Greek authors, seems to follow. But other Greek authors say sometimes, that he ended his life by fire. Nicephorus says, that having by his prayers extinguished the fire that was lighted round him, he gave up the ghost in tranquillity. Adon and other Latin writers say, he died by martyrdom; and Obadiah, an author of little credit, says, that Hyrtacus, king of Ethiopia, brother and successor of Aeglippus, desiring to marry Iphigenia, daughter of the king his brother, who had already been consecrated to God; the apostle represented to him, that he could not do this without committing a great crime; then the prince sent one of his officers, who beheaded him. Afterwards he endeavoured to burn Iphigenia in her house, but the flames were driven by a violent wind against Hyrtacus's own house, and entirely consumed it.

The Latin church celebrates the feast of St. Matthew September 21, on which day it is marked in Bede, and in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory. The Martyrologies of Jerom, which place it on the same day, mark it also October 7, and May 6, on which the Roman Martyrology now celebrates the translation of his body. We are assured that it was transported from Ethiopia to Bretany, or Bithynia, and from thence to Salernum in Naples, A. D. 954, where it was found A. D. 1080. Duke Robert there built a large church bearing his name, where his body was put in the time of Gregory VII.

Several ancients, as Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen, also, some moderns, as Grotius, distinguish Matthew from Levi son of Alphaeus, Mark ii. 14, Luke v. 27. These are their reasons: 1. Matthew is never named Levi, nor is Levi named Matthew, in the New Testament. 2. Heracleon, cited by Clemens Alexand. speaks of Matthew and Levi as of two different persons, and Clemens by not refuting this opinion, does as good as concur in it. 3. Origen writing against Celsus, says that Levi the publican, who followed Jesus Christ, is not of the number of the apostles, but only according to some copies of the gospel of Mark, and indeed some copies of Mark, and among others the Cambridge manuscript, read Mark ii. 14. Jesus saw James, son of Alphaeus. Others read, he saw Matthew the publican, instead of Levi the publican, as in the the Vulgate, in most of the Greek manuscripts, and in all the printed books. Grotius says, that Levi might be the head of the office, and Matthew one of the clerks, or subordinate officers; and that the feast at which our Lord was present might be in Levi's house, and not in Matthew's.

But, can these reasons be sufficient to invalidate so ancient an opinion, so well grounded, and so universally received by the church? The particular opinion of Heracleon, the doubt of Origen, the silence of Clemens, the reading of a few manuscripts, ought they to overthrow the authority of all other copies, printed or manuscript, with the consent of all other fathers, and of all ecclesiastical writers, from the apostles to our time? Add, that Origen himself, in the preface to his commentary on the epistle to the Romans, and in a fragment quoted in the Catena on Matthew, confirms the general opinion. Add, also, that M. Cotelier, and Dodwell, believe, that Levi distinguished from Matthew by Heracleon, is not Levi the publican, but Lebbeus, or Thaddeus the apostle.

St. Matthew wrote his gospel before he departed from Judæa. The believers in Palestine desired him to leave in writing what he had taught them while present. Some fathers tell us, that he was also desired to do this by the apostles. He wrote it at Jerusalem in the Hebrew or Syriac language, then common in Judæa. It is thought he began this work about A. D. 41, the eighth year after our Saviour's resurrection. Almost all the old Greek manuscripts have it thus at the end of his Gospel. The author of the unfinished commentary on Matthew, followed by Baronius and Cornelius à Lapide, pretends that he wrote it on occasion of the dispersion of the apostles, after the death of Stephen, about the third or fourth year after the resurrection. Iræneus thinks, that he composed it while Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome about A. D. 61. But if it be true, as is commonly believed, that Matthew was the first who committed the Gospel to writing, and that Mark made his abridgment of it about A. D. 43, it follows plainly, that it must be placed before the year 61. [See GOSPEL, MATTHEW'S.]

The Hebrew or rather Syriac Gospel of Matthew, Chaldaico Syroque sermone, sed Hebraicis literis scriptum, as Jerom speaks, lib. iii. Adv. Pel. cap. 1. was long in use among the Jewish converts to Christianity: and when they retired to Pella, before the Romans besieged Jerusalem, they carried it with them. From thence this gospel was diffused into Decapolis, and the countries on the other side Jordan, where the Judaizing Christians used it in the time of Epiphanius and of Eusebius of Cæsarea. Epiphanius. Hæres. 29. cap. 7. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 25. Nevertheless, these Christians did not preserve this sacred trust with due fidelity, but added to it several particulars, which perhaps they might have heard from the apostles, or from their disciples; these at first made it suspected by other believers. Afterwards, the Ebionites corrupted it by additions or omissions favourable to their own errors, so that it was given up by other churches, which persevered in sound doctrine, and adhered to the ancient Greek version, made from the Hebrew or Syriac, a little after [or during] Matthew's time.

In Origen's time the Hebrew gospel of the Judaizing Christians was no longer esteemed authentic; Eusebius puts it among the spurious writings; and extracts from it among the ancient fathers, very different from the present Greek, sufficiently prove it was corrupted. As examples, it was there mentioned, that the man to whom Christ said, "Go, sell all that thou hast, give it to the poor, and follow me,"—went his way, scratching his head, Orig. in Matt. Homil. iii. ed. Lat. Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. i. quotes from the same gospel, "He that will admire, shall reign, and he that shall reign shall be at rest." And this, Strom. lib. v. "My secret belongs to me, and to those of my house." Origen, on John. tom. ii. makes Jesus Christ say, according to this Hebrew gospel, "My mother the Holy Ghost has taken me by one of my hairs, and has set me upon the high mountain of Tabor." In the Hebrew, ruach, which signifies ghost or spirit, is of the feminine gender; whence he says, My mother the Holy Ghost. Elsewhere it was read, that the Holy Ghost speaking to Jesus Christ, after his baptism by John, said thus, "My son, I expected thy coming in all the prophets; thou art my well beloved son, who reignest eternally." And again, The mother of Jesus and his brethren said to him, there is John who baptizes for the remission of sins, let us go and be baptized by him. But he answered them, what evil have I committed, that I have occasion to be baptized by him? If even this that I have now said be not perhaps a sin of ignorance."

The Hebrew gospel of Matthew, though corrupted by the Ebionites, continued in purity in the hands of the Nazarenes, or the first believers of Palestine. Some of these Nazarenes remained to the time of Jerom, (on Isai. viii. 9. xxix. 20. xxxi. 6) who does not reproach them with any error like that of the Ebionites. They made no defalcations from the gospel, and rejected with contempt contempt the traditions of the Pharisees, though otherwise very zealous for observance of the law.

The true Hebrew gospel of Matthew, is no longer in being, so far as can be discovered; for those printed by Sebastian Munster, and Du Tillet, are modern, translated into Hebrew from the Latin or Greek. Others have maintained, that the Syriac gospel of Matthew, which is printed by itself, and in the Polyglots, was the original of Matthew. But they who have carefully examined this matter observe, that this translation is from the Greek. See Mill's Prolegomena.

Our Greek version of Matthew's gospel, which passes for the original, was made even in the apostolical times. The Translator is unknown. Some ascribe it to Matthew himself; others to James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem, Athanas. seu alius Addit. ad Synop.—others to John the evangelist, Theophyl. præf. in Matth. or to St. Paul, or to St. Luke, Anastas. Suait. Serm. viii. in Gen.—or to Barnabas. Papias in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 39. says, that many joined to translate it into Greek. The Latin translation was made from the Greek, and is almost as ancient as the Greek itself. But the author of it is equally unknown, and it is impossible to trace either the time or occasion of it.

Some moderns have thought fit to doubt of what we have advanced, according to the testimony of all the ancients, that Matthew wrote his gospel in the Hebrew characters and language; i. e. in Syriac, with a mixture of Hebrew and Chaldee. They maintain, (1) that Matthew wrote it in Greek, and that what is said of the pretended original Hebrew is a fiction, or is ill understood. (2) The Fathers, as Origen, Epiphanius, and Jerom, do not directly assert it; they quote it indeed, but as a book of no authority, which they would not have done had they been convinced, that this was the genuine original of Matthew's gospel. (3) If the church had ever entertained this notion of it, would they have suffered it to have been lost? (4) If Matthew wrote in Hebrew, should we have seen in this work the Hebrew names interpreted into Greek? Would he have cited the Old Testament according to the LXX. as he has always done? The Greek language was then very common in Palestine, in all the East, in the whole Roman empire, and in Rome itself. Paul writes to the Romans in Greek; Peter and James write in the same language to the Jews dispersed through the Eastern provinces; and Paul to the Hebrews of Palestine. (5) Since all the other authors of the New Testament wrote in Greek, why must Matthew alone write his gospel in Hebrew?—But it is not difficult to answer these reasons.

VOL. II. PART XIX. Edit. IV.

1. The uniform testimony of the ancients, who assert that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew, is certainly of very great weight. They did not speak at random; they had seen and had consulted this gospel, written in that language. It is true, they have not always spoken of it in a simple and uniform manner, but that might be because there were two gospels, one pure and uncorrupted, of which they have spoken with esteem; the other depraved by heretics, which they have condemned.

2. However common the Greek tongue might be, yet it is certain, the generality of the Jews spoke commonly Syriac and Chaldee, mixed with Hebrew words. This may be seen even by this gospel itself, which has preserved some Hebrew words pronounced by Jesus Christ; these are not noticed as any singularity, from which the reader might conclude it was not familiar to him: on the contrary it appears, that this was his ordinary language. And when St. Paul was seized in the temple, Acts xxi. 40. xxii. 2. he desired to speak to the Jewish populace, and made a speech to them in Hebrew.

3. The Hebrew names interpreted in Greek, in this gospel of Matthew, prove the direct contrary from what this argument would infer. For this demonstrates that the translation was Greek, and that the original was in Hebrew.

4. It is not true, that Matthew quotes Scripture according to the LXX. Of ten passages cited from the Old Testament, seven approach nearer to the Hebrew than to the LXX. and only three agree with them: but in these passages the Seventy and the Hebrew agree. Jerom maintains in general, that this evangelist follows the Hebrew in his quotations. But it is plain that commonly he quotes by memory, and relates not so much the words as the sense of a passage.

5. Though Paul, Peter, and James wrote in Greek to the Jews of Palestine, and to those dispersed in the East, nevertheless, Matthew might write in Hebrew. We do not affirm that he was obliged to write in this language, we only inquire whether he really did, or no? But this fact is attested by the ancients, many of whom had seen his original, and were very capable of judging of it; particularly Origen, Eusebius, and Jerom. To account how this ancient gospel has been lost, cannot be expected: but it is easy to conceive, that having been grossly corrupted by the Ebionites, it might fall into contempt, and then, by degrees, into oblivion. The Greek translation was valued and preserved, because it retained its primitive integrity, and is now become as authentic as the original.

Matthew in his gospel had chiefly in view, according to St. Austin, lib. i. de Consens. Evang.

vide et Theophil. proam. in Matth. to manifest the royal descent of Jesus Christ, and to represent the life of his humanity, in his conversation among men. St. Ambrose observes, that no evangelist enters so far into particulars of the actions of Jesus Christ, as Matthew, or has given us so many rules for the conduct of life, so many lessons of morality suitable to our necessities, and to the design of Christ. Petrus Damianus says, that Matthew holds the same place among the evangelists, as Moses does among the authors of the Old Testament; having been the first writer of the new law, as Moses was of the old. When he began to write, the great question among the Jews was, whether Jesus Christ were the Messiah, or no? Matthew undertakes to demonstrate it. He shews by his miracles that he was the Christ, that Mary his mother was a virgin, that Jesus was not come to destroy the law, but to accomplish it, that his miracles were no magical operations, nor effects of human power, but incontestible proofs of Divine interposition, and of the mission of Jesus.

If we compare Matthew with the other evangelists, we may observe a pretty remarkable difference in the order and succession of the actions of the life of our Saviour, from chapter iv. 22. to chapter xiv. 13. This diversity has perplexed chronologers and interpreters. Some have pretended that Matthew has followed the order of time, and that we ought to abide by his narration. Others have submitted to the authority of the other evangelists; and in truth it is more natural to assent to the testimony of three witnesses, than to that of one; and especially since Mark forsakes him in this, who usually follows him in other things. Some have imputed to mere chance this want of order in Matthew; others to choice and design. However that might be, it can be no prejudice to the truth of the facts, which are the essential part of the gospel; and as to the order of time, the sacred authors are not always solicitous about it.

There are certain apocryphal works imputed to Matthew, as the book of the "Infancy of Jesus Christ," condemned by pope Gelasius. The Ebionites also fathered some writings on this apostle: they had mangled his Hebrew gospel: they ascribed to him also an Ethiopic liturgy. The Ebionites, the Cerinthians, and other heretics, quoted the gospel of Matthew under the name of "the Gospel according to the Hebrews." It is also probable that this was the gospel known by the name of The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, The Gospel of the Nazarenes, and The Gospel according to St. Peter. Eusebius relates, that Pantenus a Christian philosopher, who lived at Alexandria about A. D. 184, found in the Indies a gospel of Matthew, which was said to have been carried thither by Bartholomew. Jerom, de Vir. Illus. cap. 36. and Rufinus say, that he brought it to Alexandria. Jerom also says, that there was a copy of the Hebrew text of Matthew in the library of Cæsarea in Palestine. In the third century Count Joseph found at Tiberias a Hebrew copy of Matthew, in a private place, where the Jews kept also the gospel of John, and the Acts of the Apostles, translated from Greek into Hebrew. Epiphanius, Hæres. xxx. n. 6. 'Ου μὲν ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον Εβραϊκὸν φηρὸν, &c. Non Genealogiam, Hebraicam, ut vult Petavius, sed genuinum opus Matthæi nativ. lingua, non è Græco versum, ut errant Evangel. Joan. et Act. Apost.

The Mahometans maintain, that Matthew wrote his gospel at Alexandria; but the Oriental Christians say only, that Bartholomew carried the gospel of Matthew into Egypt, and thence into Ethiopia [India]. Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria says, that John the evangelist, besides his own gospel that he wrote, translated also that of Matthew out of Hebrew into Greek: [which is not impossible.]

MATTHIAS, Matthias, an abridgment of Mattathias; which see.

I. MATTHIAS, the Apostle, was first in the rank of our Saviour's disciples, and one of those who continued with him from his baptism to his ascension. Acts i. 21, 22. It is very probable he was of the number of the Seventy, as Clemens Alexandrinus, and other ancients inform us, Strom. lib. iv. p. 488. Beda, Retract. in Act. tom. vi. p. 3. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 2. Epiphanius, de Christo, cap. 4. We have no particulars of his youth or education, for we may reckon as nothing what is read in Abdias (or Obadiah) concerning this matter. After the ascension of our Lord, the apostles retiring to Jerusalem in expectation of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, as had been promised, Peter proposed to fill up the place of Judas: to this the disciples agreed. Then they presented two persons, Joseph Barsabas, surnamed Justus; and Matthias. The lot falling on Matthias, he was from that time associated to the eleven apostles.

The Greeks believe that Matthias preached and died at Colchis. His life was published by a monk of St. Matthias of Treves, who says he had the original Hebrew from a Jew, who explained it to him in the vulgar tongue: in the twelfth century. Vide Bolland. loco citato, p. 441, &c.

This life expresses, that Matthias was of Bethlehem of Judah, of an illustrious family; that that in his youth he was well instructed by an excellent man called Simeon, that after Pentecost he had Palestine for his district, where he preached with great success, and did many miracles. That thirty-three years after our Lord's passion, Ananus the younger having put to death James the Less at Jerusalem, Matthias at the same time was apprehended in Galilee, and brought before Ananus, who seeing him persist in confessing Christ, he condemned him to be stoned. This was presently executed; and afterwards his head was cut off. But this history is not regarded as authentic, and the learned look on it as a pious fable. The Greeks place his feast August 9, the Latins February 24.

The ancient heretics trumped up a false gospel of Matthias, and the fathers mention it only to reject it.

II. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon son of Boëthus, A. M. 3999, four years before A. D. He was high-priest but one year. His successor was Joazer, son of his predecessor Simon. Herod the Great deposed Matthias, because he thought him engaged in the confederacy with Matthias son of Margaloth, and Judas son of Saripheus, who pulled down from over the gate of the temple the golden eagle that Herod had set up. Josephus relates, Ant. lib. xvii. cap. 8, that a seminal pollution happening to Matthias the night preceding the day of solemn expiation, he commissioned Joseph son of Ellem, his kinsman, to exercise the office of high-priest for that day only. Vide JOSEPH.

III. MATTHIAS, son of Ananus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Simon Cantharus, A. M. 4044, A. D. 41. He had for successor Ælioneus, son of Citheus, A. M. 4045, having held this dignity but one year.

IV. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Jesus, son of Gamaliel A. M. 4068, A. D. 65. He was deposed three years afterwards, to make way for Phannias, son of Samuel, the last high-priest of this nation; under whom the temple was taken and burnt by the Romans, A. D. 70. Under Matthias the war broke out between the Jews and the Romans. Matthias persuaded the people to let Simon Gioras come into Jerusalem, to set him up against John, and by that means to balance his power. But Simon seeing himself master of the city, soon forgot his obligations to Matthias, and put him to death, with three of his sons, without a hearing: for they were accused of being in the interest of the Romans. Josephus, de Bello lib. v. cap. 32.

V. MATTHIAS, or Mattathias, a Jew, of the party of the Macedonians, or of the Syrians; sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus, with proposals of peace. 2 Macc. xiv. 19. A. M. 3848, ante A. D. 161.

MATTHITHIAH, מַתִּיתִיָּה, Matthithias, gift of the Lord. See MATTATHIAS.

I. MATTHITHIAH, or Mathathias, son of Shellum, of the race of Korah, head of the fourteenth family of the Levites, 1 Chron. xxv. 21.

II. MATTHITHIAH, or Mattathias, son of Nabo; separated from his strange wife, Ezra x. 43.

[MAWER-AL-NAHR, BEYOND THE RIVER, i. e. the Jihoon. עֵבֶר הַיָּחוּן. Josh. xxiv. 2, 3.

Having supposed that the present province of this name is alluded to in Scripture, as the original country of the patriarch Abraham, I am desirous of submitting to the reader the best account I know of it; which is that of Ibn Haukal, who spends nearly fifty pages in describing it, and does little else than commend it, throughout. He seems to have visited this province, and considers it as containing whatever can delight the eye, or furnish enjoyments for human life. The following extract is from the beginning of his article.

It will appear evident to whoever peruses the account at large, that the Patriarch did not forsake this situation because it was disadvantageous in any sense, or because he was a distressed man. He was influenced, no doubt, by superior motives; in which Religion had its full share, as to himself, and to his posterity also: assuming, as is generally understood, that Abraham refused to acquiesce in the worship of idols, now gaining ground very fast in this country. I think, however, the promise of being made "a great nation," in a country more convenient for such enlargement than this fully peopled province could be, may be allowed to have had its effect on the mind of Abraham, without any impeachment of his religious motives. Compare the districts around Lebanon, (north) as to their resemblance to this province. The sands of the south of Judah were extremely inferior.

"On the eastern side of Mawer-al-nahr are the borders of Hindoostan. To the west it has the land of Ghaznein, and the borders of Touran, and down to Farab, and Markand, and Soghd, and Samarcand, and the district of Bokhara, as far as Kharazan, and the coast of the sea (Deria). Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DV.

"On the north of Mawer-al-nahr are the borders of Turkestan, as far as Ferghanah, and down towards Khotl, on the river Heriat. To the south, Mawer-al-nahr begins from Badakshan, along the river Jihoon, up to the sea or lake of Kharazm.

"The province of Mawer-al-nahr is one of the most flourishing and productive within the regions of Islam, or Mahomedanism. The inhabitants are people of probity and virtue, averse from evil, and fond of peace. Such is the fertility and abundance of this country, that if the other regions were afflicted by a scarcity or famine, the stock laid up on the preceding year in Mawer-al-nahr would afford ample provision for them all. Every kind of fruit and meat abounds there; and the water is most delicious. The cattle are excellent: the sheep from Turkestan, Ghaznein, and Samarcand, are highly esteemed in all places.

"Mawer-al-nahr affords raw silk, wool, and hair, in great quantities. Its mines yield silver, and tin or lead, abundantly; and they are better than the other mines, except those of silver at Penjhir; but Mawer-al-nahr affords the best copper and quicksilver, and other similar productions of mines; and the mines of sal ammoniac (used in tinning or soldering, in all Khorasan) are there. Like the paper made at Samarcand, there is not any to be found elsewhere. So abundant are the fruits of Soghd, and Aster-sheineh, and Ferghanah, and Chaje (or Shash,) that they are given to the cattle as food. Musk is brought from Tibet, and sent to all parts. Fox-skins, sable, and ermine skins, are all to be found at the bazars of Mawer-al-nahr.

"Such is the generosity and liberality of the inhabitants, that no one turns aside from the rites of hospitality; so that a person contemplating them in this light, would imagine that all the families in the land were but one house. When a traveller arrives there, every person endeavours to attract him to himself, that he may have opportunities of performing kind offices for the stranger; and the best proof of their hospitable and generous disposition is, that every peasant, though possessing but a bare sufficiency, allows a portion of his cottage for the reception of his guest. On the arrival of a stranger, they contend, one with another, for the pleasure of taking him to their home, and entertaining him. Thus, in acts of hospitality, they expend their incomes. The author of this work says, "I happened once to be in Soghd, and there I saw a certain palace, or great building, the doors of which were fastened back with nails against the walls. I asked the reason of this: and they informed me, that it was an hundred years, and more, since those doors had been shut: all that time they had continued open, day and night: strangers might arrive there at the most unseasonable hours, or in any numbers; for the master of the house had provided every thing necessary both for the men and for their beasts: [Comp. the history of Laban, Gen. xxiv. 23, 25.] and he appeared with a delighted and joyful countenance when the guests tarried awhile. Never have I heard of such things in any other country. The rich and great lords of most other places, expend their treasures on particular favourites, in the indulgence of gross appetites and sensual gratifications. The people of Mawer-al-nahr employ themselves in a useful and rational manner; they lay out their money in erecting caravan-serais or inns, building bridges, and such works. You cannot see any town or stage, or even desert, in Mawer-al-nahr, without a convenient inn or stage house for the accommodation of travellers, with every thing necessary. I have heard that there are above two thousand rebats or inns in Mawer-al-nahr, where as many persons as may arrive shall find sufficient forage for their beasts, and meat for themselves."

"The author of the book further says, "I have heard from a respectable person who was with Nasseh Ahmed, in the war of Samarcand, that of all his immense army, the greater part were men of Mawer-al-nahr; and I have heard that Motasem wrote a letter to Abdallah ben Taher, and sent a letter to Noah ben Asak. The answer of Abdallah was, that in Mawer-al-nahr there are three hundred thousand kulabs: each kulab furnishes one horseman and one foot-soldier; and the absence of these men, when they go forth, is not felt, or is not perceptible in the country. I have heard, that the inhabitants of Chaje and Ferghanah are so numerous, and so well disciplined, and furnished with implements of war, that they are not equalled in any region of Islam. And among the lower classes there are farmers, who possess from one hundred to five hundred head of cattle. Notwithstanding all this, there are not any people more obedient to their kings: and at all times the Turk soldiers had the precedence of every other race, and the Khalifs always chose them on account of their excellent services, their obedient disposition, their bravery, and their fidelity.

"Mawer-al-nahr has produced so many great princes and generals, that no region can surpass it. The bravery of its inhabitants cannot be exceeded in any quarter of the Mussulman world. Their numbers and their discipline give them an advantage over other nations, which, if an army be defeated, or a body of troops lost at sea, cannot furnish another army for a considerable time; but in all Mawer-al-nahr should such accidents happen, one tribe is ready to supply the losses of another without delay.

"In all the regions of the earth, there is not a more flourishing or a more delightful country than this, especially the district of Bokhara. If a person

a person stand on the Kobendiz (or ancient castle) of Bokhara, and cast his eyes around, he shall not see any thing but beautiful green, and luxuriant verdure on every side of the country: so that he would imagine the green of the earth and the azure of the heavens were united: and as there are green fields in every quarter, so there are villas interspersed among the green fields. And in all Khorasan and Mawer-al-nahr there are not any people more long-lived than those of Bokhara.

"It is said that in all the world there is not any place more delightful (or salubrious) than these three: one, the Soghd of Samarcand; another, the Rud-Aileh; and the third, the Ghutah of Damascus." But the Ghutah of Damascus is within one farsang of barren and dry hills, without trees; and it contains many places which are desolate, and produce no verdure. "A fine prospect ought to be such as completely fills the eye, and nothing should be visible but sky and green." The river Aileh affords, for one farsang only, this kind of prospect; and there is not, in the vicinity of it, any eminence from which one can see beyond a farsang; and the verdant spot is either surrounded by, or opposite to, a dreary desert. But the walls, and buildings, and cultivated plains of Bokhara extend above thirteen farsang by twelve farsang; and the Soghd, for eight days journey, is all delightful country, affording fine prospects, and full of gardens and orchards, and villages, corn fields, and villas, and running streams, reservoirs, and fountains, both on the right hand and on the left. You pass from corn fields into rich meadows and pasture lands; and the Soghd is far more healthy than the Rud Aileh, or the Ghutah of Dameshk (Damascus); and the fruits of Soghd are the finest in the world. Among the hills and palaces flow running streams, gliding between the trees. In Ferghanah and Chaje, in the mountains between Ferghanah and Turkestan, there are all kinds of fruits, of herbs, and flowers, and various species of the violet: all these it is lawful for any one who passes by, to pull and gather. In Siroushteh there are flowers of an uncommon species.

"The river Jihoon rises within the territories of Badakshan, and receives the waters of many other streams. This river is frozen in winter, so that loaded carriages pass over it.

"There are mines of gold and silver in Wekshab. The mountainous country, bordering upon Tibet, is very populous, well cultivated, abounding in fruits, and excellent cattle; and the climate is very pure and healthy." Saffron is cultivated, and madder.

"In Ferghaneh there are mines of sal-ammoniac, and of copperas or vitriol, of iron, and quicksilver, and brass; also of gold, and of turquoise stone; and in this mountain there are springs of naphtha, and of bitumen, and resin; also a stone that takes fire and burns. There is, likewise, water, which in summer is frozen, and in the depth of winter is warm."]

MAXIMIANOPOLIS, a city of Palestine; the same as Hadad-Rimmon, in the valley of Jezreel, and in the country of Megiddo. An ancient traveller places it seventeen miles from Cæsarea, and ten from Jezreel. Hieronym. ad Zach. xii. et ad Hosea i.

[MAZZAROTH, מַזְזָרוֹת, Job xxxviii. 32. Our margin supposes this word to denote the twelve signs of the Zodiac; which appears to have been the sentiment of Chrysostom, long ago. Some think the root is מַזְרָא, to gird, whence, says Castellus, the girdle, or belts of the constellations, מַזְזָרוֹת מַזְרָא. Whether this were known so early as the days of Job, under the notion of a girdle, may be questioned. The Zodiac, or animal-pictured girdle, is a broad circle in the heavens, comprehending all such stars as lie in the path of the sun and moon. As these luminaries appear to proceed throughout this circle, annually, so different parts of it progressively receive them every month, and this progression seems to be what is meant by "bringing forth mazzaroth in his season." q. d. "Canst thou by thy power cause the revolutions of the heavenly bodies in the Zodiac, and the seasons of summer and winter, which ensue on their progress into their regular annual, or monthly, situations?" Comp. FRAG. No. DIII.]

MEARAH, מַעְרָה, Σιδώνιον, or Maara-Sidoniorum, cavern; from מַעַר mahar: otherwise, he that discovers himself, or spreads himself; from מַעַר harah: or that awakes; from מַעַר hur.

MEARAH, or Maara, of the Sidonians, Josh. xiii. 4. Some understand it of a city, others of a cave, or a meadow, in the country of the Sidonians. But it is better to understand it, with Junius, of the river Magoras, which falls into the Mediterranean sea, between Sidon and Berytus. The Hebrew Mearah, or Maara, may very easily be pronounced Magora. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 18.

MEASURE. See the general table of Weights, Measures, and Money, of the Hebrews. Also the particular names of each; Shekel, Talent, Bath, Ephah, &c.

MEN OF MEASURE, of extraordinary stature, proceræ staturæ, as Jerom translates: Numb. xiii. 33. אֲנָשֵׁי מִדָּוָה. Thou feedest them with the bread bread of tears, and givest them tears to drink in great measure. Heb. in three measures, Thou shalt drink also water by measure, scantily: Ezek. iv. 11. Vide Judith. vii. 11. The scant measure is abominable, Mic. vi. 10. Heb. an ephah. The ephah was a measure of capacity.

Our Saviour says, John iii. 34. that "God giveth not the Spirit by measure," i. e. to his Son; whereas to others he giveth it by measure, as St. Paul says, Rom. xii. 3. "According as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." And Ephes. iv. 7. "But unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ." And 2 Cor. x. 13. "But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you." And Ephes. iv. 13. "Till we all come—unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." Till we all arrive at the measure of the age of the fulness of Jesus Christ. Many have thought that the age of the fulness of Jesus Christ was the age at which he died, and that the dead shall rise at that age. Jerom says, this was a tradition of the churches. Others understand it of that perfection, at which we ought to endeavour, conformable to Jesus Christ, in a perfect age: a mature, complete, full attainment.

Isaiah, says, xxviii. 17. "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet," God will proportion his corrections to the greatness of sins; and when crimes are excessive, he will break the criminals to pieces with the weight of his judgments, and justice. And chap. xxvii. 8. "In measure when it shooteth forth thou wilt debate with it. God has rejected the enemies of his people, and has judged and punished them with a full and adequate measure.

MEATS. The Hebrews had several kinds of animals which they refused to eat. Vide ANIMALS. Among domestic animals they only ate the cow, the sheep, and the goat: also the hen and the pigeon, among domestic birds: and several kinds of game.—To eat the flesh with the blood was forbid, much more to eat the blood without the flesh. We may form a judgment of their taste by what the Scripture mentions of Solomon's table, 1 Kings iv. 22, 23. Thirty measures of the finest wheat-flour were provided for it every day, and twice as much of the ordinary sort; twenty stall-fed oxen, twenty pasture-oxen, a hundred sheep, besides the venison of deer, roebucks, does, and wild-fowl. The lamb and kid were esteemed delicacies. Rebekah prepared such for Isaac, to procure his blessing for Jacob. Moses appointed it for the feast of the passover. Manoah offered a boiled kid to the angel, who foretold the birth of Samson. Samson carried a kid, as a present, to his wife.

It does not appear that the ancient Hebrews were very nice about the seasoning and dressing of their food. We find among them roast-meat, boiled-meat, and ragouts. They roasted the paschal lamb; meats that were offered were boiled in a pot; for the sons of Eli the high-priest took flesh out of the pots of those who offered sacrifices, saying they would have it raw, that they might dress it their own way. 1 Sam. ii. 15. Rebekah made a ragout, or stewed meat, for Isaac, and served it up to him in the manner she knew he loved, Gen. xxvii. 4, 14. Salt was the only seasoning that I can find ordered, in the meat prepared in the temple. The greater part of our present spices, were unknown to the ancient Hebrews. At this day in Palestine they use honey in many of their ragouts: oil, with perhaps some aromatic herbs. The paschal lamb was eat with bitter herbs, perhaps mustard. See PASSOVER.

Moses, Exod. xxiii. 19. xxxiv. 26. forbids to seethe a kid in its mother's milk, which may be understood as forbidding to sacrifice it while it sucked; or literally, that it should not be boiled in the milk of its dam; as the Hebrews explain it. They never mingle milk in any ragout or hashed meat, and eat not at the same meal first meat, then milk, or butter, or cheese, for fear that any remains of the meat should stick in their teeth, and mix with the cheese. But they eat cheese some time before, and meat afterwards. They are so cautious of dressing meat with any thing made of milk, that they do not use the same implements for meat, and for butter, milk, or cheese: but have different knives, spoons, and plates for each; and if by mistake, either of these foods has been dressed by the utensils belonging to the other, they not only refuse to eat of it, but if the vessel be an earthen one, they make no farther use of it. Leo of Modena, Part i. cap. 6.

They eat no cheese of which they have not seen the making, for fear the milk of any unclean animal may have been mixed with it; or that some part of the skin may be mixed with the curd, which might be taken for flesh or cheese; or that it may have been warmed in a kettle, wherein forbidden meat has been boiled. They mark that cheese which they have seen made. In the mountains of Vooges I have seen Jews, who came themselves to make their own cheeses in the houses of Christians, where cows were kept.

They

They might not kill a cow and its calf in the same day; nor a sheep, or goat, and its young one at the same time. They might not cut off a part of a living animal to eat it, either raw or dressed. If any lawful beast or bird, should die of itself, or be strangled, and the blood not drain away, they were not allowed to taste of it. Also, if in birds were found any thorn, pin, or needle, that had gored them, or in beasts any imposthume, or disease of their entrails, or that they had been bitten by any beast, they were not to eat of them by the express law. Exod. xxii. 31. Levit. v. 2. vii. 24. xvii. 15. xxii. 8. He that by inadvertence should eat of an animal that died of itself, or that was killed by any beast, was to be unclean till the evening, and was not purified till he had washed his clothes.

If an animal, though alive, yet should have a bone broke in one of the limbs mentioned by the Rabbins, or was wounded and in danger of dying; it was not to be eat, for fear of eating, unawares, the flesh of some impure animal. They ate of nothing dressed by any other than a Jew, nor dressed their victuals with the kitchen implements of any but one of their own nation; nor did they use another man's knife.

The Rabbins had appointed, that at the same meal they were not to eat of fish and flesh, under pretence of its not being wholesome; but now this is not observed. As to fish, they eat indifferently all that are allowed to be eaten according to the law, without any scruple as to the blood, or the fat, or rejection of such as are dead or imperfect; because the law is silent on these matters.

The prohibition of eating blood, or animals that are strangled, has been always rigidly observed by the Jews. They do not so much as eat an egg, if there appears the least streak of blood in it. When an animal is to be killed, it must be performed by a skilful person, because of the circumstances to be observed. For, the time must be proper for the action, the knife must be very sharp, and without notches, that the blood may run without interruption: they let it spill itself on the ground, or on ashes, and take it up again afterwards. And the better to perform this, they put the meat into salt for an hour, before they put it into the pot, that the blood may quite run out; otherwise they must not eat the meat, except they roast it. And as the liver abounds with blood, they must broil it on the coals before they boil it.

They take great care to cut away the sinew of the thigh of such animals as they intend to eat, according to Gen. xxxii. 32. And in several places of Germany and Italy, the Jews will not eat any of the hinder quarter, because great nicety is required in taking away this sinew as it should be done; and few know how to do it exactly.

They forbear eating any fat of oxen, sheep, goats, and animals of this kind, according to Levit. vii. 23. &c. But other kind of fat, they think is allowed them. Vide FAT.

Very good commentators maintain, that the fat of clean animals was not forbid to the Jews, only when offered in sacrifice; and that the fat intermixed with the flesh was not forbid in any case, except where the flesh itself was forbid.

In the Christian church, the custom of refraining from things strangled, and from blood, continued a long time. In the council of the apostles, held at Jerusalem, it was declared, that converts from Paganism should not be subject to the legal ceremonies, but that they should refrain from idolatry, from fornication, from eating blood, and from such animals as were strangled, and thereby the blood retained in their bodies; which decree was observed for many ages by the church. Tertullian, Athenagoras, Minutius Felix, Justin Martyr, in their Apologies for the Christian Religion, the holy martyr Biblis, who suffered about A. D. 79, in answer to the Pagans, who accused the Christians of killing children and drinking their blood in their assemblies, made this defence, "that the Christian religion would not so much as allow them to drink the blood of any animal whatever." [à fortiori, not human blood.]

The council of Gangre A. D. 324, the council of Trullo, A. D. 692, the second council of Arles, A. D. 533, that of Worms, A. D. 868, the fifty-eighth constitution of the emperor Leo; pope Zachary, Ep. xiii. writing to Boniface in 751, unanimously relate, that the prohibition of eating blood and things strangled, was observed in their times. Jerom notices, that they religiously abstained from things strangled and from blood in all the Oriental and Roman churches.

Under pope Leo IX. in the eleventh century, cardinal Humbert, legate from the holy See to Constantinople, making reply to the Grecians, declares, that in the church they refrained from creatures that were strangled by the negligence of men, dead of themselves, or drowned; and that they imposed a severe penance on such, who without any pressing necessity acted contrary to these rules. But at the same time he acknowledges, that they made no scruple of eating birds taken in hunting, and wild fowls caught with dogs. That in this they only followed the precepts of the apostles, who appointed that men should eat indifferently of all things sold sold in the shambles, and of every thing fit to eat, not asking questions for conscience sake, 1 Cor. x. 27. St. Austin, who was much more ancient than cardinal Humbert, affirms, that in the church they observed the distinction of certain foods, so long as the wall of separation was kept up between the Jews and the converted Gentiles; and that the Christian church composed of these two sorts of people, was not yet intirely formed. But, after that there were no longer any Israelites according to the flesh, there were no longer any persons who scrupled eating of animals that were killed without letting the blood run out; and those who retain any superstition in this matter, are exposed to the railery of others. Cont. Faust. lib. xxiii. cap. 13.

This shews the sentiments of this father, and the practice of the church of Africa in his time. In many other places they observed the canon of the apostles, down to the tenth and eleventh century. The Greeks to this day will not eat the blood after it is separated from the flesh; and more learned men than one in the last century contended, that this prohibition ought to continue in force. Of this opinion were Salmasius, Blondell, de Courcelles, Gerard Vossius, and Grotius.

Many of the ancients, speaking of the prohibition made by the apostles at the council of Jerusalem, notice only what is forbid as to the eating of blood, without mentioning strangled animals. St. Austin, and Gaudentius of Bresse, look on the words a suffocato as a gloss added to the text, to explain what was meant by forbidding the eating of blood. But the Greek and Latin copies, both printed and manuscript, almost all, as well as the fathers, take them as two different prohibitions, (1) that of eating creatures which had been strangled, (2) that of eating blood. Some ancients, by the words à sanguine, thought murder to be forbidden, or the effusion of blood; but such a prohibition by the council of Jerusalem must have been needless. Several Greek manuscripts, and some Latin, after these words, à suffocato et sanguine, add, and do not to another what you would not have done to yourself: which is a gloss, added without necessity.

MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS, called in Greek, Ἰδωλόθυτα ἑσθίειν, Idolothyta: 1 Cor. viii. 7, 10. At the first settling of the church there were great disputes concerning the use of meats offered to idols. Some newly converted Christians, convinced that an idol was nothing, and that the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was abolished by our Saviour, they ate indifferently of whatever was served up to them, even among Pagans, without enquiring whether these meats had been offered to idols. They took the same liberty in buying meat sold in the market, not regarding whether it were pure or impure, according to the Jews; or whether it had been offered to idols. For, among the heathen, as well as among the Jews, there were several sacrifices, in which only a part was offered on the altar, the rest belonging to him who offered it, which he disposed of at his pleasure, or ate with his friends.

But other Christians, weaker, or less instructed, were offended at this liberty, and thought that eating of meat which had been offered to idols, was a kind of partaking in that wicked and sacrilegious offering. This diversity of opinion produced some scandal, to which St. Paul thought it behoved him to provide a remedy, Rom. xiv. 20. Tit. i. 15. He determined therefore, that all things were clean to such as were clean, and that an idol was nothing at all. That a man might safely eat of whatever was sold in the shambles, and need not scrupulously enquire from whence it came. That if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him, &c. 1 Cor. x. 25, 26, 27, &c.

But at the same time St. Paul enjoins, that the laws of charity and prudence should be observed; that believers should be cautious of scandalizing or offending weak minds; for though all things might be lawful, yet all things were not always expedient. That no one ought to seek his own accommodation or satisfaction, exclusively, but each should have regard to that of his neighbour. That if any one should warn another, "this has been offered to idols," he should not eat of it, for the sake of him who gave the warning, not so much for fear of wounding his own conscience, as his brother's: in a word, that he who is weak, and thinks he may not indifferently use all sorts of food, should forbear, and eat herbs, Rom. xiv. 1, 2.

And yet it is certain, that generally Christians abstained from eating meat that had been offered to idols. See Rev. ii. 20. where the angel of Thyatira is reproved for suffering a Jezebel in his church, who called herself a prophetess, seduced the servants of God, to commit impurity, and to eat meat that had been consecrated to idols. Tertullian says, de Jejuniis, that St. Paul has put the key of the flesh-market into our hands, by allowing us the use of all sorts of meat, except that which has been offered to idols. We know that in the persecutions by the Roman emperors, they often polluted the flesh sold in the shambles, by consecrating it to idols, that they might reduce the Christians to the necessity of purchasing that, MEBUNNAI, מְבֻנָּי, Meḇunai, son, or filiation; from בָּן ben: otherwise, a building; from בָּנָה banah, to build: or understanding; from בִּינָה binah.

MEBUNNAI, or MOBANAI, the Hushathite, a valiant man of David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 27. The same as Sibbecai of Hushah, or the Hushathite, 1 Chron. xi. 29.

MECHERATHITE, מְכֵרֶתִי, Meḵerathi, sale: from מָכַר macar, to sell: or knowledge; from יָדָע yaḏ'ar, to know. 1 Chron. xi. 36.

MEDAD, מֵדָד, Meḏād, he that measures; from מָדַד madad: otherwise, the water of love, or of paps, or of the uncle; from מֵי mi, waters, and דָּד dud, uncle, or friendship; or from דָּד dad, pap or nipple.

MEDAD and Eldad: these two men were among those, whom God inspired with his holy Spirit, to assist Moses in the government, Numb. xi. 26, 30. See ELDAD. The Jews pretend, that Eldad and Medad were brothers by the mother's side to Moses, and sons of Jochebed and Elizaphan. Others say that Amram the father of Moses, having divorced his wife Jochebed, married another wife, by whom he had Eldad and Medad. Vid. Tradit. Hebr. in 1 Paralip. iv. 17. Jerom says they continued in the camp out of humility, thinking themselves unworthy the honour intended them. Some ancient impostor composed a book under the name of Eldad and Medad, of which a fragment is preserved in Hermas. The Lord is near to those who are converted, as it is written in Heldam and Modal, who prophesied to the people in the wilderness. The Rabbins are divided about the subject of their prophesies. Some say they prophesied concerning Gog and Magog; others about the quails that the Israelites were quickly to receive; others that they foretold the death of Moses, and the exaltation of Joshua. *Hieron. I. MEDAN. Some write that Medan is Magedan, Matt. xv. 39. the waters of Dan, or the fountain whence rises the river Jordan.

Others think that Medan in Arabic signifies a fair, and that this name is given to the lake Phiala, and the country around it, because during the summer season there was in this place a perpetual fair. *Vide Roland, Palest. lib. i. cap. 41. II. MEDAN, or Madan, third son of Abraham and Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. There is much probability, that Medan and Midian his brother, peopled the country of Midian or Madian, east of the Dead sea: very different from another country of Midian east of the Red Sea. MEDEBA, מֵדְבָא, waters of trouble, or of force; from מֵי mi, water, and דְּבָא daba, and from דָּאב daab, trouble, by a transposition of letters: or, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, running waters. See MEDABA.

MEDEBA, or MEDABA, MADABA, MEDAVA, a city beyond Jordan, in the southern parts of Reuben, Josh. xiii. 16. Eusebius says, Medeba was not far from Heshbon. Isaiah, xv. 2. assigns it to Moab, because the Moabites took it from the Israelites. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2. and some others, ascribe it to the Arabians, because the Arabians made themselves masters of it towards the conclusion of the Jewish monarchy. The inhabitants of Medaba having killed John Gaddis, brother of Judas Maccabæus, as he was passing to the country of the Nabatheans: quickly afterwards Simon and Jonathan his brethren revenged his death on the children of Jambri, as they were conducting a bride to her husband. MEDES, מֵדִים, Mēḏoi, inhabitants of Media. It is commonly thought, that Media was peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2.—Esther, (i. 3, 14, 18, 19. x. 2.) and Daniel, (v. 28. vi. 3, 12, 15. viii. 20.) commonly put Madai for the Medes, and so interpreters understand it. The Greeks maintain, that this country takes name from Medus son of Medea; and truly if what has been said under the article MADAI may be relied on, or if this son of Japheth peopled Macedonia, we must then seek another origin for the people of Media, Strabo, lib. i. xi. And indeed it is difficult to comprehend, how Japheth the father of those who peopled the islands of the nations, Gen. x. 5. should send Madai so far into Asia, beyond the Euphrates, to a country so very distant. But if Madai and his immediate descendants did not people Media, yet some of his posterity might have carried his name thither, since we find it so often given to Media, from the time of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, and from the transportation of the ten tribes, and the destruction of Samaria, under Salmanasser, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721. The expedition of the Argonauts, in which was the rape of Medea, took place A. M. 2760, about forty years before the taking of Troy; so that there is nothing impossible in this conjecture of the Greeks, that Media took its name from Medus son of Jason and Medea; and nothing contrary to Scripture, which speaks of the Medes from the time of Salmanasser, A. M. 3283. From the expedition of the Argonauts, to the capture of Samaria, are 523 years.

Media has been taken in sometimes a larger, and sometimes a narrower, extent. Ptolemy makes its limits to the north to be a part of the Caspian sea, and the mountains of the same name, and the Cadusians; the greater Armenia west, the countries of the Parthians and Hyrcania, east, Persia, Susiana, and a part of Assyria south. The capital of Media was Ecbatana, Judith i. 1. The author of Judith makes king Arphaxad, whom we take to be the same as Phraortes, to have at least improved and adorned this city, if not to have been the founder of it. Yet Herodotus, lib. i. says expressly, that Dejoces first undertook this work. But, as the undertaking was very great, it is probable he left enough to his successor Phraortes to complete, to entitle him to be called the builder of it, and to verify what is said in Judith. See ECBATANA. Rages was also in Media; Tob. i. 14. iii. 7. and Salmanasser placed the ten tribes of Israel, which he carried beyond Euphrates, in cities of Media, 2 Kings xvii. 6. xviii. 11.

Isaiah describes the Medes, as instruments and executioners of God's decrees against Babylon. "Behold I will stir up the Medes against them," chap. xiii. 17, 18. See also chap. xxi. 2, 8. Jeremiah, xiv. 25. speaks of the misfortunes which were to happen to the Medes. He foretels, that they also in their turn, were to drink of the cup of God's wrath; and it is likely Cyrus made them suffer the evils they were here threatened with. But Darius the Mede succeeded to the kingdom of Belshazzar, king of Chaldaea, and Cyrus succeeded Darius. Daniel, who informs us of this succession, chap.

v. 31. xiii. 65. relates no particulars of it; though the other prophets, who speak of the affairs of the Medes and of Babylon, sufficiently shew that these revolutions were not effected without war. After Darius the successor of Belshazzar, all the kings of Babylon assume the title of kings of the Persians and Medes, or kings of the Medes and Persians.

- 3294. Dejoces is chosen king of the Medes, ante A. D. 710. before the beginning of Cyrus 150: according to Herodotus; thirty seven years after Arbaces had set the Medes at liberty. Dejoces reigned fifty-three years.
- 3347. Phraortes his son succeeded him, ante A. D. 657. He reigned twenty-two years, and died at the siege of Niniveh.
- 3369. Cyaxares, son of Phraortes, forty years. While he was at the siege of Niniveh, the Scythians made an irruption into his dominions, and continued masters of them twenty-eight years. At length Cyaxares drove them out of Media.
- 3370. Cyaxares, son of Phraortes, forty years.
- 3398. Astyages his son, named Ahasuerus, Daniel ix. 1. ante A. D. 595. reigned thirty-five years.
- 3444. Darius the Mede succeeded Astyages in the kingdom of the Medes, ante A. D. 560. He is called Cyaxares in Xenophon, and Astyages in the Greek of Daniel. He succeeded Belshazzar his nephew in the kingdom of Babylon, or of the Chaldees, in 3448, and died in 3466. He left the kingdom to
- 3466. Cyrus his nephew, who united the monarchies of the Persians and Medes, ante A. D. 538.

MEDIA, Media, measure, habit, or covering; from mad: or abundance; from mad meod.

MEDIA, MEDEKE, MEDENA PROVINCIA, Ezr. vi. 2. The country of the Medes, Heb. madai. In Media, in the castle or palace of Ecbatana, was found the original grant or instrument of Cyrus the Great allowing the Jews to return and settle in their own country. [MEDIA, is now called by the Persians, Aderbigan, "the region of fire," as it abounds with spontaneous fires; and the inhabitants are prone to worship them. The principal is at Baku, where the springs of Naptha are; exhalations from which readily take fire, as they rise from the earth.

Media is a province of Asia, having to the east the Caspian sea, and Parthia, to the south the Sittacene, Susiana, and Persia, to the west Adiabene, Adiabene, to the north Armenia. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 23. It was so called, says Josephus, from Madaï son of Japhet, Ant. lib. i. cap. 14. but Strabo derives this name from Medo son of Medea. Ptolemy, lib. vi. cap. 2. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 14. Jerom, on Jer. xxv. places it between the rivers Indus and Tigris. See MADAI, MACEDONIA, and PLATES, MEDALS of MACEDONIA.]

MEDIATOR. In covenants between man and man, wherein the holy name of God is used, God is witness and Mediator of all reciprocal promises and engagements. Thus Laban and Jacob made a covenant on Mount Gilead, Gen. xxx. 40—54; and when the elders of Gilead made a covenant with Jephthah, they called on the name of the Lord, Judg. xi. 10.

When God gave his law to the Hebrews, and made a covenant with them at Sinai, a Mediator was necessary, who should relate the words of God to the Hebrews, and their answers to God; in order that the articles of the covenant being agreed to by each party, they might be ratified and confirmed by blood, and by oath. Moses on this occasion was mediator between God and the people, as St. Paul says, Galat. iii. 19. "The law was added because of transgressions —, and was ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator."

In the new covenant that God has been pleased to make with the Christian church, Jesus Christ is the Mediator of redemption between God and man. He was the surety, the sacrifice, the priest, and the intercessor of this covenant. He has sealed it with his blood, has proposed the terms and conditions of it in his gospel, has instituted the form of it in baptism, and the commemoration of it in the sacrament of his body and blood. St. Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews enlarges on this office of Mediator of the New Covenant, exercised by Jesus Christ, Heb. viii. 6. ix. 25. xii. 24. Vide also Tim. ii. 5.

[In all ages, and in all parts of the world, there has constantly prevailed such a sense of the infinite holiness of the supreme Divinity, with so deep a conviction of the imperfections of human nature, and the guilt of man, as deterred worshippers from coming directly into the presence of a Being so awful:—recourse has, therefore been had to Mediators. Among the Sabians the Celestial Intelligences were constituted Mediators; among other Idolaters their various idols; and this notion prevails at this day, in Hindostan, and elsewhere. Sacrifices were thought to be a kind of Mediators. And, in short; there has been a universal feeling, a sentiment never forgot, on the necessity of an interpreter, or Mediator, between God and man. As Luther said—"I will have nothing to do with an absolute God."]

MEDICINE, or Physic. Jesus son of Sirach, ascribes the invention of physic to God himself, Ecclus. xxxviii. 1, 2, 3, &c. "Honour a physician with the honour due unto him, for the uses which you may have of him; for the Lord hath created him." &c. Scripture makes no mention of physicians before the time of the patriarch Joseph: who commanded his servants, the physicians, ἰατρον, of Egypt, to embalm the body of Jacob, Gen. l. 2. The business of these physicians was to embalm the bodies of the dead, and to cure the diseases of the living. The art of medicine was very ancient in Egypt. They ascribed the invention of it to Thaut, or to Hermes, or to Osiris, or to Isis; and some of the learned have thought, (as Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. Ἐστὶν τε ἰατρικὴν, ἀπὸ καὶ μυστικὴν) that Moses having been instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, he must also have known the chief secrets of medicine. They also prove it, by his indications concerning diseases, the leprosy, infirmities of women, animals clean and unclean, &c. It does not appear that physicians were common among the Hebrews, especially for internal maladies. But for wounds, fractures, bruises, and external injuries, they had physicians, (i. e. surgeons) who understood the dressing and binding up of wounds, with the application of medicaments. Vide Jerem. viii. 22. xli. 11. Ezek. xxx. 21.

But in internal distempers, as fevers, gout, pains of the bowels, or of the head, the plague, &c. we hear neither of remedies nor physicians. Aas being diseased in his feet, and having applied to physicians, is upbraided with it, as contrary to that confidence which he ought to have had in the Lord, 1 Kings xv. 23. 2 Chron. xvi. 12. Hezekiah having a boil, [probably pestilential,] was cured by Isaiah, by the application of a cataplasm of figs. 2 Kings xx. 7. Isai. xxxviii. 21. But there was no remedy known for the leprosy, or for distempers the consequences of incontinence. When Job was afflicted with a very terrible distemper, we hear no mention of recourse to physic or to physicians; his malady was looked on as an immediate stroke from the hand of God, his friends reason about it according to their prejudices, and undertake to prove, that it visited him as a just punishment for past sins.

The little employment of the art of medicine, with the persuasion that distempers were effects of God's anger, or caused by evil spirits, executioners of his vengeance, was the reason that in extraordinary maladies the sufferers applied to diviners, magicians, enchanters, or to false gods. Sometimes they applied to the prophets of the Lord for cure, or, at least, to know whether they should recover or not. When Ahaziah, king of Israel, by a fall from the roof of his house, was greatly hurt, he sent to consult the false god Baal-zebub at Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2, &c. Jeremiah, viii. 17. speaks of enchantments used against the biting of serpents, and other venomous animals, Hazael was sent by the king of Syria to consult Elisha the prophet as to the issue of his distemper, 2 Kings viii. 8. Naaman the Syrian came into the land of Israel, to obtain from Elisha a cure for his leprosy, 2 Kings v. 5. 6. When our Saviour appeared in Palestine, no doubt there were physicians in that country; but it appears that the people made little use of them, and placed but little confidence in them. [Comp. Mark v. 26, Luke viii. 43.] They brought to our Saviour and his apostles multitudes of diseased people from all parts.

The Jewish authors speak of physicians in a manner not at all favourable to them, Vide Buxtorf, Lexicon. in רפא rapha, mederi.

Though Scripture does not make express mention of physicians or of medicine before the time of the patriarch Joseph, we are not to conclude from thence that the art of medicine was a novelty. Adam had received a perfect and extensive knowledge of natural things, of the powers of simples, of the virtues of juices, liquors, and minerals; and could not fail to cultivate and improve his knowledge, when he found himself condemned to diseases and death. The necessity he experienced of recruiting his strength, and of preserving his health, laid him under equal necessity of recourse to natural remedies, and consequently of studying their nature, their effects, and their properties.

A science so useful could not fall into oblivion; Adam taught it his children, they cultivated it, and transmitted it to their posterity. The ancients speak highly of the knowledge of the Egyptians in physic. Homer tells us, that the Egyptians were the most skilful physicians in the world, and that every one of them understood physic; Ἰντρος δὲ ἑκάστος ἐπιστάμενος περὶ παντῶν Ἀνθρώπων. Odyss. Δ. But this without doubt must be an hyperbole. Indeed Herodotus owns, lib. ii. cap. 24. that their country abounded with physicians, because each part of the human body, and each distemper, had its physician. Some studied particularly diseases of the eyes, others those of the teeth, others those of the head. Diodorus Siculus observes, Biblioth. lib. i. that these people had certain sacred books, which contained the principles of medicine. In the management of their patients, they were not allowed to depart from the rules prescribed by these books; if they succeeded in the cure, well and good; if not, the physician could lie under no reproach, because he had only followed the rules of his art.

But if he did not conform his remedies to them, even though he should cure his patient, he was liable to suffer death for mal-practice.

But I would not be understood to affirm that the ancient physicians of Egypt studied the cure of internal diseases, which are owing to an ill state of the blood, or other fluids of the body. The most famous physicians of Greece, as Chiron, Machaon, Podalirius, Pæan, and Esculapius himself, were no other than good surgeons. Their art did not go beyond the curing of a green wound, as Pliny himself observes. Celsus takes notice, that Podalirius and Machaon, sons of Esculapius, who accompanied king Agamemnon to Troy, were never called to cure the plague, or internal maladies, but only wounds and external injuries.

Physic among the Hebrews was hardly in greater perfection. Solomon who knew the secrets of nature, and the virtues of simples; who wrote treatises on beasts, birds, fishes, trees and plants, from the cedar of Libanus to the hyssop on the wall, 1 Kings iv. 33.—this prince might have given us great light into these matters, if God had permitted his works to have come down to us. [Some think we have the echo of Solomon's works in the Natural History &c. of Aristotle.]

Pindar tells us, Pyth. Od. iii. that Esculapius cured all sorts of fevers, ulcers, wounds, and pains, by soothing enchantments, sweetening potions, topical and external remedies, or, by incision. Homer relates, that by enchantments the blood was stopped that issued out of Ulysses's wound, Odyss. T. Cato has preserved certain verses, used in reducing a dislocated member, de re Rust. art. 160. Plato tells us, that the midwives of Athens had a secret by means of certain drugs and certain charms, to cause women in travail easily to bring forth children. Theoctetr. p. 149.

The Hebrews were neither less curious, nor less superstitious than other people. Among them, charms, enchantments, curious arts, talismans, phylacteries, the sound of instruments, and such like, were used to cure or relieve the sick, or to secure them against the bitings of serpents, and fascinations. Saul's servants provided music to relieve their master: the Jews ascribed to Beelzebub the miracles of Jesus Christ. The angel Raphael drove away the devil by the fume of the broiled liver of a fish, &c.

Josephus, de Bello, Jud. lib. vii. cap. 25. speaks of a wonderful root called Baaras, which expelled demons; and we find other superstitious methods of cure among the ancient Hebrews. Scripture speaks of charms used against the bitings of serpents, and enchantments to lay asleep or enchant those animals, and to suspend their their venom. See Jer. viii. 17. also Job xl. 25. Psalm lviii. 5. Eccles. xii. 13. Comp. DISEASES.

[It is probable, that the priests of Egypt were the depositories of the most regular knowledge of medicine among the people of that country; and that among the Hebrews, also, the priests were instructed in the Art; as they must have been, more or less, to judge on the nature and cure of certain diseases, as the leprosy, and uncleannesses. In short, "the priest's lips were to keep knowledge;" not of ecclesiastical affairs only: under the theocracy they shared in civil administrations also. This accounts for the censure passed on Asa.

We know that the Hindoo physicians are bound by the rules of their art, transmitted from father to son in their sacred books; and in this the Egyptians were conformable to them: it is also a mark of identity of the two people.

Clemens Alexandrinus, Pædagog. lib. iii. informs us, that of the thirty-six books ascribed to Hermes, by the Egyptians, six were treatises concerning the management of the body; also about different distempers; about medical instruments, and medicines, and complaints of the eyes, and female disorders. This shews the antiquity of the study in Egypt; and the reputation of the Egyptian practitioners may be inferred from the recourse had to them by Darius, King of Persia, who, on a grievous luxation of his ankle, applied to the physicians of Egypt, in preference to those of any other country. And we may fairly suppose, that when Ahaziah, or others, applied to Baal to know whether he should recover, his application included the means of recovery, also; which, he hoped to receive by an answer from the priests of that god. Every European physician, who travels into the East, and is known as such, is constantly pestered with applicants; and is expected to cure all diseases: probably it was the same anciently; and that, the state of medicine was then, much the same as it is now among the Turks and Arabs.]

MEDITATION; the chief employment of the just is to meditate on the law of God day and night, Psal. i. 2. This is the principal and most usual acceptation of the verb to meditate; to think closely and seriously on any thing. We also say, to meditate, when we speak indeed, but low and indistinctly, as when learning any thing by heart, or rehearsing in a low voice any thing in which the thoughts are deeply engaged. Job says, xxvii. 4. "My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter (or meditate) deceit." The Psalmist says, xxxv. 28. "My tongue shall speak (or meditate) of thy righteousness." And xxxvii. 30. "The mouth of the righteous speaketh (or meditateth) wisdom." And Solomon says, Prov. viii. 7. "My mouth shall speak (or meditate) truth."

Isaiah, xxxviii. 14. compares the groanings of an afflicted man to those of a dove; and he uses the word to meditate, to express them both. And chap. lix. 11. Sicut columba meditantem gememus. Much in the same sense Virgil says, Silvestrem tenui Musam meditaris avenâ.

ÆCLOG. i.

[MEEKNESS, a calm serene temper of mind, not easily ruffled or provoked; that suffers injuries without desire of revenge, and quietly acquiesces in the dispensations and will of God, Col. iii. 12. This temper of mind is admirably fitted to discover, to consider, and to entertain truth, James i. 21.]

MEGIDDO, מגידו, that declares: otherwise, his [apple, or] precious fruit, from מגד magad: otherwise, that spoils, from גוד godud: or fortune, from גד gad.

MEGIDDO, or MAGEDO, a city of Manasseh, Josh. xvii. 11. Judg. i. 27. famous for the defeat of king Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30. who was overcome and mortally wounded by Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt. Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 159. speaking of this victory, says that Necho obtained it at Magdolos. The waters of Megiddo are mentioned Judges, v. 19. מגידו, ἐν πεδίῳ ἐκ ὠππομένου, a city, or camp, [or valley; famous for a great mourning, &c. Zech. xii. 11.]

[The place of the assemblage, or military array, says Simon; referring to Josh. xii. 21. xvii. 11. Judg. i. 27. from whence Hiller explains "the waters of Megiddo," Judg. v. 19. to mean the brook Kishon.

Certainly Megiddo was in, or near, the great plain of Esdraelon, which had been the scene of many battles: as of Gideon with the Midianites, of Saul with the Philistines, of Josiah with Pharaoh Necho, of Judas Maccabeus with Tryphon, 1 Macc. xii. 49, &c. as in later ages it was of combats between the Tartars and Saracens. Vide also Joseph. lib. iii. cap. 3. Cellarius calls it Campum præliorem capacem. Geog. Antiq. tom. ii. p. 506. It is alluded to under this character, Rev. xvi. 16.]

MEGILLOTH, מגילות, a roll, or volume. The Hebrews give this name to Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, the Lamentations, Ruth, and Esther. These they call the five Megilloth.

MEHETABEL, מהשבאל, how good is God! or has done good to us; from the conjunction מה mah, how much, or מן men, from, and טוב tub, good, or יב jatab, to do good, and אל el, God. Son of Delaiah, Nehem. vi. 10.

MEHIDA,

MEHIDA, מֵחִידָא, Maḥdā, enigma; from the Chaldean word מֵחִידָא achidan: otherwise, point; from חָדַד chadaḥ: otherwise, that blots out, or suppresses the hand; from מָחָא macha, to blot out; and יָד yad, the hand. [Perhaps a connecting link, i. e. of the parents. Ezra ii 52. Neh. vii. 54.]

MEHIR, מֵחִיר, Maḥir, prized; from מָחָר machar, to prize, to esteem. Son of Caleb, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 11.

MEHUJAEI, מֵחִיְיָאֵל, who proclaims God; from חִיָּה chivah, to proclaim, and אֵל el, God: or God that blots out; from מָחָא macha, to blot out: or, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, who is smitten of God. Son of Irad, and father of Methuselah, of the race of Cain, Gen. iv. 18.

MEHUMAN, מֵחֻמָּן, who is troubled; from מָחָה amah, to trouble, or to make a tumult: otherwise, multitude; from מָחָן chamon. A Persian or Medish name. Chief of the eunuchs of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 10.

MEHUNIM, מֵחֻנִּים, houses, abodes; from מָחָן mahon: otherwise, poor, afflicted: from אָנִי ani: otherwise, that answer; from אָנָה annah. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7.

[Maon is taken for a small habitation; and Maoni, Maonim, or Mehunim, for the plural, "many small habitations." Vide MAON.]

The LXX. read in the following verse not Ammonite as in our translation, but Minaious, or the Mehunim of verse 7. so that their sense is, "God helped him against the Mehunim—and the Mehunim gave gifts."—The objection against the Ammonites is, that they were not among the Southern nations of which the context treats, but dwelt north easterly, beyond Jordan. The reader will judge of this conjecture; the transposition of the first letter occasions the change.]

MEHUSHIM, מֵחֻשִׁים, Mewshim, or Hushim, precipitated, who are in haste, from חָשַׁח chush: otherwise, that hold their peace; from חָשַׁח chashah. Father of Ahitub. 1 Chron. viii. 11.

ME-JARKON, מֵי-יָרְקָן, waters, rusty, spoiled, &c. from מַיִם maim, waters, and יָרַק jarak, rusty, green. The waters of Jarkon, a city of Dan, Josh. xix. 46.

MEKONAH, מֵכֻנָּה, Mayḥnā, bases; from כָּן ken: or preparation; from כָּנָה canah, to dispose, to found, to prepare. A city of Judah; Neh. xi. 28 probably the Meckanum, which Jerom places between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem, eight miles from Eleutheropolis.

MELATIAH, מֵלֶכֶתִּיאָה, deliverance of the Lord; from מָלַח malat, to deliver, and יָהּ yah, the Lord.

MELCHI, מֵלֶכִּי, my king, or my counsel; from מָלַךְ malac, and the pronoun i, my.

I. MELCHI, son of Janna, and father of Levi, in the genealogy of Jesus, Luke iii. 24.

II. MELCHI, son of Addi, and father of Neri; in the genealogy of Jesus, Luke iii. 28.

MELCHIAH, מֵלֶכִּיָּהּ, the Lord is my king. Head of the fifth family of the twenty-four sacerdotal families, 1 Chron. xxiv. 9. See MALCHIAH.

MELCHISEDEC, מֶלֶךְ-צֶדֶק, king of justice; from מֶלֶךְ melec, a king, and צֶדֶק zedec, justice.

MELCHISEDEC, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God. Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death, Heb. vii. 1, 2, 3. And in this sense he was as St. Paul says, a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec; and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, consecration, life, and death, are known.

When Abraham returned from pursuing the confederate kings, Gen. xiv. 17. Melchisedec came to meet him as far as the valley of Shaveh, (afterwards named the King's valley) and presented him refreshments of bread and wine; or, he offered bread and wine in sacrifice to the Lord, for he was priest of the Most High God. (Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iv. Cyprian, lib. ii. Ep. iii. ad Cecil. Euseb. Caesar. Dem. lib. v. cap. iii. Ambros. lib. v. Sacram. cap. i. et alii plerique Patrum et Interp. Consule si placet Bellarmin. lib. i. de Missa, cap. 6.) And he blessed Abraham, saying, "Blessed be Abraham of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the Most High God, who hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." Abraham, desirous to acknowledge in him the quality of priest of the Lord, offered him tythes of all he had taken from the enemy. After this there is no mention of the person of Melchisedec; only the Psalmist, cx. 4. speaking of the Messiah, says, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

St. Paul, Hebrews v. 6, 10. unfolds the mystery of Melchisedec. First, he exalts the priesthood of Christ, as a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec,—who in this quality, "in the days of his flesh" offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death; and was heard in that he feared," verse 7. He also says, that our Saviour as a forerunner is entered for us into heaven, being made a high-priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. "For, he adds, to this Melchisedec, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God, Abraham gave tythe. Now Melchisedec is according to the interpretation of his name, first, king of (zedek) justice; secondly, king of (Salem,) peace; who is without father, without mother, without genealogy, who has neither beginning

, beginning nor end of life. Consider therefore how great this Melchisedec is, since Abraham himself gives him tythe, and receives his blessing. Moreover, Levi, who (now) receives tythes from others, paid them himself, as one may say, in the person of Abraham, since he was in the loins of Abraham his ancestor, when Melchisedec met that patriarch."

An infinite number of difficulties have been started on the subject of Melchisedec. Jerom thought that Salem, of which Melchisedec was king, was not Jerusalem, but the city of Salem near Scythopolis, where they pretended to shew the ruins of his palace, Ep. ad Evang. He thinks it was at this Salem Jacob arrived after his passage over Jordan, when returning from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 18. where the Vulgate mentions, that Jacob came safe and sound to Sichem; but the Hebrew reads, he came to Salem near Shechem. Some believe that Salem, where Melchisedec reigned, is the Salim of John, iii. 23. Vid. Beland, Palest.

From the time of Epiphanius Hær. lib. v. 2. there were names given to the father and mother of Melchisedec. To his father was given the name of Heracles, or Heracles, and to his mother that of Astaroth, or Astaria. [i. e. the SUN and MOON: Oriental Deities.]

The Arabic Catena on the ninth chapter of Genesis derives him from Shem by his father, and from Japheth by his mother. Heraclas or Heracim, the father of Melchisedec was, say they, son or grandson of Phaleg, and son of Heber; and his mother named Salathiel, was daughter of Gomer, son of Japheth. Joseph ben Gorion, lib. vi. cap. 31. pretends that Melchisedec was otherwise called Joram; that the star that ruled at his nativity had the name of Sedec, or the planet Jupiter; that the city in which he reigned was first named Jebus, then Sedec, and lastly Salem, or Jerusalem.

Michael Glycas, Annal. p. 135. Georgius Cedrenus, lib. i. p. 27. and Simon Logothetes, apud Cang. ad Chron. Pasch. p. 500. derive Melchisedec from Egypt. They say his father was called Siden or Sida, and founded the city of Siden, the capital of Phœnicia: and that Melchisedec founded Salem on Mount Sion, ruled there thirty years, and died without children. Suidas, in Melchisedec, says he reigned there a hundred and thirty years, and died unmarried: that he was of the cursed race of Canaan, whence it comes to pass, that Scripture does not mention his genealogy. Another Greek author, who has borrowed the name of Athanasius, says that Melchisedec was son of an idolatrous king, called Melchi, ["the King;" the Sun or Heracles of the former paragraph,] and of a queen named Salem. [Selene? i. e. the Moon; or the Astaroth of the former paragraph.]

The author of the Questions on the Old and New Testament, printed among the works of St. Austin, had written, that Melchisedec was the Holy Ghost, who appeared to Abraham in a human form. Evangelus (or Evangelius) sent this writing to Jerom, desiring his thoughts of it. Jerom having examined the ancient doctors of the church, found that Origen and Didymus took Melchisedec for an angel; but that Hippolytus, Irenæus, Eusebius of Casarea, Eusebius of Emesus, Apollinarius, and Eustatheus of Antioch, all agreed, though in different terms, and by different ways of reasoning, that this prince was a Canaanite by birth, and king of Salem, otherwise called Jebus, or Jerusalem. Thus holy doctor shews, that Melchisedec was an express figure of Jesus Christ, as king of Salem, or king of peace; being priest and king both together. And when it is said by St. Paul that he was without father, without mother, and without descent; this is not intended to assert that he descended from heaven, or that he was formed immediately by the hand of God, but merely that he is introduced into the history, without informing us who he was, or whence he came, or at what time he was born, or when he died.

At the beginning of the third century, a heresy was formed by Theodorus a banker, disciple of Theodorus a currier, called the heresy of the Melchisedecians. Vide Epiphanius, Hæres. lv. & Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. lib. ii. cap. 6. These heretics affirmed, that Melchisedec was a heavenly power superior to Jesus Christ, since Melchisedec was the intercessor and mediator of the angels, and Jesus Christ was so only for men. That Jesus Christ was but the copy of Melchisedec, and his priesthood was formed only on the model of that of Melchisedec, according to that of the Psalmist, cx. 4. Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedec. They took literally what St. Paul says, that Melchisedec had neither father, mother, nor descent. This heresy was revived in Egypt by one Hierax, who maintained, that Melchisedec was the Holy Ghost. Cedrenus and Zonarus speak of another sort of Melchisedecians, otherwise called Autingani, as not daring to touch others, for fear of being defiled. They lived chiefly in Phrygia, and neither received circumcision, nor observed the sabbath. They gave nothing to any one with their hands, nor received any thing from any one; but they set it upon the ground when they offered any thing, and took it from thence when they received it. They had a profound a profound veneration for Melchisedec, but it is not known upon what this veneration was founded.

The Jews according to the report of Jerom, and the Samaritans, according to Epiphanius, maintained that Melchisedec was the patriarch Shem, son of Noah; which opinion has been followed by a great number of modern writers. M. Jurieu undertook to prove, that Melchisedec was Ham. A French author mentioned by F. Salien will have Melchisedec to be Enoch. Another, confuted by F. Petau, said that the Magi who came to Bethlehem to adore Jesus Christ, were Enoch, Melchisedec, and Elias. Some Jewish authors have inferred, that Melchisedec was a bastard, because Scripture says nothing of his parents or descent. Damian the heretic, of the number of the Melchisedecians, affirmed that Melchisedec who appeared to Abraham, was the son of God, and that the patriarch worshipped him as the Messiah. Peter Cunæus has revived this opinion, and supported it with much earnestness. Peter du Moulin has also asserted it, and in 1686, James Gaillard undertook the defence of it, [and some continue still to think so.]

MELEA, son of Menan, and father of Eliakim, an ancestor of Jesus, Luke iii. 31.

MELECH, מלך, king. Son of Micah, and grandson of Jonathan, son of Saul, 1 Chron. viii. 35.

MELICU, מילכו, his kingdom; from מלך melac, and the pronoun י o, his.

[MELITA, or MALTA, honey-producing. Acts xxviii. 1. But for another origin of this name, vide the following account, and see MALTA: also the PLATES, MEDALS OF MALTA.

As the inhabitants of this island appear to have retained striking indications of an oriental origin, we shall pay more than usual attention to its ancient history; because, it is evident, that if this island be justly considered as deriving its early population from the east, then, our opinion respecting the same having taken place in Crete, Cyprus, &c. is proportionately confirmed.

This island is thought to have been that of the Pheacians mentioned by Homer, Od. E. &c. then named Iperia, and governed by Eurimedon: Nausitous, grandson of Epimedon, rebelling against Jupiter (the Cretan, perhaps) was expelled; and his subjects retreated to the isle of Corfou. Whether that tradition be correct, or erroneous, we have reason to believe that the Phenicians, navigating the Mediterranean, took possession of Iperia, about 1519, before A. D. and founded a colony, which became flourishing and powerful. They established, of course, the worship of their divinities, as well as of those adored in Egypt, and Persia; though I rather think, that the deities of Egypt were derived direct from that country, at least as to their symbolical representations; and perhaps a colony from the neighbourhood of the Nile, might settle in this island. The Tyrian Hercules, which the Greeks distinguished by the appellation of Alexicacos, or driver away of evil, Juno, whose temple stood between the present castle of St. Angelo, and the Victorious City; Mithras, Isis, Osiris, and Mercury, were all worshipped here. The ports of this colony were of great advantage to the Phenicians who traded to the Atlantic ocean; and it is thought, that the name Malit (whence Melita) imports "the Refuge," or Security; Gaulos, "the Round;" Lampas, or Lampedosa, "the Lamp," or Lights: from two towers, which are reported by the geographer Scylax, to have existed on this island. Vide Bochart, Can. i. 26, and Soldani, della lingua Punica usata da' Maltesi. The name of Ogygia succeeded to that of Iberia: the island now had kings, and Dido was here received with due honour, on her voyage to lay the foundation of Carthage. The Greeks became masters of Ogygia about 786 before A. D. and from them its name of Melita, is handed down to us. They introduced the worship of Apollo, established a high-priest under the name of Hierothytyos, and appointed Archons to conduct the government.

Commerce flourished in this island: a manufacture of fine cotton obtained great celebrity: and the kings of Sicily contracted leagues of amity with its governors.

About 528. before A. D. the Carthaginians overpowered the Greeks, and exercised the sovereignty, but without expelling the former inhabitants: to these succeeded the Romans, who under Att. Regulus sacked the island: yet their dominion was not established till the beginning of the second Punic war. Under these rulers Malta was made a Municipium; and was governed by a Pro-Prætor, under the Prætor of Sicily. Malta was now in prosperity; and its manufactures were considered at Rome as articles of luxury. The temples were rebuilt about this period; principally by the Romans.

One of the most remarkable events in the history of Malta, is the shipwreck of St. Paul, about A. D. 56. Publius was at this time Protos, or chief.

On the division of the Roman empire, Malta fell to the lot of Constantius. It was seized by the Vandals, in 454, retaken by Belisarius, 533, conquered by the Arabs in 870, and by Count Roger, or his brother Guiscard, in 1090. It passed passed to the Germans, by marriage of Constance, heiress of Sicily, with Henry IV. son of the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa; but its prosperous days were now over, and its riches had disappeared. It was at length united to the crown of Spain, and Charles V. gave it to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, driven from Rhodes by the Turks, who here established themselves, A. D. 1530. [Expelled by the French, 1798, and not re-established.]

The present language of Malta retains many Phenician words; among others Eloi, epphta, kumi: and the Phenician scene of Plautus is understood by some of the inhabitants.

Tiberius Claudius Lysias, a freedman of the Emperor Tiberius, from whom he had obtained the Chiliarcate of Jerusalem, preserved St. Paul from the fury of the Jews. A marble, containing the name of this Lysias, and his son, mentioning also the honours rendered to his daughter, by a small town, near Athens, has been presented to the Museum in this island by the Grand Master. It was brought from Greece in 1789. The Abbé Navarro has proved the identity of this Lysias with the Lysias of the Acts, chap. xxi. 31. xxiii. 26.

[We ought not to close this Article, without hinting at an opinion lately started, and supported, by men of very competent learning, that the Melita of the Acts was an island in the Adriatic sea, on the coast of Illyricum, now called Meleda. To prove this, the course of the winds, the Euroclydon, with the other circumstances of the voyage, have been closely examined. But, it appears from the history, that the same winds, the S. E. the E. S. E. and the E. were equally likely to drive the ship on Malta, in a direct course from Crete: that the fears of the seamen, of falling on the Syrtes (quick-sands) the greater or the lesser, were more than nugatory in that case, as they were going further and further from them, towards Meleda: that it does not appear, that ever the Romans had such an establishment at Meleda as warranted the residence of a protos, or pro-pretor there; and that it was to the last degree unlikely, that "a ship of Alexandria," should have chosen Meleda for the purpose of "wintering in the island," which implies her arrival before the stormy season:—All these objections form a body of argument so strong against the newly-proposed opinion, that it appears to be clearly our duty to adhere to that which is supported by the prevailing judgment of the learned, and by constant tradition.]

MELOTHI, מלוּתִי, filled up, my fulness.

MELOTHI, a city of Cilicia, taken by Holofernes, Judith xi. 18. Vulg. Perhaps the same as Mallos in Cilicia, on the river Pyramus. The inhabitants of Mallos, or the Mallotæ, revolted against Antiochus Epiphanes, because he had bestowed their city on one of his concubines. The Greek makes no mention of Melothi.

MELZAR, מלצר, this name is Chaldec; dispenser, or steward: otherwise, circumcision of distress or misery; from מול mul, circumcision, and צר tzarar, to be in bonds, to be in a strait.

MELZAR, or MALAZAR, the governor of Daniel and his companions, when captives at Babylon, Dan. i. 16. An officer belonging to the kitchen, a caterer, or steward. Kimchi, Jun. Tremel. Palan.

[MEMBER, properly denotes a part of the natural body, 1 Cor. xii. 12—26. Figuratively, sensual affections, like a body consisting of many members, Rom. vii. 23. also, true believers, members of Christ's mystical body, as forming one society or body, of which Christ is the head, Eph. iv. 25.]

MEMORY. See REMEMBRANCE.

MEMPHIS, מִפְּי, NOPH: distillation, or honeycomb, or sieve, or elevation; from מִפְּי nuph, or,

MEMPHIS, מִפְּי, MOPH: by the mouth; from the preposition מִפְּי m, from, or by, and פִּי pe, the mouth. Memphis is an Egyptian name, and cannot take its etymology from the Hebrew.

[Though MOPH is, certainly, an Egyptian name, yet it is probable its derivation may agree with the Hebrew root, which seems to import a place surrounded, i. e. with water, or with walls, or both; as appears to have been the case with Memphis: around which flowed the Nile, called a sea, by Nahum; and which was defended by an extraordinary rampart; ruins of which remain to this day. Memphis is in the Coptic called called Monphtha, the water of God; or rather, perhaps, the Divine water: the city sacred to the water-deity Oceanus, or the Nile. But, Plutarch (in Iside) says Μέμφιν is ὀρμὸν ἀγαθῶν, the port of the good. The present Coptic appellation, Menuph, resembles this in its import, full of good, or of good people, says Jablonski, de Terra Gosen, Diss. iv. with this Kircher agrees, Ling. Ægypt. Restit. p. 207. It is found in the form Panouph, or without the article Nouph; whence the Hebrew נֹפֶח Noph. The M and N are interchangeable.]

MEMPHIS, a very famous city of Egypt, situate about fifteen thousand paces above the parting of the Nile, or where the Delta begins, Pliny, lib. v. cap. 9. Strabo, lib. xvii. p. 555. South of Memphis, are the famous Pyramids. Memphis was long the residence of the ancient kings of Egypt; till the times of the Ptolemies, who commonly resided at Alexandria. Memphis is now destroyed. The prophets often speak of Memphis. See Isaiah, xix. 13. Jer. xlv. 1. xlv. 14, 19. Hosea ix. 6. They foretel the miseries it was to suffer from the kings of Chaldæa and Persia, and they threaten the Israelites who should retire into Egypt, or should have recourse to the Egyptians, that they should perish in that country. Ezekiel says, that the Lord will destroy the idols of Memphis, chap. xxx. 13, 16. In this city they fed the ox Apis.

This city is called Mesr, or Misr, by the Orientals, as being the capital of Egypt, [Comp. FRAG. NOS. XXXVIII. (4.) XXXIX. 1.] also, Monf, a name approaching to the Hebrew Noph, or Moph, whence the Greeks formed their Memphis. The ancient kings of Egypt took pleasure in adorning it. It continued in its beauty till the Arabians conquered Egypt, under calif Omar, in the eighteenth or nineteenth year of the Hegira: A. D. 640. Amron Ben-As, who took it, built another city near it, which he called Fusthat, because of his tent, which was long set up in this place. The califs Fatimites, who became masters of Egypt, added another city near it, which they called Caherah, i. e. the victorious; which we know at this day by the name of Grand Cairo. d'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient. p. 580.

The Mammeluc sultans, of the dynasty of the Circassians, having afterward built a very high and fortified castle, on the Eastern shore of the Nile, by little and little, the city of Cairo changed its place; so that what the Fatimites had built is now old Cairo. But it must be observed, that the ancient Mesr, or Memphis, stood on the western shore of the Nile, and that which the Arabians have built is on the eastern shore.

So that at length, after a succession of ages, is fulfilled what the prophets had predicted against Memphis; in the places referred to above. Vide EGYPT: and on PLATE of EGYPT, see the PLAN of MEMPHIS.

Nebuchadnezzar plundered Egypt, and ravaged Memphis; afterwards, Cambyses king of Persia, and son of Cyrus, made himself master of Egypt, having first taken Pelusium, which is as it were the key of Egypt, when Psammenites, king of Egypt, marched out to meet him, at the head of a powerful army. Cambyses defeated him, and those that escaped took refuge in Memphis; whither Cambyses pursued them, and sent to the city by the Nile, a ship of Mitylene, with a summons to surrender. But the Egyptians in great rage fell on the herald, and those in the ship, and cut them all to pieces. When Cambyses shortly after made himself master of the place, he ordered as many Egyptians to be publicly executed, as there were persons in the ship of Mitylene; and those chief of the nobility. The eldest son of king Psammenites was one of this number. As for the king himself, Cambyses saved his life, and even appointed him a sufficient maintenance, but he did not enjoy it long. For it was found that he endeavoured to raise commotions in the kingdom; so they made him drink bull's blood, which killed him on the spot.

Egypt continued under the Persians till the reign of Artaxerxes. Then it shook off the yoke, and chose Inarus prince of the Lybians for king. The Egyptians called in the Athenians to their assistance; and Charitimis was intrusted with the conduct of this enterprize. Artaxerxes sent Achemenides, one of his brothers, against the rebels, at the head of 300,000 men. The Persians were beaten, and lost in one battle 100,000 men.—Those that escaped retired to Memphis, whither the conquerors pursued them, and immediately made themselves masters of two parts of the city. But the Persians having fortified themselves in the third part, called the White Wall, which was the largest and strongest of the three; they held out a siege of nearly three years, till they were relieved.

Alexander the Great having conquered Egypt from the Persians, and having built Alexandria, the kings of Egypt, his successors, studied the enlarging and beautifying Alexandria, till it became the capital of Egypt. Memphis was then of small consideration, and after several revolutions in its fortune, it was finally destroyed by the Arabians.

MEMUCAN, מִמּוּכָן, Μῆμυχάν, impoverished; from from מִנַּח minac: otherwise, to prepare; from מִנַּח min: otherwise, certain, true; from מִנַּח ken. This word is Persian. One of the seven principal councillors of the king of Persia. Esth. i. 14, 16. [of mighty authority, or dignity?]

MENAHÉM. See MANAHÉM.

MENAN, Μανάν, number, or recompence, or prepared; from מָנַח manah. Son of Mattatha, and father of Melea, ancestor of Jesus Christ, Luke iii. 31.

MENE, or MANE; מֵנֶה, a Chaldean word, signifying he has numbered, or he has counted. At a feast which Belshazzar gave to his courtiers and concubines, he prophaned the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, which Nebuchadnezzar had carried to Babylon. Then there appeared on the wall like a hand, writing these words, Mene mene, tekel, upharsin. (God) has numbered, has weighed, and divided. Daniel explained this ill-boding inscription to the king. Vide BELSHAZZAR. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CCV.

MENELAUS, Μενέλαος, power or strength of the people; from μένος, strength, and λαός, people.

MENELAUS, otherwise Onias IV. succeeded Jason in the sovereign priesthood of the Jews: Alcimus was his successor. Vide ONIAS IV.

MENESTHEUS, or MNESTHEUS, father of Apollonius, 2 Macc. iv. 21. See APOLLONIUS.

[MENI, מֵנִי. The goddess Meni is the moon. Jeremiah, vii. 18. xlv. 17, 18. speaks of her as Queen of Heaven, [Comp. FRAG. No. DIII.] Isaiah calls her Meni, lxxv. 11. Heb. Each of them shews, that her worship was popular in Palestine, and among the Hebrews. Meni is probably Astarte, and Venus Cœlestis, honoured among the Phœnicians and Carthaginians. From the Phœnicians or Canaanites, Israel learned the worship of this false deity. Isaiah reproaches them with setting up a table to Gad, (the sun) [rather, Fortune, good Fortune, or the Lord of Fortune] and with making libations to Meni. Jeremiah says, that in honour of the Queen of Heaven, the fathers light the fire, the mothers knead the cakes, and the children gather the wood to bake them. Elsewhere, the Israelites declared to Jeremiah, that notwithstanding his remonstrances, they would continue to honour the Queen of Heaven, by oblations, as their fathers had done before them; and that ever since they had left off to sacrifice to the Queen of Heaven, they had been consumed by the sword and by famine. We see by Strabo, lib. xii. that men, the month, or moon, had several temples in Asia Minor, and in Persia, and that they often swore by the men of the king, i. e. by his fortune. Vide ASTARTE, GAD; BAAL GAD, &c.]

[MENI. "As the worship of Diana Luna, or the moon, was very famous among the Greeks and Romans, so was that of the god Lunus in the East. There are a great many monuments of him; he was named MEN (Μην) in Greek, and honoured by this name in Phrygia, where was a place, according to Athenæus, (lib. iii. p. 47.) called Μηνὸς κώμη, "The Street of MEN;" i. e. of the god Lunus. Men also signifies a month in Greek; and there was a temple of Men, or Lunus, in this place. We see also the god Men, or Lunus, on several medals of the towns of Lydia, Pisidia, and Phrygia. On a medal of Antiochus, struck in Pisidia, the god Lunus hath a spear in one hand, and holds a victory in the other, and hath a cock, a symbol of the rising sun, at his feet. Spartian, in his life of Caracalla, says, that prince came to Carhæ [Charran in S. S.] on his birth-day, in honour to the god Lunus. He adds further, that the people of Carhæ did still say, what hath been formerly written by learned authors, that, "they who call the moon by a feminine word, and consider her as a woman, will be always addicted to women, and subject to their command; but those who think the moon to be a male god, will have the dominion over women, and suffer nothing by their intrigues;" hence he concludes, that it comes to pass, that the Greeks and Egyptians, though they name the moon by a word of the feminine gender, in common discourse, yet in their mysteries they call him a male god." If nothing more were requisite to keep peace in families, and make wives subject to their husbands, but calling the moon Lunus, instead of Luna, a great many husbands would make this their constant practice, and be very thankful for the possession of this Talisman. [MENNI, preparation, or provided; otherwise, number. A region, Jer. li. 27.]

The settlement of the Minæi is supposed to have been in Armenia, by Bochart, Phaleg. p. 22. Another people of this name was established in Arabia, near the Red Sea; as appears from the same writer, p. 135. and Dapper's Descript. Arab. p. 334. A reference to these in Psalm xlv. 9. is supposed by B. S. Cremer, in Miscell. Duisb. tom. i. p. 670.

[MENNITH, the same as MENNI.]

A city of Gad, Judg. xi. 33. Ezek. xxvii. 17.

The Arabic root signifies small, and the Syriac, from it, is of the same import. But as there was a people called Minne, this name might be derived from them. This city was in the confines of the Israelites and Ammonites.]

MENOIS, probably the same as Minois,
U 2 mentioned

mentioned in the subscriptions to some of the councils. Concil. Calced. An. 451. Menois was not far from Gaza, says Eusebius. It is the Menoenum castrum, in the codex of Theodosius. It was the capital of the Maonians, or Mæonians, 1 Chron. iv. 40, 41. and 2 Chron. xx. 1. in the Hebrew. Vide MAON.

MEONOTHAI, מְעֹנֹתַי, my dwelling, my sin; from עָוֹן havon. Son of Othniel, and father of Ophrah, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 13, 14.

MEPHAATH, מַפְעֵת, appearance of waters, or impetuosity; from פָּעַץ japhah, to appear, and מַיִם majim, waters. A city of Reuben, Josh. xiii. 18. yielded to the Levites of the family of Merari, Josh. xxi. 37. Eusebius says, in his time the Romans kept a garrison here.

[Some suppose that this name signifies a high place, or a conspicuous situation.]

MEPHIBOSHETH, מִפְּיִבֶשֶׁת, out of my mouth proceeds reproach; from פִּה pe, a mouth, and בֹּשֶׁת bosh, shame.

I. MEPHIBOSHETH, or Miphiboseth; son of Saul, and of his concubine Rizpah: delivered by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord. 2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9.

II. MEPHIBOSHETH, son of Jonathan, otherwise named Meribbaal, (vide MERIBBAAL.) Mephibosheth was very young, when his father Jonathan was killed in the battle of Gilboa, 2 Sam. iv. 4. His nurse was in such consternation at this news, that she let the child fall, who from this accident was lame all his life. When David found himself in peaceable possession of the kingdom, he sought for all that remained of the house of Saul, that he might shew them kindness, in consideration of the friendship between him and Jonathan. He learned that there was a son of Jonathan, called Mephibosheth, in the house of Ziba, a servant of Saul. The king sent for him, and told him, that for the sake of Jonathan his father he should have his grandfather's estate, and eat always at the royal table. 2 Sam. ix. 1, &c.

Some years after this, when Absalom, drove his father from Jerusalem, Mephibosheth ordered his servant Ziba to saddle him an ass, that he might accompany David; for being lame, he could not go on foot. But Ziba himself went after David, with two asses laden with provisions, and reported that Mephibosheth staid at Jerusalem, in hopes that the people of Israel would restore him to the throne of his ancestors. Then says David to Ziba, I give to you all that belonged to Mephibosheth. But when David returned to Jerusalem in peace, Mephibosheth appeared before him in deep mourning, having neither washed his feet, nor shaved his beard, since the king went. David then learned the truth from him: nevertheless Ziba continued to possess half his estate. Mephibosheth left a son named Micha. The time of his death is not known. 1 Chron. viii. 34.

MERAB, מֵרַב, he that fights, or disputes; from רֹבֵב rub: otherwise, that multiplies; from רַבָּה rabah: or mistress, according to the Syriac.

MERAB, or MEROB, eldest daughter of king Saul. She was promised to David in marriage, in reward for his victory over Goliath; nevertheless, Saul gave her to Adriel, son of Barzillai the Meholathite, 1 Sam. xiv. 49. xviii. 17, 19. Merab had six sons by him, who were delivered to the Gibeonites, and hanged before the Lord. The text insinuates, that the six men delivered to the Gibeonites, were sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, and wife of Adriel. But there is great suspicion, that the name of Michal is slipped into the text instead of Merab. For 1. Michal did not marry Adriel, but Phaltiel; and, 2. We nowhere read that Michal had six sons. Others think, these six were sons of Merab by birth, but of Michal by adoption.

MERAIAH, מֵרִיָּה, Amariac, bitterness; from מָרַר marar: otherwise, myrrh; from מֹר mor: otherwise, the Lord is my master; from מָרָה marah, which in Syriac signifies master, a title which the Jews gave their rabbins, and from יָהּ jah, the Lord.

MERAIAH, or MARAIA, son of Seraiah, of the race of the priests. He returned to Jerusalem from Babylon, Nehem. xii. 12.

MERAIOTH, מֵרִיֹּת, bitterness: otherwise, rebellions; from מָרָה marah; otherwise, permutations and changes; from מִר mur.

I. MERAIOTH, or Maraioth, son of Abitub, high-priest of the Jews. 1 Chron. ix. 11.

II. MERAIOTH, son of Zeraiah, is probably the same as before-mentioned; Ezra vii. 3.

III. MERAIOTH, Merajoth, a priest of the race of Aaron, son of Zerahiah, and father of Amariah; among the high-priests, 1 Chr. vi. 6.

MERAN, or MERRHA. Baruch, iii. 23. speaks of the merchants of Meran, whom he joins with the Hagarenes, and with the inhabitants of Theman, who valued themselves on their superior understanding. All these people, without doubt, were Arabians, but we cannot say exactly where Meran was. We know Marana on the Red-Sea, Mariaba in Arabia Felix, and Marace, a place of trade in the same country.

MERARI, מֵרָרִי, bitter; from מָרַר marar: otherwise, to provoke.

I. MERARI, third son of Levi, and father of Mahali and Mushi, Exod. vi. 19.

II. MERARI, son of Ox, and father of Judith, of the tribe of Simeon, Judith viii. 1.

MERCURY, from the Latin mercari, to buy, or or to sell. In Greek, Ἑρμῆς, Hermes, orator, or interpreter.

MERCURY, son of Jupiter and Maia, a fabulous god of the ancient heathen, the messenger of the gods, the deity that presided over learning, eloquence, and traffic. The Greeks named him Hermes, an interpreter, because they considered him as interpreter of the will of the gods. Probably, for this reason, the people of Lystra having heard St. Paul preach, and having seen him heal a lame man, would have offered sacrifice to him, as to their god Mercury; and to Barnabas as Jupiter, probably because of his venerable aspect. Acts xiv. 11.

[We have seen Mercury in FRAGMENT No. CCXI. employed in his office of conveying the dead to Hades, and in No. CCXII. attended by a symbolical cock, and an ear of corn: it is, therefore, probable, that the doctrine of the resurrection, enlarged on, and forcibly stated by Paul, was not without its influence in attributing to him the name of Mercury. Nevertheless, it is to be supposed, that as Mercury was son of Jupiter, the more youthful appearance of Paul was a principal cause of the allusion: and this has its effect on the probable age of the Apostle, as well at the time of his conversion, as at that of this incident.]

MERCY, Misericordia. This virtue inspires us with compassion for our brethren, and inclines us to assist them in their necessities. That works of mercy may be acceptable to God, as Christ has promised, Matt. v. 7. it is not enough that they proceed from a natural sentiment of humanity, but they must be performed for the sake of God, and from truly pious motives. In Scripture Mercy and Truth are commonly joined together, to shew the goodness that precedes, and the faithfulness that accompanies the promises; or, a goodness, a clemency, a mercy that is constant and faithful, and that does not deceive. Mercy is also taken for favours and benefits received from God or man: for probity, justice, goodness. Merciful men, in Hebrew Chasdim, are men of piety and goodness. Mercy is often taken for giving of alms. Prov. xiv. 34. xvi. 6. Zach. vii. 9.

[Mercy, as derived from Misericordia, may import that sympathetic sense of the suffering of another by which the heart is affected. It is one of the noblest attributes of Deity, yet speaking after the manner of men; and explaining what, by supposition, may pass in the mind of God, by what passes in the human mind. The object of mercy is misery:—so God pities human misery, and forbears to chastise severely: so man pities the misery of fellow man, and assists to diminish it: so public officers, occasionally moderate the strictness of national laws, from pity to the culprit. But, only those can hope for mercy who express penitence, and solicit mercy: the impenitent, the stubborn, the obdurate, rather brave the avenging hand of justice, than beseech the relieving hand of mercy.]

MERCY-SEAT, Propitiatorium, otherwise Oraculum; in Hebrew, Capporeth; in Greek, Ilasterion. Vide ORACLE.

MERED, מֵרֵד, rebellious: from מָרַר marar: otherwise, that descends; from רָדַד radad: or that commands; from רָדָה radah. 1 Chr. iv. 17.

MEREMOTH, מֵרֵמוֹת, Mapweth, bitterness, or myrrh of death; from מָרַר marar, bitterness; or מוֹר mor, myrrh, and מוֹת muth, death: otherwise, elevations; from רוּם rum: otherwise, deceit; from רָמָה ramah.

I. MEREMOTH, or Maremath, son of Urijah; he put away his strange wife. Ezra x. 36.

II. MEREMOTH, a priest, who returned from the captivity of Babylon, Nebem. iii. 44. and who set up the vessels of gold and silver, which had been restored to the temple, by king Artaxerxes, when Ezra returned to Judæa, Ezra viii. 33. A. M. 3537, ante A. D. 467.

MERES, מֵרֵס, Méres, watering, distillation; from רָסַס rasas: according to the Syriac, bruising, or wound. This is a Persian word. A prince of the court of Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 14.

MERIBAH, מֵרִיבָה, dispute, quarrel; [STRIFE.] from רוּב rub. Exod. xvii. 7. Numb. xx. 13.

MERIB-BAAL, מֵרִיב־בַּעַל, rebellion: or he that resists Baal, or strives against the idol; from רוּב rub, to contest, and בַּעַל baal, idol: or he that opposes him who governs, or possesses.

MERIB-BAAL, or MERIBAAL, son of Jonathan, and father of Micah, 1 Chron. viii. 34. ix. 40. Merib-baal is Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. iv. 4. and ix. 12. The Hebrews scrupled pronouncing the name of Baal; so that instead of Mephibaal or Meri-baal, they chose to say Mephibosheth, or Meri-bosheth. Bosheth in Hebrew, is shame, confusion, filth; Baal is master, husband, the god Baal. See MEPHI-BOSHETH.

MERODACH, מֵרֹדַךְ, bitter contrition; from מָרַר marar, bitter, and דָּכָה dacah, contrite, bruised: otherwise, bruised myrrh; from מוֹר mor, myrrh, and דָּכָה dacah, bruised: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, very pure myrrh. According to the Syriac, the little Lord; from מָרָא mara, master, or Lord, and דָּךְ dac, little, poor. [More probably, the great Lord; the highly exalted, or Sovereign, by way of eminence.] This is the name of one of the Chaldee deities, the true etymology of which is not to be found in the Hebrew.

MERODACH, an ancient king of Babylon, placed placed among the gods, and worshipped by the Babylonians. Jeremiah, l. 2. speaking of the ruin of Babylon says, "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces, her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces." We find certain kings of Babylon, whose names comprise that of Merodach, e. gr. Evil-Merodach, and Merodach-Baladan. Evil-Merodach, was son of Nebuchadnezzar the Great. Merodach-Baladan, son of Baladan king of Babylon, having heard that Hezekiah had been cured miraculously, and that the sun had gone backward in assurance of his recovery, sent him presents and compliments on the recovery of his health, Isai, xxxix. 1. Ptolemy calls him Mardoc-empadus, and says he began to reign at Babylon twenty-six years after the Æra of Nabonassar: A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721.

MERODACH-BALADAN. See USHER on A. M. 3283, and the foregoing article.

MEROE, an island, or rather a peninsula, in the higher Egypt. It lies between two arms of the Nile. Its ancient name was Saba, and Josephus believed, Antiq. lib. viii, cap. 2. that from hence the queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon. 1 Kings x. 1. Josephus, Origen, Homil. ii. in Cant. Grot. in 2 Chr. ix. say, that Cambyses changed its ancient name Saba into that of Meroë, having there built the city of Meroë in honour of his sister. This country was usually governed by queens. But these reasons have not convinced others, who were of opinion that the queen of Sheba came from Arabia Fœlix. See CANDACE..

MEROM, מְרוֹם, Μερῶμ, waters, or rivers, according to Jerom, a village called Merom, eminences, elevations; from מְרוֹם ramam, or מְרוֹם rum. [perhaps, the high waters.]

MEROM, the waters of Merom, Josh. xi. 5. are the waters of Semechon, as is believed; since Hazer, where Jabin reigned, was on this lake, as Josephus affirms, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 5. and Joshua says, that Jabin, and the other confederate kings, met together at the waters of Merom. It should seem then that Merom and Semechon are the same; but this consequence does not necessarily follow. We agree with Josephus, that Hazer was on the lake Semechon; but where is it said, that it was on the waters of Merom? Where is it said, that the kings in alliance encamped at the waters of Semechon, and near Hazer, to fight with Joshua? It is much more probable that they advanced as far as the brook Kishon, and to the pass that led into their country, to hinder Joshua from entering it, or even to attack him in the country he had over-run, than that they waited for him in the midst of their own country, leaving all Galilee, &c. exposed.

Our proofs that Merom and Merome, and the waters of Merom, were near Kishon, Carmel, Taanach, are these, 1. Eusebius places the city of Merom or Merus, at twelve miles from Sebaste, towards Dothaim. 2. The tribes of Zebulun and Naphthali exposed themselves to great danger, in the battle against Sisera, in the plains of Merome, Judges v. 18. 3. This battle was certainly fought on the Kishon, at Tanaach and Megiddo, Judges v. 19. But Taanach, Merom and Megiddo are situate on this side Kishon, and at the foot of Mount Carmel. Here therefore not only the battle between Joshua and Jabin was fought, but also that between Barak and Sisera. This pass was of great importance, and it was very difficult to march an army any other way, either from Judæa into Phœnicia or Galilee, or from Phœnicia into Judæa.

MEROME, מְרוֹמִי, מְרוֹמִי אֶרֶץ, [high places of the field. Eng. Tr.] height, or elevation; from מְרוֹם rum: otherwise, bitterness of the waters; from מָרָר marar, bitterness, and מִי mi, waters.

MEROME. Mention is made of the country, (Heb. the Fields) of Merome, Jud. v. 18. Heb. and Vulg. It is there said that Zebulun and Naphtali exposed their lives to great danger in the fields of Merome. This is thought to be the Merom mentioned by Joshua, when Jabin, and the kings of the Canaanites in confederacy with him, were overcome at the waters of Merom. The greater part of commentators believe, that the waters of Merom are the lake Semechon in the higher Galilee. Josephus has given occasion to this opinion, but see the foregoing Article.

[Jerom in his Hebrew Places, says, Merrum was a village, twelve miles from the city of Sebaste, towards Dothaim.

MEROM may signify the high place, or, as we say in English, "the upper grounds," whence the "waters of Merom," Josh. xi. 5, 7. may mean the upper waters, as this lake certainly is situated high up the Jordan, and above the lake of Tiberias. It is in the northern district of the Holy Land, and adjacent to the declivity of Lebanon; the melted snows of which fill it.

Baumgarten in his Peregrinat. lib. iii. cap. 3. speaking of this lake, says it runs over and fills the Jordan, when

Vere novo liquidus cano se monte Libano humor
Deiicit et Zephyro putris se gleba resolvit.

In summer it is for the most part dry, and covered with shrubs and grass growing in it; in which lions, bears, and other wild beasts harbour, as we are informed by Brocard, Breydenbach, Cotovicus, Salignac, and others.

MEROM, Lake of, in the Talmudists, is the sea of Samaco; whence, in foreign languages, it is called Samochonites. The Jerusalem Ge-marists marists explain Ezek. xlvii. 8. of the course of the Jordan. These waters go forth into the east coast—to the lake Samochonites; into the plain—the sea of Tiberias; into the sea—the Lacus Asphaltitis. Hazor, the metropolis of Canaan, says Josephus, lies on the lake Samachonitis. Ant. lib. v. cap. 5. Called Nasor, 1 Macc. xi. 67.

The name Samaco is thought to be derived from Sabek, a briar or bramble; and from Cubi, Cubebbi, a thorn, thorns, “thorny-marsh:” as Thorney island is the site of our Westminster Abbey. Comp. JORDAN, LEBANON.]

MERONOTHITE, מֵרוֹנוֹתִי, Merōnōtī, my song? from רָנָן ranan, song, and the pronoun my: otherwise, cry of joy, or of praise; from רָנָה ranah: according to the Syriac, he that governs. 1 Chron. xxvii. 30.

MEROZ, מֵרוֹז, secret; from רָז raz, according to the Chaldee: or leanness; from רָסַח rasah.

[The Arabic root imports to flee away, to shrink; whence some have thought that this name signifies a place of retreat or refuge; that to which fugitives ran for shelter and safety.]

MEROZ, Judg. v. 23. a place in the neighbourhood of the brook Kishon, whose inhabitants refusing to assist their brethren when they fought against Sisera, were put under anathema. Curse ye Meroz, says the angel of the Lord; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof: because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Some have thought that Meroz is the same as Merrus or Merom, above-mentioned; and this perhaps is the most probable opinion.

Others assert that Meroz was a mighty man, who dwelt near the Kishon, who not coming to assist Barak and Deborah, was excommunicated by the angel of the Lord, with the sound of four hundred trumpets, (Ita Rabbinī Gemar. Babyl. ad Tit. Wood. Caton. i. 3. Jarchi, &c.) This angel of the Lord, according to some, was Barak, the general of the Lord's army: according to others he was the high-priest for the time being, or a prophet, or the angel Michael, or some other angel. Some believe that Meroz was the angel of the Canaanites, who was cursed by Michael, the guardian angel of Israel.

MESHA, מֵשָׁא, burden, elevation, raising of water.

MESHA, or MESSA; Moses says, Gen. x. 27, 28, 29, 30, that the children of Joktan inhabited the country from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mountain of the east. Mash, son of Aram, probably gave his name to Mount Masius, which we understand here by the name Mesha; and the sons of Joktan possessed the whole country between Mount Masius, and the mountains of Sephar, or Sepharvaim. [Has the present Mesha any remains of this name?]

MESHA, מֵשָׁע, Misā, salvation, or saved; from מֵשָׁח mashah: otherwise, water of health, or he that looks on the waters; from מִי mi, the waters; and מֵשָׁה masha, to behold.

I. MESHA, or Mosa, son of Bela and Hodesh, 1 Chron. viii. 9.

II. MESHA, or Mesa, king of Moab, 2 Kings iii. 4. He fed a great number of flocks, and paid Ahab king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, with their fleeces. After the death of Ahab, he revolted against Jehoram king of Israel, who declared war against him, and called to his assistance Jehoshaphat king of Judah, who with the king of Idumea, then in subjection to him, marched against Mesha, beat him, and forced him to retire to Areopolis, his capital. Here they besieged him so closely, that not being able to escape through the camp of the Idumæans, which he attacked, he took his own son, the presumptive heir to his crown, brought him upon the wall of the city, and was going to sacrifice him. But the kings of Judah, Israel, and Edom, seeing this, retired without taking the town, [vide FRAGMENT, No. CLVI.] making a great spoil in the land of Moab. See JEHORAM, JEHOSEPHAT, and MOAB.

III. MESHA, or Messa, or Messach. The high-priest Jehoiada, desiring to set the young king Joash on the throne of Judah, placed armed men in different parts of the temple; particularly at the house of Mesha. Custodietis excubias domus Messa, 2 Chr. xxiii. 6. Vulgate. We believe it to be the MUSACH, which see; also 2 Kings xvi. 18.

IV. MESHA, or Mesa, eldest son of Caleb, son of Hesron, different from Caleb, son of Jephunneh; he was father of Ziph, or of the Ziphians, in Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 42.

MESHACH, מֵשַׁח, Heb. Misael, Dan. i. 7. That draws with force; from מֵשַׁח mashac: or that surrounds the waters; from מִי mi, the waters, and שָׁח shuc, to surround. A Chaldean name given to Mishael, companion of Daniel. [ready, swift, agile? from the Chaldee.]

MESHECH, מֵשֶׁךְ, who is drawn by force; from מֵשַׁח mashac: otherwise, included, shut up, surrounded; from שָׁח shuc.

MESHECH, or Mosoc, sixth son of Japhet, Gen. x. 2. thought to be father of the Mosques, a people between Iberia and Armenia, [of the Cappadocians, say some.] Others believe that the Muscovites are descended from Meshech, which opinion to us seems likely. See Gen. x. 2. Ezek. xxvii. 13. xxxii. 26. xxxviii. 2, 3. xxxix. 1.

[MESHECH, 1 Chron. i. 17. otherwise called MASH, Son of Aram, Gen. x. 23. The name is the same as Meshech, son of Japhet, above; i. e. extraction extraction, or selection. From this source the Meonians derived their origin.]

MESHELEMLIAH, מְשֻׁלְמִיָּהוּ, peace, or perfection, or retribution of the Lord: or the Lord is my recompence, or my happiness; from שְׁלָוָה shalom: otherwise, proverbs, or rule of the Lord; from מָשַׁל mashal, to govern, and יָהּ jah.

I. MESHELEMLIAH, father of Zechariah, a Levite and porter of the temple, 1 Chr. ix. 21.

II. MESHELEMLIAH, or Meselemlia, son of Korah, and father of several sons, who were guards or porters in the temple, 1 Chron. xxvi. 2, 9.

MESHEZABEEL, מְשֻׁזַּבְעָל, that takes away the flowing of God; from מִשָּׁהּ mush, to take away, and זָבַב zub, flowing, and אֱלֹהִים el, God. A Chaldee word, signifying, that God delivers, has delivered, or will deliver; from שִׁזְבַּב shezib, and אֱלֹהִים el, God. Neh. iii. 4. x. 22. xi. 24.

MESHILLEMITH, מְשֻׁלְמִית, Μεσελμωθ, pacific, perfect, or that recompenses; from שְׁלָוָה shalam: otherwise, parable, or power of death; from מָשַׁל mashal, parable, and מוּת muth, death. Father of Meshullam, and son of Immer, 1 Chr. ix. 12.

MESHILLEMOTH, מְשֻׁלְמוֹת, Μεσελμωθ, from the same root.

I. MESHILLEMOTH, or Mosollamoth, father of Berachiah, 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

II. MESHILLEMOTH, father of Ahasaia, Nehem. xi. 13.

MESHOBAB, מְשׁוּבָּב, who is returned, or converted, from שׁוּב shub. 1 Chron. iv. 34.

MESHULLAM, מְשׁוּלָּם Μεσολαμ, pacific, or perfect, or that recompenses; from שְׁלָוָה shalam: otherwise, their parable, their power; from מָשַׁל mashal, and the pronoun אֲמָם am, theirs.

I. MESHULLAM, or Mosallam, son of Hodaviah, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. ix. 7.

II. MESHULLAM, son of Shephatiah, 1 Chr. ix. 8.

III. MESHULLAM, son of Abihail, 1 Chr. v. 13.

IV. MESHULLAM, son of Meshillemith, 1 Chr. ix. 12.

V. MESHULLAM, descendant of Kohath, 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12.

VI. MESHULLAM, son of Besodeiah, Neh. iii. 6.

VII. MESHULLAM, son of Berechiah, Neh. iii. 4.

MESHULLEMETH, מְשֻׁלְמֶת, perfection, peace, recompence, parable, or dominion of death; from שְׁלָוָה shalam, or מָשַׁל mashal, and מוּת muth, death. Wife of Manasseh king of Judah: daughter of Haruz, of Jotbah. 2 Kings xxi. 19.

MESOBAB, מְצַבָּה, station of the Lord; from מַצָּב matzab, station, and יָהּ jah, the Lord, otherwise, צֶבֶע tsabah, a kid or goat. The name of a place 1 Chron. xi. 47.

MESOPOTAMIA, אֲרָם-נַהֲרַיִם, Aram-naharaim; i. e. Syria of the two rivers; from Aram, Syria, and נַהֲרַיִם neharaim, the two rivers: The Greek word Mesopotamia, also signifies between two rivers; from μέσος, middle, and ποταμός, river.

MESOPOTAMIA, a famous province, situated between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. The Hebrews call it Aram of the rivers, because it was first peopled by Aram, father of the Syrians. This country is celebrated in Scripture as the first dwelling of men after the deluge; and because it gave birth to Phaleg, Heber, Terah, Abraham, Nabor, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Leah, the sons of Jacob, &c. Babylon was in the ancient Mesopotamia, till by vast labour and industry the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates were united in one channel. The plains of Shinar were in this country. It was often called Mesopotamia Syriae, because it was inhabited by the Arameans, or Syrians: and sometimes Padan-aram, Gen. xxviii. 2, &c. פְּדַן אֲרָם, the plains of Aram: or Sede-aram, the fields of Aram; to distinguish the fertile plains from the uncultivated mountains of this country. Balaam, son of Beor, was of Mesopotamia. Deut. xxiii. 4. Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia, subdued the Hebrews. Judg. iii. 8.

[MESOPOTAMIA, is between Babylonia and Arabia, on the left of the Tigris, where dwell the learned of Babylon, says Strabo, lib. ii. xvii. and Ammianus, lib. xxiii. says Mesopotamia is between the streams of Tigris and Euphrates. Padan-aram, is by some interpreted redemption; or from the Syriac, similarity, or conjunction. Gen. xxiv. 10. Deut. xxiii. 4. Judg. iii. 8. 1 Chron. xix. 6. Psalm lx. title.

Mesopotamia, Josh. xxiv. 2, 3. in Hebrew is Ober-ha-nahar, that is, "beyond the river." Trans-Oxiana. See MAWER-AL-NAHAR.

Such is the statement of Stephens, which I notice, because he seems to have felt the force of the observation, that Naharaim is plural, the rivers, when connected with Aram; but, Nahar is singular, the river, in Joshua. Indeed it seems to be unaccountable, if Aram Naharaim had been the the country intended by Joshua, why he should have changed that name for another not expressing the same peculiarity of locality, but a totally different fact; one country lying between two rivers perfectly well known, the other beyond a certain river, which situation became its appellation, and continues so to be.

Arrian, lib. iii, describes the inhabitants of the Greek Mesopotamia as those who dwell in the midst of (rather, between) the rivers. Strabo informs us that Mesopotamia was divided into two parts, the first which he calls Mesopotamia Felix, (the Padan-aram of S. S. I suppose,) included from the mountains of Armenia to the river Chaboras: the other included from the Chaborns south to Babylon, and was inculta et aspera, uncultivated and rugged.]

Beside the country commonly called Mesopotamia in Greek, and Aram Naharaim in Hebrew, Harduin, Chron. Vet. Test. p. 552, mentions another which was in Syria between the rivers Marsyas and Orontes. This opinion is founded on what follows. First, the term Mesopotamia signifies simply a country lying between two rivers; so that this name may be given to any country in such a situation, whatever rivers enclose it. Secondly, the title of Psalm lx intimates, that David burnt Mesopotamia of Syria, and Syria of Zobah. But it is known that David did not make war with king Zoba, but to enlarge his conquests as far as the Euphrates, and that Syria of Zoba was beyond that river. Thirdly, the book of Judith says, ii. 24. that Holofernes went over Euphrates, and went through Mesopotamia; and destroyed all the high cities. Certain it is, that this general came out of Assyria. Mesopotamia, properly so called, was in obedience to Nebuchadnezzar his master. He therefore passed over the Euphrates into the Mesopotamia of Syria of which we are speaking; very different from that known to the Greeks and Latins between the Tigris and Euphrates.

To chuse a side in this difficulty, we must enquire whether these objections are strong enough to set aside the general opinion of geographers; who acknowledge but one Mesopotamia, i. e. Aram-Naharaim. For if the texts on which the objection is founded can be explained, without the expedient of a second Mesopotamia, we ought not to have recourse to it. As to the title of Psalm lx. it is of little authority, since the greater part of the titles of the Psalms have been placed there long after the authors composed them. Besides, it may be explained by saying, that David fought with Mesopotamia of Syria; i. e. that he conquered the auxiliary troops which came from Mesopotamia beyond the Euphrates, to the assistance of Hadarezar and the Ammonites, as expressly said, 2 Sam. x. 16, 19.

As to the passage of Judith, it may be said, that Holofernes passed the Euphrates twice, by himself in person, or by his captains. The first time he came into Syria and Cilicia, and reduced those provinces. The second time when he had conquered them, he repassed the Euphrates to reduce some other people. We do not affirm that he passed in his own person through all the countries mentioned in Judith. It is sufficient if this was performed under his orders, and by his troops. Therefore nothing in the two texts objected obliges us to acknowledge this second Mesopotamia.

[MESSAL, a discourse, that which is solicited, the petitioned for.

A city in Asher, Josh. xix. 26. xxi. 30. called Massal, 1 Chron. vi. 59.]

MESSIAS, or MESSIAH, מִשִּׁיחַ, Μεσσίας, Χριστός, anointed; from מָשַׁח mashiach. In Greek, CHRISTOS signifies the same thing.

MESSIAH, or MESSIAS. A title given principally, or by way of eminence, to that sovereign deliverer formerly expected by the Jews, and expected by them to this day. They used to anoint kings, high-priests, and sometimes prophets. Saul, David, Solomon, and Joash, kings of Judah, received the royal unction. Aaron and his sons received the sacerdotal unction; and Elisha, the disciple of Elijah, received the prophetic unction, 1 Kings xix. 16. But sometimes the phrase, to anoint for an employment, signifies simply a particular designation or choice for such an employment. Vide Theodoret, on Isaiah xlv. 1. and Psalm cv. 15. It is said, 2 Sam. xix. 10. "that the Israelites had anointed Absalom to be their king," yet it does not appear that he received the royal unction. The Lord commanded Elijah to anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, 1 Kings xix. 15. but we do not find that the prophet literally performed the order. His successor Elisha foretold to Hazael that he should reign, 2 Kings viii. 11, 12, 13, 14. yet he gave him not the royal unction; at least the Scripture mentions nothing of it; and probably it was not customary to give the unction to the kings of Damascus. Cyrus, who founded the empire of the Persians, and who set the Jews at liberty, is called, Isa. xlv. 1. the anointed of the Lord." In Ezekiel, xxviii. 14. the name of Messiah is given to the king of Tyre, "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth." In Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 8. we read that Elisha anointed kings for vengeance. He anointed Jehu king of Israel by the hands of a prophet whom he sent, and he acquainted Hazael by word of mouth, that he should reign over Damascus and Syria.

This is the name attributed by the Hebrews to that Saviour and Deliverer whom they expected, and who was promised to them by all the prophets. As the holy unction was given to kings, priests and prophets, by describing the promised Saviour of the world, under the name of Christ, Anointed, or Messiah, it was sufficiently evidenced, that the qualities of king, prophet, and high-priest, would eminently center in him; and that he should exercise them not only over the Jews, but over all mankind; and particularly over those who should receive him, as their Saviour.

St. Peter and the other believers being assembled together, Acts iv. 27. quote from Psalm ii. "Why did the Heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together."

St. Luke says, iv. 18. that our Saviour entering a synagogue at Nazareth, opened the book of the prophet Isaiah, where he read, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." After which he shewed them, that this prophecy was accomplished in his own person. St. Peter speaking to Cornelius the centurion, and to those who were with him, Acts x. 36, 37. tells them that the Lord had sent peace by Jesus Christ, whom he had anointed with the Holy Ghost, and with power." St. Paul says to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. "Now he which stablisheth us with you, in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our heart.

It is not recorded, that Jesus Christ ever received any external, official, unction. The unction that the prophets and the apostles speak of, is the spiritual and internal unction of grace, and of the Holy Ghost, of which the outward unction, with which kings, priests, and prophets were anciently anointed, was but the figure and symbol. [Nevertheless, many have supposed, and I see no harm in it, that when the Spirit visibly descended on Jesus at his baptism, he then received a peculiar, solemn, and appropriate unction.] Jesus Christ united in his own person the offices of king, prophet, and priest, and eminently included in himself whatever the law and the prophets had promised or figured, that was most excellent or most perfect. Christians, his disciples and his children, enjoy, in some sense, the same prerogatives; "but ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him that hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9. But all this must be understood in a spiritual sense, of the grace of the Holy Ghost; his holy unction poured into our hearts.

The name Messiah, Anointed, or Christ, was given to the kings, and to the high-priests of the Hebrews. "The Lord is witness against you, and his anointed, 1 Sam. xii. 3, 5. i. e. the Lord, and the king whom he has established. And David says in several places, "God forbid that I should lay my hand on the Lord's anointed." The patriarchs and prophets are also represented by the name of Messiahs, or the Lord's anointed. "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm," Psalm. cv. 15. But this name belongs to the Messiah by way of excellence, who was the object of the desire and expectation of the saints. Hannah the mother of Samuel plainly alludes to him, when at the end of her hymn, and in a time that there was no king in Israel, she says, 1 Sam. ii. 10. "The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth, and he shall give strength unto his king, and exalt the horn of his anointed;" i. e. the glory, the strength, the power of his Christ, or Messiah. And the Psalmist, ii. 2. "The kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord, and against his Messiah, or anointed. And Psal. xlv. 7. "Therefore God thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Also, Jeremiah, Lam. iv. 20. "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits." Daniel foretels the death of Jesus Christ under the name of Messiah the Lord. "And after three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself." chap. ix. 26. Lastly, Habakkuk says, iii. 13. "Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, even for salvation with thine anointed." It would be needless to bring testimonies from the New Testament, to prove Jesus to be the Messiah, since they occur in almost every line.

The Greek word Christos, whence come Christ and Christian, exactly answers to the Hebrew Messiah, which signifies him who has received unction; a king, a priest. The Greeks also use the term Eleimmenos, which has the same signification as Christos.

The ancient Hebrews, being instructed by the prophets, had clear notions of the Messiah: but these were depraved by little and little, so that when Jesus appeared in Judæa, the Jews entertained a false conception of the Messiah, expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror, who should remove the Roman yoke, and subject the whole world. Hence they were scandalized at the outward appearance, the humility, and seeming weakness of our Saviour. The modern Jews, indulging still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their forefathers.

The ancient prophets had foretold, that Messiah should be God and man, exalted and abased, master and servant, priest and victim, Prince and subject, involved in death yet victor over over death, rich and poor : a king, a conqueror, glorious ; a man of griefs, exposed to infirmities, unknown, in a state of abjection and humiliation. All these contrarieties were to be reconciled in the person of the Messiah : as they really were in the person of Jesus. It was known that the Messiah was to be born (1) of a Virgin, (2) of the tribe of Judah, (3) of the race of David, (4) in the village of Bethlehem. That he was to continue for ever, that his coming was to be concealed, that he was the great Prophet promised in the law, that he was both the son and Lord of David, that he was to perform great miracles, that he should restore all things, that he should die and rise again, that Elias should be the forerunner of his appearance, that a proof of his verity should be, the cure of lepers, life restored to the dead, and the gospel preached to the poor. That he should not destroy the law, but should perfect and fulfil it ; that he should be a stone of offence, and a stumbling-block, against which many should bruise themselves ; that he should suffer infinite oppositions and contradictions ; that from his time idolatry and impiety should be banished, and that distant people should submit themselves to his authority.

When Jesus appeared in Judæa, these notions were common among the Jews. Our Saviour appeals even to themselves, and asks, if these are not the characters of the Messiah ? and, if they do not see their completion in himself ? The evangelists take care to put the Jews in mind of them, proving hereby, that Jesus is the Christ whom they expected. They quote the prophecies to them, which then were acknowledged to belong to the Messiah, though they have been controverted by the Jews since. It may be seen in the early fathers of the church, and in the most ancient Jewish authors, that in the beginning of Christianity, they did not call in doubt several prophecies, which their forefathers understood of the Messiah. But in after ages they began to deny, that the passages we quote against them, should be understood of the Messiah, endeavouring to defend themselves from arguments out of their own scriptures. After this they fell into new schemes, and new notions concerning the Messiah.

Some of them, as the famous Hillel, who lived, according to the Jews, before Christ, maintain that the Messiah was already come in the person of king Hezekiah. Others, that the belief of the coming of the Messiah is no article of faith, and he that denies this doctrine makes but a small breach in the law ; he only lops off a branch from the tree, without hurting the root. This was affirmed by Joseph Albo the Jew, in a conference held in Spain, in the presence of Pope Benedict XIII. Buxtorf says, Synag. Judg. cap. 36, that the greater part of the modern Rabbins believe, that the Messiah has been come, a good while, but keeps himself concealed in some part of the world or other, and will not manifest himself, because of the sins of the Jews. Jarchi affirms, that the Hebrews believed the Messiah was born on the day of the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Some assign him the terrestrial paradise for his habitation, others the city of Rome, where according to the Talmudists, he keeps himself concealed among the leprous and infirm, at the gate of the city, expecting Elias to come to manifest him.

A great number believe he is not yet come ; but they are strangely divided about the time and circumstances of his coming. Some expect him at the end of six thousand years. They suppose Jesus Christ to be born A. M. 3761. Add to this number 1800, it will make 5561, consequently they have 439 years to expect still. Kimchi, who lived in the twelfth century, was of opinion, that the coming of the Messiah was very near. David, the grandson of Maimonides, was advised with in this matter ; Maimonides himself had been consulted about it ; but neither of them could say any thing to the purpose. Maimonides pretended to have received certain prophecies from his ancestors, importing that the gift of prophecy should be restored to Israel, after the same number of years from the time of Baalam, as had passed from the beginning of the world to Baalam's time. According to him Baalam prophesied A. M. 2488. If we double this number, we find the restoration of the gift of prophecy should be A. M. 4976, i. e. A. D. 1316. But this conclusion has been found false. Some have fixed the end of their misfortunes to A. D. 1492 : others to A. D. 1598, others to A. D. 1600, others yet later. Last of all, tired out with these uncertainties, they have pronounced an anathema against any, who shall pretend to calculate the time of the coming of the Messiah. Gemarr. Tit. Sanhedr. cap. xi.

To reconcile those prophecies which seem to oppose each other, some have had recourse to an hypothesis of two Messiahs, one in a state of humiliation, poverty and sufferings ;—the other in splendor, glory, and magnificence ; but both of them to be mere men. The first is to proceed from the tribe of Joseph, and the family of Ephraim : his father is to be called Huziel, and himself Nehemiah. He is to appear at the head of an army, composed of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, of Benjamin, and part of Gad : he shall make war with the Edomites, (thus they call the Christians and the Romans, whose empire they are to destroy) and bring back the Jews in triumph to Jerusalem.

The second Messiah is to be of the race of David, is to bring the first Messiah to life again, to assemble all Israel, to raise those that are dead, to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, and to rule over the whole world. He is to marry several wives, and to have many children, who are to succeed him after his death; for he is to die like other men. On this subject vide two dissertations of F. Charles Joseph Imbonatus, at the end of tom. v. of the Bibliotheca Rabbinnica, concerning the coming of the Messiah; also what Bartolucci has gathered in tom. i. of his Bibliotheca Rabbinnica; and Basnage's History of the Jews, tom. iv.

Jesus Christ gave warning to his disciples, that false prophets and false Messiahs should arise; Mark xiii. 22—that they should perform signs and wonders, by which even the elect themselves would be in danger. The event has verified his prediction. Every age among the Jews has produced false prophets, and false Christs, who have succeeded in deceiving many of that nation. One appeared even in the age of Christ himself; I mean Simon Magus, who reported at Samaria that he was the great Power of God, Acts viii. 9. In the following century Barchochebas by his impostures drew the most terrible persecution on the Jews that they had ever suffered. See BARCHOCHÉBAS, ADRIAN, AKIBA and JERUSALEM.

About A. D. 434, there appeared in the isle of Candia a false Messiah called Moses, who pretended to be the ancient Legislator of the Jews, descended from heaven to procure a glorious deliverance for the Jews of that island, by making them pass over the sea, into the Land of Promise, Socrat. Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 38. The Jews of Candia were fools enough to be persuaded by him; many of them jumped into the sea, in expectation that it would open to give them a safe passage. A great number were drowned, and the rest got out again as well as they could; the impostor was sought for to be punished, but he disappeared.

A. D. 530, there appeared in Palestine a false Messiah called Julian; he gave himself out to be a conqueror, and assured his followers, that he would deliver them from the oppression of the Christians, by force of arms. Misled by such promises, the Jews took arms, and killed many Christians. But the emperor Justinian sending troops, Julian was taken and executed, and his party dispersed.

A. D. 714, a Jew called Serenus, pretended to the Spanish Jews, that he would conduct thém to Palestine, and set up his empire there. Several believed in this new Messiah, forsook their country and their business, and began to follow him. But they soon found him to be a cheat, and had time enough to repent of their credulity, Marca, Hist. de Bearn, lib. ii.

The twelfth century was very fruitful in this kind of imposture. One appeared in France, who brought on his followers a severe rebuke from king Louis le Jeune; he was taken and put to death, but his name and country are not known. He appeared about A. D. 1137. The year following another started up in Persia; his army was numerous, and hardy enough to offer battle to the king of Persia. That prince chose rather to compel the Jews in his dominions, to oblige this man to lay down his arms; the false Messiah answered, that the present success of his undertaking was a warrant to him of the future, and that they had nothing to fear. However, at last he promised to quit his arms, if he might be reimbursed the charges he had been at in preparing for war. The king complied with this proposal, but no sooner was his army dismissed, but the king forced the Jews to repay him, what he had paid the impostor, Maimon. Epist. de Australi Regione, apud Vorstium, Not. in Zemath. Solomon Ben-virga Schever Juda, p. 169.

In the same century were seen no fewer than seven or eight false Messiahs, not only in Spain, but in Arabia, in Persia, in Moravia. The Moravian was said to have the secret of making himself invisible when he pleased, and to charm the eyes of those who followed him. Another, called David Al-roi, was a conjurer, who by some false miracles deceived a great number of Jews, whom he persuaded to take arms. The king, amazed at the rapidity of his conquests, and at the multitude of his followers, ordered him to appear at court, with a promise of submitting to him, if he could prove himself to be the true Messiah. David attended on the king, was put in prison, but he came out again; was pursued, but he disappeared: his voice was heard, but nothing was seen of him. The king marched at the head of his army in hopes to catch him, and arrived at the banks of the river Goran, where he heard him cry out, O Fools! but he was not seen. A moment afterwards he was observed dividing the waters of the river with his cloak, when he passed over. The army followed him, but he was no more to be found. The king then wrote to the Jews in his dominions, to deliver up David to him, on penalty of all being massacred without quarter. Zaccheus, the head of the captivity, wrote to the impostor to deliver himself up and save the nation, nation, but he made a jest of this. However, at last, the father-in-law of David, gained over by a great sum of money, tempted him into his power, made him drunk, and cut off his head.

James Zieglern, who died A. D. 1559, loudly proclaimed the coming of the Messiah. He maintained that he had been born fourteen years, and that he had seen him at Strasburg. He kept a sword and a sceptre to put into his hands, as soon as he should arrive at an age proper for fighting. Then he should pull down Antichrist, and the Turkish empire; should extend his monarchy to the utmost limits of the world, should assemble a council at Constance, which would hold for twelve years, and in which all disputes about religion should be finally determined. But the Messiah did not appear, and this imposture was manifest. Another visionary called Philip Zieglern arose in Holland, A. D. 1624, and promised a Messiah whom he had seen, and who only waited for the conversion of the hearts of the Jews, in order to manifest himself.

All these impostures, with their total failure, have not been able to cure the Jews of their whimsical notions, concerning the Messiah whom they expect. One of their nation, born at Aleppo, called Zabatai Tzevi, attempted about A. D. 1666 to be received as the Messiah. He had concerted this design very early, and learned whatever might be necessary to the better acting of his part. He preached in the fields before the Turks, who only derided him; but his disciples were in great admiration of him. He bragged that he could raise himself above the clouds, as Isaiah had foretold, xiv. 14. And having asked his disciples if they had not seen him do it, he reproached the blindness of those who had sincerity enough not to affirm it. He was summoned before the heads of the synagogue at Smyrna, where he then resided, and was condemned to death; but no one would execute this sentence: so that they were contented to banish him.

Tzevi was three times married, but did not consummate his marriage. Having gone through Greece, he came to Alexandria, and thence to Gaza, where he found a Jew called Nathan-Levi, or Benjamin, whom he persuaded to act the part of the prophet Elias, who was to precede the Messiah. They came to Jerusalem. Nathan declared Tzevi to be him whom they expected. Part of the Jews of the country were seduced into the cheat, but the wiser sort opposed him, and excommunicated him. He withdrew to Constantinople, and thence to Smyrna, whither Nathan-Levi sent four ambassadors to him, who acknowledged him for the Messiah. This embassy imposed on the people, and even on some of the doctors; they owned him as a king, and brought him presents, that he might support his royal dignity. Those of better understanding remonstrated in vain. They even pronounced two sentences of death against him, but he was not concerned at it, because he knew they dared not put them in execution. He waited on the Cadi of Smyrna, and put himself under his protection. The whole discourse of the public was of Tzevi; he had a throne set up for himself, and another for his spouse. He called himself The King of the Kings of Israel, and Joseph Tzevi his brother The King of the Kings of Judah. He caused the name of the Ottoman emperor to be erased out of the liturgy, and substituted his own. Before he began the conquest of the empire, he distributed the offices and employments among his favourites.

He departed for Constantinople. The Grand Seignor being informed of it, ordered his vizier to seize him, to put him in prison, and give him the bastonado. They laid hold of him, and asked him, why he assumed the title of king? He answered, the Jews had compelled him. The vizier ordered him to prison at the Dardanelles. The Jews thought it was for want of power to hurt him that Tzevi was spared. They corrupted the governor by great presents, so that even in his prison the impostor was entertained with all possible honours. At length the Grand Seignor caused Tzevi to be brought to Adrianople, and ordered him to be run through with a sword, to try if he was invulnerable: but Tzevi chose rather to turn Mahometan, than thus to suffer death: and such was the conclusion of this famous transaction. Basnage Hist. Jews, tom. iii. lib. v. cap. 18.

METEMPSYCHOSIS. The notion of a metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul from one body to another, whatever modern Jews may say, is not taught, either in the Old or New Testament. On the contrary, it appears by the law, by the prophets, and by the apostles, that the souls of men after their death are in a fixed state, and have no longer any concern with this present life. The Jews quote the passage, Job xxxiii. 29, 30. to support their opinion concerning the metempsychosis. "Lo all these things worketh God oftentimes (Heb. twice and thrice) with man. To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living." As if Elihu alluded to a threefold revolution, or meant a threefold return of the soul to a body. But the true sense of this passage is, that God preserves the man who puts his confidence in him, three times, i. e. repeatedly—many times. There is great probability that that the Jews imbibed this notion, during their long captivity at Babylon; or from their intercourse with the Greeks, who themselves had borrowed it from the Orientals.

At the time of Jesus Christ this opinion was common among the Jews: whence they say, some thought Jesus to be John the Baptist, others Elias, others Jeremiah, or one of the old prophets, Matth. xvi. 14. And when Herod the Tetrarch heard reports of the miracles of Jesus, he said, that John the Baptist, whom he had beheaded, was risen again. Josephus and Philo, speak of the metempsychosis as an opinion common in their nation. The Pharisees held, according to Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12. that the souls of good men might easily return into other bodies, after the death of those which they had forsaken. He says also, de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 25, that the souls of wicked men sometimes enter into the bodies of living men, which they possess and torment. Philo says, de Somniis, p. 586, et de Gigantibus, p. 285, that the souls which descend out of the air into the bodies which they animate, return again into the air after the death of those bodies; that some of them retain a great abhorrence for matter, and dread to be again plunged into bodies; but that others return with good will, and natural desire, to renewed life.

The Jewish doctors who treat of the transmigration, wrap it up in obscure and mysterious terms. R. Isaac Lorien, de Revolution. Anim. cap. 4. Cabbalæ denudata, par. iii. p. 258. They believe that God has determined for all souls a certain degree of perfection, to which they cannot attain in the course of one life only. They therefore return several times upon the earth, and animate several bodies successively, that they may fulfil all righteousness; and practice all the commandments, negative and affirmative, without which they cannot arrive at the state which God intends for them. Whence is it, say they, that some people die in the prime of their youth? It is because they have already acquired their degree of perfection, and have nothing remaining to be done in a frail and mortal body. Others, like Moses, die with reluctance, because they have not accomplished all their duties. Others, like Daniel, die with satisfaction, and even desire death, because nothing remains for them to do in this world.

They say, the metempsychosis, or revolution of souls, is after two manners. The first when a soul enters a body already animated. Thus it was that Herod the Tetrarch imagined, that the soul of John the Baptist, whom he had caused to be beheaded a little before, was entered into the body of Jesus Christ, in order to work miracles. Souls enter into bodies already animated, to acquire some new degree of perfection, or to assist that soul already in the body, in the works which God requires of it. They say, for example, that the soul of Moses is to be united to that of the Messiah, &c.

The second manner of transmigration, say they, is, when a soul enters into a body newly formed, either to expiate some crime it had committed in another body, or to acquire a greater degree of sanctity. The Jews think this revolution is performed at least three or four times. They even extend this transmigration to brute beasts, and to inanimate things; and the number is not small that maintains this opinion. The most famous of the Jewish doctors hold it, and pretend that Pythagoras, Plato, Virgil, and the ancient philosophers who espoused it, derived it from the writings of the prophets.

This notion is very ancient in the East. The Chinese teach, that Xekiah an Indian philosopher, born about a thousand years before Jesus Christ, was the first promulgator of this doctrine in the Indies, whence it spread into China, A. D. 65. They pretend, that Xekiah was born eight thousand times, and that his last birth was in the form of a white elephant. On this principle the Indians and Chinese are so little scrupulous of putting themselves to death, and killing their children, when they find a difficulty in maintaining them. It is related that a king of this country having had the small-pox, and seeing his face much disfigured, could not endure to live under such a frightful form, but ordered his brother's son to cut his throat, who was afterwards burned. The story of the Indian philosopher Calanus is well known, who burned himself in the time of Alexander the Great.

The Indians look on death with indifference, being fully persuaded of the metempsychosis. This opinion has produced in the East a great number of impostors and false Messiahs, who pretended to be animated by the souls of Adam, or of Moses. For example, Akem-Ben-Asha, a famous impostor, who appeared in the year 162 of the Hegira, and affirmed, that after the death of Adam, God appeared to men under the shape of several prophets, and other great men, till he took a human figure in the person of Abu-Moslem, prince of Korasan; after whose death the Deity had passed and descended into his own person. From the same source those fanatics proceeded, who gave divine honours to Abon-Giasar-Almansor, the second calif of the race of the Abassides; into whom they pretended that the soul of Mahomet, or of some ancient prophet, had passed. Hence they abstain from killing any living creature, for fear of violating the soul of their father, or of some near relation, inhabiting those animals. They do not so much as defend themselves against wild beasts; and they charitably redeem animals out of the hands of strangers, who are about to kill them. See SOUL and RESURRECTION.

METHUSAEL, מֶתוּשָׁאֵל, who demands his death; from שָׁאֵל shelah, to demand, and מוּת muth, death, and the pronoun יו, his: otherwise, death in his hell, or grave; from שָׁאֵל sheol, hell, or the tomb; otherwise, man that demands; from מֶתִים methim, man, and שָׁאֵל shala, to demand. [Dangerous to God: i. e. extremely painful to his mother, at his birth.] Son of Mehujael; of the race of Cain. Gen. iv. 18.

METHUSELAH, מֶתוּשֶׁלַח, he has sent his death; from מוּת muth, death, and שָׁלַח shalach: otherwise, the arms of his death; from muth, death, and shalac or shelec, according to different readings, and the pronoun יו, his: otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, spoil of his death: otherwise, man that demands; from meth, mortal man, and shaal, to demand. [Extension further extended; i. e. of the family: possibly, also, as some think, referring to his extended life.]

METHUSELAH, son of Enoch, Gen. v. 21, 22: was born A. M. 687: He begat Lamech A. M. 874, and died A. M. 1656, aged nine hundred sixty-nine years; the greatest age attained by any mortal man. This year, A. M. 1656, was the year of the deluge.

Jerom in his Hebraical questions on Genesis, mentions a famous question that used to be debated, which is, that Methuselah, according to the LXX. must have lived fourteen years after the deluge; or according to other copies, he died six years before the deluge: in which, both accounts vary from the Hebrew text, which says he died the very year of the deluge. Thus the Seventy read—Methuselah being a hundred and sixty-seven years old begat Lamech, after which he lived yet eight hundred and two years, (or according to other copies seven hundred fourscore and two years) and the whole number of his years was nine hundred sixty-nine years. But if Lamech was born in the year of Methuselah 167, and if he begat Noah at the age of 188 years, which was the 355th year of Methuselah, the deluge happening in the 600th year of Noah, as the Scripture affirms, that is, in the year of Methuselah 955, it must follow that the year of the deluge was 14 years before the death of Methuselah. But we may admit, that the copies of the Septuagint have been injured in this place.

The Rabbins pretend that Methuselah was a very learned man, that he was a hundred years at the school of his father Enoch, that he wrote several works, and three hundred and thirty proverbs or parables. Eupolemus in Eusebius, Præparat. lib. ix. cap. 17. acquaints us, that Methuselah, by the ministry of angels, learned all kinds of knowledge. Solomon Jarchi thinks he died seven days before the deluge, that his son Noah might have time to lament him; and the book of Jalkut says, that then a voice was heard from heaven, as if the angels themselves bewailed the death of Methuselah.

METRETA; a sort of measure, very nearly the same as the Bath of the Hebrews. John says, ii. 6. that at the marriage of Cana, there were six large urns, or stone water pots, containing about two or three firkins (μετρηται) a piece; which Christ changed into excellent wine. [Comp. Dr. E. D. Clarke's Travels, Vol. II. p. 445]

MEUZAL, מֵעֻזַּל, Μοοζήλ, that goes out, or goes away; from עָזַל azal. [Eng. Trans. "going to and fro" Ezek. xxvii. 19. מֵעֻזַּל וְדָן.]

MEUZAL, or MOSEL, a city whose situation is unknown. The Hebrew of Ezekiel may be translated as the Vulgate, Dan et Græcia et Mosel; or Dan and Javan of Ozel or Usal. Bochart, Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 22. thinks that by Javan of Ozel or Uzal, are meant the descendants of Javan, whose habitation was at Usal, a city of Arabia. Instead of Javan the LXX. read Jain, wine; also Asel or Asael, and not Mosel. The Syriac has Dan and Javan of Uzel; the Arabic, they brought to your fairs wine of Ail. The Chaldee, Dan and Javan brought you merchandizes in troops, &c. I suspect some alteration in this passage. Dan and Javan are too far distant from each other, to be thus brought together.

MEZAHAB, מֵצָהָב, Μεζαῖβ, who is gilded; from צָהָב zahab, gold: or waters yielding gold; from מֵי mi, waters, and צָהָב zahab, gold: otherwise, what is gold; from the conjunction מֵי, mi, what is, and צָהָב zahab, gold. Mother of Martred, Gen. xxxvi. 39.

MEZUZOTH. This name the Jews give to certain pieces of parchment, which they fix on the door posts of their houses; taking literally what Moses orders, Deut. vi. 9, 11, 13. Thou shalt never forget the laws of thy God, but thou shalt write them on the posts of thy house, and on thy gates. They pretend, that to avoid making themselves ridiculous, by writing the commandments of God without their doors, or rather to avoid exposing them to prophannation, they ought to write them on parchment, and to enclose it. Therefore they write these words words on a square piece of parchment prepared on purpose, with a particular ink, and a square kind of character, Deut. vi. 4,—9. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," &c. Then they leave a little space, and afterwards go on, to Deut. xi. 13. "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently to my commandments," &c. as far as, "thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house." —After this they roll up the parchment, put it into a case, and write on it Shadai, which is one of the names of God; they attach it to the doors of their houses, and chambers, to the knocker of the door on the right side, and as often as they pass, they touch it in this place with their finger, which they afterwards kiss. The Hebrew mezuzah properly signifies a door-post of a house; but is a name also given to this roll of parchment. Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, Part i. cap. 2. Vide Plate of PHYLACTERIES, and FRAGMENT, No. CCXXXIV.

MIAMIN, מִימִין, Meimîn, who is dextrous, or the right hand; from יָמִין jamin: otherwise, that prepares waters; from מֵי mi, waters, and מִן min, preparation. Son of Parosh, of the race of the priests; one who divorced his strange wife. Ezr. x. 25.

MIBHAR, מִבְּחָר, elected, or election, or youth; from בָּחַר bachar, to choose, &c. Son of Hageri, a valiant man of David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 38.

MIBSAM, מִבְּשָׁם, that perfumes; from בִּשְׁם beshem: otherwise, who confounds them; from בּוֹשׁ bosh, to confound, or put to shame, and the pronoun מֵ am, them.

I. MIBSAM, or Mabsam, son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13.

II. MIBSAM, son of Shallum, 1 Chron. iv. 25.

MIBZAR, מִבְּצָר, Maẓẓâr, which is defended, or fortified: or that cuts, or has a vintage; from בָּצַר batzar, bitzur, or bitser, according to different readings. He succeeded Taman in the principality of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 42.

MICAH, מִיכָא, poor, humble; from מָכַךְ macac: otherwise, who strikes, or is struck, from נָכַח nacah: otherwise, who is there? from the conjunction מִי mi, and כֹּה co, here, there: or, waters here; from מֵי mi, waters, and כֹּה co, here.

MICAH, son of Zichri, and father of Mattaniah, 1 Chron. ix. 15.

II. MICAH, מִיכָא, Micha, or Michas, son of Meribbaal, i. e. Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. ix. 6, 12. Micha's sons were Pithon, Melech, Tarea, and Ahaz, 1 Chron. viii. 34, 35.

III. MICAH, father of Achbor, 2 Kings xxii. 12.

IV. MICAH, of Reuben; son of Joel, 1 Chr. v. 5.

V. MICAH, son of Uzziel, 1 Chron. xxiii. 20.

VI. MICAH, the Morasthite, or of Moresa, a village near Eleutheropolis, in the south of Judah, is the seventh in order of the twelve lesser prophets. He prophesied under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, about fifty years: from about A. M. 3245, or the beginning of the reign of Jonathan, to A. M. 3306, or the last year of Hezekiah. This prophet was nearly contemporary with Isaiah, and has some expressions in common with him; compare Isaiah ii. 2. with Micah iv. 1. and Isaiah xli. 15, with Micah iv. 13.

The prophecy of Micah contains but seven chapters. He first foretels the calamities of Samaria; afterwards he prophesies against Judah; then he exclaims against the iniquities of Samaria; he foretels the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. The third chapter contains a pathetic invective against the princes of the house of Jacob, and the judges of the house of Israel; which in my opinion is levelled against the chiefs of the kingdom of Judah, the judges, the magistrates, the priests, the false prophets, &c. We are informed by Jeremiah, xxvi. 18, 19, &c. that this prophecy was pronounced in the time of Hezekiah, and that in the days of Jehoiakim it protected Jeremiah from death, who prophesied much the same things against Jerusalem as Micah had done.

After these terrible denunciations, Micah speaks of the reign of the Messiah. And as the peaceable times which succeeded the return from the Babylonish captivity, and which prefigured the reign of the Messiah, were disturbed by a tempest of short continuance; Micah foretold it in a manner, which agrees very well with what Ezekiel says, of the war of Gog against the saints, and which we think had relation to the reign of Cambyses, or the war of Holofernes. Micah speaks particularly of the birth of the Messiah v. 2, 3, &c. at Bethlehem, whose dominion was to extend over the earth.

The two last chapters of Micah contain a long invective against the iniquities of Samaria; then he foretels the fall of Babylon, the re-establishment of Israel, their happiness, &c. and this in such lofty terms, as chiefly agree with the state of the Christian church.

Jerom, Ep. 37. says, that Micah was buried at Morasthi; and Sozomen, lib. vii. cap. 29. Hist. Eccl. says, that his tomb was revealed to Zebennus, bishop of Eleutheropolis, in the reign of Theodosius the Great. He calls the place of his burial Beretsate, which is probably the same as Morasthi, ten furlongs from Eleutheropolis. The author of the Life and Death of the Prophets, printed under the name of Epiphanius, pretends that Micah was thrown headlong, and put to death by Jehoram, son of Ahab, because he

he could not bear his freedom in reproving his vices. But this author, as several others, has confounded Micah the Morasthite, with Micaiah, son of Imlah, who lived in the kingdom of the ten tribes, under the reign of Ahab. The spurious Dorotheus says, that Micah was buried in the burying place of the Anakim, whose habitation had been at Hebron.

MICAH, מִיכָיָה, Μιχαίας, who is like to God?

VII. MICAH, or Michaihu, of Ephraim, son of a rich widow, who became an occasion of falling to Israel, Judges xvii. xviii. The mother of Micah had laid by a reserve of eleven hundred shekels, about £125 10s. This money being missing, she was in a great passion about it, and uttered heavy imprecations against the thief. Whether Micah had taken it himself, or whether he recovered it from somebody who had taken it, he comes and tells his mother that it was in his custody. The mother regained her temper, and blessing her son for his diligence, told him it was dedicated to God, that she would have an ephod made with it, (or priestly habit) and images of metal: for a domestic chapel. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite.

It is believed this happened in the interval, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. During this time the tribe of Dan being streightened in their inheritance, sent six hundred men to seek a more convenient settlement. They passed by Micah's house, on the mountains of Ephraim, and desired the Levite who resided there, to enquire of the Lord about the success of their expedition. He answered them, that the Lord would prosper their undertaking.

They came a second time to the house of Micah; and having persuaded the priest to their party, they took away the ephod, and the graven images. Micah ran after them, crying out, but they threatened him, and obliged him to retire.

Having taken Laish, they there set up the idol purloined from Micah, and appointed for their priest, Jonathan, son of Gershom, son of Moses. This idol continued here all the time the house of God was at Shilo, and to the captivity of the country; or, according to another version of the Hebrew, to the deliverance of the country. Some understand it of the deliverance of the country by Samuel; others, of the captivity of the ten tribes by the kings of Assyria, Salmanassar, and Tiglath-pilesser. During all this time the city of Laish, otherwise called Dan, was a place of idolatry and superstition; worshipping either the Teraphim of Micah, or the golden calves of Jeroboam.

VOL. II. PART XIX. Edit. IV.

MICAIAH, מִיכָיָה, Μιχαίας, from the same.

I. MICAIAH, mother of Abijah, king of Judah. See MAACHAH.

II. MICAIAH, or Michaiah, מִיכָיָה, son of Imlah, of Ephraim, a prophet of the Lord. It is thought to have been Micaiah, though Scripture does not mention his name, who directed one of his associates to strike him, and to wound him, which the other refusing, Micaiah told him, a lion should meet and kill him, which happened accordingly. Micaiah meeting another, desired the same thing, which he performed. Thus the prophet being disfigured, threw dust in his face, and went to meet King Ahab: complaining that being charged with a prisoner, he had escaped, but his ransom was required of him. The king gave sentence against him.—At which the prophet wiping the dust off his face, and discovering himself to Ahab, said, “Just so says the Lord to thee. Because thou hast let go a man deserving of death, thy life shall answer for his life, and thy people for his people.” He spoke of Ben-hadad king of Syria, whom Ahab had suffered to escape, when he was in his power. 1 Kings xx. 35.

About three years after, when Ahab made war against Ben-hadad king of Syria, he invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to accompany him, 1 Kings, xxii. Jehoshaphat, who was then at Samaria, consented, but desired that a prophet of the Lord might be consulted about their success. For he would not rely on the prophets of Baal, who had assured Ahab of victory. They brought Micaiah, son of Imlah before the kings, and instructed him by the way, to conform his sentiments to those of the other prophets. Ahab having asked him, whether they should march against Ramoth Gilead, or no? Micaiah answered, March on and prosper, the Lord shall deliver it into thy hands. The king replied, I adjure thee in the name of the Lord to answer only according to the truth. Then Micaiah says to him with a more serious countenance; I saw all Israel dispersed upon the mountains, like sheep that have no shepherd: and the Lord said, they have no captain, let every one return in peace to his own house.

Micaiah added an apologue, or parable, “I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, amid the heavenly host. And the Lord said, Who shall seduce Ahab, king of Israel, to march against Ramoth-Gilead, that he may die there? One answered one thing, and another, another. Then an evil spirit stepped forth and said, I will seduce Ahab, by putting a lie into the mouth of all his prophets. The Lord said to him, Go, and thou shalt succeed. Now has the Lord put a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets, and and has passed sentence against thee." At this time Zedekiah, son of Chenaanah, stepped up to Micaiah, and gave him a blow on the face, saying, which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to speak unto thee? To whom Micaiah replied, That thou shalt see, when thou shalt skulk from chamber to chamber to hide thyself." Then Ahab said to his people, Take Micaiah and carry him to Amon the governor of Samaria, and let him be fed with the bread of grief, and water of affliction, till I return in peace. (לחם וּמַי לְרַגְלֵי, bread and water in a little quantity. See 2 Chron. xviii. 26. where Jerom translates, Date ei panis modicum, et aqua paucillum. Comp. Isaiah. xxx. 20.) Micaiah answered, If thou return at all in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me." The event justified his prediction. We hear no more of Micaiah son of Imlah.

III. MICAHIAH, son of Gemariah, informed the princes of Judah, that Baruch had read the prophecies of Jeremiah in the temple, before all the people. Jer. xxxvi. 11.

MICHAEL, מִכָּאֵל, who is like to God? From the conjunction מִי mi, who, and כֵּה co, the same, or like, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, humility, poorness of God; from מַכָּה macac, poverty, and נָכָה naoah, to strike, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. MICHAEL. It is believed that Michael is head of the heavenly host, as Lucifer is head of the infernal crew; and that God has constituted him protector of Israel. St. Jude, ver. 9, 10. says, "Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee." St. Jude concludes from thence, that the faithful ought not to use ill words or execrations, like heretics and false prophets.

It is asked, to what incident St. Jude alludes? Some have imagined he alludes to a story related in the apocryphal book of the Assumption of Moses, that the archangel Michael after the death of Moses, was urgent to have the body of this legislator buried and concealed, from fear the Hebrews, or any other nation, should idolize or worship him. While, the devil on the contrary pretended, that the body ought to be left to the Hebrews, for a trial of their fidelity; meaning rather for a snare and occasion of scandal to them, Vide Chrysost. Homil. v. in Matth. Theodoret, qu. 43. in Deut. Procop. in Deut. Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. ult. Ecumenius, Comment. in Epist. Judæ, from another tradition, advances, that Michael used all his power to procure an honourable funeral for Moses: but the devil on the contrary was furiously importunate, pretending that the body belonged to him, and that Moses was unworthy of the honour of burial, being guilty of the murder of an Egyptian. Philo and Epiphanius believe, that the body of Moses was buried by the hands of angels. We have at this day two books intituled, Pettii-ath Moshe, or the Assumption of Moses; but we find nothing in them of this contest.

Some believe that Michael conducted the Israelites in the desert, of whom it is said, "Behold, I send an angel before thee to keep thee in the way," &c. Exod. xxiii. 20. xxxiii. 2. —my envoy, my ambassador: he acts in my name. It is believed also, that he appeared to Moses in the burning bush, was the guide of the people in the wilderness, and gave the tokens of his presence in the pillar of a cloud. It is thought also, he appeared to Joshua in the fields of Jericho, Jos. v. 13. and to Gideon, and to Manoah the father of Sampson. In a word, to him are imputed the greater part of the most remarkable appearances, in the Old Testament or the New. [Others think, that these appearances in the O. T. were temporary incarnations of the Messiah, to effect deliverances of Israel, previous to his more permanent incarnation to extend the benefits of salvation to all mankind.]

Daniel speaks of Michael in two places, x. 13. He says, that the angel Gabriel having appeared to him, said, "The prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days; but lo, Michael one of the chief princes came to help me, and I remained there with the kings of Persia." It is commonly believed, that this angel of the kingdom of Persia was he, to whom God had committed the care and superintendence of that kingdom, who opposed Gabriel, and Michael, because he was desirous to keep the Jews as long as he could in Persia, where they did much good, and made many proselytes. Others, not readily assenting to this opposition of three good angels, imagined that the angel of the Persians was a bad angel, who, jealous of the prosperity of the Jews, did his utmost to prevent Cyrus from acquiring the empire of Persia, that he might not set the Jews at liberty.

We find mention of Michael, Daniel xii. 1, 2. where speaking of the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, he says, "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble," &c. Michael therefore was sent of God to succour his people, during these times of persecution; he inspired the Maccabees with invincible courage, he struck the wicked Antiochus, and delivered the Jewish church.

[It

[It is remarkable, that we meet with very few, if any, of the names of angels, before the captivity of Babylon: we cannot positively affirm that such were not customary; but it seems to be very safe to say, that the distinguishing angels by name has much the air of a Chaldee custom.]

We read, Rev. xii. 7, "And there was a war in heaven, Michael and his angels fought against the dragon." From this place it has been concluded, that Michael the archangel was the tutelar angel and guardian of the Christian church. He exerted his power chiefly at the time of the persecutions of the Pagans against the believers. He restrained the power of Satan, he supported the faith of the Christians, he defeated the designs of the persecutors, &c.

II. MICHAEL, father of Sethur, one of the spies sent by Moses, Numb. xiii. 13.

III. MICHAEL, son of Jeshishai, and father of Gilead, of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 13, 14.

IV. MICHAEL, son of Uzzi, of Issachar, 1 Chron. vii. 3.

V. MICHAEL, of Manasseh: a valiant man on the party of David, 1 Chron. xii. 20.

VI. MICHAEL, son of king Jehoshaphat, killed with his brethren, by king Jehoram, after the death of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xxi. 2.

MICHAL, מִיכָל, who is it that has all? from the conjunction מִי mi, who is it, and כָּל calal, all: otherwise, who is perfect, or complete? from the same: otherwise, the whole is water; from מִי mi, water, and כָּל col, the whole; or defence; from כָּלָא cala. [rivulet, brook.]

MICHAL, or MICHEL, daughter of king Saul. The Hebrews think, she was also named Eglah, and was mother of Ithream, 2 Sam. iii. 5. But this opinion has no foundation. Michal falling in love with David, and her father Saul being informed of it, he was not a little glad, saying, I will offer her to David for a wife, that he may fall by the hands of the Philistines. Saul therefore bid his confidants insinuate to David to improve his good fortune; David at first declined, but finding his valour might be equivalent to a dowry, he doubled what Saul required as proofs of his victory over the Philistines: and Saul gave him his daughter Michal.

Some time after, Saul sent his guards to seize David in his own house during the night; but Michal let him down through a window, and he escaped. Michal then took a figure,—(the Hebrew says, she took teraphim. The LXX. κινράκια, figures: as the representation of a dead man, or an empty tomb) and laid it in David's bed, and wrapped about its head the skin of a goat with the hair on, and covered it with a cloth. (מִן כֶּבֶד חֵטִי, a bolster of goat's hair.

LXX. Ἦναι τὸν ἀγῶν, a liver of goats. Aquila, Σπρυγγύλαμον τοῦ χῶν, a bottom of hair.) Saul sent next morning to take David, even in his bed; but his messengers found nothing but a figure, and Michal excused herself by saying, that David threatened to kill her if she did not favour his escape. [Comp. FRAG. No. XXV.] Some time after Saul gave Michal to Phalti, (or Phaltiel,) son of Laish.

But David, when he came to the crown, caused Michal to be restored to him, and this was one condition that he stipulated with Abner. The Hebrews pretend, that Phaltiel never came near Michal, who in strictness could not be his wife, since she never had been divorced from David. Others believe that Michal had five sons by Phaltiel, which the Gibeonites executed, 2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9. See MERAB.

David from the beginning of his reign had formed a design of translating the ark of the covenant from Shiloh to Jerusalem, where he had fixed his habitation. This pious design the king executed with great pomp and ceremony; he himself leaping and dancing for joy in this solemnity. Michal observing this at a window, where she had placed herself to see the procession, conceived no small contempt for king David; and when he returned to his palace, she upbraided him with acting rather like a buffoon than a king. David vindicated himself by telling her, that he would dance and appear still more vile before the Lord, who had preferred him to be king of Israel, before her father and all his family. Michal had no children to the day of her death, which Scripture seems to impute to these reproaches made to David: the time of her death is unknown.

MICHMAS, מִכְמָס, secret, concealed; from כָּמַס camas: otherwise, tribute of the poor, or of him that is beaten; from מָס mas, tribute, and מָכַךְ macac, poor: or from נָכַח nacah, to strike. [hiding place.] Ezra ii. 27.

MICHMASH, מִכְמָשׁ, Maymash, he that strikes; from נָכַח nacah: otherwise, poor, who is taken away; from מָכַךְ macac, poor, and מָשַׁח maskah, taken away: that touches; from מָשַׁח maskash.

MICHMASH, or MACHMAS; Eusebius says, was in his time a considerable place, about nine miles from Jerusalem towards Rama. Michmash was east of Beth-aven, 1 Sam. xiii. 6.

[A city of Ephraim, in the south, on the confines of Benjamin, Ezra ii. 27. Neh. vii. 31, called also MICHMASH, 1 Sam. xiii. 2. Isaiah x. 28. comp. Neh. xi. 31. Gr. Machmas, 1 Mac. ix. 73.

"The burrow," den, or hiding-place.]

MICHMETHAH, מִכְמֶתָה, the gift of him that strikes, or of the poor; from מָתָה nathath, a gift, also מָכַךְ macac, poor, and נָכַח nacah, to strike; strike; otherwise, the death of the poor and afflicted; from מָוֹת muth, death, and מָוֹעַ macac, poor. [or, the hiding-place, as MICHMAS.]

MICHMETHAH, or MACHMETHATH, a city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, on the frontiers of Ephraim and Manasseh; over against Shechem, Josh. xvi. 6. xvii. 7.

MICHEI, מִכִּי, sale; from מָכַר macar, to sell; or, knowledge; from מָכַר nicar, 1 Chr. ix. 8.

MIDDIN, מִידִן, or NIDDIN, judgment, or that pleads, or reproves: from מִן din, whence, מִדּוֹ madon, process; otherwise, that measures, from מָדַד madad. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 61.

[Some think Middin for Middim: measures, i. e. portions of the allowance: or, perhaps, extension; a place very much extended.]

MIDIAN, מִדְיָן, judgment: from מִן dun: or, measure, habit, covering; from מָדַד mad. [or, great extension, i. e. of the family.]

I. MIDIAN, or MADIAN, fourth son of Abraham and Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. See MADAN.

The Midianites mentioned Num. xxii. 4, 7. xxv. 15. xxxi. 2, &c. whose daughters seduced Israel, even to the worshipping of Baal-peor, were descendants of Midian son of Abraham. The Midianites, who were overcome by Hadad son of Bedad, king of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 35, and those who oppressed Israel, and were defeated by Gideon, Judg. vi. 1, 2, &c. vii. 1, 2, were also descended from Midian, son of Abraham, who dwelt east of the Dead Sea, and south of Moab. Their capital city was called Midian, and its remains were to be seen in the time of Jerom and Eusebius. It was situated on the Arnon, south of the city Ar, or Areopolis.

The Lord intending to punish the Midianites, because their daughters had seduced Israel to the worship of Peor, directs Moses to take a thousand men out of each tribe, and send them under the command of Phinehas, son of the high-priest Eleazar, to execute vengeance against the Midianites. Phinehas marched therefore at the head of twelve thousand men, having with him the ark of the covenant, according to some commentators, and the trumpets of the tabernacle. He defeated the Midianites, and slew five of their kings, Levi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, who reigned over several cities of the country of Midian, east of the Dead Sea. The wicked prophet Balaam was also involved in their misfortune, and lost his life. The Israelites took the women, the children, the flocks, and whatever belonged to the Midianites; they burnt their cities, villages and forts, and they brought into the camp all the booty they had got in this expedition.

II. MIDIAN; was probably son of Cush, since Zipporah, the wife of Moses, who was a Midia- nite, was nevertheless a Cushite; Num. xii. 1. Heb. and since Habakkuk iii. 7. Heb. puts the Midianites with the Cushites as if they were synonymous, or at least neighbours. This Midian peopled the country of Midian, east of the Red Sea. Into this country Moses withdrew, and there married Zipporah, daughter of Jethro, Exod. ii. 15, &c. It was these Midianites who trembled for fear, when they heard the Hebrews had passed the Red Sea, Hab. iii. 7. Abulfeda speaking of the city of Midian, says, "Madyan is a city, in ruins, on the shore of the Red Sea, on the side opposite to Tabuc, from which it is distant about six days' journey. At Midian may be seen the famous well, where Moses watered the flocks of Schoaib. (Thus the Mahometans call Jethro.) This city was the capital of the tribe of Midian in the days of the Israelites. According to Abusaid, the bay of the Red Sea in this place, is about one hundred thousand paces wide."

It should seem as if the Orientals knew no other Midianites than those on the east of the Red Sea, south of Mount Sinai, among whom Moses took refuge. The Arabian authors affirm, that the Midianites are a foreign people, who came to settle in Arabia, and are not of the number of the ancient inhabitants of the country; which countenances the opinion of those, who suppose Midian to have been a son of Cush. It is also affirmed, that these Midianites worshipped the idols Abda and Hinda; and that the prophet Jethro being sent by God to reclaim them, they continued hardened and obstinate, and that God extirpated them, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 581, 496. Vide JETHRO.

MIGDAL-EL, מִגְדַּל־אֵל, Μαγδαλην, tower of God, or majesty of God. See MAGDALENE. A city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 38.

[Probably a fort, or strong hold, on a top ridge, or peak of a hill, or rock: for on such places it was customary among the ancients to construct forts for security. Comp. Judges viii. 9. ix. 46. And among the poets the same idea occurs frequently. Many cities also were named from such stations, as, the Tower of Strato, i. e. Cæsarea; Pyrgos, i. e. the tower; Turris Augusti, Turris Julia, &c. The same is common in all languages and countries.]

MIGDAL-GAD, מִגְדַּל־גָּד, tower of God, happy, or fortified tower; from מִגְדַּל migdal, a tower, and גָּד gad, good fortune: otherwise, greatness of happiness; from גָּד gadol, grand, magnificent. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 37.

MIGDOL, מגדל, tower, or greatness; from מגדל megdal.

I. MIGDOL, Magdolum, or Magdala; these words signify a tower, and are found sometimes alone, and sometimes joined to a proper name. Josephus speaks of a fortress called Magdala, near to Gamala; and some have thought, that from hence Mary Magdalen took her name, de Bello, lib. ii. 25. Antiq. lib. xviii. 1. et in Vita.

II. MIGDOL. Moses says, that when the Israelites came out of Egypt, the Lord commanded them to encamp, over against Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon, Exod. xiv. 2. It is not known whether this Migdol were a city, or only a tower. The prophets speak of Magdolum in lower Egypt, over against Thebais. Jer. xiii. 2, 14. Ezek. xxix. 10. Hebr. The itinerary of Antoninus has Magdolum, at about twelve miles from Pelusium. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXIX.

MIGRON, מגרון, Μαγγεδδών, fear; from מגר mager, in a metaphorical sense: otherwise, a farm, from גרן goren: or throat, from גרון garon: otherwise, to deliver, from מגר magar: otherwise, fear, from גר jagar. A village near Gibeah. Saul with 600 men retreated into the cave of Remnon, near Migron, 1 Sam. xiv. 2.

[A place near Michmas, Isaiah x. 28.

It appears to have been a city of Benjamin, 1 Sam. xiv. 2.

"The place of great conflict," says Simon. The root Migr implies to cast down: the noun describes those repositories of corn which are dug in the earth, for the purpose of concealment. This name, therefore, if referred to a person, would denote the Act of seclusion, concealment, or confinement, for the purpose of preservation; a character of Act which we meet with frequently.]

MIJAMIN, מימין, Μίμιν, who is dextrous: otherwise, the right hand, from מימין jamin: or that prepares the waters, from מימין majim, waters, and מי min, preparation: otherwise, true, faithful, trusty, from מימין naaman. A priest of the sixth sacerdotal family, 1 Chron. xxiv. 9.

MIKLOTH, מכלת, Μακεδδών, rods, or staffs, from מכל makel: otherwise, voices, from מכל ool: or lightnesses, or contempt, from מכל calal, to despise: with a כ, he, Macheloth, or Mikloth, signifies assembly, congregation, from מכל oahal.

MILALAI, מלל, circumcision; from מלל mul: otherwise, my word; from מלל malal, to speak, and י, my. [elocution.] Nehem. xii. 26.

MILCAH, מלכה, queen; from מלך malac, to reign. [consultissima, prudentissima, Chald.]

I. MILCAH, or Melcha, daughter of Aram, sister of Lot, wife of Nahor, niece of Abraham, and mother of Bethuel. Her other sons were Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, and Jidlaph, Gen. xxiv. 15. xxii. 20, &c.

II. MILCAH, daughter of Zelophehad, Numb. xxvi. 33.

MILE, milliare, a measure of length, containing a thousand paces. Eight stadia or furlongs make a mile. Our Saviour tells us, that if we are constrained to go a mile, we should go two, Matt. v. 41. The Romans commonly measured by miles, and the Greeks by furlongs. The furlong was an hundred and twenty-five paces; the pace was five feet. The ancient Hebrews had neither miles, furlongs, nor feet, but only the cubit, the reed, and the line. The Rabbins make a mile to consist of two thousand cubits, and four miles make a parasang. See Reland, Palest. lib. ii. cap. 1. also the Hebrew measures.

MILETUM, Μίλητον, red, or scarlet; from the Greek μίλος, vermillion, red.

MILETUM, or Miletus, a famous city of Ionia, perhaps the Malothi of Judith ii. 13. St. Paul going from Corinth to Jerusalem, in A. D. 58, passed by Miletum; and as he went by sea, and so could not take Ephesus in his way, &c. he desired the bishops of the church of Ephesus to meet him at Miletum, about twelve leagues from thence. He earnestly exhorted them to vigilance, &c.

[MILETUS, a city in Asia. Acts xx. 18. 35. This city, situated beyond the river Meander, was originally a colony of Cretans: it became so powerful that it sent out settlers to a great number of cities on the Euxine Sea, and many others on the continent. It had four ports, of which one alone could contain a fleet. What most contributed to its renown was a temple of Apollo Didymus in its vicinity; whose priests were were descended from Branchus, whom Apollo is reported to have loved. The temple having been destroyed by Xerxes, king of Persia, to whom the Branchidae had surrendered the treasures of it, the Milesians erected instead of it an edifice so large, that it remained without any roof: there was a sacred grove within it as well as without it.

Miletus in Crete, mentioned by Homer, is said to have been the mother town of Miletus in Caria: but what part of Crete it occupied does not appear.

Miletus, built on the confines of Ionia and Caria, was, properly, the capital of the former province. It stood about ten stadia south of the Meander, near the sea coast. Stephens, the ancient geographer, says the city was called Miletos, the people Milesians. This change of s and r deserves notice, because on its medals it is usually written Milesios. Pliny, however, writes it Miletus, and Selden quotes an ancient inscription from the Arundel marbles, in which it is written Meileton. The present state of this city is thus given by Dr. Chandler: Trav. p. 146—149.

"Miletus is a very mean place, but still is called Palat, or Palatia, The Palaces. The principal relic of its former magnificence is a ruined theatre, which is visible afar off, and was a most capacious edifice, measuring four hundred and fifty seven feet long. The external face of this vast fabric is marble.

"On the side of the theatre next the river is an inscription in mean characters rudely cut, in which "The city Miletus" is mentioned seven times. This is a monument of heretical Christianity. One Basilides, who lived in the second century, was the founder of an absurd sect called Basilidians and Gnostics, the original proprietors of the many gems with strange devices and inscriptions, intended to be worn as amulets or charms, with which the cabinets of the curious now abound. One of their idle tenets was, that the appellative "Jehovah" possessed signal virtue and efficacy. They expressed it by the seven Greek vowels, which they transposed into a variety of combinations. This superstition appears to have prevailed in no small degree at Miletus. In this remain the mysterious name is frequently repeated, and the deity six times invoked, "Holy Jehovah, preserve the town of the Milesians, and all the inhabitants." The archangels also are summoned to be their guardians, and the whole city is made the author of these supplications; from which, thus engraved, it expected, as may be presumed, to derive lasting prosperity, and a kind of talismanical protection.

"The whole site of the town, to a great extent, is spread with rubbish, and overrun with thickets. The vestiges of the heathen city are pieces of wall, broken arches, and a few scattered pedestals and inscriptions, a square marble urn, and many wells. One of the pedestals has belonged to a statue of the emperor Hadrian, who was a friend to the Milesians, as appears from the titles of "saviour" and "benefactor" given him. Another supported the [statue of] the emperor Severus, and has a long inscription, with this curious preamble, "The senate and people of the city of the Milesians, the first settled in Ionia, and the mother of many and great cities both in Pontus and Egypt, and various other parts of the world."

"From the number of forsaken mosques, it is evident, that Mahometanism has flourished in its turn at Miletus.

"The history of this place, after the declension of the Greek empire, is very imperfect. The whole region has undergone frequent ravages from the Turks, while possessed of the interior country, and intent on extending their conquests westward to the shore. One sultan in 1175 sent twenty thousand men with orders to lay waste the Roman provinces, and bring him sea-water, [sea-] sand, and an oar. All the cities on the Meander and on the coast were then ruined. Miletus was again destroyed towards the end of the thirteenth century, by the conquering Othman.

"Miletus was once exceedingly powerful and illustrious. Its early navigators extended its commerce to remote regions. The whole Euxine Sea, the Propontis, Egypt, and other countries, were frequented by its ships, and settled by its colonies. It boasted a venerable band of memorable men: Hecataeus, an early historian, and Thales, the father of philosophy. It withstood Darius, and refused to admit Alexander. It has been stiled the metropolis and head of Ionia; the bulwark of Asia; chief in war and peace; mighty by sea; the fertile mother, which had poured forth her sons to every quarter, counting not fewer than seventy five cities descended from her. It afterwards fell so low as to furnish a proverbial saying, "The Milesians were once great;" but if we compare its ancient glory, and its subsequent humiliation, with its present state, we may justly exclaim, Miletus how much lower art thou now fallen!"

It is now called by the Turks Melas, or according to Mr. Crutwell, Milet.

2. Commentators have been embarrassed to discover that Miletus at which Trophimus was left sick by St. Paul. (2 Tim. iv. 20.) Some read Miletus, others Miletum; but they can find find only two places of this name; one already mentioned in Asia Minor; the other in Crete. That it could not be that in Asia Minor, is, I believe, generally admitted: because, when St. Paul visited Miletus near Ephesus, Acts xx. 17. Trophimus went with him to Jerusalem: and St. Paul did not return to that Miletus; and that it should be Miletum in Crete, supposes that St. Paul touched there in his voyage to Rome, of which Scripture is silent. Under these difficulties observe—

(1.) There was in Athens a ward, or district of that city, called Melitus; and the inhabitants were called Melites; (the vowels were interchangeable, and this is, occasionally, Miletes.)

(2.) There was in Attica a town called Miletus: mentioned in early editions of Pliny, when speaking of Attica, Rhamnus pagus, locos Marathon, campus Thriasius, oppidum MILETUM, ad Oropus, in confinio Bæotiae. Now this Miletum which Pliny qualifies as oppidum, city,—must have been at least a considerable town, and probably well inhabited: and it lay not far, if at all, from the course of some journeys which we know the apostle did make. Moreover, in the inscriptions copied by Dr. Spon, at Athens, we read Leonides, son of Leonides of MELITUS; and this is distinguished in the same inscription from Hesticeus, son of Dionisius of MILESIS, which appears to be our No. 1. and which is written on the inscription remaining at Athens, Meilesios—Meliesios—Milesia—Meilesia.

It is remarkable that MSS. differ in the spelling of the Miletum at which Trophimus lay sick, in like manner as this inscription differs; but, without referring, further than by way of illustration, to the Miletus of the city of Athens, I would ask whether Pliny's oppidum Miletum, may be that at which Trophimus was left? If so, on what occasion? and what influence would it have on the date of the second epistle to Timothy?]

MILK. A land flowing with milk and honey, is a country of extraordinary fertility. Moses forbids to seethe a kid in its mother's milk, Exod. xxiii. 19. xxxiv. 16. Deut. xiv. 21. which the Hebrews understand literally. See MEATS. Some accept this prohibition metaphorically, as forbidding cruelty; as in another place to take the old bird sitting upon her nest along with her young ones. Vide Deut. xxii. 6.

The writers of the Old Testament speak of the origin of man in the womb, as of milk, curdled. See Job x. 10, 11. Nonne sicut lac mulsisti me, et sicut caseum me coagulasti. And Wisdom vii. 1, 2. In ventre ventris figuratus sum cara, decem mensium tempore coagulatus sum in sanguine. The heart of the wicked is coagulated, or hardened, like milk; but the Hebrew may be translated, their heart is as fat as grease, Psal. cxix. 70.

In the prophets the kingdom of the Messiah is represented as a time of great abundance, when the mountains should flow with milk and honey," Joel. iii. 18. And Isaiah says, lx. 16. "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breasts of kings." St. Paul compares his converts to little children, to be fed with milk, and not with solid food; 1 Cor. iii. 2. Heb. v. 12. and St. Peter thus exhorts the faithful; "As new born babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby," 1 Pet. ii. 2.

To milk is often said in a figurative sense, to denote the dangerous caresses and enticements of sinners, Prov. i. 10. "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not," Heb. מִלֵּךְ milk thee, or deceive thee, flatter thee, tempt thee by allurements. The text reads the same word in other passages, where Jerom uses the term lactare, instead of seducere, fallere. In the Song of Songs, iv. 11. Honey and milk are under thy tongue, signifies, your words are softer or sweeter than milk and honey. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCXXVII.

MILL, mola, to grind. Our Saviour says, Matth. xviii. 6. it would be better for a man to be thrown into the sea, with a mill-stone about his neck, than that he should be a scandal to one of his little ones, Expedit ei ut suspendatur mola asinaria in collo ejus, &c. This ass's mill-stone, according to some, was a large stone turned round by an ass, to distinguish it from smaller stones turned by hand. Others believe, that the mola asinaria was the lower mill-stone, which was sluggish and immovable.

To express the meanest condition of life, Moses says, "From the first born of Pharaoh, to the first-born of the maid servant that is behind the mill." Because before the invention of wind-mills and water-mills, they commonly used hand mills to grind their corn. Samson was condemned by the Philistines to this kind of labour; "But the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass, and he did grind in the prison house," Judg. xvi. 21. Allusion is often made to this custom. See Isaiah xlvii. 2. Matt. xxiv. 41. Luke xvii. 36. Vide PLATE of MILL or QUERN.

Moses forbids his people to take from a poor man as a pledge, the upper or the nether mill-stone, Deut. xxiv. 6. Or according to the Hebrew, Thou shalt not take the two stones of a mill, and the carriage. Very probably he speaks of those mills, used by the Hebrews in the wilderness wilderness, which were mounted upon carriages, because of their frequent decampments. The two Chaldee paraphrasts explain this in a figurative sense; Thou shalt not use any artifice to hinder the consummation of marriage. Some Rabbins explain what is said of Samson in a sense pretty near this; he was made to grind in his prison, say they, that they might have some of his race. In profane authors Molere is sometimes taken in an obscene sense.

MILLET, a kind of grain, in Latin millium. It is mentioned Isaiah, xxviii. 25. Vulgate. (Heb. מִלֵּט). LXX. Κέγχρον, and Ezekiel iv. 9. מִלֵּט, LXX. Κέγχρον.) Isaiah says, that the husbandman sows in his land, wheat, barley, millet, and fitches, each in its place. And Ezekiel receives an order from the Lord, to make himself bread with a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentils, and millet. The word used by Isaiah is Nisman; Ezekiel uses Dochan. The LXX. render both by Kenchron, millet. But the signification of Nisman is doubtful. Some render it by spelt, or fitches, [vetches.]—Others join it to the barley, and read hordeum signatum vel insigne. The word Nisman is found only in this place; nor is Dochan read any where else.

MILLO, מִלּוֹ, Ἀκρὰ Μαελῶ, fullness, plenitude, repletion; from מָלָא male.

[It should seem that Millo imports a house of armoury, a guard house, or depôt for military stores, or troops: BARRACKS.

The Chaldee root appears to import a trench, or fortification; whence the idea of a fort, or castle is attached to this name. Such a castle might have stood on Mount Sion. 2 Sam. v. 9. 1 Kings, ix. 15. 24. xi. 27. 1 Chron. xi. 8. 2 Chron. xxxii. 5. The same is called Beth Millo, the Castle-house, 2 Kings, xii. 21.]

I. MILLO. Thus they called a deep valley, which was between the old city of Jebus, or Jerusalem, and the city of David, on Mount Sion. David and Solomon caused this valley to be filled up, and made here a place for the people to assemble. 1 Kings ix. 15. 2 Kings v. 9. 1 Chron. xi. 8. Solomon also on a part of it, built a palace for his queen, the daughter of Pharaoh, 1 Kings ix. 24. On account of these chargeable works of Solomon, to fill up Millo, &c. Jeroboam revolted, 1 Kings xi. 27.

II. MILLO, a city near Shechem. It is said Judges ix. 6, that the inhabitants of Shechem, and those of the city of Millo, made Abimelech son of Gideon king. The Hebrew reads, The house of Millo, not the city of Millo. Some believe that Millo was a citizen of Shechem; or, some part of that city; for in Palestine there is no known city of Millo,

[The Beth Millo near Sichem was probably a kind of head quarters to troops. Might it be the same as the tower of Sichem in verses 46, 47, 49. If it were, the punctuality of retribution, according to the malediction of Jotham, would be the more remarkable.

Perhaps adjacent to the castle itself, in these instances, might be some separate building, capable of containing a large assembly: in this case the castle, tower, or fort, might be Millo; and such a great room might be Beth Millo.]

MINA, or MNA; a species of money, called in Hebrew, min, or mina, or maneh, properly, one part or ounce. I observe this word only in the books of Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, and Ezekiel. Ezekiel tells us, xlv. 12. that the mina or maneh was valued at sixty shekels, which in gold make of English money above £54. and in silver almost £7. This is the Hebrew maneh. But the Greek or Attic mina, which is probably that mentioned in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, is valued at a hundred drachmæ, or about £2 17s. There was also a lesser mina, valued at seventy-five drachmæ.

MINCHA, מִנְחָה, this is a pure Hebrew word, and signifies an offering of meal, cakes, or biscuits, presented in the temple of the Lord. The LXX. sometimes preserve this word; but instead of mincha, they read manna, which doubtless was the common pronunciation in their time. We find manna in Baruch i. 10. "Prepare ye manna, and offer upon the altar of the Lord our God." Scripture uses the word mincha, to express the offerings that Cain and Abel made to the Lord, of their first-fruits; Gen. iv. 3, 4:—for the presents made by Jacob to his brother Esau, at his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxii. 13, 16, 18, 20, 21:—for those carried by the sons of Jacob to Joseph in Egypt, before he discovered himself to them; Gen. xliii. 11, 14, 24. and—for those that Ehud presented to Eglon, king of Moab: Judg. iii. 15, 17, 18. Malachi speaking of the sacrifice of the new law, which in every place was to be offered, uses the word mincha. "From the rising of the sun, even to the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a pure offering, Mal. i. 10, 11.

[MIND, the understanding, or judgment; that principle which distinguishes the differences of things: lawful or unlawful, good or evil, 2 Cor. iii. 14. Tit. i. 15. This principle is sometimes supposed to be seated, or rather, perhaps, to exercise itself in the heart, Gen. xxvi. 35. Dent. xviii. 6. or, in the memory, Psalm xxxi. 12. Isaiah xli. 8. or, in the imagination, or will.

These

These ramifications are all referable to the exercise of the understanding in these departments of the intellectual faculties.]

[MINISTER, one who attends, or waits on, another; so we find Elisha was the minister of Elijah, and did him services of various kinds, 2 Kings iii. 11. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXII. So Joshua was the servant of Moses, Exod. xxiv. 18. xxxiii. 11. And these persons did not by any means feel themselves degraded by their stations, but in due time they succeeded to the offices of their masters. In like manner, John Mark was minister to Paul and Barnabas, Acts xiii. 5. Christ, is called a minister of the true i. e. the heavenly, sanctuary.

The Minister of the Synagogue, Luke iv. 20. was appointed to keep the book of the law, to observe that those who read in it, read correctly, &c. The Rabbins say, he was the same as the angel of the church, or overseer. LIGHTFOOT says, Baal Aruch expounds the chazan, or minister of the congregation, by Sheliach hatzibbor, or angel of the congregation; and from this common platform and constitution of the synagogue, we may observe the apostle's expression of some elders ruling, and labouring in word and doctrine; others in the general affairs of the synagogue. Allusions to the officers of the Jewish synagogue are often introduced by the writers of the New Testament, and perhaps are hardly intelligible to us, who are not over well acquainted with the constitutions of those assemblies. Vide Vitringa, De Synog. Jud.

Ministers were servants, yet servants not menial, but honourable; those who explain the word, and conduct the service of God, those who dispense the laws, and promote the welfare of the community, the holy angels who in obedience to the divine commands protect, preserve, succour, and benefit the godly, are all ministers, beneficial ministers to those who are under their charge. Vide Heb. viii. 2. MINNI, מִנִּי, disposed, reckoned, prepared.

MINNI, or MENNI; Jeremiah, li. 27. invites the kings of Minni, Ararat, and Ashchenaz, to war against Babylon. Minni, we think, denotes Minias, a province of Armenia; and perhaps Armenia took its name from Aram and Minni; i. e. the Syria of Minni or Minias, mentioned by Nicolas of Damascus, lib. xcvi. MINNITH, מִנִּית, counted, prepared.

MINNITH, or MENNITH, a city beyond Jordan, four miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia, as Eusebius relates, Onomast. in Vol. II. PART XIX. Edit. IV.

Minith. It belonged to the Ammonites, when Jephthah made war against them, Judg. xi. 33. Ezekiel says, that Judah carried wheat of Minith to the fairs of Tyre. Vulg. Frumentum primum, the finest wheat. Ezek. xxvii. 17.

MINT, a garden-herb, or pot-herb, sufficiently known. The law did not oblige the Jews to tythe these minor sorts of herbs; it only subjected to the payment of tythes what could be comprehended under the name income, or revenue, proventus; especially, what was produced in the country. But the Pharisees desiring to distinguish themselves, by a most scrupulous and literal observation of the law, gave tythes of mint, anise, and cummin, Matth. xxiii. 23. Our Saviour does not censure this exactness; but complains, that while they were so precise in these lesser matters, they neglected the essential commandments.

MIRACLE, sign, wonder, prodigy; these terms are commonly used in Scripture, to denote an action, event, or effect, superior (or contrary) to the general and established laws of nature. This name is given, not only to true miracles wrought by saints or prophets sent from God, by good angels, by the finger of God, or by the son of God; but also to the false miracles of impostors, and to wonders wrought by the wicked, by false prophets, or by devils. Moses speaks of the miracles of Pharaoh's magicians, in the manner he speaks of those wrought by himself, in the name and by the power of God. And our Saviour foretels in the gospel, that false Christs and false prophets should perform wonders, capable of deceiving, were it possible, the elect themselves, Matth. xxiv. 24. And St. John in the Revelations, xiii. 13, 14. speaks of a beast that came out of the earth, which performed such prodigies, as even to make fire descend from heaven on the earth, which seduced many persons, &c. And in the same book he speaks of demons, which shew wonders, to stimulate the kings of the earth to make war on the saints; also of a false prophet, who works miracles, to seduce those who have received the mark of the beast, Rev. xvi. 14. xix. 20.

Therefore miracles and prodigies are not always sure signs, of the sanctity of those who perform them; nor proofs of the truth of the doctrine they deliver; nor certain testimonies of their divine mission. The Son of God not only allows us, but even commands us to examine miracles, and those who perform them. "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo here is Christ, or there, believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders, insomuch that that (if it were possible) they shall deceive the very elect," Matth. xxiv. 23, 24. And Moses says, Deut. xiii. 1. "If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, who giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder cometh to pass, whereof he spake unto thee saying, Let us go after other gods, (which thou hast not known) and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams; for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether you love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul." It may therefore be affirmed, that the proof of miracles is not always unquestionable. To the mission of him who works miracles must be joined the truth of the doctrine he advances, the holiness of his life, his good understanding, and his concurrence with those whose life, mission, and doctrine have been already acknowledged and approved. His miracles must be strictly examined, to see if they are true, and will stand the test, and are not juggling tricks, or magical operations: whether they lead to God, to peace, to righteousness, to salvation. If all these marks and characters are found in him who works miracles, we may without danger allow such an one to be a messenger from God.

Our Saviour complains, John i. 48. that the Jews would not believe but by dint of miracles. "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." They asked a sign from Jesus; "Master, we would see a sign from thee," Matt. xii. 38. He replied, that they should see no other sign but that of the prophet Jonah. [Comp. FRAG. No. CXLV. &c.] He says, John xv. 24. that if he had not performed among them such miracles as were never before performed by man, they would have had no sin. Nicodemus owns, John iii. 2. "No man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." Such a train of miracles, accompanied with so much innocence and righteousness, with a doctrine so pure and divine, could not be operations of falsity and delusion. The finger of God manifestly appears herein. When Jesus Christ sent his apostles to preach the gospel among the Jews, and among infidel nations, he gave them the power of working miracles in his name, Matth. x. 6, 8, &c. Nothing so much contributed to the propagation of the Christian faith, as the multitude of miracles wrought by the apostles and their disciples; to which was joined the sublimest doctrine, and the purest morality, with a most holy and disinterested life and conversation.

The prejudices, obstinacy, and incredulity of the Jews must have been very extraordinary, not to yield to the miracles of Jesus Christ and his apostles. St. Paul says, that the Jews must have miracles to convince them: "The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom," 1 Cor. i. 22. But, who ever performed greater signs, or worked more frequent and more incontestible miracles than Jesus Christ? The common people laboured under less prepossessions and prejudice than the doctors, the priests, and the Pharisees; and were ready to allow, that the Messiah could not exceed his miracles. The doctors themselves could not give the lie to their own eyes, or oppose what was so public and notorious; they could not directly deny the miracles, but chose rather to ascribe them to Beelzebub. The modern Jews pretend, that Jesus Christ had stole the name Jehovah out of the temple, by which he performed his miracles. If this were true, could it be conceivable, that God would favour an impostor with the gift of working miracles, and such a long train of miracles, and of so high degree, and by one who announced the subversion of the law and the Jewish religion? And would he permit him to transfer this power to his disciples and apostles, to those who believed in him, and this for so long a series of years? [For some thoughts on Miracles and their distinctions, consult the FRAGMENTS, passim.]

MIRIAM, מִרְיָם, Marjam, exalted, from מִרְמָם ramam: otherwise, bitterness of the sea, from מָרָר marar, bitterness, and יָם jam, the sea: otherwise, myrrh of the sea, from מוֹר mor, myrrh: otherwise, lady, or mistress of the sea, from מָרָה marah, a Syriac word, which signifies lord, or mistress. [From this the Greek name Mariam, Matt. i. 20. and Maria, v. 16, &c. Also, Mary are derived.]

MIRIAM, sister of Moses and Aaron, and daughter of Amram and Jochebed, born about A. M. 2424, ante A. D. 1580. She might be ten or twelve years old when her brother Moses was exposed on the banks of the Nile, since Miriam was watching there, and offered to Pharaoh's daughter, to fetch a nurse for him. The princess accepting the offer, Miriam brought her own mother, to whom the young Moses was given to nurse, Exod. ii. 4, 5, &c. It is thought that Miriam married Hur, of Judah; but it does not appear that she had any children by him, Joseph. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 2. et alii.

Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she insinuates, Exod. xvii. 10, 11. Numb. xii. 2. "Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? Hath he not spoken also by us?" After the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam led the choir and dances of the women, and repeated with them the canticle, Sing ye to the Lord, &c. which Moses Moses sung in a choir of men, Exod. xv. 21. When Zipporah the wife of Moses arrived in the camp of Israel, Miriam and Aaron disparaged her, speaking against Moses on her account, Numb. xii. The Lord punished Miriam by visiting her with a leprosy. Aaron interceded with Moses for her recovery, and Moses besought the Lord: who ordered her to be shut out of the camp seven days.

We are acquainted with no subsequent particulars of the life of Miriam. Her death happened in the first month of the fortieth year after the Exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh in the wilderness of Sin. Numb. xx. 1. The people mourned for her, and she was there buried. Josephus says, she was buried with great solemnity at the charge of the public, and that they mourned for her a whole month. St. Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Ambrose were of opinion, that she lived in perpetual virginity; but we have observed, that Josephus has given her Hur for a husband. Eusebius assures us, that in his time the sepulchre of Miriam was to be seen at Kadesh.

MIRMA, מִרְמָה, deceit, from מִרְמָה ramah: or, that raises itself, from מִרְמָה ramam, to raise, and the pronoun הָא, itself. 1 Chr. viii. 10.

MISHAEL, מִישָׁאֵל, who is asked for, or lent; from מִי mi, who, and שָׁאֵל shaal, who demands or lends: otherwise, God takes away, or retires, from מִשָּׂה mashah, to take away, and אֵל el, God.

MISHAEL, or MISAEEL, one of the three companions of Daniel, to whom Nebuchadnezzar gave the Chaldean name of Meshach, Dan. i. 7. He was one of those cast into the burning furnace, from which he was miraculously delivered. Vide DANIEL: also Dan. iii. 12. See Exod. vii. 22. Lev. x. 4. Neh. viii. 4.

MISHAM, מִשָּׂמ, their saviour, from מִשָּׂה jashah, or מִשָּׂה hoshiah, a saviour: otherwise, he that regards him, from מִשָּׂה shaah, to regard: otherwise, that takes away, or touches the people, from מִשָּׂה mashash, or מִשָּׂה mashah, and הָם ham, the people. Son of Elpaal, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 12.

MISHEAL, מִשָּׂאֵל, Mathal, 1 Chron. vi. 74. He that asketh, or is asked [for]: or that lends, from מִשָּׂה shaal, to ask: otherwise, hell, the grave, death, from the same: otherwise, touched of God, from מִשָּׂה mashash, to touch, and אֵל el, God: or whom God takes away, or draws back, from מִשָּׂה mashah. A city of Asher, Josh xix. 26. Eusebius says it is near Mount Carmel, on the sea coast.

MISHMA, מִשְׁמָה, he that hears, or obeys, from מִשְׁמָה shamah: otherwise, noise, reputation. Fifth son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 14.

MISHMANNAH, מִשְׁמָנָה, his fat, his oil, from שֶׁן shaman, oil, or grease, and the pronoun הָא, his: or simply, perfume, sweet-scented oil. A valliant captain of David's army, 1 Chr. xii. 10.

MISHNA, מִשְׁנָה, Gr. Δευτερονόμιον, Misna, repetition, or secondary law.

MISHNA; this is properly the code of the Jewish civil law. The Jews believe, that when God gave the written law to Moses, he gave him also another not written, which was preserved by tradition among the doctors of the synagogue, to the time of the famous Rabbi, Judas the Holy, who wrote the Misna about A. D. 180, being then about forty years old: He was born A. D. 186. This doctor was prince or head of the captivity, i. e. chief of the Jews after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. He was born at Sephoris, a city of Galilee, and having acquired great reputation, and being long employed in composing differences and deciding disputes, among his nation concerning the sense of the law; and likewise seeing great danger lest the Jews, dispersed into so many provinces, might at last recede from the traditions of their fathers, or forget some part of the rites of their nation; he judged it better to reduce them to writing, than to trust to their memories. This produced the Misna, which is the codex of the civil and canon law of the Jews, and contains a collection of their ceremonies, and oral laws.

This work is divided into six parts. The first, סֵדֶר זְרַעִים Ordo Seminum, contains the distinction of seeds in a field, the trees, fruits, tythes, &c. The second, סֵדֶר מוֹדַעִים Ordo Festorum, regulates the manner of observing the festivals. The third, סֵדֶר נָשִׁים Ordo Mulierum, treats of women, and matrimonial cases. The fourth, סֵדֶר נִזְקִים Ordo Damnorum, which treats of Losses, takes cognizance of suits which arise from trade, also of strange worship, עֲבוֹדַת זָרָה Cultus Extraneus, or idolatry, because it afforded much matter for judicial proceedings. The fifth, סֵדֶר קֳדָשִׁים Ordo Sanctorum, seu Rerum Sacrarum, is concerning obligations, sacrifices, and whatever has any relation thereto. The sixth, סֵדֶר טְהוֹרִיּוֹת Ordo Purificationum, has for its subject the several sorts of purifications. Those who desire a more exact knowledge of the Misna, may consult the edition of it, by G. Surenhusius at Amsterdam in 1703, in six tomes in folio, with the notes of Maimonides, Bartenora, and Guisius. See also the third tome of the Bibliotheca Rabbinica of Bartolucci, and the History of the Jews, by M. Basnage.

Judah the Holy is acknowledged as the author, or compiler, of the Misna. He is the chief and principal of those doctors, whom the Jews call Tanaites, or preservers of the tradition.

They succeeded, say they, the heads of the great synagogue, the chief of which were Zerubbabel, and Malachi. Ezra is esteemed to be the head of the Tanaites. It is maintained that they enjoyed the peculiar favour of God, and often heard the Bath-col, or daughter of the voice, which succeeded the power of prophecy, and procured great authority and respect to these doctors: on whom the Jews are very lavish of encomiums, and the most pompous titles. From these Tanaites, these depositaries of tradition, Judah the Holy learned what he has given us in the Misna.

The Tanaites were succeeded by the Gemarists, or commentators; for no sooner did the Misna appear, but it was received with profound veneration by all Jews, as they thought it contained what had been dictated by God himself from Mount Sinai, as well as the written law. So that all their learned men made it their chief study, and both in Judæa and Babylon, applied themselves to the making of comments on it. These commentaries, together with the text of the Misna, make up the two Talmuds, that of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon. These comments they call the Gemara, or supplement, because with these the Misna is complete, and needs no farther improvement. Vide GEMARA, TALMUD. LAW, ORAL LAW.

MISHRAITES, מִשְׁרָעִי, who touches the companion, the friend, the pastor, or malice; from מִשַּׁשׁ mashash, to touch, and רַחֵם rahah, a friend, &c. from רַע rah, malice. 1 Chron. ii. 53.

MISPAR, מִסְפָּר, a number, or written [easily]; or scribe, or book, or he that reckons; from סָפַר saphar: otherwise, the bull of the tribute; from מַסַּם mas, tribute, and פָּר phar, a bull. Ez. ii. 2.

MISPERETH, מִסְפֶּרֶת, Maṣparəṯ, he that reckons or counts, from סָפַר saphar: or augmentation of the tribute, from מַסַּם mas, tribute, and פָּרָה parah, to multiply. Nehem. vii. 7.

[MISPHAT, judgment. A fountain, called also KADESH. Gen. xiv. 7.

Here Moses and Aaron were judged by God, on account of their unbelief, Numb. xx. 12. xxvii. 14. Or, perhaps, Oin Misphat is the fountain of argument, contention, which is much the same import as Meribah, the waters of strife, from a strife here held with Israel. Grotius thinks it was so called because here was a place of judgment for the neighbourhood: and in this sense the Chaldee appears to have taken it.]

MISREPHOTH, or MISREPHOTH-MAIM, מִשְׁרֵפֹת, drouth, burnings of waters; from שָׂרַף saraph, to burn, and מַיִם majim, waters: or simply, furnaces where metals are melted.

[A place constructed for evaporating water by means of fire; the remainder, when cold, forming salt. The Hebrew commentator describes these places as salt pits; wherein the sea water was admitted into reservoirs, and exhaled by the sun, leaving the salt behind it. Josh. xi. 8. xiii. 6.—like what we call Bay-salt?]

We think this may be the city of Sarepta: the root of which is the same as of Mizrephoth. Others think the waters of Mizrephoth were hot waters.

MITE, MINUTUM, a small piece of money, in value a quarter of a Roman penny, in English money about seven farthings, or two pence. "She threw in two mites which make a farthing." See also Luke xii. 59. and xxi. 2.

MITHCAH, מִתְּחָה, Maṭṭekā, sweetness; from מִתְּחָה mathac, sweet, mild.

[Honey seems to be an unlikely article to give name to a place in the desert, yet this is the first idea that seems to be expressed by sweetness. But, as some places have received a corresponding appellation from the sweetness of their waters, it is possible this might be the reason of the name Mithcah. So Glukias, a place in Achaia, near Pella, was named from the sweetness of its springs. Pausan. Achaicis. cap. 27.]

MITHCAH, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness, between Tarah and Hashmonah, Numb. xxxiii. 28, 29. probably Methegammah, 2 Sam. viii. 1. Comp. Chron. xviii. 1. where it is said David took Gath and her daughters: [So Hebr. and Vulgate. English translation, Gath and her towns.]—and in Samuel, that he took Metheg the mother, or Metheg and its mother; that is, Metheg and Gath. Gath and Metheg were in the neighbourhood of Hashmonah, far south in the Land of Promise. Instead of Metheg the mother, the Hebrew reads Methegammah, which Jerome has translated by Frænum tributi. I rather think he wrote Frænum cubiti, and that transcribers have substituted Frænum tributi. But it is better to take Metheg for the name of a place. [Is not metheg a transposition of gethem? i. e. little Gath.]

MITHNITE, מִתְּנִי, gift, loins; according to the Syriac, hope, or expectation. 1 Chr. xi. 43.

MITHREDATH, מִתְּרַדָּת, he that explains or meditates on the law, from תָּרַד thur, law: otherwise, the descent or dominion of death, from רָדָד radad, to descend, or רָדָה radah, to rule, and מוֹת muth, death. This name is Chaldee or Persian, in the composition of which enters the name of Mithra, a deity of the Persians, who write this name without a t, but with a pure aspiration, Mirk: so that the t has no share in it. [Mithra dedit, given by Mithra.]

MITHREDATH,

MITHREDATH, or MITRIDATES, son of Gazabar, Ezra i. 8. (מִתְרִדָּת וְגַזְבָּר, Γαζοφύλαξ. So Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 1. and Esd.) or rather Mithredath the treasurer, (for this is the literal signification of Gazabar) by order of Cyrus, returned to Sheshbazzar, prince of Judah, the vessels of the temple.

MITHRIDATH, or MITRIDATES, one who signed the letter written to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, against the Jews, to hinder them from rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, Ezr. iv. 7.

MITRE, MITRA; mention is made in Scripture of the mitres of the priests and of those of women. Isaiah, iii. 19. speaks of those of women, Auferet Dominus, — armillas et mitras. The Hebrew Haraloth, translated Mitras, signifies to tremble, to waver. The Syrian and Arabian women at this day have commonly on their heads a silver mitre called Arkic, made in form of a sugar loaf, and encompassed with a veil of black silk, edged with pearls and precious stones. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. LXI. also PLATES of EASTERN DRESSES, &c.

MITYLENE, Μιτυλήνη, purity, cleansing, or press. The capital of the island of Lesbos, through which St Paul passed as he went from Corinth to Jerusalem, A. D. 58. Acts xx. 14.

[MIZAR, Hill, small, or little.

This place is probably not far from Zoar, Gen. xix. 20. Lot says, "O let me escape to this city, is it not Mizar?"—a little one: and this name might attach to some hill hereabouts. But, this seems to infer a hill Hermon in this neighbourhood. Psalm xlii. 6.

Hiller thinks Mizar is Zoar in Genesis: in any case we may look for the hill Mizar of the Psalms in some of David's haunts.]

MIZNEPHETH, or MASNEPHETH, the Hebrew name of the high priest's cap or mitre. Moses gives us no particular description of it. [Comp. the PLATES of PRIESTS' DRESSES.]

MIZOR, מִיזוֹ. Miso. In Hebrew Jahzah, plain, or level way, from יָשָׁר jashar: otherwise, ox, from שָׁר shur: or wall: otherwise, sawed, from נָשָׂר nashar.

MIZOR, or MISOR, a city of Reuben, given to the Levites of the family of Merari. 1 Chron. vi. 78, 79. Mizor is not in the Hebrew of Joshua, nor in the Chronicles. There is some probability that Mizor is put for Jaza. Aquila and Symmachus took Mizor for a plain; and indeed this word is sometimes put for a champion country. See Joshua xx. 8. xxi. 36.

MIZPAH, מִצְפֶּה, or MIZPEH, a sentinel, speculation, or that waits for, from צָפָה tsaphah: or roof. [watch tower, or centry-box; otherwise covering together, or expectation.]

I. MIZPAH, Mizpeh, Maspha, or Mesphe,

a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 38. south of Jerusalem, and north of Hebron or Eleutheropolis, about six leagues from Jerusalem. I think it to be Mizpah of Benjamin, 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6, 7. Josh. xviii. 26. a place of prayer and devotion, where the Hebrews often assembled. See 1 Kings xv. 22. 2 Chron. xvi. 6. Nehem. iii. 7. 1 Sam. x. 17. 1 Mac. iii. 46.

II. MIZPAH, or Masphath, of Gad, in the mountains of Gilead. Here Laban and Jacob made a covenant, Gen. xxxi. 49. Jephthah dwelt at Mizpah; here he made a covenant with the Israelites on the other side Jordan, who chose him for their captain; and here he assembled his troops, Judg. xi. 11, 29, 34. This city is sometimes ascribed to Moab, because the Moabites conquered, and kept it.

III. MIZPAH. Joshua, xi. 3, 8. speaks of the Hivites, who inhabited the country of Mizpah, or Mizpah, at the foot of Mount Hermon, and consequently towards the head of the Jordan. He adds, that the army of Jabin and his allies took refuge at Mizpah, to the east of the city of Sidon: which agrees with this position.

IV. MIZPAH, in general, signifies some elevated place which afforded a prospect to a distance; an eminence where a watch was kept.

[Under the signification of watch tower, or spot commanding an extensive prospect, from which the motions of enemies might be descried with advantage, no doubt but many places might derive their names in a country so perpetually exposed to inroads as the territories of Israel were.]

MIZRAIM, מִצְרַיִם, *Misapsim, tribulations, or who is streightened, or blocked up; from צָר matzar. [confinement; i. e. of his mother?]*

MIZRAIM, or MESRAIM, son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Anamin, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Casluhim, Gen. x. 6. Meser or Misor was father of the Mizraim, the Egyptians; and he himself is commonly called Mizraim, although there is very strong probability that Mizraim being of the plural number, signifies rather the Egyptians themselves, than the father of that people. Mizraim is also put for the country of Egypt: thus it has three significations, which are perpetually confounded and used promiscuously, sometimes denoting the land of Egypt, sometimes him who first peopled Egypt, and sometimes the inhabitants themselves. Vide FRAGMENTS. No. XXXIX.

The word Mizraim being of the dual number, may express both Egypts, the superior and inferior, or the two parts of the country, E. and W. divided by the Nile. Cairo capital of Egypt, and even Egypt itself, is to this day called Mezer by the Arabians. But the natives call it Chemi,

i. e. the Land of Cham, or Ham, as it is also sometimes called in Scripture. Psalm lxxviii. 12. cv. 23. cvi. 22. The prophet Micah, vii. 12. Heb. gives to Egypt the name of Mezor; [or Matzor] and Rabbi Kimchi, followed herein by several learned commentators, explains by Egypt what is said of the rivers of Mezor, 2 Kings xix. 24. Isaiah xix. 6. xxxvii. 25. Heb.

The city of Memphis, in Hebrew Moph or Noph, which long was the capital of Egypt, had also the name of Meser. The Oriental geographers say, that from the time of the conquests of Alexander, it had the name of Babylon or Babylon, in memory of the ancient Babylon of Chaldæa. But the cities of Memphis, Babylon, and Cairo, though not far from one another, are not strictly in the same place. Cairo is east of the Nile, and old Memphis is west. Vide MEMPHIS, EGYPT, &c. among the PLATES.

MIZZAH, מִצָּח, Možè, distillation, or sprinkling; from מִצָּה, nazah: otherwise, of this; from the conjunction ׀ of, and מִן ze, this: from the Syriac, consumption, or burning. Fourth son of Reuel, son of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 13.

MNASON, Acts xxi. 16. He was [of Cyprus] an ancient disciple, a Jew by birth; converted by Jesus Christ himself; and one of the Seventy. St. Paul lodged at his house at Jerusalem, A. D. 58. Several Latin copies call him Jason, others Nason, but his true name was Mnason. He was a different person from Jason the host of St. Paul at Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 5.

MNESTHEUS, Μενεσθεύς, force, strength, or anger of God; from the Greek μένος, force, anger, and θεός, God. 1 Macc. iv. 21.

MOAB, מוֹאָב, of his father; from מִן m, of, or from; the pronoun י o, his, and אב ab, father. Instead of Moab, the ancients pronounced Meab, waters of the father; father's son. Waters represent generation.

MOAB, son of Lot, and of his eldest daughter. The history may be seen, Gen. xix. 31. &c. This happened about the time of the birth of Isaac, A. M. 2108, ante A. D. 1896.

MOABITES, a people descended from Moab, son of Lot. Their habitation was beyond Jordan, east of, and adjacent to the Dead Sea, on both sides the river Arnon. Their capital city was situated on that river; and was called Ar, or Areopolls, or Ariel of Moab, or Rabbah-Moab, i. e. the capital of Moab; or Kir-hares, i. e. the city with brick walls. This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called Emim, Deut. ii. 11, 12. The Moabites conquered them; afterwards the Amorites took a part from the Moabites, Judg. xi. 13. Moses conquered that part which belonged to the Amorites, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. The Moabites were spared by Moses, as God had restricted him, Deut. ii. 9. But, there always was a great antipathy between the Moabites and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars. Balak, king of this people, endeavoured to prevail on Balaam to curse Israel. And Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, Numb. xxv. 1, 2. God ordained, that the Moabites should not enter into the congregation of his people, [q. be capable of office, &c. ?] even to the tenth generation, Deut. xxiii. 3. because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country; nor would supply them with bread and water in their necessity.

Eglon king of the Moabites, was one of the first that oppressed Israel after the death of Joshua. Ehud killed Eglon, and Israel expelled the Moabites, Judg. iii. 12, A. M. 2679, ante A. D. 1325. Hanun king of the Ammonites having insulted David's ambassadors, David made war against him, and subdued Moab and Ammon; under which subjection they continued till the separation of the ten tribes; when they were attached to the kings of Israel till the death of Ahab.

Presently after the death of Ahab, the Moabites began to revolt. 2 Kings iii. 4, 5. Mesha king of Moab, refused the tribute of an hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, which till then had been customarily paid, either yearly, or at the beginning of every reign; which of these two, is not clearly expressed in Scripture. The reign of Ahaziah was too short to allow of his invading them; but Jehoram, son of Ahab, and brother to Ahaziah, having ascended the throne, intended reducing them to obedience. He invited Jehoshaphat king of Judah: who with the king of Edom, then his vassal, entered Moab: where they were almost on the point of perishing with thirst, but were miraculously relieved. 2 Kings iii. 16, &c.

It is not easy to perceive what were the circumstances of the Moabites after this time; but Isaiah, at the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, threatens them with a calamity, which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war of Shalmaneser king of Assyria against the ten tribes, and the nations beyond the Jordan.

Amos, i. 13, &c. also foretold great miseries to them, which probably, they suffered under Uzziah and Jotham, kings of Judah; if not under Shalmaneser: 2 Chron. xxvi. 7, 8. xxvii. 5. or lastly, the war of Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem: We believe this prince carried them captive beyond the Euphrates, Euphrates, as the prophets had threatened; Jer. ix. 26. xii. 14, 15. xxv. 11, 12. xlviii. 47. xlix. 8, 6, 39. l. 16. and that Cyrus sent them home again, as he did other captive nations. After their return from captivity, they multiplied, and fortified themselves, as the Jews did, and other neighbouring people; still in subjection to the kings of Persia, afterwards conquered by Alexander the Great, then in obedience to the kings of Syria and Egypt successively, and finally to the Romans. There is a probability also, that in the later times of the Jewish republic, they obeyed the Asmonean kings, and afterwards Herod the Great.

The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor. Vide their Articles. Scripture speaks of Nebo, of Baal-meon, and of Baal-dibon, as gods of the Moabites: but it is likely these are rather names of places where Chemosh and Peor were worshipped: and that Baal-dibon, Baal-meon, and Nebo, are no other than Chemosh adored at Dibon, or at Meon, or on Mount Nebo. See under BAAL.

[MOAB is thought to be the name of a king, 1 Sam. xii. 9. xxii. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 22. Comp. AMMON, AMMAUN.]

MOADIAH, מֹאדִיָּה, Maadai, solemnity, or festival [ornament, or praise] of the Lord. Neh. xii. 5.

MODIN, מֹדִיִּן, judgment, or debate, or quarrel; from מָדַן dun.

MODIN, a celebrated city or town in the tribe of Dan, whence arose Mattathias and his family, the Maccabees, 1 Macc. ii. 1, 15. ix. 19. This place could not be far from the sea, since mariners from their ships might see the mausoleum, here erected in honour of Mattathias, 1 Macc. xiii. 29, 30. Eusebius says, that Modin was not far from Diospolis, and that in his time was still seen the tomb of the Maccabees. Jerom, on Isaiah xxx. insinuates that it was but a small place, he calls it viculus, a little village. See MATTATHIAS. But Modin is not only famous for the tomb of the Maccabees, but also for a battle fought by a handful of men, under Judas Maccabæus, against Antiochus Eupator, 2 Macc. xiii. 9, &c.

There is a seeming contradiction in the author. He says, ver. 15. that "Judas went into the king's tent by night;" and ver. 17. "that this was done in the break of day." I imagine the attack was begun in the night, but the action was not completed till break of day.

[MODIN was situated on a mountain, apparently, Baalah, on the brook which issues at Secrona. Here was the famous sepulchre of the Maccabees, of seven pyramids rising from a square basis, or mole.]

MOLADAH, מֹלֶדֶת, birth, generation: from יָלַד jalad, to beget, [nativity, birth-place.]

MOLADAH, or MOLATHA, Josh. xv. 26. xix. 2. a city first given to Judah, afterwards to Simeon. I imagine it to be the Malatha, or Malathis, mentioned in the Notitia Imperii; also the Makkeloth, Numb. xxxiii. 25. This city was in the southerly part of Judah. See MALATHA.

MOLE, an animal declared impure by Moses, Lev. xi. 30. Heb. תִּשְׁחָמֶת tishameth. LXX. Ἀσπαλάξ, Vulg. Talpa. Chald. אַשְׁחָמָה Ashuta. The Hebrew tishameth is understood by the Syriac for an animal with several feet; perhaps the scolopendra. Castellio translates a toad: others a weasel. Bochart thinks it signifies a camelion, but the Chaldees and the Rabbins understand it of a mole. Bochart believes, that the true word for a mole, is choled, which the Vulgate has translated weasel. Levit. xi. 29. מֹלֶךְ Chald. מֹלֶךְ. Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. P. 1. lib. iii. cap. 35.

We find the word mole in the Vulgate, [and in the English translation] Isaiah ii. 20. But the Hebrew reads חַפְרֵי־פֶרֶת chaporperoth, from a root signifying to dig; and by consent of interpreters, it signifies in this place moles. By this passage, we see the excessive blindness of the Jews, who gave divine honours to such creatures. Vide FRAGMENTS, and NAT. HIST.

MOLID, מֹלִיד, See MOLADAH. Otherwise, circumcision of the hand; from מָלַךְ mul, circumcision, and יָד jad: otherwise, that begets.

MOLOCH, מֹלֶךְ king; from מָלַךְ melec.

MOLOCH, MOLECH, MILCOM, or MELCHOM, a god of the Ammonites. Moses in several places forbids the Israelites under the penalty of death to dedicate their children to Moloch, by making them pass through the fire in honour of that deity, Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2, 3, 4, 5. God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against such a criminal. There is great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this deity, even before their coming out of Egypt, since Amos, v. 26. and after him St. Stephen, Acts vii. 43. reproaches them with having carried in the wilderness, the tabernacle of their god Moloch. Solomon built a temple to Moloch on the Mount of Olives, 1 Kings xi. 7. Manasseh a long time after, imitated his impiety, making his son pass through the fire in honour of Moloch, 2 Kings xxi. 3, 4. Such idolatry was practised chiefly in the valley of Tophet and Hinnom, east of Jerusalem. Jer. xix.

Some are of opinion, that the devotees contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Moloch; by this action consecrating them to that false deity; and as by a lustration purifying them: this being a usual ceremony ceremony on other occasions among the heathen. Others believe that they made them pass between two fires opposite to each other; with the same intention. But, others maintain that they really burnt their children, as sacrifices to Moloch. See Psalm cvi. 37. Isaiah lvii. 5. Ezek. xvi. 20, 21. xxiii. 37, 39. where it is positively asserted, that the Hebrews sacrificed their children to devils, to Moloch, and to strange gods. And 2 Kings xvii. 31, it is said, that the inhabitants of Sepharvaim burnt their children in the fire to Anammelech and Adrammelech their gods. However, I would not be understood to assert, that they always really burnt to death their children; and perhaps when it is only said they made them pass through the fire, lustrare per ignem, or transfere per ignem, this may mean in some places, the leaping over the flames, or passing nimbly between two fires. But we are persuaded, that generally speaking the worshippers of Moloch immolated or sacrificed their children to death in honour of this false deity. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LI.

The Rabbins assure us, that the idol Moloch was of brass, sitting on a throne of the same metal, adorned with a royal crown, having the head of a calf, and his arms extended as if to embrace any one. When they offered children to him, they heated the statue within by a great fire; and when it was burning hot, they put the miserable victim within his arms, where it was soon consumed by the violence of the heat: and, that the cries of the children might not be heard, they made a great noise with drums, and other instruments, about the idol. Others say, that his arms were extended, and reaching toward the ground; so that when they put a child within his arms, it immediately fell into a great fire which was burning at the foot of the statue. Others relate that it was hollow, and had internally seven partitions, the first of which was appointed for meal or flour; in the second there were turtles, in the third an ewe, in the fourth a ram, in the fifth a calf, in the sixth an ox, and in the seventh a child. All these were burned together, by heating the statue internally.

When David conquered the Ammonites, 1 Chron. xx. 2. he took the crown of their god Milcom, or more simply, he took the crown of their king, which weighed a talent of gold, and made a crown of it for himself. The Hebrew talent weighed three thousand shekels, or one hundred and twenty-five Roman pounds. This is an excessive weight for a crown royal. Therefore it is thought this prince did not wear it on his head, but caused it to be hung upon his throne, over his head. Or lastly, that the talent of gold here mentioned, does not express the weight, but the value, of the crown. It was of gold, and set with precious stones, as is hinted in the book of Chronicles. These precious stones were a very considerable addition to the value; but its weight might be that of an ordinary royal crown, say some commentators on 2 Sam. xii. 30. Comp. FRAG. No. CCLXXXII.

There are various sentiments about Moloch: some believe that Moloch was Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered. Others think he was Mercury, others say Venus, others Mars or Mithra. We have endeavoured to prove, that Moloch signified the sun, or the king of heaven. See also Selden, de Diis Syris, Spencer, de legibus Hebræorum Ritualib. lib. ii. cap. 10. And Vossius, de Origine et progressu Idolatriæ, lib. ii. cap. 5.

MONEY. Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, of certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, of current money, of money of a certain weight; but I do not observe coined or stamped money till late; which induces me to believe, that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight. That they only considered the purity of the metal, and not the stamp.

The most ancient commerce was conducted by barter, or exchanging one sort of merchandize for another. One man gave what he could spare to another, who gave him in return part of his superabundance. Afterwards, the more precious metals were used in traffic, as a value more generally known and stated. Lastly, they gave this metal, by public authority, a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy, to fix its value, and to save buyers and sellers the trouble of weighing and examining the coins.

At the siege of Troy in Homer, Iliad, Σ. no reference is made to gold or silver coined; but the value of things is estimated by the number of oxen they were worth. E. gr. They bought wine, by exchanging oxen, slaves, skins, iron, &c. for it. Iliad. H. When the Greeks first used money, it was only little pieces of iron or copper, called oboli, or spits, of which a handful was a drachma, says Plutarch, in Lysandro. Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 94. thinks, that the Lydians were the first that stamped money of gold or silver, and introduced it into commerce. Others say, it was Ishon king of Thessaly, a son of Deucalion, Lucan, Pharsal, lib. vi. Others ascribe this honour to Erichthonius, who had been educated by the daughters of Cecrops king of Athens: Strabo, lib. viii. Others again to Phidon king of Argos.

Among the Persians it is said, Darius son of Hystaspes, first coined golden money, Herodot. lib. iii, cap. 89, &c. lib. iv. cap. 166. Lycargus banished banished gold and silver from his commonwealth of Lacedæmon, and only allowed a rude sort of money, made of iron. Janus, or rather the kings of Rome, make a kind of gross money of copper, having on one side the double face of Janus, on the other, the prow of a ship.

I find nothing concerning the money of the Egyptians, the Phœnicians, the Arabians, or the Syrians, before Alexander the Great. In China to this day they stamp no money of gold or silver, but only of copper. Gold and silver pass as merchandize. If gold or silver be offered, they take it and pay it by weight, as other goods. So that they are obliged to cut it into pieces with shears for that purpose, and they carry a steel-yard at their girdles to weigh it.

The people of Albania, and those on the banks of the Araxes, had neither money, nor weights, nor measures, and did not reckon beyond a hundred, says Strabo, lib. xi. p. 352. Tournefort says, Voyage, lib. ii. p. 127. that to this day the Georgians, who succeed that people, despise money, and would not sell their provisions, but by barter. All the trade of Mingrelia is carried on by barter. In Ethiopia and Bengal they use sea-shells [cowries] of the Maldivé islands, as small money: also on the coast of Guinea, and in the kingdoms of Congo and Siam.

Let us now return to the Hebrews. Abraham weighs out four hundred shekels of silver, to purchase Sarah's tomb: Gen. xxiii. 15, 16. And Scripture observes, that he paid this in current money with the merchant. Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Midianites for twenty pieces of silver, Gen. xxxvii. 28. Heb. twenty shekels of silver. The brethren of Joseph bring back with them into Egypt the money they found in their sacks, in the same weight as before; Gen. xliii. 21. The bracelets that Eliezer gave Rebecca weighed ten shekels, and the ear-rings two shekels. Gen. xxiv. 22. Moses ordered that the weight of five hundred shekels of myrrh, and two hundred and fifty shekels of cinnamon, of the weight of the sanctuary, should be taken, to make the perfume which was to be burnt to the Lord on the golden altar, Exod. xxx. 24. He acquaints us that the Israelites offered for the works of the tabernacle, seventy-two thousand talents of brass, Exod. xxxviii. 29. We read in the books of Samuel, that the weight of Absalom's hair was two hundred shekels of the ordinary weight, or of the king's weight, 2 Sam. xiv. 26. Isaiah describes the wicked as weighing silver in a balance, to make an idol thereof; chap. xlvi. 6. and Jeremiah, xxxii. 10, weighs seventeen pieces of silver in a pair of scales, to pay for a field, he had bought. Isaiah says, "Come buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Wherefore do ye weigh money for that which is not bread?" Amos, vii. 5. represents the merchants encouraging one another, to make the ephah small, wherewith to sell, and the shekel great, wherewith to buy, and to falsify the balances by deceit.

In all these passages, three things only are mentioned. 1. The metal, i. e. gold or silver, and never copper, it not being used in traffic as money. 2. The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah or obolus; the weight of the sanctuary, and the king's weight. 3. The alloy, [standard] of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good quality, as received by the merchant. The impression of the coinage is not referred to; but it is said, they weighed the silver, or other commodities, by the shekel and by the talent. This shekel therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights applied to things used in commerce. Hence those deceitful balances of the merchants, who would increase the shekel, i. e. would augment the weight by which they weighed the gold and silver they were to receive, that they might have a greater quantity than was their due; hence the weight of the sanctuary, the standard of which was preserved in the temple, to prevent fraud; hence those prohibitions in the law, "Thou shalt not have in thy bag diverse weights [Heb. stones]; a great and a small," Deut. xxv. 13. Hence those scales that the Hebrews wore at their girdles, Hosea xii. 7. and the Canaanites carried in their hands; to weigh the gold and silver which they received in payment.

And it is to be observed, that in the original text there is no mention of [coined] money, or of any thing like it. The gold and silver offered to Moses in the Desert, for the use of the tabernacle;—that which was given to Aaron to make a golden calf;—that of which Gideon made an ephod;—that which tempted Achan;—that which David left to Solomon;—and that which Gehazi received from Naaman; was only gold or silver made into rings, bracelets, pendants, vessels, or ingots. Not a word of coined money, of any mark or impression; nothing to shew the form of the money, or the figure represented upon it. For, generally, coined money has the impress of some prince, some animal, flower, or other device. But nothing of this kind occurs among the Hebrews.

It is true that in the Hebrew, Gen. xxxiii. 19, we find, that Jacob bought a field for a hundred kesitahs; and that the friends of Job, chap. xlii. 11. after his recovery, gave to that model of patience each a kesitah, and a golden pendant for the ears. We also find there Daries, (Hebr. Daremonim, or Adarcemonim.) and Minae, Statera, Oboli: but this last kind of money was foreign, and is put for other terms, which in the Hebrew only signify the weight of the metal. The kesitah is not well known to us; some take it for a sheep or a lamb; others for a kind of money, having the impression of a lamb or a sheep. But we rather think it to be a purse of money. See KESITAH. [Also PLATES: MEDALS of PERSIA, Nos. 2, 3. ANTIOCH, No. 2. DAMASCUS, No. 17, EGYPT, Nos. 30, 31.]

The Daremonim or Darics, are money of the kings of Persia; and it is agreed, that Darius, son of Hystaspes, first coined golden money. Ezekiel tells us, xlv. 12. that the mina makes fifty shekels; he reduces this foreign money to the weight of the Hebrews. The mina might probably be a Persian money originally, and adopted by the Greeks and by the Hebrews. But under the dominion of the Persians, the Hebrews were hardly at liberty to coin money of their own, being in subjection to those princes, and very low in their own country. They were still less able under the Chaldeans, during the Babylonish captivity, or afterwards under the Grecians, to whom they were subject till the time of Simon Maccabæus, to whom Antiochus Sidetes king of Syria granted the privilege of coining money in Judæa, 1 Macc. xv. 6. And this is the first Hebrew money properly so called, that we know of. There were shekels and demi-shekels [also, the third part of a shekel, and the quarter of a shekel] of silver. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. XXVIII. XCII. CCII. CCIII. and Plates of JEWISH COINS.

MONTH, in Latin Mensis, Gr. Μην, Meen, in Hebrew Chodesch or Jerach. The ancient Hebrews had no particular names for their months. They said, the first, the second, the third, &c. In Exod. xiii. 4. xxiii. 15. xxxiv. 18. Deut. xvi. 1. we find חֹדֶשׁ אֲבִיב, Chodesh Abib, or the month of the young ears of corn, or of the new fruits: which is, probably, the Egyptian name of that month, which the Hebrews afterwards called Nisan, and which was the first of the holy year. Every where else this lawgiver designates the months by their order of succession. In Joshua, Judges and Samuel, we see the same method. Under Solomon, 1 Kings, vi. 1, we read of the month Zif, which is the second month of the holy year, and answers to that afterwards called Jiar. In the same chapter we read of the month Bul, which is the eighth of the holy year, and answers to Marshevan, or October. Lastly, in chap. viii. 2. we read of the month Etha- zim, or the month of the valiant, which answers to Tizri, the seventh of the holy year.

Critics are not agreed about the origin of these names of the months. Scaliger thought Solomon borrowed them from the Phœnicians, with whom he had much intercourse. Grotius believes they came from the Chaldeans; and F. Hardouin deduces them from the Egyptians. However this be, we see nothing of them, either before or after Solomon. But after the captivity of Babylon, the people continued the names of the months as they had found them among the Chaldeans and Persians.

At first the Hebrews followed the same distribution of their year and months, as Egypt. Their year consisted of 365 days, and of twelve months, each of thirty days. This appears by the enumeration of the days of the year of the deluge, Gen. ch. vii. The twelfth month was to have thirty-five days, and they had no intercalary month, but at the end of one hundred and twenty years; when the beginning of the year following was out of its place thirty whole days.

After the Exodus, which happened in the month of March, God ordained that the holy year, i. e. the Calendar of religious feasts and ceremonies, should begin at Nisan, the seventh month month of the civil year (the civil year he did not change) which the Hebrews continued to begin at the month Tisri (September.) After the Babylonish captivity, the Jews being but a handful of people in the midst of others, surrounding them, complied with such customs, and manners of dividing times and seasons, as were used by the people that ruled over them; first, of the Chaldeans, afterwards of the Persians, and lastly, of the Grecians. They took the names of the months from the Chaldeans and Persians, and perhaps their manner of dividing the year and the months. However, we cannot be sure of this, not exactly knowing the form of the Chaldean months. But we see plainly by Ecclesiasticus, xliii. 6. by the Maccabees, by Josephus, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10. and by Philo, vit. Mos. lib. iii. that in their time they followed the custom of the Grecians: that is, their months were lunar, and their years were solar.

These lunar months were each of twenty-nine days and a half, or, rather, one was of thirty days, the following of twenty-nine, and so on alternately: that which had thirty days was called a full or complete month; that which had but twenty-nine days was called incomplete. The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day they called Neomenia, new-moon day, or new month. They did not begin it from that point of time, when the moon was in conjunction with the sun, but from the time at which she first becomes visible, after that conjunction. And to determine this, it is said, they had people posted on elevated places, to inform the Sanhedrim as soon as possible. Proclamation was then made, the feast of the new moon, the feast of the new moon; and the beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. For fear of any failing in the observation of that command, which directed certain ceremonies at the beginning of each month, they continued the Neomenia two days, the first was called the day of the moon's appearance, the other of the moon's disappearance. So say the Rabbins: but there is great probability, that if this was ever practiced, it was only in provinces distant from Jerusalem. In the temple, and in the metropolis, there was always a fixed calendar, or at least a fixed decision for festival days, determined by the House of Judgment.

When we say that the months of the Jews answered to ours, Nisan to March, Jiar to April, &c. this must be understood with some latitude; for the lunar months cannot be reduced exactly to solar ones. The vernal equinox falls between the twentieth and twenty-first of March, according to the course of the solar year. But in the lunar year, the new moon will fall in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew months will commonly answer [partially] to two of our months, the end of one, and the beginning of the other.

Twelve lunar months making but three hundred fifty-four days and six hours, the Jewish year was short of the Roman by twelve days. To recover the equinoctial points, from which this difference of the solar and lunar year would separate the new moon of the first month, the Jews every three years intercalated a thirteenth month, which they called Ve-adar; the second Adar. By this means their lunar year equalled the solar; because in thirty-six solar months there would be thirty-seven lunar months. The Sanhedrim regulated this intercalation, and this thirteenth month was placed between Adar and Nisan; so that the passover was always celebrated the first full moon after the equinox. Consult F. Lamy's Introduction to the Scripture, and our Dissertation on Chronology, at the beginning of our Commentary on Genesis; Scaliger, de emendatione temporum; and Calvisius's Introduction to Chronology.

MOON, Luna. The Lord created the sun and the moon on the fourth day of the world, to preside over day and night, and to distinguish times and seasons, Gen. i. 15, 16. As the sun presides over day, so the moon presides over night; the sun regulates the course of a year, the moon regulates the course of a month; the sun is, as it were, king of the host of heaven, the moon is queen. Moses speaks of the moon as of a luminous body, not much inferior to the sun; yet it is certain, that the moon, when compared to the sun, is but a very small body. The moon's diameter is about 2184 English miles; her superficial content is about one thirteenth part of the surface of the earth, whereas the sun's diameter is 100 times that of the earth, and his superficial content 10,000 times that of the earth's surface. But the sacred authors speak in a popular manner. They call that a great light which appears great to the human eye: not meaning to determine its absolute magnitude.

The moon was appointed for the distinction of seasons, of festival days, and days of assembling, says Gen. i. 14. And the Psalmist says, civ. 19. He made the moon for seasons." So Ecclesiasticus; "He made the moon also to serve in her season, for a declaration of times, and a sign of the world. From the moon is the sign of feasts, a light that decreaseth in her perfection. The month is called after her name:

increasing wonderfully in her changing, being an instrument of the armies above, shining in the firmament of heaven. The beauty of heaven, the glory of the stars, an ornament giving light in the highest places of the Lord." The Hebrews varied their manner of reckoning months and years. We think that in the time of Moses, and long after, they kept to the solar year; but after their return from Babylon, they had only lunar years. This the author of Ecclusiasticus insinuates in the passage quoted. It is true, however, either way, that the moon marks the revolutions of seasons, and that men divided the year into twelve months, by following the twelve revolutions of the moon, in the course of one year.

I do not know whether the Hebrews understood the theory of lunar eclipses; but they always speak of them in terms which intimate that they considered them as wonders, and as effects of the power, and wrath of God. When the prophets speak of the destruction of empires, they often say, that the sun shall be covered with darkness; the moon withdraw her light; and the stars fall from heaven. Isai. xiii. 10. xxiv. 23. Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. Joel ii. 10. iii. 15. But I cannot perceive that there is any direct mention of an eclipse.

Among the Orientals in general, and the Hebrews in particular, the worship of the moon was more extensive; and more famous, than that of the sun. In Deut. iv. 19. xvii. 3. Moses bids the Israelites take care,—when they see the sun, the moon, the stars, and the host of heaven, not to pay them any superstitious worship, because they were only creatures appointed for the service of all nations, under heaven. Job, xxxi. 26, 27. also speaks of the same worship. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart has been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand," as a token of adoration. The Hebrews worshipped the moon by the name of Meni, of Astarte, of the goddess of the groves, of the queen of heaven, &c. The Syrians adored her, as Astarte, Urania, or Cælestis; the Arabians as Alilat; the Egyptians as Isis; the Greeks as Diana, Venus, Juno, Hecate, Bellona, Minerva, &c.

Macrobius, Saturnal, lib. iii. cap. 8. and Julius Firmicus acquaint us, that men dressed like women, and women dressed like men, sacrificed to the moon. [See MENI.] Maimonides thinks, Mose Nebochim, part iii. cap. 38. that Moses intended to forbid this, when he prohibited the sexes from exchange of habits. The moon was worshipped as a god, and not a goddess, in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia. The Sepharvites called her Axameleck, the gracious king. Strabo calls her Meen: as does Isaiah, lxxv. 11. She was represented clothed like a man; and there are medals extant, on which she is represented in the habit and form of a man armed, having a cock at his feet, covered with a Phrygian or Armenian bonnet. Spartian, in Caracalla, assures us, that the people of Charræ in Mesopotamia believed, that such as held the moon for a goddess, would be always in subjection to their wives. He adds, that though the Greeks and Egyptians sometimes called her goddess, yet they always call her god in their mysteries. In Scripture we have no name for goddess, and Astarte, i. e. the moon, is called a god, as well as Baal, the sun. Vide plate of BAAL, and FRAGMENTS, Nos. CVII. DIII. also PLATE of ANTIOCH in PISIDIA, No. 18.

They offered several sorts of sacrifices to the moon. We see in Isaiah, lxxv. 11. and Jeremiah, vii. 18. that they offered to her in the high ways, and upon the roofs of their houses, sacrifices of cakes, and similar offerings. Thus the Greeks honoured Hecate, or Trivia, which is the moon. Elsewhere they offered to her human sacrifices. Strabo relates, lib. xi. that in the countries bordering on the Araxes, they especially worshipped the moon, who had there a famous temple. The goddess had several slaves, and every year they offered one of them in sacrifice to her, after having fed him daintily the whole year before. Lucian, de Dea Syr. speaks of like sacrifices, offered to the Syrian goddess, the Dea cælestis, i. e. the moon. Fathers carried their children, tied up in sacks, to the top of the porch of the temple, whence they threw them down upon the pavement; and when these unfortunate victims moaned, the fathers would answer, that they were not their children, but young calves.

The Jews ascribed different effects to the moon. Moses speaks of the fruits of the sun and the moon. Deut. xxxiii. 14. The sun and moon are considered as the two causes which produce the fruits of the earth. The moon furnishes them with moisture and juices; the sun concocts this moisture, and exhales what is superfluous, says Pliny, lib. ii. cap. 101. Luna fœmineum ac molle sidus atque nocturnum, solve humorem et trahere, non auferre. Some commentators think, that the fruits of the sun are those that come yearly, as wheat, grapes, &c. and the fruits of the moon are those that may be gathered at different months of the year, as cucumbers, figs, &c.

MORASTHI, מורשתי, heir, or inheritance, or of the inheritance; from מ am, of, or from, and ור jarash; otherwise, of poverty; from the same. The country of the prophet Micah; East of of Eleutheropolis, Micah i. 1. Jer. xxvi. 18, See MARESHA.

MORDECAI, מֹרְדֵכַי, Μαρδοχαῖος, contrition, or bitter bruising; from מָרַךְ duk, to bruise, and מָרַר marar, bitter: or myrrh bruised; from מֹר mor, myrrh, and duk, to bruise: or who teaches to bruise; from mara, master, or he that teaches: otherwise, very pure myrrh, according to the Hebrew and Syriac. This name is not Hebrew, but Chaldee, composed of Merodach, or Mordak, a deity of the Babylonians. [Perhaps, led by God.]

MORDECAI, son of Jair, of the race of Saul, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin (or Jeconiah) king of Judah, A. M. 3405, before A. D. 599. Esther ii. 5, 6. He settled at Shushan, and there lived to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he visited Jerusalem with several other captives, Vide 1 Esdras ii. 2. Abenezra, Cornel. à Lapide, et alios. But afterwards he returned to Shushan. There is great probability that Mordecai was very young when taken into captivity. For from the transportation of Jeconiah by Nebuchadnezzar, to the third year of Darius son of Hystaspes, or Ahasuerus, who, this year took Esther to wife, is above fourscore years.

Some believe that Mordecai came to Babylon or Shushan, only in the person of his father, and that he was born in this country: but there is no need of this solution. For if we suppose Mordecai to be twelve years old at the transportation of Jeconiah, then at the time of Ahasuerus's marriage with Esther he might be fourscore and twelve. At this age he might discharge the duty of those employments the king gave him, yet live a long time, supposing, as the Jews pretend, that he lived to be a hundred fourscore and eighteen years old; or even if he lived to be only a hundred and ten, or a hundred and twenty. However this be, Mordecai had a niece called Edessa, or Esther, the daughter of his brother, whom he had adopted and brought up as his own daughter, after the death of his brother.

After Esther became the spouse of Ahasuerus, (vide ESTHER :) Mordecai was constant at the palace gate to learn news of the queen: during his attendance there he discovered a conspiracy of two eunuchs to kill the king: this service was registered, but not rewarded. The king Ahasuerus raising Haman to be his favourite, Mordecai refused to honour him: Haman resented this indignity by endeavouring to exterminate the whole Jewish people, for which he obtained a decree from the king.

Mordecai acquainted Esther with this decree, and urged her to induce the king to revoke it. In the mean time, the king not being able to sleep, one night, caused the annals of the preceding years to be read to him. Therein was read the conspiracy of the two eunuchs against the king, discovered by Mordecai. The king asked if this man had been rewarded? being told he had not; he asked who was in the antichamber? He was answered Haman: who was then coming to the king to solicit that Mordecai might be hanged on a gallows he had provided for him. Ahasuerus asked him, "What should be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour?" Haman believing it must be himself whom the king intended by this description, answered, let him be clothed in a royal habit, be set on the king's horse, have a royal diadem on his head; and be it proclaimed before him in the public places of the city, "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour." The king replied, haste, and so do to Mordecai: which Haman was forced to do.

Esther having prepared herself by fasting and prayer, presented herself before the king, in hopes of averting that danger from her people, to which Haman had exposed them. She discovered to him the wicked design of Haman, that Mordecai was her uncle, that she was a Jewess by birth, and that her people were condemned to slaughter. Ahasuerus countermanded his decree against the Jews, condemned Haman to be hanged on the gallows he had set up for Mordecai, gave his goods to the queen, and raised Mordecai to the honours that Haman had enjoyed. This was the fourteenth day of Nisan, which day became a solemn festival to the whole nation for ages. See ESTHER and PURIM.

The greater part of critics and commentators believe, that Mordecai was author of the book of Esther. Certainly, he in conjunction with Esther writ the letter, which ordains the celebration of the Feast of Lots, or Purim. But this letter is no other than the book of Esther, in which some slight alterations have been made, to give it the form of a history rather than of a letter.

MORIAH, מֹרְיָה, 'Αμορῖα, bitterness of the Lord, from מָרַר marar: otherwise, myrrh of the Lord, from מֹר mor: otherwise, doctrine, or fear of the Lord, from יָרָא jara, to fear, or יָרָה jarah, to teach, and יָה jah, the Lord: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, dominion of the Lord.

MORIAH, a mountain upon which the temple of Jerusalem was built by king Solomon. 2 Chron. iii. 1. It is thought this was the place where Abraham intended to offer up his son Isaac, Gen. xxii. 2, 14, though this supposition is attended with great difficulties. Instead of Moriah Moriah the Samaritan reads Moreh, in Genesis, as if God sent Abraham near to Sichem, where certainly was a Moreh, Gen. xii. 6. Dent. xi. 30. and it was on mount Gerizim Isaac was brought to be sacrificed.

[Mount Moriah was so called, says one Rabbi, because thence should go forth instruction to Israel: another Rabbi says, fear to all nations. Maimonides says, that the place where David built his altar in the threshing floor of Araunah, was where Abraham built his, upon which he bound Isaac.

This name is thought to be derived from a root implying height, or elevation: and it is certain from the descriptions given of Jerusalem, (vide the Article of that city) that it stands on the highest hill in the neighbourhood, and is seen from a great distance. The LXX. render Upsele and Oreine, implying height. Pliny also uses the latter name. It is probable, therefore, that the idea of being seen from far, as if it lifted itself up, is included in the name Moriah; which we may observe is in the feminine. Probably there is a reference to this in those prophets, who say, the mountain of the Lord's temple shall be exalted above the (surrounding) hills, and all nations shall flow to it. Isaiah ii. 2. Micah iv. 1.]

MORNING. This is sometimes put for quickly. Thou shalt hear me in the morning, or quickly. The evening and the morning make the day, according to Moses: because the ancient Hebrews began their day in the evening, Gen. i. 5. The morning expresses the diligence with which any thing is done. The Lord says, that he rose early to invite his people to return to him, Jer. vii. 13. xi. 7. The Psalmist says the same, that he praised God in the morning, that he was early in paying his devotions to him, Psalm lix. 16. xcii. 2.

Ezekiel says, xlvi. 14, 15. Vulgate, the priest of the week shall offer every morning to the Lord the ordinary sacrifice of a lamb. Kata manè manè, is an expression taken from the Greek, where the preposition kata being joined to a noun signifying a year, a day, or the hour of the day, denotes the action to be repeated every time at that hour, kata manè, every morning.

Zephaniah says, manè manè, iii. 5. "Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light." Manè, manè, being repeated, expresses very early in the morning. Amos iv. 13, God changes the darkness into morning, the night into day. Joel ii. 2. "As the morning spread upon the mountains." As at the break of day the light appears upon the mountains, so shall the locusts spread over the country.

From morning to evening expresses a very short time, Job iv. 20. The Psalmist comparing the life of man to a flower, says, that in the morning it flourisheth, in the evening it is withered and decayed. Psalm. xc. 6. The rain of the evening and of the morning, or rather of the spring and autumn. See RAIN.

The Psalmist speaking of the Messiah, cx. 3. says, that he was begot before the morning; or according to the Hebrew, that "his posterity is as the dew, which is produced from the bosom of the morning." This posterity are the faithful, believers in Jesus Christ. Their multitude may be well compared to a plentiful dew. See LUCIFER.

The same Psalmist expresses the rapidity of his flight, cxxxix. 9, 10. "If I take the wings of the morning." We know no motion so rapid as the diffusion of the beams of the sun, at day-break.

Isaiah says, viii. 20, that those who do not keep the law and the ordinances of God, shall have no morning. They shall perish without seeing the light, they shall not abide until morning.

Job, xli. 9, compares the eyes of the Behemoth to the brightness of the morning: they are as splendid as the rising sun.

MOSEROTH, מוסרות, Moσepà, erudition, discipline, bond; from מוסר jasar, to bind.

MOSEROTH, or MOSERAH, Numb. xxxiii. 30. probably the same as HazerOTH, or Hazerah, near Kadesh, and Mount Hor.

[A station of the Israelites, Numb. xxxiii. 30. Simon thinks, chains of settlements: but whether chains of rocks, or hills, or, as we say, a chain of mountains, does not appear.]

MOSES, משה, taken out of the water.

MOSES, son of Amram and Jocabed, was born in Egypt A. M. 2433, ante A. D. 1571. His father and mother were of the tribe of Levi. He had a brother called Aaron, and a sister named Miriam; Aaron was three years older than Moses, and Miriam might be seven or eight years older than Aaron. Some time before the birth of Moses, the king of Egypt decreed, that all the male children of the Hebrews should be put to death as soon as born. The parents of Moses could not obey this severe law; they concealed their child in their house three months. But, despairing of longer hiding him, they resolved on exposing him to the wide world, committing his preservation to Providence. They put him into a kind of little vessel made of rushes, and laid him on the banks of the Nile. His sister Miriam stood to watch at a distance. The daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, happening to come that way, to bathe in the river, perceived the basket, ordered it to be fetched to her, and she opened it.

Miriam the sister of little Moses, asked her if if she would please to have her fetch a Hebrew nurse? She went, and brought Jocabed, her own and Moses's mother. The princess named the infant, Moses, which in the Egyptian language signifies one saved out of the water. Mō or Mōi signifies water, and Uses one that is drawn out; so say Josephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus. But the abbé Renaudot, who studied the Egyptian language, says, that Moooo signifies water, and Si to draw or take. According to Josephus, the name of Pharaoh's daughter was Thermutis. She adopted Moses, and had him instructed in all the learning of Egypt. Acts vii. 22. But Amram and Jocabed, who brought him up, betimes initiated him into the religion and expectations of his forefathers. So that when grown up, he would not own for his mother the princess who had adopted him, chusing rather to partake with his true people in their afflictions, than to share in the pleasures of a court, Heb. xi. 24, 25, 26.

Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. i. says, that Moses's parents had named him Joachim, at his circumcision. Pharaoh's daughter named him Moses, in memory of his being taken out of the water; and it was thought that in heaven his name was Melchi. He had the ablest masters to teach him arithmetic, geometry, music, physic, the symbolic philosophy, which was taught by means of hieroglyphic characters, and all that belonged to the language and writing of the Egyptians. Philo, de Vitâ Mosis, says pretty much the same thing. He adds, that Grecians were sent for to instruct him in the liberal sciences, that the Assyrians taught him their learning, and the Egyptians mathematics. Eupolemus says, that Moses is the first of sages, that he first gave to the Hebrews the art of grammar, from whom the Phœnicians received it, and from them the Grecians. Eupolem. apud Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. et Euseb. Præp. lib. ix. cap. 26.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 5. has much adorned the history of Moses, yet it is thought very probable, that he has delivered only what was believed among the Jews. He relates that, the king of Egypt had a daughter named Thermutis, who going to the banks of the river Nile, saw in the water a little box floating; having found in it a child of extraordinary beauty, she sent for some women to give it suck. But the child refusing the breast from any of these women, Miriam the child's sister approached as if by accident, and told the princess the child would not suck any but a Hebrew nurse; at the same time she offered to fetch one. She went, and brought Jocabed the child's mother, who having presented the nipple to young Moses, he instantly took it.

The beauty of young Moses was so great, and he shewed so much wit and address, that all were charmed with him, and were never satisfied with looking on him. The princess Thermutis not having any children, adopted him, and when he was three years of age, she presented him to the king her father; telling him she had chosen him for her son on account of his rare qualities, and could wish that he might succeed to the crown of Egypt. At the same time she put the child into the hands of her father. The king received him into his arms, and, to please his daughter, jocosely put his diadem upon the child's head. But Moses presently snatched it off, and letting it fall on the ground, he trod it under foot. This was taken as no good omen, and a priest who had foretold that the birth of this child should be fatal to Egypt, was very urgent to have him put to death, saying that Egypt could not be in safety if he lived. Thermutis took him away, without any opposition from the king; and disregarding the predictions of the fortune-teller, she caused Moses to be educated in a manner befitting the dignity she intended him.

When he was grown up, Providence presented an opportunity of shewing his valour. The Ethiopians of South Egypt, greatly ravaged the country. The Egyptians with a great army, marched against them, but were defeated. The Ethiopians, proud of their success, penetrated into Egypt, even to the sea, laying all waste before them. The Egyptians, unable to oppose them by human means, had recourse to an oracle;—it told them to apply to a Hebrew for assistance. The king then desired Moses from Thermutis, to head his army. Thermutis made her father promise with an oath, that no injury should be done to him. He contrived to cut off the enemy's retreat, and to attack them before they could know of his march. He resolved to lead his army, not along the Nile, which was the direct way, but within the country, where it was very dangerous to pass, because of the multitude of serpents, and other venomous creatures.

By this means he came upon the Ethiopians before they were aware. He cut them in pieces, invaded their country, took several of their cities, and shut them up in the city of Saba. He besieged this town, but because it was in an island, and well fortified, he could not carry the place so soon as he expected.

In this interval Tharbis, daughter to the king of Ethiopia, having from the walls seen Moses fighting bravely at the head of the Egyptian army, conceived a great affection for him. She secretly sent to him proposals of marriage.

marriage. Moses consented, on condition she should deliver up the city. This she performed; Moses took possession of Meroë, married Tharbis, and with his victorious army returned into Egypt. But there, instead of receiving the acknowledgments he deserved, he found himself exposed to the envy of the courtiers; and accused to Pharaoh of having murdered an Egyptian. The king himself taking umbrage at the bravery and reputation of Moses, resolved to use this pretence to put him to death. Moses having discovered these designs, retired through the desert into the country of Midian, not finding it safe to go the ordinary road.

But Moses himself relates none of these particulars. He tells his own story thus: Exod. ii. A. M. 2473, ante A. D. 1531. Moses was then forty years old, Acts vii. 23. Moses being grown up visited his brethren, and saw the hardships they suffered from the Egyptian taskmasters. Seeing an Egyptian oppressing a Hebrew, he vindicated him, slew the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. The next day he found two Hebrews at variance, and being willing to reconcile them, he asked the offender why he struck his brother? He answered with another question, Who made you a ruler and judge over us? Will you kill me as you did the Egyptian yesterday?" Moses hearing this, was afraid, and wondered how it was discovered: Pharaoh being informed of it, sought for Moses to put him to death. But he fled into the country of Midian, beyond the Red Sea, in Arabia Petræa, south of Mount Sinai; where he sat down near a well. While he was sitting there, the seven daughters of Jethro, priest of Midian, came thither, according to custom, to draw water for their flocks; certain shepherds arriving with the same intention, drove them away. Moses assisted the damsels, drove off the shepherds, and watered Jethro's flocks.

Moses living for some time with Jethro, Jethro gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage, who bore Moses two sons, Gershom, and Eleazar. At length, that king of Egypt died; and the children of Israel groaning under the weight of oppressions, sent their cries to heaven, and the Lord heard them.

Moses was employed in feeding the sheep of Jethro his father-in-law; and one day came to the mountain of Horeb, where he observed a bush that burned without being consumed. Moses, astonished at this sight, says within himself, I must go and examine how it is that this bush is not consumed." The Lord seeing him advance, spake to him out of the bush, saying, Moses, approach no nearer, but put off your shoes, for the place wherein you stand is holy ground." Then he commissioned him, notwithstanding the reluctance and hesitation of Moses, to deliver his people Israel: foretelling the obstinacy of Pharaoh, the intervention of miracles, &c.

Moses still intreating to be excused, the Lord commanded him to throw his rod on the ground, which was immediately changed into a serpent. God bid him take it up; it became a rod again. Then he bid him put his hand into his bosom, and when he drew it out, it was all over leprous. He bid him put it in again, and it returned to its former health. These two miracles, says he, you shall perform before Israel. If after this they shall not believe you, take water out of the Nile, and pour it on the land; it shall be changed into blood. Moses pleading an infirmity of speech, the Lord referred him to his brother Aaron, as a man of ready utterance.

Moses returning to Jethro, told him he must go to see his brethren in Egypt; he took his wife and children with him, and set forward. But being arrived at a resting place, the angel of the Lord sought to kill his second son Eleazar, the occasion of which was (as some think) because he was not circumcised. Therefore Zipporah with a sharp stone, circumcised her son; and throwing herself at Moses's feet, said you are a bloody husband to me." After this they parted, and she returned to her father Jethro, taking her sons with her. The Hebrew text of ver. 24, 25, 26, is very obscure, because it does not express who it is the angel would kill, nor at whose feet Zipporah cast herself, nor what is the nominative case to dimisit eum in the Vulgate. In ver. 26, we have followed the sense, that to us appeared to be most rational.

Being arrived in Egypt, Moses and Aaron reported to Pharaoh, that the God of the Hebrews ordered them to go three days journey into the desert of Arabia, to offer sacrifices to him. Pharaoh refused; and commanded that the children of Israel should no longer be allowed straw, as before, for making bricks. The people on this complained to Moses, and he to the Lord, who told him, you shall see the plagues which shall smite the Egyptians. Moses and Aaron coming to Pharaoh, with the orders of the Lord, Aaron threw down his rod, which immediately was changed into a serpent. Pharaoh then sent for his magicians, the chief of which were Jannes and Jambres, who by enchantments changed also their rods into serpents; but Moses's rod, now a serpent, devoured those of the magicians.

After this the Lord smote Egypt with ten different sorts of plagues, in the compass of a few days.

days. Some Rabbins believe, that they continued a whole year, not succeeding one another immediately, but by intervals.

1. The plague of BLOOD,—the change of the waters of the Nile into blood; on the eighteenth day of the sixth month, afterwards called Adar; (February, O. S.) This plague continued about seven days.

2. The plague of FROGS, about the twenty-fifth of Adar; continued but one day.

3. The plague of LICE, on the twenty-seventh of Adar.

4. The plague of FLIES, the twenty-ninth, which at the earnest intreaty of Pharaoh was taken away on the thirtieth of Adar.

5. The plague of the PESTILENCE, or mortality among the cattle, about the second day of the seventh month, afterwards called Nisan. It ceased on the third day.

6. The plague of BOILS and ULCERS, which seized all the Egyptians, and even hindered the magicians themselves from appearing before Pharaoh. This plague continued the third and fourth days of Nisan, called Abib by Moses.

7. The plague of THUNDER and lightning, rain and hail, on the fifth day of Nisan, continued but one day.

8. The plague of LOCUSTS or grasshoppers, which devoured all that had escaped the hail, on the eighth of Nisan.

9. The plague of DARKNESS, which covered Egypt for three days, while the land of Goshen, where the Israelites lived, was enlightened as usual. While this plague lasted, Pharaoh sent for Moses and Aaron, and told them to sacrifice to their God, provided they left behind them their flocks and their herds; but Moses answered, they must take all their cattle with them. This day Moses ordered the Hebrews to prepare a lamb for the passover.

10. The plague of the DEATH of the first-born of the Egyptians, who were slain by the destroying angel, in the night between the fourteenth and fifteenth of Nisan.

The fourteenth day of Abib, or Nisan, at evening, the Hebrews killed the lamb of the passover, or of the passage of the Lord, and with the blood they sprinkled the two posts and upper part of their doors; that the destroying angel passing over their houses, might not enter to kill their first-born. About the middle of the night the Lord smote all the first-born of the Egyptians, from the first-born of Pharaoh, to the first-born of his meanest slave. Pharaoh sent in haste to call Moses and Aaron, and bid them go quickly and sacrifice to their God, with their wives, children, cattle, and all that they had; and to pray for him, also. The Egyptians also urged them to be gone.

Moses took with him the bones of the patriarch Joseph, who had laid this injunction on the Israelites before his death. Exod. xiii. 10. Gen. l. 25. The Hebrews departing from Rameses, came to Succoth, and thence to Etham. At Baal-zephon, Pharaoh advanced with a large army, thinking to force them back into Egypt. But the Lord put between the camp of Israel and that of the Egyptians, a miraculous cloud, which was luminous on the side towards the Israelites, and dark towards the Egyptians. Vide SEA, RED; and FRAGMENT, No. XXXIX.

The Egyptians perceiving that the Hebrews had fled through the separated waters of the Red Sea, they pursued; but the Lord by a contrary wind, brought back the waters, so that the whole Egyptian army was drowned.—Then Moses and the Israelites sang a song of thanksgiving to the Lord. From hence they went on toward Sinai. At Marah they found water, but very bitter: Moses crying to the Lord, he shewed him a certain wood, which being thrown into the water, corrected the bitterness, and made it potable. See ALVAM.

On the fifteenth day of the second month, after they quitted Egypt, the Hebrews came into the wilderness of Sin or Zin, between Elim and Sinai. Here the multitude, tired with the length of their journey, began to murmur against Moses, saying, Would to God we had died in Egypt, where we sat at the flesh-pots, and where we ate bread in abundance! The Lord spake to Moses, and promised to rain food from heaven: of which Moses informed the people. That very evening the camp of Israel was covered with quails, brought thither by the wind; and the next morning they saw all round the camp a kind of hoar-frost, or like little grains, of the colour of bdellium, and of the shape of coriander-seeds: the manna. See MANNA. Moses bid Aaron to fill an omer with manna, and to lay it up before the Lord; to remain as a monument to future generations.

From the desert of Sin, the Hebrews proceeded to Allush, and to Rephidim; where the people in want of water, murmured against Moses. But the Lord, by the ministry of Moses, drew them water out of the rock of Horeb. At this time, the Amalekites attacking Israel, Moses sent Joshua against them; he himself at the same time, with Aaron and Hur, being on an eminence, whence they could see the engagement. While Moses held up his hands toward heaven, Joshua had the advantage over the enemy; but no sooner did he hold them down when weary, but the Amalekites prevailed. Wherefore Aaron and Hur put stones under him, that he might sit down, while each of them supported his arms, that he might not be tired. So the Amalekites were entirely defeated. And the Lord said to Moses, write an account of this action in a book, and instruct Joshua concerning it; for I will utterly destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven.

The third day of the third month from their coming out of Egypt, they arrived at the foot of Mount Sinai, where they continued one whole year: and here Moses was the mediator of a covenant between God and this people. Vide LAW, &c. and see the history, Exod. xx.

Coming down from the mountain, Moses declared to the people the laws he had received, and the articles of the covenant the Lord would make with them. The people answering, that they would perform whatever the Lord enjoined, Moses erected an altar of unhewn stones, at the foot of the mountain, and twelve monuments, or twelve other altars, in the name of the twelve tribes of Israel. He offered sacrifices and peace-offerings: then taking the blood of the victims, he poured half upon the altar, and the other half into cups: and having read to the people the ordinances he had received from the Lord, and which he had wrote in a book, he sprinkled all the people with the blood that was in the cups. Thus was concluded this solemn and celebrated covenant, between the Lord and the children of Israel.

Then the Lord bid Moses come up again into the mountain, and bring with him Joshua, his servant, that he might instruct him in all which he would have observed by the priests or people, in the public exercise of religion; all the parts of which he distinctly appointed. After this, God informed him, that the people had forgotten all their promises and engagements; for at that very time they had made a molten image, and were worshipping a golden calf; adding a proposal of exterminating this headstrong and untractable people; and making Moses the father and chief of a great nation: but their leader interceded for Israel.

Descending from the Mount, Joshua heard the shouts and rejoicings of the people, as if of an engagement with an enemy. But Moses observed, it was not the sound of an alarm, but cries of joy. When they approached the camp, they saw the golden calf, and the people singing and dancing about it; Moses indignantly threw down the tables of stone he held in his hands, and broke them. Taking the calf they had made, he reduced it to powder, and scattered the powder into the water, and so made all the congregation drink of it. See GOLDEN CALF. Moses severely rebuked Aaron; and, standing at the entrance of the camp, he proclaimed, "Whoever is for the Lord, let him join himself to me." All the children of Levi assembling about him, he said; "Thus saith the Lord, let every one of you take his sword, and let him go from gate to gate across the camp, and slay even to his brother, his friend, or his kinsman." That day there were slain about three thousand people.

The next day Moses remonstrated to the people on the heinousness of their sin; but told them, he would go up again into the mountain, and endeavour to obtain forgiveness for them. He went up, and intreated the Lord to pardon them; or otherwise, he begged that he himself might be blotted out of the book of the Lord. The Lord answered, That only he who offended, should be blotted out of his book; that he would no further go with them, but would send his angel before them: and to shew the displeasure of the Lord, Moses carried the tabernacle out of the camp, where the Lord had been used to give his orders. Moses also desired another favour from the Lord, which was, that he might see his glory. The Lord answered him, that he could not see his face, for no man could support that sight; but that he would pass before the opening of the rock, where he might hear his name, and see his hinder parts [train] as he passed along.

Afterwards, Moses went up into the mountain, and carried new tables of stone. There God gave him the decalogue anew, and several other commandments: after forty days and forty nights he came down, bringing the two tables of testimony with him. He was not aware that his face emitted rays of light, which remained upon it after his communication with the Lord: wherefore, while he spake to Aaron and Israel he put a veil over his face.

Then he caused proclamation to be made, that whoever had any valuable metals, or precious stones, thread, wool, furs, or fine wood fit for the tabernacle, might offer them to the Lord. The Israelites actuated by a holy zeal, brought with great alacrity more than was necessary.

The Lord commanded also, that each Israelite should contribute half a shekel, (about thirteen pence half-penny of our money.) And that this contribution might be regularly raised, he took an account of the people, from twenty years old and upwards; and there were found 603,550, each of which paying a bekah or half shekel, the sum amounted to 100 talents of silver, (about £84,219 and 1775 shekels, (about £202 9s.) Six whole months they worked at the the tabernacle, i. e. from the sixth month of the holy year, after their leaving Egypt, A. M. 2513, to the first day of the first month of the following year, 2514, ante A. D. 1490. On the first day of Nisan, (April 21, according to Usher,) the tabernacle of the covenant was set up, and filled with the glory of the Lord. The fourteenth of Nisan the Israelites celebrated the second passover from their coming out of Egypt; and about this time Moses published the laws contained in the first seven chapters of Leviticus: he consecrated Aaron and his sons, and dedicated the tabernacle, with all its vessels.

The first day of the second month of this year Moses took a second account of the people, in which the Levites were reckoned apart, and appointed to the service of the tabernacle. Moses regulated their functions, and offices. Also the order of every tribe in their marches and encampments, to prevent confusion. The princes of the tribes made their offerings to the tabernacle, each according to his rank, and on his day, during the twelve days of the dedication and consecration of this holy place. Lastly, about this time, Moses made several ordinances, relating to the purity to be observed in holy things, and the manner of approaching the tabernacle.

About the end of the year, Jethro the father-in-law of Moses brought him his wife Zipporah, and his two sons Gershom and Eliezer. Moses received him with all respect, and by his persuasion commissioned judges to assist in accommodating differences, and minor suits.

Soon after, the pillar of clouds rising, the Israelites decamped from Sinai to go towards Paran. Vide TABERAH and KIBROTH HATTA AVAH.

On account of the arrival of Zipporah in the camp, Aaron and Miriam his sister spoke against Moses, because his wife was an Ethiopian; but the Lord interposed in behalf of Moses, who was the meekest man upon earth. See AARON and MIRIAM.

It is not easy to determine, whether the sedition of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, happened after the arrival of the Hebrews at Kadesh-barnea, or before: Korah was of the tribe of Levi, as well as Moses and Aaron; Dathan, Abiram, and On, were of Reuben. Being disgusted at Moses and Aaron, they raised a mutiny against them, supported by two hundred and fifty others of the chief of the people: saying, "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy every one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord?" Moses fell on his face, and told them, Let every one of you take his censer, and present himself to-morrow before the Lord; and the Lord will then cause it to be known whom he hath chosen. Moses in the mean time having sent for Dathan and Abiram, they answered, "Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? We will not come up."

The day following Moses having assembled all the people at the door of the tabernacle, the glory of the Lord appeared; and in the issue the revolvers were swallowed up by the earth. Yet the very next day the people began again to murmur against Moses and Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord. The Lord caused a sudden fire, or plague, to go forth, in the camp, but Aaron with his censer placing himself between the living and the dead, offered his incense, and intreated the Lord; on which the plague ceased.

From the encampment called the Graves of Lust, the people went to Hazeroth, and thence to Kadesh-barnea, where they continued a long while: from hence Moses sent twelve chosen men to view the land of Canaan. These messengers were forty days on their search, and at their return they brought back some of the fruits of the country, of extraordinary size and quality; they very much commended the land for its beauty and fertility, but added, that the inhabitants were of gigantic stature, and had many strong and populous cities; so that there were but little hopes of conquering this country. This report put all the camp into a mutiny. Nothing would satisfy them, but they would return into Egypt. Then the Lord in his anger threatened to destroy all the people, but Moses interposed by his prayers. However, sentence was passed against these murmurers, that all from the age of twenty years and upwards should die in the desert. The ten spies were punished by a sudden death. Only Joshua and Caleb were preserved; and God declared that they alone of the whole multitude should enter the Land of promise.

At Kadesh, Miriam the sister of Moses died. Here the people murmured for want of water, which Moses and Aaron supplied by causing it to gush out of a rock. But as they shewed some distrust in the Lord, he condemned them to die in the wilderness, without entering the Land of Promise. Hence they called this encampment Meribah, or waters of contradiction.

They went then to Mount Hor, where Aaron died. From hence they went to Zalmonah, where it is thought Moses erected the brazen serpent, to heal those who had been bitten by fiery serpents in the camp. Numb. xxi, 6. See SERPENT. Being come to Mount Pisgah in the desert of Kadesh, they dispatched am-ambassadors to Sihon, king of the Amorites, to solicit a passage through his country, which being refused, Moses gave him battle, overcame him, and took all his territories. Some time afterwards, Og king of Bashan marched against Moses, and fought with him; but Moses conquered him, and his country.

After this Moses encamped in the plains of Moab, at Shittim, where the Israelites continued till they passed over Jordan, under Joshua. While they abode in this encampment, Balak king of Moab invited Balaam to come and curse Israel. But the sorcerer, having rather blessed than cursed them, he sent the daughters of Moab into the camp, to tempt the Israelites to idolatry and fornication. This wicked counsel had the desired effect; but Moses put to death all who had abandoned themselves to the worship of Baal-peor, to the number of 23,000, besides 1000 others executed by the judges.

After this, the Lord commanded Moses to make war against the Midianites, who had sent their daughters, with those of Moab, to debauch Israel. Phinehas was appointed chief of this expedition, for which Moses gave him twelve thousand chosen men. He routed the Midianites.

The tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh having requested for their inheritance the country conquered from the Amorites, Moses consented, on condition that they would go with their brethren over Jordan, to assist them in the conquest of the country possessed by the Canaanites.

The first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the coming out of Egypt, Moses being in the fields of Moab, knowing that he was not to pass over Jordan, and that his last hour approached, he made a long discourse to the people, recapitulating all he had done, and all that had happened from the coming out of Egypt. He set before them the happiness that would attend their constancy and fidelity, and the calamities which would punish their prevarication. He put into the hands of the priests and elders a copy of the law, with an injunction to have it read solemnly every seventh year in a general assembly of the nation. He composed an excellent canticle or poem, in which he exclaims against their future infidelities, and threatens them with all the evils that in after ages came upon them. Lastly, a little before his death he annexed to each of the tribes a particular blessing, in which he mingles several prophecies and predictions.

The Lord commanded Moses, at the beginning of the twelfth month, to ascend Mount Nebo, where he obtained a view of the country, both on this side and beyond Jordan; saying to him, "This is the land which I swore unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed. I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither. So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day. And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plain of Moab thirty days." It is added, "There arose not a prophet since, like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face: in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to his land: and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel."

Scripture is full of the praises of this great man; Jesus, son of Sirach, author of Ecclesiasticus, applauds him, Eccles. xlv. 1, 2, 3.

Moses is the most ancient writer, of whom there remains any authentic works. He has left us the Pentateuch, or the five first books of the Old Testament, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Probably these books were not originally separate works, as we find them now. Moses composed but one single work, of which the law was, as it were, the body, and Genesis was the preface. Afterwards, they were divided for convenience in reading. These books are acknowledged as authentic and inspired, by general consent both of Jews and Christians. Some difficulties have been started about the author of these books, because some passages have been observed therein, that seem not to agree to Moses. And indeed it must be owned, that some small additions have been inserted. But these additions make no alteration in the sense, but are by way of illustration only.

Besides the Pentateuch, the Jews ascribe to Moses eleven Psalms, from XC. to C. But there is no sufficient proof that these Psalms were all written by him. For the title of the ninetieth Psalm, A prayer of Moses the man of God, which they pretend must be applied also to the ten following Psalms, is not sufficient. The greater part of the titles of the Psalms are not original, nor indeed very ancient; and some of them are wrong placed. Besides, in these Psalms we find the names of persons, and other marks, that by no means suit with Moses. Vide Psalms.

Some ancients thought that Moses was the author author of the book of Job. Origen, on Job, pretends, that he translated it out of Syriac [Arabic] into Hebrew. But this opinion is rejected both by Jews and Christians; and if this book had truly belonged to Moses, would the Jews have separated it from the Pentateuch?

There is also quoted an Apocalypse or Revelation of Moses, a lesser Genesis, the Ascension of Moses, the Assumption of Moses, the Testament of Moses, the Mysterious books of Moses. It is thought that from the Apocalypse of Moses St. Paul quoted Gal. v. 6. "For in Jesus Christ, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love." And vi. 15. "For in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature." It is imagined also, that what is said in the epistle of St. Jude, ver. 9. concerning the contention of Michael the archangel with the devil, about the body of Moses, is taken from the Assumption of Moses. Vide Fabricius, Apoc. Vet. Test.

As to the death and burial of Moses, many difficulties have been raised. Scripture tells us expressly, that Moses died, according to the word of the Lord, Deut. ult. 5, 6. But as the Hebrew, וַיִּסְרֹף, literally imports upon the mouth of the Lord, the Rabbins have imagined, that the Lord took away his soul by a kiss. Others have maintained that he did not die; and some have pretended that he was translated into heaven. "Our masters have assured us, (says Maimonides,) that our master Moses is not dead, but ascended into heaven, where he serves God to all eternity." Præfat. in Talmud. En. Israel. p. 2. p. 39. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. ult. that he disappeared; but that it was he himself who gave an account of his own death, for fear the Jews, astonished at his exalted virtue, should imagine he had made approaches to Deity itself. And since nobody could tell where his place of burial was, and since he appeared with Elias in the transfiguration of Jesus Christ; and lastly, since St. Jude says, that there was a dispute between Michael and the devil about his body, some have concluded that he did not really die, but ascended body and soul into heaven.

The Rabbins, do not content themselves with the miracles that Scripture relates of Moses, but say, for example, that he was born circumcised; that the daughter of Pharaoh, who found him on the banks of the Nile, was leprous, and that as soon as she touched the ark in which the infant lay, she was immediately cured. Bathia, (for so they call this princess) having brought Moses to Pharaoh, at the age of three years, Moses took his crown, and put it upon his own head. Balaam, the famous wizard, being then at Pharaoh's court, advised him to put the child to death. But Pharaoh's magicians desiring to try whether Moses had done this out of knowledge and design, or by mere chance, put diamonds and coals of fire before him. Moses was reaching out his hand to the diamonds, but the angel Gabriel pulled it back, and put it to the coals of fire; he put them upon his tongue, and burned himself, which made him hesitate in his speech ever after. This action was the saving of his life. When it was known to Pharaoh that Moses had killed an Egyptian, he condemned him to lose his head; but God permitted that his neck should become as hard as a pillar of marble, and the rebound of the sword killed the executioner. Moses fled, and no body could stop him; for Pharaoh became dumb that minute, and all the rest either deaf, dumb, or blind.

Moses withdrew to Korkon, king of Ethiopia, who was then in Armenia. Balaam being also then in Ethiopia, excited the people to an insurrection against their prince; but Moses in the defence of Korkon at the head of his army, besieged Balaam in the capital city of Ethiopia. To make the approach to the city more difficult, the sorcerer brought an infinite multitude of serpents around it. But Moses charmed the serpents, and made himself master of the town. He married the queen, then widow to the king, who died during the war, and reigned forty years over Ethiopia: the queen complained that Moses did not use her as his wife; at which the people mutinied, and Moses was constrained to retire to Jethro, where he found a famous rod or twig, that God had at first created for Adam. It passed afterwards to Abraham, then to the kings of Egypt, from whom Jethro took it, when he left that court. He planted it in his garden, and promised his daughter to any one that could pluck it up. The name of God was engraved on this twig, which was the cause of its being so miraculous. Moses married Zipporah, who soon brought him a son. But Jethro having covenanted that his first-born son should not be circumcised, God immediately sent two angels, who so far swallowed up Moses, that there only remained his feet. But no sooner had Zipporah circumcised her son, than Moses was delivered from this danger. The Jews relate a thousand miracles about the manner of Moses's receiving the law. According to them it is not enough to say, that Moses ascended Mount Sinai; they will have it that he ascended into heaven; that being come to the top of Sinai, a cloud took him up, and carried him into heaven. On his way he met the angel Remuel, Remuel, chief of twelve thousand angels, who was desirous to accompany him. But pronouncing the name of God, composed of twelve letters, he made him fly away to the distance of twelve thousand furlongs. Pursuing his way, he found the angel Adarniel, who put him into a great fright. For this angel had a terrible voice, which he caused to be heard in the two hundred thousand spheres encompassed with a white fire. Moses being dismayed would have retired, but the Lord encouraged him; and pronouncing the name of God composed of seventy-two letters, he terrified the angel in his turn, who fled away, crying out as he went, Happy art thou Moses, who knowest that of which angels are ignorant! They believe the tables were of sapphire, on which the law was written; and that Moses was made rich by the fragments only, that were taken from these tables when they were polished, Exod. xxxiv. 1. They say moreover, that Moses destroyed the accomplices of Korah, by putting a deadly poison into their censers, the fume of which killed them.

The history of Moses was so famous for many ages, in almost all countries, that it is no wonder writers of different nations have each represented it after his own manner. The Orientals, the ancient Grecians, the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, the Romans, have all made additions to his history. Some of them have improved on the miracles that the Scripture relates concerning his life; others have disguised his story, by adding to it not only false, but mean and trifling circumstances. The reader has had a taste of this, in what we have extracted from the Rabbins.

As the Jews and Orientals generally have enlarged the number of Moses's miracles, and magnified his exploits, so the Greek and Latin authors have enfeebled them, or rendered them doubtful by a mixture of fable. Manetho says, apud Joseph. cont. App. lib. i. that Moses was a priest of Heliopolis, called Osarsiph, who being at the head of a company of lepers, and other diseased persons, whom king Amenophis wished to expel from his kingdom, he revolted against the king, and fortified himself with his people in the city of Avaris, or Typhon. This new commander made his followers swear obedience to him in the first place; then he gave them laws, which consisted chiefly of such points as these; that they should not worship the gods, that they should not refrain from eating such things as passed for sacred in Egypt, and that they should not make alliance with any other people, but only with such as would espouse their cause. After this Osarsiph changed his name for that of Moses.

He sent ambassadors to the shepherds whom king Thermotis had driven out of Egypt, and who were withdrawn to Jerusalem, to persuade them to enter into confederacy with him, and to join their forces together against king Amenophis. The shepherds were very well pleased at this invitation, and with great diligence repaired to the city Avaris, to the number of two hundred thousand men. King Amenophis got together an army of three hundred thousand men, but instead of fighting with the rebels, he retired into Ethiopia, where he found protection, the king of that country being in alliance with him. The rebels having no longer any thing to fear, dispersed themselves all over Egypt, and there committed a thousand outrages, not only against the men, but also against the sacred animals, killing, burning, and destroying wherever they came. At the end of thirteen years, king Amenophis joining his troops with those of the king of Ethiopia, he poured at once upon the rebels, and drove them as far as to the frontiers of Syria.

Justin was no better informed. He tells us, lib. xxxvi. that when Joseph was sold by his brethren, and carried into Egypt, he there soon insinuated himself into the king's favour, by means of the magic art, in which he was very expert. Besides which, he had the knack of interpreting dreams, and had it not been for him, all Egypt had died of hunger. For he foretold a great famine that happened, the distress of which was prevented, by hoarding up all the corn of Egypt for several years, by his advice. Moses was his son, inheritor of all his secrets: and besides his knowledge, he was valued likewise for the extraordinary beauty of his person. But the Egyptians being much vexed with leprosy, and fearing this evil might be farther communicated, they consulted the gods about it, who commanded that all those should be driven out of the country who were infected with that distemper; Moses therefore was driven out, and all the other lepers. At going away, they stole the gods of the Egyptians; who being desirous to recover them, pursued the lepers with weapons in their hands: but were soon obliged by tempests to return home again.

Moses therefore being at the head of the exiles, conducted them to the country of Damascus, which was the country of their ancestors Abraham and Israel. They made themselves masters of Mount Sinai, after seven days marching and fasting. In memory of this seventh day they observed the Sabbath, and dedicated it to fasting. And fearing lest the leprosy, which still infested them, should make them odious odious to the neighbouring people, they resolved to have no correspondence with any other nation; which by degrees became a principle of their religion. After Moses, his son Arrat, who was priest of the Egyptian gods, was created king of the Jews; from which time the royalty and the priesthood have been united in the same person. Vide MANETHO, JEWS, EGYPT, &c.

[The character and life of Moses is one of the finest subjects for the pen of a philosophical historian, who is at the same time a competent antiquary. The history contains not a few difficulties. We shall instance in the Chronological. If we take strictly the words a daughter of Levi, Exod. ii. 1. it will follow, that Jochebed, his mother, was fourscore years old at the time of his birth; which is most unlikely; and therefore we must take daughter for granddaughter, or other relative of the family of Levi. [See JOCHEBED.] This is contrary to the sentiment of Lightfoot; who finds a miracle here.

Secondly. If Moses was forty years with Jethro, in Midian, then his children by Zipporah, must have been approaching forty years of age, when he was returning to Egypt. Or, if these children were young, as the history indicates, then had Moses continued with Jethro thirty years, at least, without forming that connection, which seems to have taken place early; for Zipporah, apparently, was one of the seven daughters of Jethro, whom Moses rescued from the shepherds, at his first arrival. Otherwise, Zipporah was born more than twenty years after the arrival of Moses; for no man in the East would think of delaying his daughter's marriage till she was near forty years old. Again, as Jethro practised circumcision, though he might delay it to the age of twelve or thirteen, yet as the sons of Moses were not circumcised, it should follow, that they were not arrived at that age.

We must also bear in mind the age of the Pharaohs contemporary with Moses. If the Pharaoh who was recently dead when Moses thought of returning to Egypt, was the same as reigned when Moses was born, he must have been much above a hundred years old, since his daughter was of age to have children, when she adopted Moses. This is not impossible; but, it is very unlikely. In proportion as the time of Moses's residence with Jethro might be shortened, these difficulties would diminish.

It may justly be questioned, whether the plagues in Egypt followed in that rapid succession, which is stated by CALMET. Mr. Bryant carries this principle so far as to derive a miracle from some of them taking place at a time of year, when they would be contrary to nature.

This appears to be wholly unnecessary, on a just estimate of the true nature of miracles. It is likely, that between some of them a considerable interval might be allowed, during which Pharaoh might have been brought to reflection; also that only the latter of them followed quickly.

The Geographical difficulties in the history of Moses, are much lessened since our better acquaintance with the countries he traversed; and little more is wanting than a description of the view from Pinah or Nebo.

The Verbal and Numerical difficulties are many. What can be meant by the sight of the Deity granted to Moses? what by the writing with the finger of God? &c. &c.—How it should happen that the numbers of Israel should be so great: how the numbers of all the tribes should end with two cyphers, &c. &c. are questions connected with inquiries too extensive to be treated of in this place.

The institutes of Moses have not only been maintained for several thousands of years, and by Jews, however, dispersed in all parts of the globe, but they retain a vigour that promises a perpetuity, unless disturbed by some omnipotent interference. They have withstood the fury of persecution, and the more dangerous snares of seduction. They are essentially the same in China and in India, as in Persia and in Europe. They may have been neglected, they may have been interpolated, they may have been abused,—yet they are the same. Nor is the nation insensible to its relation in all its branches: the principle of consanguinity is allowed and felt throughout. It is impossible not to discern the hand of Providence in the fate of this people. To assign too positively the termination of the Mosaic institutions, were rash; for, even supposing the general conversion of the body of the Jewish nation to Christianity, it does not follow, that every rite established under the Mosaic economy, should absolutely cease and determine.]

[MOTE. Vide EYE. Add.]

[MOTH, an insect which flies by night; there are many kinds of moths, and as some of them are particularly attached to woollen cloth, which they consume, &c. they are alluded to in S. S. under that description. Job iv. 19. xiii. 28. James v. 2. Isaiah l. 9. The moth is, as it were, a night butterfly, and is distinguished from the day butterfly, by having its antennæ, or horns, sharp-pointed, not tufted.]

MOTHER. Is sometimes used for a metropolis, the capital city of a country, or of a tribe; and sometimes for a whole people. 2 Sam. xx. 19. The synagogue is the mother of the Jews, Jews, as the church is of Christians. Isaiah says, l. 1. "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement, whom I have put away?" i. e. of the synagogue. And St. Paul, Galat. iv. 26. "Jerusalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all." The great Babylon, i. e. Rome, is called in the Revelations, "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," that is, of idolatry, Rev. xvii. 5.

A mother in Israel signifies a brave woman, whom God uses to deliver his people; this name Scripture gives to Deborah. Judg. v. 7. Wisdom calls herself Mater pulchræ dilectionis, the mother of chaste love. The earth, to which at our death we must all return, is called the mother of all men: "To the day that they return to the mother of all things," Eccclus. xl. 1.

MOUNTAINS. Judæa is a mountainous country, but the mountains are generally beautiful, fruitful, and cultivated; producing fruits, olives, vines, and pasturage. Moses says, Deut xxxii. 13. that the rocks of its mountains produce oil and honey, by a figure of speech, which elegantly shews their fertility. He says, Deut. viii. 7, 9, that in the mountains of Palestine spring excellent fountains; and that their bowels yield iron and brass. And indeed we are informed by history, that there were mines in Palestine and Mount Libanus. Aristeas, in the history of the seventy interpreters, assures us, that these mines were in being down to the empire of the Persians, when the governors of this province acquainting the king, that the charges of working the mines exceeded the profit, they were abandoned. Moses desires earnestly of the Lord, that he might see the fine mountains of Judæa, and Libanus, Deut. iii. 25.

The most famous MOUNTAINS mentioned in SCRIPTURE.

Seir, in Idumæa, Gen. xiv. 6.

Horeb, near Sinai, in Arabia Petræa, Deut. i. 2.

Sinai, in Arabia Petræa, Deut. xxxiii. 2.

Hor, in Idumæa, Numb. xx. 22.

Gilboa, south of the valley of Israel, 2 Sam. i. 21.

Nebo, a mountain of Abarim, Numb. xxxii. 3.

Tabor, in Lower Galilee, Judg. iv. 6.

En-gedi, near the Dead Sea, Josh. xv. 62.

Libanus and Anti-libanus, Deut. iii. 25.

Gerizim, whereon was afterwards the temple of the Samaritans, Judg. ix. 7.

Ebal, near to Gerizim, Josh. viii. 30.

Gilead, beyond Jordan, Gen. xxxi. 21, 23, 25.

Amalek, in Ephraim, Judg. xii. 15.

Moriah, where the temple was built, 2 Ch. iii. 1.

Paran, in Arabia Petræa, Gen. xiv. 6. Deut. i. 1.

Gabash, in Ephraim, Josh. xxiv. 30. Judg. ii. 9.

Olivet, Luke xxi. 37.

Pisgah, beyond Jordan, Numb. xxi. 20. Deut. xxxiv. 1.

Hermon, beyond Jordan, near Libanus, Josh. xi. 3.

Carmel, near the Mediterranean Sea, between Dora and Ptolemais, Josh. xix. 26.

There are many other mountains, famous only for having cities on them; as Hebron, Samaria, Nazareth, Gibeon, Shophim, Shilo, &c.

The mountains of Judah are chiefly south, in the country belonging to that tribe, inclining towards Idumæa.

The mountains of Ephraim are spread through the whole extent of that tribe, except what are situated on the Jordan to the east, and on the Mediterranean sea to the west.

The mountains of Gilead stretch out north and south, from Libanus, or Mount Hermon, as far as the mountains of Seir, or of Idumæa.

The mountains Abarim, Pisgah, and Nebo, make but one chain of mountains stretching from east to west, from the mountains of Gilead or Seir, far into the plains of Moab, east of Jordan.

The Hebrews frequently give to mountains the epithet eternal, because they are as old as the world itself, Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 15.

Some philosophers have doubted, whether there were any mountains before the Deluge. They pretend that mountains were produced by sinkings of the earth, caused by openings made by the waters under the earth. Vide DELUGE.

[MOUNTAINS, were sometimes retired to as places of security. I think the following history from Mr. BRUCE, is pretty similar to that of Samson, Jud. xv. 8—13.

"Emana Christos had retired to a high mountain in Gojam, called Melca Amba, where he continued.

"Soon after, Af Christos by forced marches surrounded Melca Amba, where Emana Christos was, and had assembled a number of troops.

"The mountain had neither water in it nor food for such a number of men, nor had Emana Christos forces enough to risk a battle with an officer of the known experience of Af Christos, who had chosen the ground at his full leisure, and with complete knowledge of it.

"Three days the army within the mountain held out without complaining; but, in the evening of the third day, some monks and hermits came to Af Christos to remonstrate, that there were several convents and villages in the mountain, also small springs, and barely enough to answer the necessities of the ordinary inhabitants, but not enough for such an additional number which had taken forcible possession of the wells, and drank drank up all the water, to the immediate danger of the whole inhabitants perishing with thirst.

"To this Af Christos answered, that the reducing the mountain, and the taking Emana Christos, was what was given him in commission by the king, to attain which end he would carefully improve all the means in his power. He was sorry, indeed, for the distress of the convents in the mountain, but could not help it; nor would he suffer one of them to remove or come down into the plain, nor would he discontinue blockading the mountain while Emana Christos was there and alive. No other alternative, therefore, remained but the delivering up Emana Christos. His army would have fought for him against a common enemy, but against thirst their shields and swords were useless."

Is it absolutely certain that Samson dwelt alone on the rock Etam? had he no servants, no soldiers, or &c.?

Mountains and their properties, are frequently objects of comparison in Scripture, their elevation, their stability, the breadth of their bases, &c. and many extraordinary events narrated in sacred history, took place on mountains, which seem to form, by their very structure and appearance, proper places of seclusion. N. B. The high-places of Scripture are thought not to have been always on hills or mountains; nevertheless, I suppose, they originally were so: and indeed, generally, when those who worshipped in them could have their choice, and were not overruled by circumstances.]

MOURNING. The Hebrews, at the death of their friends and relations, gave all possible demonstrations of grief and mourning. They wept, tore their clothes, smote their breasts, fasted, and lay upon the ground, went barefooted, pulled their hair and beards, or cut them, and made incisions on their breasts, or tore them with their nails. Lev. xix. 28. xxi. 5. Jer. xvi. 6. The time of mourning was commonly seven days; but was lengthened or shortened, according to circumstances. Jesus son of Sirach says, the days of mourning are seven; Ecclus. xxviii. 16, 17, and elsewhere, "My son, let tears fall down over the dead, and begin to lament, as if thou hadst suffered great harm thyself; and then cover his body according to the custom, and neglect not his burial. Weep bitterly, and make great moan, and use lamentation as he is worthy, and that a day or two, lest thou be evil spoken of; and then comfort thyself for thy heaviness." The Rabbins admit of several degrees in grief and mourning. For the three first days it was allowed to give themselves up to tears, and to the most sensible grief; which, in the seven days following was diminished. But if the time of mourning extended to a whole month, it was managed with moderation. The mournings for Saul, Judith, and Herod the Great, lasted but seven days. Those for Moses and Aaron were prolonged to thirty days. Josephus says, that a thirty days' mourning ought to be sufficient for any wise man, on the loss of his nearest relation, or his dearest friend.

During the time of their mourning the near relations of the deceased, as father, mother, husband, brother, sister, children, continued sitting in their houses, and ate on the ground. The food they took was thought unclean, and even themselves were judged impure; "their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted," says Hosea, ix. 4. Their faces were covered, and in all that time they could not apply themselves to any occupation, nor read the book of the law, nor say their usual prayers. They did not dress themselves, nor make their beds, nor uncover their heads, nor shave themselves, nor cut their nails, nor go into the bath, nor salute any body. Nobody spoke to them, unless they spoke first. Their friends commonly went to visit and comfort them, bringing them food, according to that of Proverbs, xxxi. 6, 7. "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty, (or affliction) and remember his misery no more." Comp. BAPTISM for the Dead.

Leo of Modena says, that after they come back from the funeral, the relations of the deceased sit down on the ground, and after taking off their shoes, they have bread, wine, and hard eggs set before them. In some places they make entertainments for the relations, and those who assisted at the funeral. Josephus says, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 1. that after Archelaus had kept a mourning of seven days, for his father Herod the Great, he made a magnificent treat for the people; and that it was customary among the Jews on these occasions, to make great feasts for the relations; which was very inconvenient to many persons, who could not well bear that expence. Anciently, they set bread and meat at the tombs of the dead, that the poor might have the benefit of it, Tob. iv. 18. Eccles. xxx. 18. Baruch, vi. 26, 31.

Anciently, in times of public mourning, the Hebrews went up to the roof, or upon the platform of their houses, to bewail their misfortune. "Through all the cities of Moab, (says Isaiah,) they shall gird themselves with sackcloth: on the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl, weeping abundantly," chap. xv. 3: and xxii. 1. speaking to Jerusalem, he says; "What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the house-tops?"

They hired women to weep and mourn, and players on instruments, as well at the funerals of the Hebrews, as anciently among the Romans. But this custom is not observable in the East, till after the Romans introduced it. Persons in years were carried to their graves by sound of trumpet, as Servius says, and younger people by the sound of flutes. In Matth. ix. 23, we observe a company of players on the flute, at the funeral of a girl of twelve years of age. Among the Romans the kings had fixed the number of players on the flute at funerals; more than ten was forbidden. The Rabbins have determined that a husband must have two at the burial of his wife, not reckoning the two he-mourners, and the she-mourner, that were hired. If a woman of condition should marry a man of inferior quality, he was to bury her according to her condition. For according to the Rabbins, the wife ascends with her husband, but does not descend with him, even at her death.

All that met a funeral procession, or a company of mourners, out of civility were to join them, and to mingle their tears with those who wept, Joseph. lib. ii. cont. Appion. St. Paul seems to allude to this custom, when he says; "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep," Rom. xii. 15. And our Saviour in the Gospel; "The men of this generation are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept," Luke vii. 32. Matth. xi. 17.

When Jesus Christ was led away to his crucifixion, the women of Jerusalem followed him, making great lamentations: Luke xxiii. 27. When the daughter of Jephthah was devoted by her father, she went with her companions upon the mountains, to lament her leaving the world without being married, Judg. xi. 38. In Palestine and Syria, the women go out into the burying places at certain times, there to mourn for the death of their near relations. See PLATES: MATERNAL MOURNING AT RAMAH.

The mourning habit among the Hebrews was not fixed either by law or custom. We only find in Scripture, that they used to tear their garments: a custom still observed, but they tear a small part, merely, and for form's sake. Anciently, in times of mourning they clothed themselves in sackcloth, or hair-cloth, i. e. in coarse or ill made clothes, of brown or black stuff. At this day, that they may not appear ridiculous, they wear mourning after the fashion of the countries where they live, without being constrained to it by any law.

MOUSE, or RAT; Greek Μῦς, Latin, Mus, Hebrew מִצְרָיִם Gnathbar, or Acdar. Moses, Lev. xi. 29. declared the mouse unclean, which insinuates that it was eaten sometimes. The Jews were so oppressed with famine during the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, that they were compelled to eat dogs, mice, and rats, Hist. Hebr. Templi secundi, p. 241. Isaiah, lxvi. 17. reproaches the Jews with eating mice, and other impure food. The Rabbins, Beth. Jacob. fol. 181, say that one reason why the law forbade the eating of mice, is, because their flesh causes the loss of memory. Mice made great havoc in the fields of the Philistines, after that people had taken the ark of the Lord, 1 Sam. v. 6, 7, &c. The lords of the Philistines sent back the ark with mice and emerods of gold, as an atonement for irreverence committed, and to avert the vengeance that pursued them. The Assyrians who besieged Bethulia, when they saw the Hebrews come out of the city in order of battle, compared them to mice, saying, "See the mice are coming forth out of their holes," Judith xiv. 12. Vulgate. See the PLATES: CONEY, JERBOA.

MOUTH. We observed on the article ADORE, that to kiss one's hand, and to put it to one's mouth, was a sign of adoration. The Hebrews, by way of pleonasm, often say—he opened his mouth, and spoke, sung, cursed, &c. Also, that God opens the mouth of the prophets, puts words into their mouth, bids them speak what he inspires to them. To inquire at the mouth of the Lord, is to consult him, Josh. ix. 14. God says, that he will be a mouth to Moses and Aaron, Exod. iv. 15. "We will call the damsel, and enquire at her mouth;" let us know Rebecca's sentiments of the matter, Gen. xxiv. 57. "Let us hear what is in the mouth of Achitophel," 2 Sam. xvii. let us consult him about this affair.

To open the mouth, is often used emphatically, for speaking aloud, boldly, freely, 1 Sam. ii. 1. "my mouth is enlarged—opened—over my enemies," says Hannah the mother of Samuel: comp. Ezek. xxiv. 27. Isaiah lvii. 4. In a contrary sense, to shut the mouth, to silence, is a mark of humiliation and affliction, Psalm cvii. 42, xxxviii. 14. "To set their mouth against the heavens, Psalm lxxiii. 9. is when they speak arrogantly, insolently, and blasphemously of God.

God directs that his law should be always in the mouth of his people; that the Israelites commune frequently with one another about it. He forbids forbids them so much as to pronounce the name of strange gods; Exod. xxiii. 18. God says, that the earth opened her mouth, to receive the blood of Abel, Gen. iv. 11. The Hebrews generally say; to cause to pass under the mouth of the sword, whereas we say, the edge of the sword. To speak mouth to mouth, is a Hebraism, which we render by face to face, Numb. xii. 8. Heb. To lay one's hand on one's mouth, signifies to keep silence out of admiration, veneration, or submission. To fill from one mouth to the other, from one extremity to the other; as a sack that is full from bottom to top. "Shut not up the mouths of those that praise thee;" let them not be oppressed, or prevented from publishing thy praise; Scripture often says, that God does what he barely permits, or even what he foretels shall be done. With one mouth, is with common consent, Dan. iii. 51. To observe the mouth of the king, is to hear his words with attention, Eccles. viii. 2. To walk by the mouth of any one, is to obey his orders. To transgress against the mouth of the Lord, is to disobey his commands, You shall be justified by your own mouth; you shall be condemned out of your own mouth: by the good or ill use of your tongue.

Hosea says, vi. 5, the Lord has put the people to death by the words of his mouth: that is to say, that he foretold death (or captivity) to them by his prophets. Isaiah says of the Messiah, xi. 4. "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." These expressions denote the absolute power of God, and that it requires only one breath to destroy his enemies, [perhaps, by his judicial sentence.] The same prophet says; xlix. 2. "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword." See FRAG. No. CCCCXCI.] These ways of speaking energetically express the sovereign authority of God.

"From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," says Jesus Christ, Matth. xii. 34. Our discourses are the echo of the sentiments of our hearts. It is not what enters into the mouth that defileth the man; it is neither meat nor drink that makes us unclean in the sight of God: in ore, or ad os, often signifies, pro ratione, proportionē servatā.

MOZA, מֹצָא, מֹצֵא, unleavened bread; from מֹצָא matzak: otherwise, to find, or who has succeeded; from מֹצָא matza: otherwise, turned out; from מֹצָא jatza, to go out. [q. spring-head?]

I. MOZA, or MOSA, son of Caleb and his concubine Ephah, 1 Chron. ii. 46.

II. MOSA, son of Zimri, and father of Binea, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 36.

MOZAH, מֹצָא, unleavened bread; from מֹצָא

matzak: or that squeezes: otherwise, dispute, quarrel. See מֹצָא matzak. [Josh. xviii. 26, a town of Benjamin. Simon thinks it has not the same import as the foregoing: Comp. Judg. xviii. 10. what is complete, wanting nothing.]

MULBERRY-TREE, Morus. Psalm lxxviii. 47, says, that among other plagues with which the Lord visited Egypt, he destroyed their vines with hail, and their mulberry-trees with frost. [Vulgate; the English translation reads sycamore-trees.] Heb. מֹרְיָא מֹרְיָא, according to most interpreters, signifies sycamores: a tree frequent in Egypt; it has a leaf nearly resembling that of a mulberry-tree; and fruit something like figs; hence the word sycamore, from sycos, a fig, or fig-tree, and morus, a mulberry-tree. The Hebrew Shikamah is evidently the radix of sycaminus, which signifies also a sycamore. Vide FRAG. Nos. LXVII. CCLX. CCCCLXXVI. and PLATE, SYCAMORE.

It is said, 1 Macc. vi. 34, that Antiochus Eupator coming into Judæa with a powerful army, and many elephants, those who had the care of these animals shewed them the blood of grapes and mulberries, that they might provoke them to fight." The elephant of its own nature is not cruel; to render him fierce he must be vexed, urged, made drunk, or provoked by blood, or something like blood. Experience shews, that many animals are provoked at the sight of blood, or of any lively red colour, as Vallesius affirms; why not elephants also?

MULE, the offspring of two animals of different species, a horse and female ass, or a male ass and a mare.

There is great likelihood that the Jews did not breed mules, because it was forbid to couple creatures of different species, Levit. xix. 19. But they were not forbid to use them. Thus we may observe, especially after David's time, that mules male and female were common among the Hebrews: formerly they used only male and female asses, 2 Sam. xiii. 29. xviii. 9. 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44, x. 25. xviii. 5, &c.

Some have thought that Anah, son of Zibeon, of the posterity of Seir, being in the desert, found out the manner of breeding mules, by coupling together animals of different kinds. This opinion was much espoused by the ancients. But Jerom, who notices it in his Hebraical questions on Genesis, translates, that Anah found hot waters. The Syriac says, a fountain; but rather it signifies a people whom Anah surprized and defeated. See ANAH.

MUPPIM, מִפִּים, מִפִּי, of the mouth; from the preposition מִן am, and פִּי pe, the mouth.

MUPPIM, or MORIM, son of Benjamin, Gen. xli. 21. called Shupham, Num. xxvi. 39.

MUR

MURDER. This crime among the Hebrews was always punished by death, but involuntary homicide was only punished by banishment. Cities of refuge were appointed for involuntary manslaughter, whither the slayer might retire, and continue in safety, till the death of the high-priest, Numb. xxxv. 28. Then the offender was at liberty to return to his own house, if he pleased. A murderer was put to death without remission: the kinsman of the murdered person might kill him with impunity. Money could not redeem his life; he was dragged away even from the altar, if he had taken refuge there. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. X. XI.

When a dead body was found in the fields, and the murderer was unknown, Moses commanded, that the elders and judges of the neighbouring places should resort to the spot, Deut. xxi. 1, 2—8. The elders of the city nearest to it were to take a heifer, which had never yet borne the yoke, and were to lead it into some rude and uncultivated place, which had not been ploughed or sowed, where they were to cut its throat; the priests of the Lord, with the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the dead body, and washing their hands over the heifer that had been slain, they were to say: "Our hands have not shed this blood, nor have our eyes seen it shed. Lord be favourable to thy people Israel, and impute not to us this blood, which has been shed in the midst of our country." This ceremony may inform us, what idea they had of the heinousness of murder, and how much horror they conceived at this crime; also, their fear that God might avenge it on the whole country: and the pollution that the country was supposed to contract, by the blood spilt in it, unless it were expiated, or avenged on him who had occasioned it; if he could be discovered. Comp. Psalm lxxiii. 13: also, the action of Pilate, Matth. xxvii. 4.

MURMURING. A complaint made for wrong pretended to have been received. St. Paul forbids murmuring. "Neither murmur ye, as some of them murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer," 1 Cor. x. 10. And the wise man, Wisdom i. 11. "Therefore beware of murmuring, which is unprofitable, and refrain your tongue from backbiting; for there is no word so secret that shall go for nought, and the mouth that belyleth slayeth the soul." And indeed God severely punished the Hebrews who murmured in the desert. He was more than once on the point of forsaking them, and even of destroying them, had not Moses appeased his anger by earnest prayer. Numb. xi. 33, 34. xii. xiv. 30, 31. xvi. 3. xxi. 4, 5, 6. Psal. lxxviii. 30.

MUSACH, מִסַּח, Kab'spa, from מִסַּח masac, to cover: otherwise, unction, libation, or mixing of liquors; from מִסַּח masac.

MUSACH. This term signifies literally a veil, or covering, or a work of cast metal. There are many various opinions concerning the signification of the Musach of Judah, that Manasseh caused to be uncovered at the approach of the king of Babylon; and the Musach of the Sabbath that Ahaz caused to be turned towards the temple, for fear of the king of Assyria. Some have thought it was a veil, that covered the courts of the temple; others that it was a tent, wherein the priests rested themselves in the temple, when their week was out; others that it was a chest, wherein they threw their offerings for the repairs of the temple. Our opinion is, that it was the scaffold of brass made by Solomon, 2 Chr. vi. 13. and placed in the temple, upon which he stood on festival days. The same name was given to the scaffold on which a priest ascended on great solemnities, to read the law to the people.

Ahaz fearing that king Tiglath-pileser should come to Jerusalem, and carry off this scaffold, which was very valuable both for its matter and workmanship, he caused it to be taken from its place, and put into some secret part of the temple. Manasseh on a like occasion tore off the plates of brass with which it was covered. In 2 Kings xi. 14. the high-priest Jehoiada, desiring to have young Joash acknowledged king, caused guards to be set about him in the musach that was in the temple. The prince was seated upon the scaffold, and the guards placed round about. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLVIII.

MUSHI, מוּשִׁי, he that touches, that withdraws himself, that takes away; from מוּשִׁי mush.

MUSHI, or MUSI, son of Merari, chief of a family of Levites, 1 Chron. vi. 19. Numb. iii. 33.

MUSIC. The ancient Hebrews had a strong inclination to music and musical instruments. They used it in their religious services, in their public and private rejoicings, at their feasts, and even in their mournings. We have in Scripture canticles of joy, of thanksgiving, of praise, of mourning; epithalamiums, or songs composed on occasion of marriage; as the Song of Songs, and Psalm xlv. which are thought to have been composed to celebrate the marriage of king Solomon. Also mournful songs, as those of David on the deaths of Saul and of Abner, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah on the death of Josiah. Also Psalms to celebrate the accession of a prince to his crown, as Psalm lxxii. Songs of victory, triumph, and gratulation, as that which Moses sung after passing the Red-Sea, that that of Deborah and Barak, and others. The book of Psalms is an ample collection of different pieces for music, composed on all sorts of subjects by inspired authors. See POETRY.

Music is very ancient. Moses says of Jubal, who lived before the Deluge, he was the father of those who played on the kinnor, and the hugab, Gen. iv. 21. The kinnor manifestly signifies the harp, and hugab the ancient organ, i. e. a kind of flute composed of several pipes of different sizes, joined together. Laban complains that his son-in-law Jacob had left him, without bidding him farewell, without giving him an opportunity of sending his family away, with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp. Moses having passed over the Red Sea, composed a song, and sung it with the Israelite men, while Miriam his sister sung it with dancing, and playing on instruments, at the head of the women. This legislator caused silver trumpets to be made, to be sounded at solemn sacrifices, and on religious festivals. David, who had a great taste for music, seeing that the Levites were numerous, and not employed as formerly, in carrying the boards, veils, and vessels of the tabernacle, its abode being fixed at Jerusalem; he appointed a great part of them to sing and to play on instruments in the temple.

Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun were chiefs of the music of the tabernacle under David, and of the temple under Solomon. Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen. These twenty-four Levites, sons of the three great masters of the temple music, were at the head of twenty-four bands of musicians, which served in the temple by turns. Their number there was always great, but especially at the chief solemnities. They were ranged in order about the altar of burnt sacrifices. Those of the family of Kohath were in the middle, those of Merari on the left, and those of Gershon on the right hand. As the whole business of their lives was to learn and to practise music, it must be supposed that they understood it well; whether it were vocal or instrumental. The Lord had abundantly provided for their maintenance, and nothing could hinder them from being perfect in their art.

The kings also had their particular music. Asaph was chief master of music to king David. He was, as the Scripture says, a prophet at the king's hand. And Barzillai said to David, Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? Even in the temple, and in the ceremonies of religion, female musicians were admitted as well as male; they generally were daughters of the Levites. Heman had three daughters, who understood music. The ninth Psalm is addressed to Benaiah, chief of the band of young women who sang in the temple. Ezra in his enumeration of those whom he brought back with him from the captivity, reckons two hundred singing men and singing women. The Chaldee paraphrast on Ecclesiastes, ii. 8. where Solomon says he got singing-men and singing-women, understands it of singing women of the temple. In 1 Chron. xv. 20. the Hebrew says, that Zechariah, Aziel, and Shemiramoth, presided over the seventh band of music, which was that of the young women.

As to the nature of their music, we can judge of it only by conjecture, because it has been long lost. Probably, it was a mixture of several voices, of which all sung together in the same tune, each according to his strength and skill; without [musical counterpoint,] those different parts, and that combination of several voices and tunes, which constitute harmony in our concerts, or compounded music. Probably also, the voices were generally accompanied by instrumental music. But if we may draw any conclusions in favour of their music, from its effects, its magnificence, majesty, and the lofty sentiments contained in their songs; we must allow it great excellence. Every one knows, that David by his skill on the harp dispelled the melancholy vapours of king Saul. Also, Saul having sent messengers to apprehend David at Naioth in Ramah; the messengers no sooner heard the sound of the instruments of the prophets, who were there singing and playing, but they were immediately transported (as it were) by a divine enthusiasm, to engage in the service. Saul sent a second and a third company after them, who did the same. Lastly that prince came thither himself, was equally seized by the divine Spirit, and began to experience prophetic sensations even before he came to the place where the prophets were assembled. The prophet Elisha finding himself agitated, caused a minstrel to play before him to calm his spirits, into a temper fit to receive the divine Spirit.

The musical instruments of the Hebrews are, perhaps, what has been hitherto least understood, of any thing in Scripture. The Rabbins themselves know no more in this matter, than other commentators who are least acquainted with Jewish affairs. One cannot read without contempt, what is said by most of them, respecting certain terms, whose meaning is not ascertained, which occur in the titles to the Psalms; and which they take, at a venture, for instruments of music; such as neginoth, hane-chiloth, chiloth, nashemith, siggaion, gittith, halamoth, michtam, haialoth hashahar, shushanim, &c.

If we examine attentively, we shall find, that the Hebrews had by no means a great variety of musical instruments. We shall consider them under three classes: (1) Stringed instruments, (2) Wind instruments, or divers kinds of flutes. (3) Different kinds of drums.

Of stringed instruments, are the nabl, נבל, the psaltery, or psanneterim, פסנתרים, Dan. iii. 5. these three names apparently signify nearly, or altogether, the same thing. They considerably resembled the harp; the ancient cythara; or the hazur, עזר, or the ten stringed instrument: both were nearly of the figure Δ : but the nablum, or psaltery, was hollow toward the top, was played on (touched) toward the bottom: whereas, the cythara, or ten-stringed instrument, was played on on the upper part, and was hollow below: both were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the fingers.

The cinnor, כנור, or ancient lyre, had sometimes six, sometimes nine, strings. These strings were strung from top to bottom; and sounded by means of a hollow belly, over which they passed: these were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the finger.

The ancient symphony, was nearly the same as our viol. Comp. FRAG. No. CCCCLXXXV.

The sambuc, was a stringed instrument, which we guess was nearly the same as the modern psaltery.

We discover in Scripture divers sorts of trumpets, and flutes; of which it is difficult to ascertain the forms.

The most remarkable of this kind is the ancient organ, in Hebrew huggab, חגב, which, seemingly, was one of those kinds of flute composed of several pipes of unequal length and perforation, which gave a musical sound, when passed successively over the lips, and blown into while passing. [This is the ancient pipe of Pan; now common among us.]

Drums were of many kinds. The Hebrew taph, תוף, whence comes tympanum, is taken for all kinds of drums, or timbrels. The zalzelim (זלזלם, cymbal, or cystra) is commonly translated by the LXX. and the Vulgate, cymbala: now the cymbals were instruments of brass, of a very clattering sound, made in the form of a cap, or hat, and struck one against the other, while held one in each hand. Later interpreters by zalzelim understand the sistrum; an instrument anciently very common in Egypt. It was nearly of an oval figure, and crossed by brass wires, which being shaken jingled, while their ends were secured from falling out of the frame, by their heads being larger than the orifice which contained the wire.

M Y R

The Hebrew mentions an instrument called shalishim, שלשם, which the LXX. translate cymbala; but Jerom, sistra: it is found only 1 Sam. xviii. 6. the term shalishim, hints that it was of three sides (triangular) and it might be that ancient triangular instrument, which carrying on each side several rings, they were jingled by a stick; and gave a sharp rattling sound. The original also mentions mexilothaim, מצלותים, which were of brass, and of a sharp sound. This word is usually translated cymbala: some however render it tintinabula, little bells. Zechariah says, xiv. 20. the time shall come when on the mexilots of the horses, shall be written, "Holiness to the Lord!" this inclines to the supposition that this word signifies bells; since we know that anciently, bells were worn by horses trained for war, to accustom them to noise.

The bells which were placed at the bottom of the robe of the high-priest, are called פזמון, phaammun. LXX. Κώδων, tintinabulum. [See the PLATES, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, with their explanations, FRAG. Nos. CCXXXI. et seq.]

MYNDUS, Μύνδος, silent; from μῦδος. A maritime city of Caria, 1 Macc. xv. 23.

MYRA, a town of Lycia, where St. Paul embarked for Rome, on board a ship of Alexandria, Acts xxvii. 5.

MYRRH, MYRRHA, מור, Mur. Exod. xxx. 25. A gum yielded by a tree common in Arabia: which is about five cubits high: its wood hard, and its trunk thorny. Scripture notices two kinds (1) myrrha electa, literally, free myrrh: what runs of itself without incision; this is the best of all. Pliny speaking of the tree which yields myrrh, says, Sudant spontè priusquam incidantur, Stactem dictam, cui mella præfertur. This is the myrrh called also stacte. (2) The other kind of myrrh is simple and ordinary. It was employed in perfumes, and in embalming, to preserve the body from corruption. The Magi who came from the East to worship Jesus Christ, offered to him myrrh, Matth. ii. 11.

In the Gospel, Mark. xv. 23, is mentioned myrrh and wine; wine mingled with myrrh; offered to Jesus Christ, previous to his crucifixion, intended to deaden in him the anguish of his sufferings. It was a custom among the Hebrews to give such kind of stupifying liquors to persons who were about to be capitally punished, Prov. xxxvi. 6. Talmud, Tract. Sanhed. cap. 6. Some have thought that the myrrhed wine of St. Mark, is the same as the "wine mingled with gall," of St. Matthew: but others distinguish them. The myrrhed wine was given to our Lord, from a sentiment of sympathy, to prevent him from feeling too sensibly the pain of of his sufferings ; but the soldiers, from cruelty, gave him their potation, mingled with gall, of which Jesus would not drink. Or, perhaps, St. Matthew, writing in Syriac, used the word marra, which signifies either myrrh, bitterness, or gall. The Greek translator took it in the sense of gall, and St. Mark in the sense of myrrh. Wine mingled with myrrh was highly esteemed by the ancients : Pliny says, lib. xiv. cap. 13. Lantissima apud priscos vina erant, myrrhæ odore condita. The law of the twelve tables forbids the sprinkling of it on the dead : Ne murrhata potio mortuo inderetur.

MYRTLE. MYRTHUS, מֵרְחָס, Chadas; this expresses sometimes the shrub which bears the myrtle flowers, Zach. i. 8, 10, 11. also the flower itself; also the perfume, or essence, extracted from the flowers. Myrthetum is a place planted with myrtles. This shrub was common in Judæa. Esdras sends the people to procure in the country, myrtles, branches of olives, and palms, to make booths for the Feast of Tabernacles. Esdras viii. 15. [Comp. HOSANNA the great : also, FRAGMENTS, No. CCCLXIII.]

MYSIA, Μυσία, criminal, or abominable; from the Greek μύσος, crime. A province of Asia Minor, now called Æolia; having Bythinia north; the Troad south; Phrygia east; and the Hellespont west. St. Paul preached in this country, Acts xvi. 7, 8.

MYSTERY. Gr. Μυστήριον, mysterion, properly a secret; from mys, I shut, stoma, a mouth: i. e. a subject on which I shut my mouth; I decline to speak: or from the Heb. סָתַר satar, סִתְמָתָר mesatar, a thing concealed. Denudare amici mysteria, desperatio animæ, says Ecclesiasticus xxvii. 16. When a man has betrayed the secret of his friend, he is unworthy of credit. Ei, qui revelat mysteria, et ambulat fraudulenter,—ne commiscearis. Have no correspondence with him who betrays the secrets of his friends, and who walks deceitfully, Prov. xx. 19.

All Religions true or false have mysteries, i. e. certain things kept private, not to be divulged, or exposed indifferently to every body; but known only to the initiated. The Pagans had their mysteries, but they were mysteries of iniquity, shameful mysteries, concealed only because their exposure would have rendered their religion contemptible, ridiculous, and odious. If men of sense and honour had known what was practised in the mysteries of certain false deities, they would have abhorred them. Scripture often speaks of the infamous mysteries of Astarte, Adonis, Priapus, wherein a thousand infamous actions were practiced, and called religion. Baruch speaks of the prostitutions practised in honour of Venus at Babylon, chap.

vi. 42, 43. The whole religion of the Egyptians was mysterious. But these pretended mysteries, were invented subsequently, to conceal the folly and vanity of it. They could not vindicate, for example, the adoration paid to brutes, but by saying, that their gods had sometimes assumed these shapes. In the Maccabees mention is made of the mysteries of Bacchus, of the ivy imprinted on every one that was initiated therein, and of the garlands of ivy worn by those who assisted at these ceremonies, 1 Macc. vi. 7. 2 Macc. vi. 7. Asa king of Judah, would not suffer the queen his mother to continue to preside over the mysteries of Priapus. 1 Kings xv. 13. No doubt but they gave mysterious and secret reasons for the worship of Moloch, and for offering human sacrifices to him. It was perhaps a perverse imitation of Abraham's intended sacrifice of Isaac. The Phœnicians assigned a reason not unlike this, for their cruel sacrifices to Hercules and to Saturn. See Porphyry in Eusebius's Preparatio Evangelica.

[Taking the term mystery in another sense, for typical, or far predictive, we may say that],

The religion of the Jews was full of mysteries. The whole nation was a mystery, according to St. Austin. It represented the people of Christ, and the Christian religion. Whatever happened to them, whatever they practised, all that was commanded, or forbidden them, was figurative, according to St. Paul. Their sacrifices, their priesthood, their purifications, their abstinence from certain sorts of food, included mysteries which have been explained by Jesus Christ and his apostles. The passage over the Red Sea symbolized baptism. The brazen serpent prefigured the cross and death of Christ. Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael, denoted the two covenants. The tabernacle and its vessels hinted at the worship of God in the Christian church. The priesthood of Aaron has been admirably explained by St. Paul of the priesthood of Christ. Barnabas has unfolded the secrets contained in the prohibition of certain foods. Jesus Christ discovered the mystery of Jonah's being three days in the whale's belly: that of the manna which represented his body and blood: that of the union of Adam and Eve. The reprobation of the Jews, and the adoption of the Gentiles, were intimated in a hundred passages of Scripture; by Agar and Sarah, by Ishmael and Isaac, by Ephraim and Manasseh, by Saul and David, by Absalom and Solomon, and even by Moses and Aaron, who were not permitted to enter the Land of Promise.

The prophecies concerning the person, the coming, the character, the death and passion of the Messiah, appear in a multitude of places in in the Old Testament,—but figuratively and mysteriously. The actions, the words, the lives of the prophets, were a continual and general prophecy, concealed from the people, and sometimes from the prophets themselves, and not explained and discovered, till after the birth and death of Jesus Christ; and these mysteries were dispensed so wisely, that the first served as a foundation for the second, and the succeeding illustrated those that preceded. Daniel is much more explicit than the earlier prophets; Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, speak of the coming, of the death, and of the priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the calling of the Gentiles, more distinctly than the prophets before them.

The word mystery is also taken for secrets of a higher order, supernatural; for those the knowledge of which God has reserved to himself, or has sometimes communicated to his prophets and friends. Daniel gives to God the name of revealer of mysteries: he tells king Nebuchadnezzar, that only God who reigns in heaven, can reveal hidden mysteries, things to come.

Our Saviour says to his disciples, Matt. vi. 7. that they are peculiarly happy, because God has revealed to them the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. St. Paul often speaks of the mystery of the gospel, of the mystery of the cross of Christ, of the mystery of Christ which was unknown to former ages, of the mystery of the resurrection, &c. Mystic Babylon, the great harlot, had written on her forehead, MYSTERY, to shew that she represented not any particular woman, but a corrupted and idolatrous people.

The mysteries of the Christian religion, as the incarnation of the Word, his hypostatical union with his human nature, his miraculous birth, death, resurrection, ascension, his grace, and the manner of its operation in our hearts, the resurrection of the dead, &c. are objects of faith to all true Christians.

These then were called mysteries, the doctrine of the gospel, the tenets of Christianity, and the Christian sacraments: not only because they included secrets which had not been known, if the Son of God and his Holy Spirit had not revealed them; but also, because they were not opened indifferently to every body; according to the advice of Jesus Christ to his apostles, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine." Preachers in their sermons, and ecclesiastical writers in their books, did not fully express themselves on all the mysteries. They said enough to be understood by the faithful; while to the Pagans they were secrets—privacies. This precaution continued long in the church.

The Greek word mystery is expressed by the Latin word sacramentum: denoting the sacraments and mysteries of the Christian church. God has made known unto us the mystery of his will; his incarnation, his coming, his gospel.

ADDITION.

The word mystery has been so repeatedly canvassed, and the import of it, apparently, so often perverted, that it demands a few additional remarks.

I never hear the word mystery, without thinking of the old English term MAISTERIES, E. gr.—the maisterie of the Merchant Taylors,—the maisterie of the Cordonniers (Cordwainers) and of other arts, and trades. In fact, the term is still currently used in the city of London, "the art and mystery of"—occurs in the indentures of apprenticeship, used in most branches of business: meaning, that which may be a difficulty, or even an impossibility, to a stranger, to a novice—to a person only beginning to consider the subject—but which is perfectly easy, and intelligible to a master of the business; whose practice, and whose understanding, have been long cultivated, by habit and application.

Or, mystery, may be defined a SECRET: and a secret, will always remain such, to those who use no endeavours to discover it:—we often hear it said, such a person holds such a mode of accomplishing such a business a secret. Now, imagine one who wishes to know this secret; he labours, strives, &c. but, unless he proceed in the right mode, the object still continues concealed: suppose the possessor of this secret shews him the process, teaches him, gives him information, &c. then that secret (mystery) is no longer mysterious to him; but he enjoys the discovery, and profits accordingly: while others not so favored, are as much in the dark respecting this peculiar process, as he was.

Secrets may be considered as various: some are known to a few, but are unknown to the many; some are kept closely a long time, but are revealed in proper season; some are kept entirely, totally, and never are revealed; some are of a nature not to be investigated by us; and some, so far surpass our powers, that, however familiar their effects may be to our observation, yet their principles, causes, progresses, and distributions, exceedingly perplex our understanding, and confine us to probabilities, inference, and conjecture. We might instance this in Electricity, Galvanism, ~~Magnetism~~, Attraction or Gravitation, &c.

I entreat that this familiar illustration of the word mystery, may not be despised because of its familiarity;—as, I incline to think, that it is not not far from a scriptural acceptation of the term. Let us see its effect when applied to scripture examples, 1 Tim. iii. 16. "Great is the mystery—secret—of godliness."—i. e. a thing not to be comprehended at first sight; nor until after many reflections, and much consideration.

Rom. xi. 25. "I would not have you ignorant of this mystery—secret—that blindness in part hath happened to Israel;"—strange indeed! if mystery denoted something utterly incomprehensible and inexplicable, that the apostle should wish them not to be ignorant of it! that he should instantly open to them this mystery!—To the Jews, indeed, it was still a secret; and they did not believe the fact, that they laboured under any blindness at all:—while to the apostle, and among his fellow Christians, the mystery was clear, and well understood.

1 Cor. xv. 16. "Behold, I shew you a mystery—we shall not all sleep"—change the phraseology: "behold, I tell you a secret, we shall not all sleep"—could the apostle mean to shew them a thing utterly incomprehensible?

1 Cor. xiii. 2. The apostle speaks of a man's understanding all mysteries—i. e. they were easy to him, though not so to others. In 1 Cor. xiv. 2. he alludes to a man, who discoursing in a language foreign to his auditors, may in the Spirit speak mysteries: he may tell all manner of secrets, in a foreign language; but, while he himself understands perfectly well his own meaning, and what he says, yet his subjects of discourse, with all his explanations of those subjects, will continue secrets to such as are ignorant of the language he uses.

"We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery," says the apostle, 1 Cor. ii. 6. i. e. the wisdom hitherto kept secret: but now the secret is explained—is opened—is let out;—not indeed, to the princes of the world; to them it is as much a secret as ever; but God by his Spirit hath given us information respecting it, and by that we know and understand it.

"Stewards of the mysteries of God"—i. e. persons intrusted with some of the secrets of God—for the benefit of his church, 1 Cor. iv. 1.

So the calling of the Gentiles separately from the Jews, was a mystery—a secret—which no Jew would have thought of, or would have believed, had not God opened, and explained, and enforced it, by his Spirit, &c. Eph. iii. 3—6. nor would any Gentile: it would have remained unknown, unsuspected.

MYSTERY signifies also an allegory, i. e. a mode of information under which partial instruction is given, a partial discovery is made, but there is still a cover of some kind, which preserves somewhat of secrecy:—this, the person who desires to know the secret thoroughly, must endeavour to remove. So, the mystery of the seven stars, Rev. i. 20, is, an allegory representing the seven Asiatic churches under the figure, or symbol, of seven burning lamps. So the mystery, Babylon the Great—is an allegorical representation of a spiritual Babylon, spiritual idolatry, spiritual fornication, &c. and to this agrees the expression afterwards, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman;"—i. e. I will explain to thee the allegory of this figure, Rev. xvii. 5, 7.

VOL. II PART XX. Edit. IV.

I apprehend that, originally, the Fathers understood the word in this sense; so, the mystery of the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood,—is the figurative representation of the Lord's body. But the mysteries among the heathen, in time perverted this, and the true idea of the word mystery, into sentiments not merely unscriptural, but unwarrantable, and unwise. [It may be proper here to state that the heathen mysteries continued to be performed with great pomp, during the second and third centuries of Christianity; and were not wholly suppressed, till the Emperor Theodosius closed the temples; more than a hundred years later.]

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied, that there are mysteries in the highest sense of the word, in Nature, Providence, and Grace. The union of the human soul and body, is a profound secret: the origin of life, is a profound secret:—the cause, manner, &c. of thought, is a deep secret. So are many dispensations of Providence: why goodness should suffer, and evil prosper, is a secret: and, why one is called and another left, is a secret of secrets, a mystery of Grace!

If the ways and works of God are mysteries, we may justly expect to find his attributes, his essence, his perfections, his nature, inscrutable mysteries to us, poor worms of mankind! Could we suppose,—pardon the supposition; that God were inclined to instruct us in this, it would be (as we are constituted, at present) teaching us a maisterie, which we have no faculties capable of learning; it would be speaking to us, in a language of which we could never comprehend a word; it would be overwhelming us with too mighty, too extensive, too profound, too exalted discoveries, unless we were previously endued with the attributes and qualities of the divine nature: with immensity, infinity, ubiquity, omniscience, eternity, in short, with DEITY!

Now, since none denies the existence of God, because he cannot comprehend his nature and essence, which is a mystery; so none ought to deny exertions of his power, goodness, wisdom, &c. because they imply the exercise of what is secret to mankind in general: and this principle, which is undeniable in nature, ought to be equally undeniable in religion.—In short, what relates to God may, rather must, always include much of mystery. Even the most direct and profound intercourse between the human powers, and their ineffable Creator, mental emotions, prayer and praise, may be secrets, i. e. mysterious services, but not therefore less devout, or less acceptable.]

MYSTICAL. The mystical sense of Scripture is that which is gathered from the terms or letter of various passages, beyond their literal signification. For example, Babylon signifies literally a city of Chaldæa, the habitation of kings who persecuted the Hebrews, and who were overwhelmed in idolatry and wickedness. But St. John in the Revelations gives the name of Babylon mystically to the city of Rome. So Jerusalem is literally, a city of Judæa; but mystically, the heavenly Jerusalem; the habitation of the saints, &c. The serpent is, literally, naturally, a venomous reptile; but mystically, is the devil, the old serpent, &c. &c.

girl, a captive, who said, there was a prophet in Israel, who could cure any disorder. This being reported to Naaman, he solicited Ben-hadad's leave to go to Samaria to the prophet Elisha. The king wrote to Jehoram, king of Israel, that he should cure Naaman, who exclaimed in astonishment, "Am I a god, that I can kill and make alive;" 2 Kings v. 1, 2, &c.

But Elisha sent word to Jehoram; "Let this man come to me; and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel." Naaman came therefore with his chariot and horses, and stopped at the door of Elisha's house; whether out of respect to the prophet, or, that having the leprosy he was impure. Elisha, by a messenger bid him wash himself seven times in the Jordan. Naaman being indignant at this apparently disrespectful mode of cure, and at the prophet's reserve and stiffness, was turning away in great wrath, when his servants said to him; "Had the prophet enjoined you some hard thing, you would readily have obeyed him; how much rather should you comply, when he only bids you wash and be clean?" Naaman was persuaded, went to the Jordan, washed seven times and was perfectly cured.

He returned to the man of God, and acknowledged, "Now I know certainly that there is no God but the Lord. I intreat you to receive a present at my hand." But Elisha declined it. Naaman seeing that he could not prevail with him, said, I beseech you then to permit me to carry home with me, two mules lading of the earth of this country; for from henceforward I shall shall offer sacrifice to no God, but to the God of Israel. Elisha readily permitted him; seeing it was his regard for the Lord, which made him think that he could not offer any sacrifices agreeable to God, but upon earth that was holy, and which had formed part of the land of Israel. This piece of devotion is ancient among the Jews, and even among Christians. Benjamin of Tudela says, that the Jews of Nahardea, in Persia, built their synagogue with earth and stones, fetched purposely from Jerusalem. We are assured that the empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, procured a great quantity of earth from Jerusalem, which she placed in the church of the Holy Cross, at Rome, therefore surnamed in Jerusalem. St. Austin, and Gregory of Tours, afford other examples. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CIII.

[Mr. HARMER, from Chardin's MS. hints at the same motive, Vol. II. p. 491. A friend has communicated another idea. Vide 2 Kings v. 17.

"It is plain that his intention was to build an altar with this earth, to the God of Israel. By this request he expressed a desire to build an altar in Syria formed of that holy ground, as he conceived it, to which God had assigned the blessing of his peculiar presence, that he might daily testify his gratitude for the great mercy which he had received, that he might declare openly his renunciation of idolatry, and that he might keep a sort of communication, by similitude of worship, with the people who inhabited the land where Elisha dwelt who had so miraculously cured him." A. H. This is perfectly consistent with the precept, Exod. xx. 24. an altar of earth shalt thou make unto me: and it is very credible that the temporary altars were usually of earth: especially on the high places. To such an altar, apparently, Elijah, after repairing it, added twelve stones in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, 1 Kings xviii. 31.]

To return to Naaman; speaking to Elisha he added: "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon: when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." And he said unto him, "go in peace." This passage has given rise to many scruples. The greater part of commentators think, that Naaman only asks leave from Elisha to continue those external services to his master Ben-hadad, which he had been used to render him, when he entered the temple of Rimmon; but not to adore Rimmon: and that Elisha suffered him to accompany the king into the temple, provided he paid no worship to the idol.

Others, in great numbers, translate the Hebrew by the time past; "in this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master went into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaned on my hand, and I bowed myself in the house of Rimmon: when I bowed down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." And he said unto him, "go in peace." Naaman mentions only his past sin, and asks pardon for it; and he chiefly insists on this, in conformity to his declaration, that henceforth he would only worship the God of Israel. [Much more must have passed between Elisha and Naaman than is narrated. Who told Naaman that an altar of earth, rather than of costly materials, would be acceptable to the God of Israel. Certainly he learned this of the prophet. He professes to offer sacrifice only to the God of Israel: this was, most probably, not public, still less pompous solemnity. The leprosy of Naaman certainly disqualified him from entering into the temple of Rimmon, even supposing that other than the priests possessed that privilege: nor would the king lean on the hand of a leprous man. It is possible, that he might plead an apprehension of the return of his leprosy,—a disorder always considered as inflicted by the Deity—unless he continued to worship that Deity which had cured him.]

Naaman was returning to his own country very joyful, but had hardly gone fifty yards, when, Gehazi vexed that Elisha his master took nothing from Naaman, runs after him to ask a favour, and in his master's name by a lie, begged a talent, and two changes of raiment. The talent (of silver) is worth of our money about £342. Naaman constrained him to receive double. See GEHAZI. The leprosy of Naaman was inflicted as a punishment on Gehazi. Scripture makes no further mention of Naaman.

NAAMATHITE, נַעֲמָתִי, beauty, or motion of death; from נָעַם naham, beauty, or נָוַח nuah, to move, and מוֹת muth, death. Job xi. 1.

NAARAI, נַעֲרֵי, Napai, my young children, or my watchers, or my spillers; from nakar, or hara, or hur, and the pronoun 'i, my; a valiant man of David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 37.

NAARAN, נַעֲרָן, Vul. Noran, young child; from נָעַר nohar: otherwise, that awakes; from נָחַר hur. A city of Ephraim, 1 Chron. vii. 28.

NAARATH, נַעֲרָת, נַעֲרָת, Noapd, youth, or child [female]; from נָעַר nakar: otherwise, to spill; from נָחַר harah: otherwise, that watches; from נָחַר hur.

[The Arabic root, as well as the Hebrew, is thought to import wandering, and that this city was built by exiles from a foreign country: see

Phygela, a city of Pannonia, derived its name from the fugitives who built it. Vide Pliny, lib. v. cap. 29. I rather think exiles would consider their settlement in a city as the end of their wanderings. Perhaps the ways about it were winding; or its streets were intricate: but Hiller derives the name from a root importing greenness: q. Green-town. Possibly, the town on the green, or verdant spot of ground.]

NAARATH, a city of Ephraim, Josh. xvi. 7. Eusebius places Naarath about five miles from Jericho. This is probably the same as Neara, mentioned by Josephus, and from whence, he says, they brought the water which watered the palm trees of Jericho. Perhaps this also may be the Naaran above.

NAASHON, נֶאֱשֹׁן, that foretels, that conjectures: or serpent; from נֶאֱשֶׁשׁ nichesh: otherwise, their auguries; from the same, and יָאן, their. Son of Aminadab, Exod. vi. 23.

NABAL, נָבֵל, fool, or senseless. Compare Abigail's allusion, 1 Sam. xxv. 23.

NABAL, a very rich but very churlish man, of but little understanding, of the tribe of Judah, and the race of Caleb, whose ordinary dwelling was probably at Maon, one of the most southern cities of Judah, and who had a very numerous flock on Mount Carmel, not far from Maon. This Carmel is very different from the Mount Carmel, on the coast of the Mediterranean, between Dora and Ptolemais. While David, fearing Saul, was obliged to hide in the wilderness of Paran, and near to Carmel, he took care that none of his followers should injure Nabal, but rather should assist his shepherds and herdsmen. Being therefore informed that Nabal was come thither to shear his sheep, he sent ten young men of his company, to make his compliments to him, and to ask him civilly for something to refresh himself and followers. But Nabal answered them, "Who is David, and who is the son of Jesse? We are pestered every day with servants that run away from their masters. Shall I take the flesh of my sheep, and the provisions I have brought for my own servants, and shall I give them to strangers?" David in anger caused four hundred of his people to arm themselves, and went with them, resolved to put Nabal and all his family to the sword. But in the interim one of Nabal's servants acquainted his wife Abigail with what had passed: she was a wise and prudent woman, and having justified David's people, she presently prepared provisions and refreshments, with which she met and appeased David.

Abigail returning to Nabal, found him in his house feasting as if he were a prince. His heart swelled with joy, and he was quite drunk.

She said nothing to him till morning; but after he had slept, she told him of the danger he had been in. Her account had such effect on him, that he became as immovable as a stone, and he died in ten days. 1 Sam. xxv. 25, &c.

NABATHEANS, נַבְתָּאִיִּם, that prophesy, that speak, or bring forth fruit. See NEBAJOTH.

NABATHEANS, or NABATHENIANS, Arabians descended from Nebajoth. Their country is called Nabathæa, and extends from the Euphrates to the Red-Sea. Not that the Nabatheans are the only inhabitants of this vast tract of land, but the principal. Their chief cities are, Petra, the capital of Arabia Deserta, Medaba, and some others. The wandering manner of life they lead, with their wives, children and cattle, and the liberty they enjoy, without being accountable to any body, appear to them to be the greatest blessings of life. Their chief substance consists in cattle. Isaiah promises Jerusalem, that the fat rams of Kedar and Nebajoth should be brought into the temple of the Lord, and offered on his altar.

The Nabatheans are hardly known in Scripture, but since the time of the Maccabees. During the wars of the Jews against the Syrians, and while almost all other nations about them were inimical to the Hebrews, the Nabatheans alone shewed them friendship. Judas Maccabæus going to the assistance of his brethren in the country of Gilead, was very well received by the Nabathites. Some time after Jonathan Maccabæus sent his brother John to the Nabatheans, to conduct and deposit with them the heavy baggage of his army; but the inhabitants of Medaba, or Nadabatha, took John as he went, slew him, and seized his carriages. Diodorus Siculus places among the Nabatheans the lake Asphaltites, the palm-trees and gardens of balm that are near there, and the city Petra. Their country extended northward as far as Libanus. Dionysius the geographer places the Nabatheates at the foot of Libanus. Josephus says that Jonathan Maccabæus being in the country of Emath, and having driven his enemies beyond the river Eleutherus, he penetrated into Arabia, beat the Nabatheans, and came to Damascus. Epiphanius says, that the Ebionites came chiefly from the country of the Nabatheans, and from Paneas.

NABLUM, Heb. נָבֵל Nebel. Vide MUSIC.

NABONASSAR, king of Babylon, the same as Baladan, Berodach, or Merodach-baladan, Isaiah xxxix. 1. 2 Kings xx. 12. also called Belesis, or Belessus, in Agathias and Alexander Polyhistor. He is more known by the name of Nabonassar, given him by Hipparchus, Ptolemy, and and Censorinus. He reigned fourteen years at Babylon, from A. M. 3257, to 3272, and had Nabius for his successor. The Epocha, or Æra of Nabonassar, so famous among chronologers, falls on A. M. 3967 of the Julian period; 3257 from the creation; 747 years before A. D. See BALADAN.

NABONADIUS, or NABONIDES, called Laby-netus by Herodotus, Nabannidoch by Abydenus, and Belshazzar by Daniel. He succeeded Laborosoarchod, who is probably the same as Evilmerodach, king of Babylon, A. M. 3449, ante A. D. 555. He reigned seventeen years according to Berosus, and to the canon of Ptolemy. Under him Babylon was taken by Cyrus, A. M. 3466, ante A. D. 538. Vide BELSHAZZAR and NERIGLISSOR.

NABOPOLASSAR. See NERUCHADNEZZAR II.

NABOTH, נָבוֹת. See NEBAJOTH.

NABOTH, an Israelite of Jezreel, who lived under Ahab king of Israel, and had a vineyard in Jezreel, near the king's palace. That prince required him, either to sell him his vineyard, in order to make a kitchen garden of it, or to exchange it for a better. But Naboth declined the offer. Ahab returning home, threw himself on his bed, and refused to eat. Jezebel his wife took on herself to procure this vineyard; she writ letters in Ahab's name, sealed them with the king's seal, and sent them to the elders of Jezreel, directing them to publish a fast, to make Naboth sit among the chief of the people, to suborn against him two sons of Belial, or false witnesses, who might depose, that Naboth had blasphemed God and the king. (The text has it, that Naboth hath blessed God and the king; but it is agreed, that to bless is here put for to curse, as in several other passages. See Job i. 5. ii. 9. The holy text, out of respect, avoids even to mention the word curse, when applied to God.) [query, "blessed the gods, even Moloch"?] Accordingly, Naboth was condemned and stoned for the supposed crime. 1 Kings xxi.

Jezebel immediately went to the king, and wished him joy of Naboth's vineyard. Ahab instantly departed from Samaria, to Jezreel to take possession of Naboth's estate. But the Lord commanded the prophet Elijah to threaten him and Jezebel with the most ignominious death, and treatment after death. See AHAB, JEZEBEL, and 2 Kings ix. 10.

NACHON, נָכֹן, prepared; from נָכַן cun: otherwise, certain, solid; from נָכַן cen.

NACHON. We read of the floor of Nachon, 2 Samuel vi. 6. So that Nachon must be the name of a man, who is known by no other passage of Scripture. When the oxen which brought the ark arrived at his threshing-floor, they stumbled; which put the ark in danger of being overturned.—Others translate the Hebrew by the prepared floor, i. e. the floor of Obed-edom, which was near, prepared to receive the ark. 1 Chronicles, xiii. 9. reads the floor of Chidon, instead of the floor of Nachon. The Chaldee has only in the place prepared. This place, wherever it might be, was either in Jerusalem, or very near Jerusalem, and near the house of Obed-edom, in that city.

[The question is, whether either of these names appertained to a person, the proprietor of this place, or whether both relate to the same unfortunate event, the death of Uzza, of which it was the scene? It might be thought that one name derived from the accident was sufficient; yet it is not unlikely that King David might adopt one name, and another also might be current among the people. Under this idea some have rendered Chidon "the great misfortune," the calamity; and Nachon, "the severe stroke," the fatal blow.]

NADAB, נָדָב, free and voluntary gift; from נָדַב nadab: otherwise, prince; from נָדִיב nadib.

I. NADAB, son of Aaron, and brother of Abihu. He offered incense to the Lord with strange, i. e. common, fire; not with that which had been miraculously lighted on the altar of burnt-offerings. Therefore he was slain by the Lord, together with his brother. Lev. x. 2. It is surmised, that these two brothers were surprized by wine. Vide ABIHU.

II. NADAB, son of Jeroboam I. king of Israel. He succeeded his father, A. M. 5050, ante A. D. 954. He reigned but two years, being assassinated while besieging Gibbethon, by Baasha son of Abijah, of the tribe of Issachar, who usurped his kingdom. Scripture says Nadab did evil in the sight of the Lord. 1 Kings xv. 25.

III. NADAB, son of Shammai, and father of Seled and Appaim, 1 Chron. ii. 30.

NAGGE, נָגַעַי, brightness: from נָגַח nagah. Father of Esli, Luke iii. 25.

NAHALAL, נָהָלַל, נָהַל, he that is praised, or that glitters; from נָהַל killul: or, that becomes strong; from נָהַל halal.

NAHALAL, or NAALOL, or NACHALAL, a city of Zebulon, Josh. xix. 15. yielded to the Levites, and given to the family of Merari, Josh. xxi. 35. The children of Zebulon did not make themselves complete masters of it, but permitted the Canaanites to dwell in it, Judg. i. 30. Its situation is not exactly known.

NAHALIEL, נָהָלִיֵּל, Nabavaiḏ, brook, vale, torrent, or inheritance of God, or God is my brook; from נָהַל nahal, brook, and הָאֵל el, God.

[Perhaps

[Perhaps this was a copious torrent, as extraordinary things are said to be of God, rather than distinguished by any appearance of the divine presence, or in any other manner related to Deity. This is the opinion of Ziegler, Descript. Palæst.

But this name may be derived from a combination signifying the valley of the oaks; as alim imports oaks, Isaiah lvii. 3, 5. Comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19. xxi. 10. That many oaks should grow in the desert, is very unlikely; if one grew there the singularity might distinguish the valley. But in the desert there might be much game of the horned kind (ail); and this derivation I should prefer, if it could be established; q. "Buck-valley."]

NAHALIEL, an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness. From Mattanah they went to Nahaliel, and thence to Bamoth, Numb. xxi. 19. Eusebius says, that Nahaliel is on the Arnon, and that Mattanah is beyond the Arnon towards the east, twelve miles from Medaba.

[NAHALLAL, praise, or light; or brook.

A city of the Levites in Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15. xxi. 35. written Nahalol, Judges i. 30.

The Arabic root imports a place well watered; but Simon thinks it denotes frequent leadings of flocks: the pastures to which flocks are frequently led: as the root is applied to flocks, Psalm xxiii. 2.]

NAHAM, נַחַם, Nasûm, consolation, or repentance; from נָחַם nacham: otherwise, who guides them; from נָחַח nachah, to guide: or their rest; from נָחַח nuach, to rest, and the pronoun נָ am, them, or their. 1 Chron. iv. 19.

NAHAMANI, נַחֲמָנִי, Nahmani, comforter, or that comforts me, or that spreads; from נָחַם nacham. Returned with Zerubbabel, Neh. vii. 7.

NAHARAI, נַחֲרַי, 'Apai, my nostrils, my nose: otherwise, hoarse, dry, hot, angry; from נָחַר charar: according to the Syriac, choaked. A native of Beeroth, a man of great valour, and armour-bearer to Joab, 2 Sam. xxiii. 37.

NAHASH, נָחָשׁ, snake, or serpent, or that foretels; or brass: from נָחַשׁ nichesh.

[Whether this name were derived from the place where this city stood being frequented by serpents, or from a person of the name of Nahash, has been questioned. Probably, Nachash was adopted as a name of good omen; and not infrequently intended the Agathodemon, or benevolent genius. Serpents are praised for courage, prudence, vigilance, rapidity, and length of life. They are adopted as symbols of heat, by Pier. Valer. lib. xiv. The ancients often expressed wisdom by the serpent, as Alciat has observed, and this observation is confirmed by Lande, Numis. Select. p. 148. Kircher says that the emblem of fecundity among the Egyptians was a serpent. Obelisco Pamphyl. lib. v. Large serpents, or dragons, were also symbols of felicity and of health among the same people; also among the Greeks and Romans, as observed by Spanheim, de Præst. et Usu Numism. Dis. iii. They were sacred to heroes, as we learn from Plutarch, in the life of Cleomenes. Comp. Wilde, Num. Select. tab. xv. and Vaillant, de Num. Ær. Imperat. in Colon. p. 242. The dragon and the basilisk are considered as denoting great men by Artemidorus, Oneirocrit. lib. iv. cap. 58. On the same principles many proper names are derived from serpents. Al-nachas is the name of an astrologer in Abulpharagius: Osman, i. e. serpent, is a common name among the Mahometans: Thermutis, an Egyptian name, denoted an asp, as Ælian informs us, Hist. Animal. lib. iii. cap. 33. Draco and Basiliscus are Greek and Roman appellations. So the old German Hotterus and Otterus, i. e. adder; as Schottelius explains it.]

I. NAHASH, or NAAS, king of the Ammonites. He attacked Jabesh-Gilead a month after the election of Saul as king of Israel. The Hebrews of Jabesh finding themselves not strong enough to resist Nahash, offered to capitulate. Nahash proposed to pull out every one's right eye, and to make it a reproach on Israel. The elders of Jabesh desired a truce of seven days, and sent to Gibeah, where Saul resided, messengers who declared their distress. Saul happening to return just then out of the fields, seeing the people weep, inquired the reason. On being acquainted with it, and moved by the Spirit of God, he cut two of his oxen in pieces, and sent them express throughout Israel; proclaiming, that so should the cattle of all those be treated, who did not instantly follow Saul and Samuel.

The people struck with consternation, appeared at the place appointed: Saul sent back the messengers to Jabesh-Gilead, and bid them expect relief on the morrow. That evening, Saul took his army over Jordan; and marching all night, by break of day attacked the camp of the Ammonites; (this might be about the fourth day of the cessation granted to Jabesh) with so much fury, that he intirely routed them. Thus was this war finished at once; and Josephus says, Nahash was killed in the battle. 1 Sam. xi.

II. NAHASH, king of the Ammonites, and a friend to David; probably son to the above. We know nothing of the circumstances of his life, nor on what occasion a friendship commenced between him and David. It is likely however, that this might happen during Saul's persecution of David, when he was forced to abscond on the other side Jordan. Probably, Shobi, Shobi, son of Nahash, of Rabbah the capital of the Ammonites, is a son of the same Nahash, 2 Sam. xvii. 27. xxii. For the imprudence of his son Hanun, see HANUN.

III. NAHASH, father of Abigail and Zeruiah; is thought to be the same as Jesse, father of David. Compare 2 Sam. xvii. 25. and 1 Chron. ii. 13, 15, 16. This perhaps might be the surname of Jesse, the father of David. Others think that Nahash is the name of Jesse's wife; but the first explication seems to be the best.

IV. NAHASH, father of Shobi, friend of David, 2 Sam. xvii. 27. Probably the same as Nahash II. above.

V. NAHASH, or Ir-Nahash, a city of Judah, peopled by the descendants of Tehinnah.

NAHATH, נחַת, Naḥath, rest; from נחַ nuach: otherwise, guide; from נחַח nachah, to conduct: descent, according to the Syriac.

NAHATH, son of Reuel, and grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 13.

NAHBI, נחבי, my well-beloved; from נחב chabah, well-beloved, and י i, my: otherwise, my guide, or my rest; from נחַ nuach, to rest, or from נחַח nachah, to guide, the conjunction ב with, and י my. Son of Vophsi, one of the spies sent by Moses, Numb. xiii. 14.

NAHLAT, the name of the wife of Ham, son of Noah, according to the Orientals.

NAHOR, נחור, hoarse, dry, hot, angry; from נחר charar: or choaked, from the Syriac.

I. NAHOR, or NACHOR, son of Serug, born A. M. 1849, ante A. D. 2155. He died aged one hundred and forty-eight years; his son was Terah, the father of Abraham, whom he begat at the age of twenty-nine years, Gen. xi. 22, 24.

II. NAHOR, son of Terah, and brother of Abraham, Gen. xi. 26. The year of his birth is not exactly known, nor that of his death. Nahor married Milcah, daughter of Haran, by whom he had several sons, Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Kesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel. Nahor fixed his habitation at Haran, which is therefore called the city of Nahor, Gen. xxiv. 10.

NAHASSON, or NASHON, son of Aminadab; head of the tribe of Judah, at the Exodus: the first chief who made his offering to the tabernacle of the Lord, in the second year from their leaving Egypt. He offered a bason, weighing one hundred and thirty shekels of silver, a plate weighing seventy shekels, and a cup of ten shekels of silver. He offered also a bull, a ram, and a lamb, for burnt offerings; a goat for a sin-offering; two bulls, five sheep, five kids, and five lambs, for a peace-offering. Numb. vii. 12, 13.

NAHUM, נחֻם, Nasûm, comforter, penitent, or their guide. See NAHAM.

NAHUM, the seventh of the twelve minor prophets, native of Elkoshai, a little village of Galilee, whose ruins were in being in the time of Jerom. However, some think Elkoshai is rather the name of his father, and that the place of his birth was Begabor, or Bethabara, beyond Jordan. Heretofore they used to shew the tomb of this prophet at a village called Bethogabre, now called Giblin, near Emmaus. The Chaldee calls him Nahum of Beth-koshi, or Beth-ketzi: but the situation of this place is quite as obscure as that of El-koshai. The circumstances of Nahum's life are unknown. His prophecy consists of three chapters, which form one discourse, wherein he foretells the destruction of Nineveh. He describes it in so lively and pathetic a manner, that he seems to have been on the very spot.

Opinions are divided as to the time in which he prophesied. Josephus says, he foretold the fall of Nineveh one hundred and fifteen years before it happened, which brings the time of Nahum under king Ahaz. The Jews say, that he prophesied under Manasseh. Clemens Alexandrinus puts him between Daniel and Ezekiel, and consequently, during the captivity. But we incline to Jerom's opinion, that he foretold the destruction of Nineveh in the time of Hezekiah, and after the war of Sennacherib in Egypt, mentioned by Berosus. Nahum speaks plainly of the taking of No-ammon, a city of Egypt, of the haughtiness of Rabshakeh, of the defeat of Sennacherib; and he speaks of them as things that were passed. He supposes that Judah was still in their own country, and that they there celebrated their festivals. He notices also, the captivity, and dispersion of the ten tribes. All these marks convince us, that Nahum cannot be placed before the fifteenth year of Hezekiah, since the expedition of Sennacherib against that prince was in his fourteenth year.

And, as the taking of Nineveh foretold by him, cannot be the first siege of that place, under Sardanapalus, long before (A. M. 3257); it must be necessarily understood of the second siege of that city, by Nabopolassar and Astyages, A. M. 3378, ante A. D. 626, which comes to the sixteenth year of king Josiah, under whom Jerom places the destruction of Nineveh. Tobit says, that this city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar and Ahasuerus, giving the name of Nebuchadnezzar to Nabopolassar; and to Astyages that of Ahasuerus.

This prophet gives a fine description of the destruction of Nineveh. He says that this city should be ruined by a deluge of waters, which should overflow it, and demolish its walls. Diodorus Siculus and Athenæus relate, that during during the time this city was besieged by Belshazzar, and by Arbaces, under Sardanapalus, the river Tigris swelled in such a manner, that it overthrew twenty furlongs of the walls of Nineveh. The same thing might happen at the second and last siege under Nebuchadnezzar and Astyages. Probably the besiegers directed the course of the waters, to the same effect as before. See NINEVEH.

The time of Nahum's death is not known. The Greek Meneologies, and the Latin Martyrologies, place his festival December 1. Petrus Natalis however places it December 24, which he says was the day of his death; without acquainting us how he learned that circumstance.

[NAIL. Few things are more perplexing to distant strangers than those which are of daily occurrence in their own country: their very familiarity renders them beneath the notice of observers, where they are practised, who therefore seldom report them; but where they are not practised, simple as they are in themselves, they occasion much perplexity, to those who wish to understand what they read.

Our translation renders by one word, nail, what the Hebrew employs two words to denote; and this difference should mean two distinct kinds of things.

1. The nail of Jael's tent with which she killed Sisera, is called נַיִל, itad; it was formed for penetrating earth, or other hard substance, when driven by sufficient force; as with a hammer, &c. it includes the idea of strength. I suppose too, the idea is that of strength, Isaiah, xxii. 23. "I will fasten him as a nail (itad) in a sure place," i. e. he shall be strong enough to support whatever is suspended on him.

This illustrates an allusion of the prophet Zechariah, x. 4. "The Lord hath made (Judah) his flock of sheep, &c. which are naturally timid, as martial as a horse trained to battle; yea, out of Judah shall come the chief for the corner, (Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XII.) a hero; out of Judah shall come the strong nail, or pike-head, (itad) which shall effect whatever is requisite, by force or strength; out of him shall come the battle-bow, with powers augmented by additional vigour (vide CCXXI. CCCCLXXIII.) out of him shall come the general regulator, (the commander in chief, perhaps,) at once:" meaning, most probably, different ranks of men, (the lower class, the nail, humble but strong; a superior class, the battle-bow) which, combined in their proper stations, should compose a formidable army. Observe, too, these shall come at once, without much disciplining; without that experience in former wars, which is usually necessary to form the complete military character.

I add Chardin's account of the manner of fastening nails in the East: "They do not drive with a hammer the nails that are put into the eastern walls; the walls are too hard, being of brick; or if they are of clay, they are too mouldering; but they fix them in the brick-work as they are building. They are large nails, with square heads like dice, well made, the ends bent so as to make them cramp irons. They commonly place them at the windows and doors, in order to hang upon them, when they like, veils and curtains." HARMER, Vol. I. p. 191.

2. But we have another word for nails, which, I presume, implies ornament rather than strength; or, somewhat of dignified stability. So we read 2 Chron. iii. 9. "the weight of the nails, מַסְמְרוֹת, mesemeruth, was fifty shekels of gold." These nails then, being of gold, were used to adorn the holy place, no less than to strengthen any part of it. We have the same word though varied, 1 Chron. xxii. 3. David prepared iron in abundance for the nails (מַסְמְרִים, mesemerim) designed to ornament, no doubt, the leaves of the doors of the sanctuary entrance:—for, had the intention been only to fasten these doors, what need of so great a quantity? [STUDS.]

Observe, how Ezra employs his simile, chap. ix. 8. "the Lord leaves us a remnant to escape, to give us a nail, not an ornamental nail, not a golden stud, but, an itad, a nail of support, in his holy place:"—can any thing be less arrogant, &c. than assimilation to such a nail?

But the idea Eccl. xii. 11. seems to be the reverse of this: "the words (sayings) of the wise are as goads—sharp, piercing, penetrating, stimulating, when taken each one by itself, but, when combined, they are like ornamental nails (mesemeruth) planted [this word is very expressive here] in a regular order, and disposed in symmetrical rows, or patterns, as those were in the holy place, &c. or those in the doors of the sanctuary, &c. The writer adds, "by the masters of assemblies," by directors of workmen in their labours, when inserting such decorations, according to the pattern given by one chief architect, overseer, or surveyor." Is this the intention of the simile?

This gives also the true import of the expression, Isaiah xli. 7. "the image is ready for joining together (literally, to joining good is this) i. e. the junctures fit accurately to each other, now fix them to each other; and he strengthens it, by driving in ornamental nails, nails of the best kind, (mesemerim) or, at least, flat headed nails, not brads; that it should not start, be separated, fall to pieces." This is very different, from the usual notion of the passage, but is is supported by Jer. x. 4.—“They deck the image with silver, and with gold; with ornamental nails—(mesemeruth) studs—[I suppose the following is the meaning of the latter words of this verse, by adopting the marginal reading]—and with piercings; they bind it tightly together, compact it, brace it up, and add to the whole (phuk) a delicate coat of paint, for complete decoration:” as we know was customary in early antiquity.]

NAIM, or NAIN, נַיִן, Luke vii. 11. beauty, &c. See NAHAM.

[Probably this name imports comeliness; and it might be a pleasant village, like Caper-Naum, &c.]

I. NAIN, or NAIM, a city of Palestine, where Jesus Christ restored a widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says, this city was in the neighbourhood of Endor and Scythopolis. Elsewhere he says it was two miles from Tabor, south. [At the foot of the lesser Mount Hermon, near the town of Endor.] The brook Kishon ran between Tabor and Nain.

II. NAIN, a town of Idumea, where Simon, son of Gioras fortified himself. Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 7.

NAIOTH, נַיִת Naïth, beauties; from נָאֵה naah: or, habitations, abodes; from נָוָה navaḥ.

[It might perhaps be a kind of suburb to Ramah; or rather an edifice at the edge of the town where the prophets and their disciples resided.]

The Ketib uniformly has this name in the plural, Naioth; whereas the singular is Naieh. There might be more than one structure, or several dwellings united, as we call a row of houses—buildings.]

NAIOTH, or NAJOTH, near Ramah, where David withdrew to avoid the violence of Saul. Here Samuel with the sons of the prophets dwelt, 1 Sam. xix. 23.

NAIS, a city in the great plain, probably the same as Nain. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5.

NAKEDNESS, Nudity. These terms, besides their ordinary and literal meaning, sometimes signify void of succour, disarmed. So, after worshipping the golden calf, the Israelites found themselves naked in the midst of their enemies.

Nakedness of the feet was a token of respect. Moses put off his shoes to approach the burning bush. Most commentators are of opinion, that the priests served in the tabernacle with their feet naked; and afterwards in the temple. In the enumeration that Moses makes of the habit and ornaments of the priests, he no where mentions any dress for the feet. The Talmudists teach, that if they had but stepped with their feet upon a cloth, a skin, or even upon the foot of one of their companions, their service would have been unlawful. That, as the pavement of the temple was of marble, the priests used to incur several inconveniences, because of the nakedness of their feet; to prevent which in the second temple, there was a room in which the pavement was warm, that they might there warm their feet. Also, the frequent ablutions appointed them in the temple seem to imply, that their feet were naked.

VOL. II. PART XX Edit. IV.

Some also maintain, that the Israelites might not enter this holy place, till they had put off their shoes, and cleaned their feet. To this purpose are applied these words of Ecclesiastes, v. 1. “Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God.” Take care that your feet be clean. Rabbi Solomon, on Lev. xix. 30. “Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary,” understands the obligation of appearing before the Lord with naked feet. Maimonides says expressly, that it was never allowed to enter the house of God on the holy mountain with shoes on, or with their ordinary clothes on, or with dirty feet. Some think our Saviour alludes to this custom, when he says to his disciples, “Provide neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves,” Matth. x. 9, 10.

The Turks at this day do not enter their mosques, till after they have washed their feet, and their hands, and have put off the outward covering of their legs. The Christians of Ethiopia enter their churches with their feet bare [shoes off.] The Indian Brachmans have the same respect for their pagodas. Solinus says, cap. 19, that no one can enter the temple of Diana of Crete, till he has made his legs bare. Juvenal says, Sat. vi. that even the kings of the Jews kept their Sabbaths with naked feet:

Exercent ubi festa mero pede Sabbathis Reges.

The nakedness of the feet is sometimes put in Scripture for that nakedness which modesty forbids. “With-hold thy feet from being unshod,” says Jeremiah, ii. 25. Take care of uncovering your feet, i. e. of falling into any shameful action. [Go not to strangers' rooms, which being carpeted, you take off your shoes to avoid soiling the carpet. Do not commit idolatry, or prostitution.] And Jerem. xiii. 26. “Therefore will I discover thy skirts upon thy face, that thy shame may appear.” The feet express what delicacy would conceal. Lam. i. 9. Sordes ejus in pedibus ejus, & aqua pedum. Vide FEET.

To uncover the nakedness of any one, is commonly put for a shameful and unlawful conjunction, or an incestuous marriage. Ignominiam ornis sue nudavit. Levit. xx. 19. And Ezekiel, xvi. 37. Nudabo ignominiam tuam. And again, Eras nuda & confusione plena.

Nakedness is sometimes put for being partly undressed: en dishabille. Saul continued naked among the prophets; i. e. having only his under garments on. Isaiah received orders from the Lord to go naked; i. e. clothed as a slave, half clad. Thus it is recommended to clothe the naked; i. e. such as are ill clothed. St. Paul says, that he was in cold, in nakedness; i. e. in poverty, and want of raiment. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXI. LXII.

[The term naked should in many places be understood like our word undressed;—not fully, or properly, or becomingly, clothed. A king having on only his under clothing, is undressed, i. e. naked, for a king; though his garb might suit a labourer. When the Apostle says, 1 Cor. iv. 11. “to this present hour we are naked,” he does not mean absolute nakedness, in the same sense as Job says, i. 21. “naked came I out of my mother’s womb, and naked shall I return;” but, he means, unprovided of suitable clothing. To the same effect a nation, or people, is said to be made naked, Exod. xxxii. 25. 2 Chron. xxviii. 19. “Asa made Judah naked,” unprovided with means of resisting the enemy. So the walls of Babylon are said to be made naked, Jer. li. 58: i. e. stripped of their towers and other defences: and a tree in the wilderness is described as naked, deprived of its verdure, its foliage, Jer. xlviii. 6. In warm countries slight clothing, or even nakedness is more endurable than with us; but when nakedness is put absolutely, it usually intends a shameful discovery of the person; ruthless privation of necessities, degradation, misery.]

Naked is put for discovered, known, manifest. So Job, xxvi. 6. “Hell is naked before him.” The sepulchre, the unseen state, is open to the eyes of God. St. Paul says in the same sense; “Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Heb. iv. 13. Comp. FRAG. No. CXXIX.

The nakedness of Adam and Eve was unknown [i. e. unfelt; they were unconscious of it] by them, before they sinned. They were not ashamed at it, because concupiscence and irregular desires had not yet excited the flesh against the spirit. They were exempt from whatever indecency might now happen among their descendants, on occasion of nakedness.

Some interpreters translate the text of Moses, Adam and Eve were wise, or crafty; for the Hebrew harom has sometimes this signification. But it is plain from the sequel of Moses’s discourse, that he meant it of bodily nakedness; for he says, that to hide their nakedness they made themselves aprons of fig-leaves. The Pagans believe that in the golden age all men went naked, Plato, in Politic. p. 272.

NAME. The name of God. See JEHOVAH. The name without any other addition, signifies the name of the Lord, which was not pronounced, out of respect. “The Israelitish woman’s son blasphemed the Name,” Levit. xxiv. 11. If any one blasphemed the sacred name, he was taken out of the camp, all who heard him laid their hands on his head, and the people stoned him. Comp. FRAG. No. CCCXC.

The name of God often stands for God himself, his power, or majesty. Our assistance, or strength, and hope, is in the name of God, in his goodness, power, &c. The Hebrews believe that Moses, that Jesus Christ, and the prophets, performed their miracles by pronouncing the name of God, the true pronunciation of which was known to them, though at this day (they say) it is intirely forgot.

To invoke the name of God, to serve in the name of God, to bless in the name of the Lord, to build a house in the name of the Lord; in all these expressions the name is put for the Lord himself. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXVIII.

To take the name of God in vain, Exod. xx. 7. is to swear falsely, or without occasion, or to mingle the name of God in our discourses, or oaths, either falsely, rashly, wantonly, unnecessarily, or presumptuously. God forbids to “make mention of the names of other gods,” Exod. xxiii. 13. It is doing them too much honour to swear by their names, to take them as witnesses of what we affirm, as if they were really something. The Hebrews hardly ever pronounced the name Baal; they disfigured it, by saying Mephibosheth, or Meribosheth, instead of Mephibaal, or Meribaal; where Bosheth signifies something shameful or contemptible: instead of saying Elohim, they said Elihim, gods of filthiness.

To give a name is a token of command and authority. A father gives names to his children, a master to his slaves, to his animals. It is said Gen. ii. 23. that Adam gave name to his wife, and to all the animals, and that the names he gave them became their true name. God changed the name of Abram, Jacob, and Sarai, as a token of honour, an addition, expressing his particular benevolence towards those, whom he receives more especially into the number of his own. Hence he gave a name, even before their birth, to some persons whom he appointed, and who belonged to him in a particular manner:

e. gr. to Jedediah, or Solomon son of David, to the Messiah, to John the Baptist, &c.

God speaking to Moses, promises to send his angel before him; and says, my name is in him. Exod. xxiii. 21. He shall act, he shall speak, he shall punish in my name; he shall bear my name, he shall be my ambassador, he shall receive the same honours as belong to me. And in effect, the angel that spake to Moses, that appeared to him in the bush, that gave him the law on Mount Sinai, speaks and acts always as God himself; and Moses always gives him the name of God. Thus says the Lord, and the Lord spake to Moses, &c.

To know any one by his name, I know thee by name, Exod. xxxiii. 12, expresses a distinction, a friendship, a particular familiarity. The kings of the East had little communication with their subjects; and hardly ever appeared in public. So that when they knew their servants by name, vouchsafed to speak to them, to call them, and to admit them into their presence, it was a great mark of favour. [In many eastern countries the true personal name of the king is unknown to his subjects: in Japan, to pronounce the emperor's real name, is punishable; his general name as emperor, is held to be sufficiently sacred. Titles often became names, or parts of names; by these titles many sovereigns are known in history: and varying with incidents and occurrences, they occasion great confusion.]

Those who in the assemblies were called by their names, per nomina vocabantur, Numb. xvi. 2. were principals of the people, the heads of tribes; or who had some great employment, or particular dignity.

On these occasions they called thus; Aaron and his posterity, Hur and his family, Caleb and those under him, &c. They called by their name only the first and chief of the people. "I have called thee by thy name," Isai. xliii. 1. xlv. 4, may also signify, I have appointed thee by name to this office; I have changed thy name, to shew that I took thee into my service; so Nebuchadnezzar gave new names to Daniel and his companions. God speaking of the fixed place where his temple should be built, calls it "The place which the Lord shall choose to place his name there." Deut. xiv. 23. xvi. 2. There his name should be solemnly invoked; this place should have the honour of bearing the name of the Lord, of being consecrated to his service, and worship. These expressions shew the veneration of the Hebrews for whatever in any wise belonged to God.

Name is often put for renown or reputation. The name of Joshua became famous over all the country, Josh. vi. 27. And God said to David, when he reproached him with the crime he had committed with Bathsheba, "I have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth." 2 Sam. vii. 9. I have given you honour and reputation, equal to that of the greatest of monarchs.

"To raise up the name of the dead," Ruth iv. 5, 10, &c. is said of the brother of a man who died without children, when this brother marries the widow of the deceased, and revives his name in Israel, by means of the children which he may beget: these are deemed to be children of the deceased. In a contrary sense to this, to blot out the name of any one, is to exterminate his memory; to extirpate his race, his children, works or houses, and in general whatever may continue his name on the earth. "Thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name for ever and ever." Psalm ix. 5. "The name of the wicked shall rot." Prov. x. 7. It shall stink, and if it be at all remembered, it shall be only with abhorrence and detestation.

Isaiah, iv. 1. describes a time of calamity and disgrace in Israel, wherein men should be very scarce: he says, "In that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying we will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach." Take us for wives, and let us be called your spouses. The Lord complains in Ezekiel, that his spouses (Judah and Israel) are become prostitutes, though they bore his name; they defiled his holy name, by abominations, and idolatry.

God often complains that the false prophets prophesied in his name, Jerem. xiv. 14, 15. xxvii. 15, &c. Jesus Christ says, Matth. vii. 22. that in the day of judgment many shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works?" He says, Mark ix. 41, whosoever shall give a cup of cold water in his name, shall not lose his reward; and he that receives a prophet or a just man, in the name of a prophet or a just man, shall receive a recompence in proportion to his good intention. Matth. x. 41. In all these instances the word name is put for the person, for his service, his sake, his authority.

So names of men is sometimes put for persons. Revelations iii. 4. "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments." And Rev. xi. 13. Vulg. Occisi sunt in terra motu nomina hominum septem milia. Seven thousand men perished in the earthquake,—names of men; Gr. perhaps this should should be considered as implying men of name, persons of consequence, nobles, titulados, &c.

[It is probable, also, that this phrase contains some allusion to a list, or catalogue of names, very credibly, of eminent persons; for we find it, Acts ii. 15. expressing the apostles and principals of the Christian church—"the number of the names, was about a hundred and twenty." There were many thousands of followers of Jesus, in Jerusalem; but the Apostles, the Seventy, and some others, enough to make up about the number stated, were the principals.

There were certain mysterious notions connected with the names of individuals: hence in calling a muster-roll of soldiers the serjeants always began with names of good omen as Felix, Faustus, &c. analogous to our Good-luck, Happy, &c. Also, the number comprized in the letters of a name was mysterious, as that of Antichrist. See that Article.

There are also, other particulars concerning names; as the double names of some individuals: so Jacob was named Israel; Esau was named Edom; see SOLOMON, MAHER-SHAL-AL-HASH-BAZ, &c. Some persons had originally two names, as Thomas called Didymus, i. e. the twin: some had two names in different languages, as John, whose surname was Mark; so Lucas in Greek became Lucius in Latin; see also NATHANIEL and BARTHOLOMEW, MATTHEW and LEVI. We have also a remarkable variation of name in Paul, who was originally named Saul. On what occasion he adopted the name Paul is not certain; some have supposed, in compliment to his illustrious convert Sergius Paulus; others have thought Paulus was a name more acceptable to the Greeks than the Hebrew appellation Saul. Possibly, this name took place at his baptism; at which time as converts among the Jews were supposed to undergo such an entire change as amounted to death, they might, on returning to life, be known under another name—(a new name, Rev. ii. 27. iii. 12.)—importing an entire regeneration, and newness of life.]

NAOMI, נָאוֹמִי, beautiful, agreeable.

NAOMI, or NOEMI, wife of Elimelech; who retired into the land of Moab on occasion of a famine in Judæa; where Elimelech dying, Naomi settled her two sons in marriage, Mahlon to Ruth, and Chilion to Orpah. These two young men dying also, without children, Naomi resolved to return into Judæa. Her two daughters-in-law were desirous of returning with her, but she dissuaded them. Orpah remained behind, but Ruth would accompany Naomi to Bethlehem. Ruth i. 1, 2, 3, &c. When they came thither, the report was soon spread in the neighbourhood, and the people came to welcome her. She told them, they must no longer call her Naomi, i. e. fair [pleasant]; but Mara, i. e. bitterness. "For the Lord, says she, has heaped trouble upon me. I went away full, but the Lord has brought me back empty and desolate."

One day as Ruth went out to glean, she happened to enter a field belonging to Boaz. At her return, Naomi informed her, that Boaz was her near kinsman: and she advised the procedure of Ruth so warily, that eventually, Boaz married Ruth. Vide BOAZ and RUTH.

By this marriage Ruth had a son called Obed; on which the women of Bethlehem congratulated Naomi. The exact time is not known, in which this history happened; but we know that between the time of the marriage of Salmon with Rahab of Jericho, and the birth of David, are three hundred and sixty-six years, which are filled up only with four persons. Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse. So that each of these must have lived long.

NAPHISH, נַפִּישׁ, the soul: from נָפַשׁ naphesh: otherwise, he that rests, or refreshes himself, that respire: according to the Syriac, that multiplies. Son of Ishmael. Gen. xxv. 15. 1 Chron. i. 31.

NAPHTHA, a sort of bitumen found about Babylon. Daniel says, Dan. iii. 46. Vulg. that they heated the furnace, in which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were to be cast, with naphtha, pitch and other combustible matter. It is thought Noah used naphtha or bitumen, to coat the outside of the ark, Gen. vi. 14. The walls of the tower of Babel were cemented with a sort of mortar, in which naphtha [bitumen] was a chief ingredient. Gen. xi. 3. We are assured that naphtha is so subtle and inflammable, that it attracts fire, when it [i. e. its vapour, or gas.] comes within a certain distance. Strabo says, lib. 15. it cannot be quenched by common water. Pliny relates, that Medea burnt a woman of whom she had conceived a jealousy, by giving her a crown dipped in naphtha, which took fire as she approached the altar, to sacrifice. [The Jews have a story of the sacred fire being kindled by Nehemiah's pouring water on the altar: it is probable that liquid naphtha was the fluid used; which would easily take fire from concentrated rays of the sun. See NEHEMIAH.]

Naphtha is a kind of petroleum, or rock oil, found in several parts of the world, sometimes of one colour, sometimes of another, according to the nature of the rock, or of the soil that produces it; sometimes more liquid, sometimes less, always very inflammable, sulphureous, and clammy. The word Naphtha is derived from the Chaldee or Hebrew Noph or Naph, to drop or distil. It is procured in great quantities from certain springs, near the city Hit. in Chaldaea, d'Herbelot, Diction. Orient. p. 452, 656, 740. Also in the mountains of Farganah, in the province of Transoxane. To distinguish naphtha from pitch, the Turks call it black mastic. There is a naphtha petraea, which distils from rocks, found in the duchy of Modena. There is some also about Ragusa; and in several provinces of France, as Auvergne, &c. The naphtha of France is soft as pitch, liquid, black, of an ungrateful scent. That of Italy is a kind of petroleum, or a clear oil, sometimes white, sometimes red, sometimes yellow, sometimes green, and sometimes black. Isaac Vossius has a dissertation on Naphtha. [In England, the common naphtha is Barbadoes tar, which is a rock oil brought from that island: I have never been able to procure the true Oriental naphtha.]

NAPHTALI, נַפְתָּלִי, comparison, likeness: otherwise, that struggles, or fights [emulation?] or to twine, wrench, [twisted] from פתל pathal.

[This name should appear to denote strugglings, or wrestlings, i. e. of the mother of Naphtali with her sister: so Luctatus, of the same import, was a name used among the Romans. In the Greek, Matth. iv. 15. and Rev. vii. 6. it is written Nephtaleim.]

This name is well explained by Dieterich, Ant. Bibl. V. T. p. 237.]

NAPHTALI, or NEPHTALI, sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. Rachel said, "with great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed." Gen. xxx. 8. We know but few particulars of the life of Naphtali. His sons were Jabzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shillem. Gen. xlvi. 24. The patriarch Jacob, when he gave his blessing, said, "Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words." Gen. xlix. 21. Most of the Rabbins and commentators apply this to Barak, who was of the tribe of Naphtali, and who at first shewed the fear of a hind, by refusing to march against the Canaanites, unless the prophetess Deborah would go with him; but he afterwards imitated the swiftness of a hind in pursuit of his enemy. Judg. iv. 6. He signalized his eloquence also, in that sublime canticle he composed with Deborah, to give thanks to God for their victory.

The LXX. give another rendering to this text; "Naphtali is as a tree that puts forth young branches, the shoots of which are fine." This sense seems to me as good, at least, as the former. Jacob commends the fertility of Naphtali, and the beauty of his race. Naphtali had but four sons, yet at the Exodus his tribe made up 53,400 men able to bear arms. Moses in blessing the same tribe, says, Deut. xxxiii. 23. "O Naphtali, satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the west and the south." [Vulgate, The sea and the south; which the Hebrew will admit.] i. e. the sea of Genesareth, which was south of the inheritance of this tribe. His soil was very fruitful in corn and oil. His limits were extended into upper and lower Galilee, having Jordan east, Asher, and Zebulun west, Libanus north, and Issachar south.

The tribe of Naphtali encamped in the wilderness north of the tabernacle, between Dan and Manasseh. Numb. ii. 25, 26, 27, &c. After the division, by Joshua, of the Land of Promise, the children of Naphtali did not destroy all the Canaanites in their country, but contented themselves with making them tributary. Judg. i. 33. The Naphtalites being on the frontiers to the north, were first invaded, and first made captive by the kings of Assyria. 2 Kings xv. 29. A. M. 3345, ante A. D. 659. Isaiah, ix. 1. foretold to them, that they should see the light of the Messiah, and should be early illuminated by the glorious gospel. And indeed our Saviour preached oftener and longer in Galilee, and particularly in the tribe of Naphtali, than in any other part of Judea, Matt. iv. 13, 15.

[The name of a place, as some suppose. 1 Kings, iv. 15.]

NAPHTUHIM, נַפְתֻּחִים, Nephtuim, openings.

NAPHTUHIM, or NEPHSUIM, fourth son of Mizraim, Gen. x. 13. He dwelt in Egypt, and probably peopled that part of Ethiopia, between Syenna and Meroe, of which Napata or Napatea was the capital.

[Plutarch, de Iside, says, that the Egyptians called the extremities of land where it meets with the sea Nepthyn: whence Nepthyn denotes the extremity, which they give to Typhon for a wife. It may be, therefore, that the extremity of the land of Egypt, toward the Mediterranean Sea, might receive this name; and this the rather, because the Sirbonic lake was called the exhalations of Typhon, and where we find Typhon, we may naturally expect his consort. Nepthys, then, in the Egyptian language may denote the district between Egypt and the Asiatic desert, in the neighbourhood of the Sirbonic Lake. Plutarch adds, that the Nile, having reached the extremity of its course, is said to effect the intercourse of Osiris with Nepthyn, which prompts the growth of vegetables. This metaphorical mode of description agrees well enough with a district near the mouth of the Nile.

The Chaldee interpreter on Chronicles reads Pentascenos: which was a district between Mount Mount Cassius and the lake Sirbonis, at the extremity of Egypt. The Greek word Lystæos is adopted by the Jerusalem paraphrast, and Lystes by all the other versions Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic.

This word signifies thieves; and as very infamous thieves infested the marshes of Egypt, which served them as places of refuge, the term might probably be used to denote the district wherein they resided, which was not distant from the Sirbonic lake.]

NARCISSUS, Napκίσσος, astonishment, stupidity, surprise; from the Greek νάρκησις.

NARCISSUS. St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 11. says, "Greet them of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord." This passage cannot prove that Narcissus was a Christian; and Origen pretends, that this expression, of the household of Narcissus, proves that they were not all Christians. Grotius thinks that Narcissus was a Pagan; but others insist he was a Christian; yet as they maintain him to have been Narcissus, the famous freed-man of the emperor Claudius, they must certainly be mistaken, since this Narcissus never was a Christian; and besides, he was dead some years before St. Paul wrote this epistle. [Yet his household establishment might continue more or less distinguished.] The Pseudo-Ambrosius says, that some copies describe Narcissus as being a priest, and that if St. Paul does not salute him, it is because perhaps he then happened to be absent. The Greeks say he was bishop of Athens, a martyr, and give him the title of an apostle, and place him in the number of the seventy disciples. Baronius has accordingly inserted him in the Roman martyrology, Oct. 31.

NASBAS, Naβάρ. See NEBAT. A kinsman of Tobit. Tob. ix. 18.

NASI, נָסִי, NASHI, a prince. The Hebrews give this name to heads of the tribes, of great families, and even to princes of the people. At this day it is in a manner appropriated to the chief, the president of the Sanhedrim. Simon Maccabeus was honoured with this title, after he became independent of the Greeks. He has the name of Nasi on his medals. The prince, or Nasi, of the Sanhedrim, was depositary of the oral law or tradition, which Moses, according to the Rabbins, intrusted with the seventy elders, who made up that assembly. Those who are of opinion, that the Sanhedrim has always subsisted since its institution by Moses, make the dignity of Nasi equally ancient: but those who maintain the Sanhedrim to be much more modern, hold also the same of the office of Nasi. Some conclude that Esdra first introduced this office, and that he annexed it to the family of David. When Hillel came from Babylon, under the reign of Herod, about thirty years before A. D. he exercised this function with great splendour. After the destruction of Jerusalem, this name of prince was changed into that of patriarch, or head of the captivity. It is necessary to know their titles, in order to understand the language of the Rabbins, and of such authors as have treated of the republic, or other affairs, of the Jews.

NATHAN, נָתַן, who gives, or is given.

I. NATHAN, son of David and Bathsheba, 2 Sam. v. 14. 1 Chr. iii. 5. Father of Mattatha, Luke iii. 31.

II. NATHAN, a famous prophet of the Lord, who lived under king David, and had much of the confidence of that prince. His country is unknown, as also the time in which he began to prophesy. The first time the Scripture speaks of him, is on occasion of the design of David, to build a temple to the Lord. That prince discovered his intention to Nathan, who, not questioning but so pious a resolution must proceed from God, bid him execute what his heart prompted him to. But the night following the Lord ordered Nathan to acquaint David, that this honour was reserved for his son and successor.

Several years after, when David had transgressed with Bathsheba, and had slain Uriah, by the sword of the Ammonites, the Lord sent Nathan to reprove him. Nathan acquitted himself of this duty very prudently, by a parabolical story of a rich man, who having many flocks and herds of his own, yet for the entertainment of a friend who was come to visit him, would force from a poor man, a lamb which was the only one he had; David had hardly heard Nathan's story, 'ere he exclaimed, the man is worthy of death! he shall restore the lamb four-fold." Then Nathan applied his parable to David himself, "Thou art the man, &c. Thou hast taken—seduced—the wife of Uriah the Hittite, and slain him by the sword of the Ammonites. Therefore the sword shall not depart from thy house," &c. 2 Sam. xi. xii.

David acknowledged his sin to the prophet, lamenting, I have sinned against the Lord! Nathan to comfort him, assured him, that the Lord had mitigated his punishment, and that he himself should not die. But because he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, his son that was born of Bathsheba should surely die." Bathsheba had a second son, called Solomon, and the Lord sent Nathan again to David, ordering him to call the name of the child Jedidiah, i. e. beloved of the Lord.

Probably

Probably on this occasion, God declared to David, that Solomon (Jedidiah) should be his successor; that he should build him a temple, and should be heir of the promises made to him. See 2 Sam. vii. 12, &c.

David being arrived at a great age, Adonijah his eldest son began to assume the state and equipage of a king, in opposition to the interest of his brother Solomon. But neither the high-priest Zadok, nor the prophet Nathan, were in his interest. Adonijah gave a splendid entertainment to his own faction, at which Nathan, being alarmed, immediately repaired to Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, and bid her, at the peril of her own life, and that of her son, to follow his counsel. "Go presently to king David, and say to him; O my Lord the king, have you not sworn to me, that Solomon my son should succeed to the crown? Why then does Adonijah reign?" While you are saying this, I will come in, and confirm what you say. Bathsheba adopted his advice, and while she was speaking, Nathan comes, and said, "O my Lord the king, have you appointed Adonijah to be your successor? Have you not often declared to me, that Solomon should be your successor?" Then David caused Zadok the high-priest, and Benaiah son of Jehoiada to be sent for, and commanded them, with the prophet Nathan, to anoint Solomon king of Israel.

The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. 1 Chron. xxix. 29. notices that Gad and Nathan wrote the history of David. The same prophets had also regulated with David the order and disposition of the ministers of the temple. Lastly, Nathan and Ahijah of Shilo wrote the history of Solomon, 2 Chron. ix. 29. In 1 Kings iv. 5, under the reign of Solomon we find Azariah and Zabud, sons of Nathan, who had considerable employments at court; but whether this was Nathan the prophet is not explained.

Epiphanius in his Lives of the Prophets, relates a story taken from some apocryphal book, in which it is said, that Nathan knowing by inspiration that David was on the point of committing adultery, he set out immediately for Jerusalem, hoping to prevent it. But the devil found means to delay him by the way, having placed before him a dead man quite exposed. Nathan out of humanity, thought himself obliged to stay and bury him; in the mean time David committed his crime. Eusebius in Eusebius makes Nathan an angel of the Lord, when he says, that the angel Dianathan told David, that God did not think fit he should build the temple. [This seems to be a corrupt reading; as Dia Nathan imports through Nathan; through his office as a prophet?]

III. NATHAN, father of Igal. 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. called Nathan brother of Joel, 1 Chron. xi. 38.

IV. NATHAN, father of Zabud, a priest. 1 Kings iv. 5.

V. NATHAN, father of Azariah. 1 Kings iv. 5.

VI. NATHAN, brother of Joel, 1 Chron. xi. 38. a champion in David's army. The same as Nathan father of Igal. 2 Sam. xxiii. 36.

VII. NATHAN, one of the chief of the Jews who returned from Babylon with Ezra, and was sent by him to Iddo, to obtain Nethinim for the temple service, Ezra vii. 16.

NATHANAEL, נָתָנִיאֵל, gift of God; from נָתַן nathan, a gift, and אֵל el, God.

I. NATHANAEL, or NETHANAEL, son of Zuar, head or prince of the tribe of Issachar at the Exodus. He made his oblations to the tabernacle, as chief of his tribe, Numb. i. 8. vii. 18, 19.

II. NATHANAEL, fourth son of Jesse, and brother of David, 1 Chron. ii. 14.

III. NATHANAEL, son of Obbededom, of the race of the priests. 1 Chron. xv. 24. xxvi. 4.

IV. NATHANAEL, a doctor of the law, sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people. 2 Chr. xvii. 7.

V. NATHANAEL, father of Shemaiah, a Levite. 1 Chron. xxiv. 6.

VI. NATHANAEL, a Levite in the time of king Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 9.

VII. NATHANAEL, one who returned from the captivity of Babylon, Ezra x. 22.

VIII. NATHANAEL, a disciple of Jesus Christ. Philip meeting Nathanael told him, we have found the Messiah, described by Moses and the prophets, in Jesus of Nazareth, son of Joseph. Nathanael asked him, Can any thing good come out of Nazareth? Philip bid him come and see. Jesus seeing Nathanael coming towards him, says, There's an Israelite indeed, without artifice, or disguise! Nathanael asked him, How can you know me? Jesus answered, Before Philip called you, I saw you under the fig-tree. (It is believed that Jesus saw him in spirit, as he was praying in secret, under a fig-tree, and begging of God the manifestation of the Messiah.) Nathanael then said to him, Master, thou art the son of God,—the king of Israel. Jesus answered him, dost thou believe, because I saw thee under the fig-tree? Thou shalt see much greater things than these. John i. 46, &c. xxi. 2.

Many have thought that Nathanael was the same as Bartholomew, (vide Bartholomew.) The evangelists who mention Bartholomew, say nothing of Nathanael; and St. John, who mentions Nathanael, takes no notice of Bartholomew. We read at the close of St. John's gospel, pel, that our Saviour, after his resurrection manifested himself to Peter, Thomas, Nathanael, and the sons of Zebedee, as they were fishing in the lake of Genesareth.

NATHAN-MELECH, נתן-מלך, gift of the king; from נתן nathan, to give, and מלך melech, a king. An officer or eunuch of Manasseh king of Judah. 2 Kings xiii. 11. He had the care of the chariots consecrated to the sun.

[NATION, all the inhabitants of a particular country, Deut. iv. 34. a country or kingdom, Exod. xxxiv. 10. Rev. vii. 9. countrymen, natives of the same stock, Acts xxvi. 4. the father, head, and original of a people, Gen. xxv. 23. the Heathen or Gentiles, Isaiah, lv. 5. Vide HEATHEN.]

NATURE. In Scripture the word nature expresses the course of things established in the world. So a crime is said to be against nature, because it is contrary to what is established by the Creator, Rom. i. 26. Judg. xix. 24. Obsecro ne scelus hoc contra naturam operemini in virum. And St. Paul says, to ingraft a good olive-tree into a wild olive, is contrary to nature, Rom. xi. 24. the customary order of nature is thereby in some measure inverted.

Nature is also put for natural descent, Gal. ii. 15. "We who are Jews by nature, by birth, and not Gentiles." And Eph. ii. 3. "We were by nature the children of wrath."

Nature also denotes common sense, natural instinct. "Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame to him?" 1 Cor. xi. 14.

The nature of animals is that whereby they are distinguished from other creatures, and from one another. Every nature of beasts, birds, serpents, and other animals, has been tamed and subdued by human nature, James iii. 7.

St. Peter informs us, that Jesus Christ has made us partakers of a divine nature; he has merited for us the character of children of God, and grace to practice godliness, &c. like our father who is in heaven. Comp. 1 John, iii. 1.

[NATURAL HISTORY, and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY of the sacred Scriptures, are seldom thought of so much consequence as they really are. If "an undevout Astronomer is mad," as Dr. Young says, so is an undevout Naturalist; nay, perhaps, the most devout of pious persons have been the greatest adepts in the study of nature: witness the Psalmist, "When I consider the heavens, the works of thy fingers, the stars, the sun, moon, &c. Lord, what is man, that thou visitest him!" &c. We see the same disposition in the sagacious Solomon; and many allusions of our Lord are utterly unintelligible without acquaintance with nature, and nature's works. Let the truly honourable Robert Boyle, let Ray, Derham, &c. in modern ages, stand as examples of the connection between piety, and true philosophy.

But there is another view in which Natural Philosophy, for instance, illustrates Scripture:—the history of the Creation in Genesis is best understood by those who are best acquainted with the discoveries of science; the order of operation, the dependances, the consequences, the attachments and connections of the various successions of parts, the mutualities of the whole, are not only perfectly agreeable to modern discoveries, but modern discoveries furnish many reasons, formerly unknown, for that very order, which is presented in holy writ: insomuch that those objections which heretofore were thought embarrassing are now converted into corroborations of the accuracy of the inspired historian.

Moses appears also in the character of a naturalist, in his distinctions of food, and his classification of animals. There can be no reasonable doubt that one of the causes of such distinctions was, the nature, and properties of animals. It is very likely, that transgression of this principle was the loss of permanent health in Adam; that the forbidden fruit was deleterious; so that, when man fed on vegetable productions, fruits, &c. as in Paradise, yet one, was unclean to him, by reason, not only of Divine appointment, but of its own malignant nature; as when mankind fed on animals, some were unclean as food, by reason, not only of Divine appointment, but of their own ferocious nature. An acquaintance with the principles of natural history must have been, therefore, of considerable importance; and we find some of a very general nature in Moses, whose classification of certain kinds of creatures, and whose rules for determining the fitnesses of others, appear to be the result of, or at least, to coincide remarkably with, the elements of natural science. But, it should be recollected, that Moses wrote for a certain part of the earth, for a certain people, a people fixed in a determinate situation; he therefore did not want those extensive systems which embrace the whole world; the Linnæan system, as at present received, would have been inapplicable to his purposes; nevertheless the leading distinctions of it as found in nature, are found also in Moses, and he classes his beasts, his birds, his fishes, and his insects, by parts, which at that time, and in that country, were more correct, and certainly were better known, among the people, than the inhabitants of northern climates may suppose. See the SYSTEM OF NATURAL HISTORY, at large.]

NAUM.

[NAUM, the same as Nahum, an ancestor of Jesus Christ, Luke iii. 25.]

NAVE, נָוֶה, Naveh. The Greek translator of Ecclesiasticus reads nave for נָוֶה. Nave signifies son, posterity, durable and eternal; from נָוֶה : wave, signifies beauty; from נָוֶה נָוֶה : otherwise, habitation; from נָוֶה נָוֶה. [We read also, in the LXX. of Joshua the son of Nave, instead of son of Nun; which seems to suggest that the Hebrew copies used by them had this variation.]

[NAVIGATION, as an art, was probably first taught by God to Noah, when he directed the building of the ark; and this first great construction of a marine vessel, mankind were emboldened to imitate, by constructing others, some of which may not only vie with, but exceed in dimensions, even that comprehensive structure which saved mankind.]

Navigation was little cultivated among the Hebrews, till the days of their kings; Solomon had a fleet; but he had not sailors equal to the management of it; no doubt, from their want of habit. Moses mentions nothing of navigation, and David it should seem rather acquired his great wealth by land commerce, than by sea-voyages. It is not easy to say what assistance the wisdom of Solomon contributed to his fleet and officers, on the mighty ocean. Perhaps his extensive knowledge of natural things, first suggested the plan of these voyages. We know that Judæa had ports on the Mediterranean, as Joppa, &c. but probably the coast during the days of the Judges was in the hands of the Philistines, to the exclusion of Hebrew mariners; (Tyre and Sidon, we know, were not under the authority of the Jewish princes,) and this accounts for the means by which the Philistines, on so narrow a slip of land, could become powerful, and could occasionally furnish immense armies, because they were free to receive reinforcements by sea. In later ages the Greeks and Romans invaded Syria by sea, and the intercourse between Judæa and Rome was direct: as we learn from the voyage of St. Paul, &c. Comp. JOPPA.

There were also many boats, and lesser vessels employed in navigating the lakes, or seas, as the Hebrews called them, which are in the Holy Land; and there must have been some embarkations on the Jordan, as at its ferries, &c. but the whole of these were trifling; and it appears that though Providence taught navigation to mankind, yet it was not the design of Providence that the chosen people, and the depositaries of the Messiah, should have been other than a settled, a local nation, attached to one country, to which country, and even to certain of its towns, peculiar privileges were attributed in prophecy, and divine appointment. And it is remarkable, that, though Jews were settled in many nations, yet they do not appear to have practised maritime occupations; although they were closely allied to those who were thus engaged, and subsisted by traffic and commerce, or brokerage. The legal observances, the distinctions of meats, &c. were impediments to Jewish sailors, and prevented their attainment of any great skill in navigation.]

NAZAREAN, Ναζωραῖος, kept, from נָזַר to keep, to flourish. See NAZARITE.

NAZARETH, נָצְרֶת, Naẓeret, guarded, or flourishing; [sanctified, or separated, or crowned. When written with ז it is interpreted the keeper, or flowering; otherwise, the staff, or branch.]

NAZARETH, a little town of Zebulun, in lower Galilee, west of Tabor, and east of Ptolemais. Eusebius places it fifteen miles from Legio east. Celebrated for having been the residence of Jesus Christ, for the first thirty-three years of his life, Luke ii. 51. Here our Saviour became incarnate, here he lived in obedience to Joseph and Mary, and hence he received the name of Nazarene. After he had begun his mission, he preached here sometimes, in the synagogue, Luke iv. 16. But because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his origin, he did not many miracles there, nor would he dwell therein. Matth. xiii. 54, 58. He fixed his habitation at Capernaum for the latter part of his life, Matt. iv. 13. Nazareth is situated on high ground, having on one side a precipice, from whence the Nazareans one day attempted to throw down our Saviour, because he upbraided them with their unbelief, Luke iv. 29.

Epiphanius says, that in his time Nazareth was only a village, and that to the reign of Constantine it was inhabited by Jews alone, exclusive of Christians. Adamnanus, a writer of the seventh century, says, that in his time there were two great churches at Nazareth, one in the midst of the city, built on two arches, in the place where our Saviour's house had stood. Under the two arches now mentioned, was a very fine fountain, which furnished water to the whole city. The second church of Nazareth was built in the place where the house stood, wherein the angel Gabriel appeared to the Virgin Mary. Villibrodé, in the eighth century, speaking of the same church of Nazareth, says, the Christians were often obliged to redeem it with money from the Pagans, who otherwise threatened to demolish it. Photas in the twelfth century says, that as soon as one enters Nazareth, one finds the church of St.

Gabriel, under which is a little vault, wherein is the fountain near which the angel saluted Mary. It may be here observed, that the Orientals thought the angel first spoke to Mary near a fountain, and afterwards in her own house. Phocas adds, that in the same city is a very handsome church, heretofore the house of St. Joseph. The church of Nazareth, or of the Incarnation, is still in being.

Now all this will by no means agree with the famous translation of the house of the Virgin Mary; which in 1291, is pretended to have been removed by the assistance of angels, from Nazareth into Dalmatia; whence it was carried four years after, beyond the gulph of Venice, into the diocese of Recanati, in the borders of Ancona, and set on the land of a lady named Lauretta; whence the church that was founded there, obtained the name of our Lady of Lau-retto. But the situation of this holy house being in a wood, to which it was dangerous to resort, because of robbers, it was a third time transported to the distance of half a league up a hill; and once more it was carried from thence to the place where it stands at present. It is very probable, that all these different translations were no other than so many different buildings, constructed on the model of the church of Nazareth; just as in several places churches have been built, on the model of that of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem.

[Nazareth is about eight leagues from Acre. It is situated at the foot of a mountain, and is surrounded on all sides by hills and mountains, leaving a little valley between them full of thistles and pebbles. This town is inhabited only by a few Religious of the Holy Land, and by some poor Christians in their service, or dependent on them. The place is shewn where stood the house of the Holy Virgin; but the house itself, say the Catholics, is at Loretto. Both Turks and Christians have a great veneration for the sacred precincts, and pray to the Virgin. The place where the synagogue stood wherein our saviour preached, is shewn. Such is D'Arvieux's account: The following is from Volney.

Nazareth, so celebrated in the history of Christianity, is an inconsiderable village, one third of whose inhabitants are Mahometans, and the remaining two-thirds Greek Catholics. The Fathers of the Holy Land, who are dependant on the great convent of Jerusalem, have an hospitium and a church here. They are usually the farmers of the country. In the time of Daher they were obliged to make a present to every wife he married, and he took great care to marry almost every week.

[Our latest traveller who describes Nazareth, Dr. E. D. CLARKE, approaching it from Acre, mentions the village of Sephoury, in which is shewn the house of St. Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary, five miles from Nazareth. He observes—the fountain near Nazareth, called the "Virgin Mary's fountain;"—the great church, or convent, at that time the refuge of wretches afflicted with the plague, hoping for recovery from the sanctity of the place;—Joseph's workshop, converted into a chapel;—the synagogue, wherein Jesus is said to have preached, now a church;—the precipice, whence the inhabitants would have thrown our Lord; concerning which "the words of the Evangelist, are remarkably explicit; and it is, probably, the precise spot alluded to in the text of St. Luke's gospel:"—a stone, that is said to have served as a table to Christ and his disciples, is an object of worship to the superstitious of Galilee. The people were under the severest oppression.]

NAZARITES, נָזִירִים, Ναζαρηῖται, separated, or crowned; from נָזַר nazir, or נָזַר nazar, a flower, or bud.

NAZARITE, or NAZAREAN, may signify,

1. An inhabitant of Nazareth; or a native of that city.

2. This name was given to Jesus Christ and his disciples; commonly, in a sense of derision and contempt, especially by writers against Christianity.

3. A sect of heretic (Christians) called Nazareans.

4. A Nazarite, a man under a vow, to observe the rules of Nazariteship; whether for his whole life, as Sampson, and John the Baptist; or for a time, as those in Numbers vi. 18, 19, 20. Amos ii. 11, 12.

5. Nazarite, in some passages of Scripture denotes a man of distinction and dignity in the court of a prince.

The name of Nazarene belongs to Jesus Christ, not only because of his having lived the greater part of his life at Nazareth, and because that place was considered as his country, but also because the prophets had foretold, that "he should be called a Nazarene." Matth. ii. 23. We find no particular place in the prophets, expressly affirming, that the Messiah should be called a Nazarene; and St. Matthew only mentions the prophets in general. Perhaps, he would infer that the consecration of Nazarites, and their great purity, was a type and prophecy referring to our Saviour; Numb. vi. 18, 19. or, that the name Nazir or Nazarite, given to the patriarch Joseph, had some reference to Jesus Christ, Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 16. Jerom was of opinion, that St. Matthew alludes to Isaiah xi. 1. lx. 21. "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch (Heb. Nezer,) shall grow out of his roots. This branch or Nezer, and this rod, are certainly intended to denote Jesus Christ, by the general consent of the fathers and interpreters. [Or, possibly, in a more general sense, "He shall be vilified, despised, neglected," as every thing was, that came from Nazareth; and this might be a kind of prophetic proverb.]

Isaiah

Nazarean heretics, were Christians converted from Judaism, whose chief error consisted in defending the necessity or expediency of the works of the law, and who obstinately adhered to the practice of Jewish ceremonies. The name of Nazarenes at first had nothing odious in it; and was often given to Christians. The Fathers frequently mention the Gospel of the Nazarenes, (i. e. of St. Matthew.) Some of them were in being in the time of Jerom, who does not reproach them with any error. They were zealous observers of the law of Moses, but held the traditions of the Pharisees in contempt.

[It may reasonably be doubted, whether these Nazareans were heretics: it is more probable, that they were descendants of the original Jewish Christians, and, as Jews, were too harshly treated by (those who should have been) their Gentile brethren. They must have been well known to Jerom, who lived long in Judea; he thus describes them, in several places. Mentioning Hebrews believing in Christ, he says, they were ANATHEMATIZED for their rigid adherence to the ceremonies of the Jewish law, which they mingled with the Gospel of Christ: Propter hoc solum a patribus anathematizati sunt, quod legis cæremonias Christi evangelio miscuerunt. (Comment. on Isaiah.)—"They so receive Christ, that they discard not the rites of the ancient law."

He also describes the Nazarenes as persons "who believed in Christ the Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary, in whom the orthodox believe:—but, were, nevertheless, so bigotted to the Mosaic law, that they were rather to be considered as a Jewish sect, than a Christian.

"To this day," says Jerom, "a heresy prevails among the Jews in all the synagogues of the East, which is called that of . . . the Nazarenes . . . who from a desire of being Jews and Christians, BOTH AT ONCE, are neither Jews nor Christians." Epist. ad Agustinum, de dissidio Petri et Pauli.]

Nazarite, under the ancient law, denotes a man or woman, engaged by vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let their hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead corpse in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If by accident any one should have died in their presence, they re-commenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes during their whole lives. When the time of Nazariteship was expired, the priest brought the person to the door of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory sacrifice, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered likewise loaves and cakes, with wine for libations. After all was sacrificed and offered, the priest, or some other, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt his hair on the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into the hands of the Nazarite the shoulder of the ram roasted, with a loaf and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. And from this time he might again drink wine, his Nazariteship being accomplished.

Perpetual Nazarites, as Sampson and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine, or cutting their hair.

Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were; the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, to be offered at the temple, by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred, till a convenient opportunity. Hence, St. Paul being at Corinth, having made the vow of a Nazarite, he had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth; but deferred the complete fulfilment of his vow, till he came to Jerusalem. Acts xviii. 18.

When a person found he was not in condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or had not leisure fully to perform it; he contented himself by contributing to the expence of the sacrifices and offerings of those who had made, and were fulfilling, this vow; by this means he became a partaker in such Nazariteship. Josephus, magnifying the zeal and devotion of Herod Agrippa, says, that king caused several Nazarites to be shaven. Maimonides says, that he who would partake in the Nazariteship of another, went to the temple, and said to the priest, "In such a time such an one will finish his Nazariteship; I intend to defray the charge attending the shaving off his hair, either in part, or in the whole." When St Paul came to Jerusalem, saalem, A. D. 58. Acts xxi. 23, 24. St. James, with other brethren, advised, that to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should unite with four persons, who had vows of Nazariteship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies; by which the people would perceive, that he did not disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose.

Nazarite, expresses a man of great dignity, —the patriarch Joseph is called a Nazarite among his brethren; Gen. xlix. 26. Nazarite in this sense is variously understood. Some think it signifies one who is crowned, chosen, separated, distinguished: Nexir in Hebrew signifies a crown. The LXX. translate, a chief, or, him that is honoured. We think that Nazir was a name of dignity, in the courts of eastern princes. In the court of Persia, the Nexir is superintendant-general of the king's household, the chief officer of the crown; the high steward of his family, treasures, and revenues. Chardin, Government of the Persians, ch. 5. In this sense Joseph was Nexir of the house of Pharaoh. It is very like what the ancient Persians called the King's Eyes. Moses also gives to Joseph the title of Nazir, speaking of the tribes of his two sons Ephraim and Manasseh. Deut. xxxiii. 16.

NEAH, נֶעַח, NEA, or NOA, a city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13. I suspect it to be the Neve, mentioned in the Itinerary of Antoninus, thirty-six miles from Capitolias; but I must own, the manner of writing Noah or Neah is not very favourable to this conjecture. See Reland, tom. ii. p. 909.

[Some think this denotes wanderings; and was so called because it was built by wandering exiles.]

NEAPOLIS, Νεάπολις, new city; from νέα, new, fresh, and πόλις, a city. Vide SHECHEM.

NEAPOLIS, now called Napoli, Acts xvi. 11. a city of Macedonia, whither St. Paul came from the isle of Samothracia. From Neapolis he went to Philippi. Napoli is near the borders of Thrace.

[The name afterwards given to the ancient Sichem, as we are informed by Jerom in his Hebrew Questions.]

NEARIAH, נֶעְרִיָּה, Neapia, child, or effusion, or watch of the Lord; from nahar, hara, and hur. See NAARAH. The fifth son of Shechaniah. One of those who, at the head of five hundred men of the tribe of Simeon, attacked the remnant of the Amalekites in Mount Seir, defeated them, and dwelt in their country, 1 Chron. iii. 22. iv. 42. The time of this expedition is not known.

NEBAI, נְבִי, that fructifies; from נָבַּא nub:

otherwise, that foretels, or that speaks; from נָבַּא niba. Nehem. x. 19.

NEBAJOTH, נְבִיאוֹת, words, or prophecies; from נָבַּא nabia: or fruits; from נְבִיאוֹת thabnah. First son of Ishmael, and grandson of Abraham and Hagar. Father of the Nabathean Arabians. See NABATHEANS.

NEBALLAT, נְבִילָת, that fructifies, or that prophecies in secret, or in a riddle; from נָבַּא nub, and niba, and לָטַף lut, to hide, to wrap up. A city of Benjamin, Nehem. xi. 34.

[This name may be so divided as to signify, "the habitation in the secret place:" privacy.]

NEBAT, נְבַט, that beholds.

NEBAT, or NABATH, of Ephraim, of the race of Joshua, and father of Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes, 1 Kings, xi. 26. The author of the Hebrew questions on the books of Kings, says, that Nebat was the same as Shimet, who cursed David, 2 Sam. xvi. 5, &c. but, Shimei, was of the family of Saul, consequently of Benjamin, not of Ephraim.

NEBO, נְבוֹ, that speaks, prophecies, or fructifies. [Vide infra, Nos. II. and IV. Add.]

I. NEBO, or Nabo, a city of Reuben, Num. xxxii. 38. Being in the neighbourhood of Moab, the Moabites seized it, and in the time of Jeremiah they held it, Jer. xlviii. 1.

II. NEBO, a city of Judah, Ezra ii. 29. x. 43. Neh. vii. 33. Probably the village Nabaz, eight miles from Hebron, south, which was forsaken in the time of Eusebius and Jerom. [For distinction, it is called "the other Nebo." Neh. vii. 33. The Arabic root of this word denotes high, eminent: and as the mountain of this name is described as being very high, it is supposed that the true import of the appellation expresses height, or elevation: "High-town."]]

III. NEBO, a mountain beyond Jordan, where Moses died. Deut. xxxii. 49. [xxxiv. 1. Isaiah xli. 1. very high: and so called by Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 7. Its height was taken by the celebrated Harenberg, Biblioth. Brem. class viii. p. 853. comp. Hackman's Diss. cit. p. 4. and Diss. Jph. Quistorph, Rostock, 1657. Probably adjacent to the banks of Jordan, over against Jericho.]

IV. NEBO, an idol of the Babylonians. "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth," says Isaiah, xli. 1. The word Nebo coming from a root that signifies to prophesy, may stand for an oracle. There is some probability, that Bel and Nebo are the same deity, and that Isaiah has used these as synonymous terms. Bel was the oracle of the Babylonians. Nebo or Nabo is found in composition of the names of several princes of Babylon; as Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabuzardan, Nabusesban, &c. The LXX.

LXX. instead of Nebo read Dagon, Σαυαρίον Δαγών. The Chaldeans worshipped a god called Odacon. Vide DAGON, FRAGMENTS, No. CLXV. and PLATES.

[The following derivation and character of the Chaldean deity Nebo, is from Norberg's Lexicon of the Syriac language, as found in the books of the disciples of John the Baptist, p. 95.

"NEBU. Heb. נב, from the Syriac נב, he divined, he foretold. This Oriental idol, a deity of the Chaldeans, was the same as Mercury. Mercurius in Latin imports Nuntius, an interpreter; and Nebu, by the Syro-Chaldeans, is called "the wise scribe." It is remarkable, that throughout antiquity, and even in later days, in China, the character of one of their deities is that of a young man studious of letters and books." Comp. Heb. Nabi, Nebia, &c.

If this be correct, it should seem that the kings into whose names that of this deity entered, were men who prided themselves on the wisdom of their conduct, their opinions, or judgments; or, on the policy and favourable issue of their negotiations. Perhaps, when Nebuchadnezzar boasts, "is not this great Babylon, which I have built?" he might refer to his personal share in forming the plan of the city, &c. superintending the execution, and completing it, &c. His anxiety about the import of his dreams, his fear lest the opportunity of which he was forewarned, should slip, nor less the privation of his intellect, strongly mark a prince who possessed, and had exerted, great powers of mind, great political wisdom. He was certainly a man of learning, as well as valour; and probably had received all the advantages of the Chaldean collegiate institutions.]

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, נבוכדנאצר, tears and groans of judgment; from בכה bacah, to weep, and דן dan, judgment: otherwise, trouble, or sorrow of judgment; from צר tsar, anguish, דן dan, judgment. This word is foreign from the Hebrew: and includes the name of the Babylonian god Nabo, or Nebo: it may possibly, signify a treasure defended by Nebo.

I. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, NEBUCHADREZZAR, NABUCHODONOSOR, &c. king of Assyria, otherwise called Saosduchinus, began to reign at Nineveh, A. M. 3335, ante A. D. 669. In the twelfth year of his reign, in a set battle he overcame Arphaxad, king of the Medes, in the plains of Ragan. Nebuchadnezzar sent to Cilicia, Damascus, Mount Libanus, Phœnicia, Judæa, and the other nations adjoining, and even to Ethiopia, to require them to acknowledge him, and to submit to his empire. But these people sent back his ambassadors with disdain, and slighted his menaces. Nebuchadnezzar, enraged, swore by his throne, that he would be revenged; and in the thirteenth year of his reign he assembled his chief officers, and acquainted them with his resolution, of bringing the whole earth under his government. He appointed Holofernes his generalissimo, gave him military instructions, put large sums of money into his hands, and sent him with a powerful army to reduce all those nations. See HOLOFERNES. Nebuchadnezzar, otherwise Saosduchinus, had Saracus or Chynaladan for successor, A. M. 3356, ante A. D. 648.

II. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, otherwise Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, so much celebrated in Scripture. Nabopolassar was a Babylonian, and Saracus, king of Assyria, appointed him chief of his army. He made a league with Astyages, otherwise called Ahasuerus, who gave his daughter Amyitis in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar. Ahasuerus and Nabopolassar joining their forces, revolted against Saracus, king of Nineveh, besieged him in his capital, took him prisoner, and on the destruction of the Assyrian monarchy raised two kingdoms; that of the Medes, possessed by Astyages, or Ahasuerus, and that of the Chaldeans, or of Babylon, founded by Nabopolassar, A. M. 3378, ante A. D. 626. Nabopolassar died A. M. 3399, ante A. D. 605.

III. NEBUCHADNEZZAR, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldea A. M. 3399, ante A. D. 605. Some time before, Nabopolassar had associated him in the kingdom, and sent him to recover Carchemish, which had been wrested from him four years before, by Necho king of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar having been successful, marched against the governor of Phœnicia, and Jehoiachim king of Judah, tributary to Necho, king of Egypt. He took Jehoiachim, and put him in chains, to carry him captive to Babylon; but afterwards he left him in Judea, on condition of his paying a large tribute. He took away several persons from Jerusalem; among others, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, all of the royal family, whom the king of Babylon caused to be carefully educated, in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, that they might be employed at court.

Nabopolassar dying about the end of A. M. 3399, Nebuchadnezzar, who was then either in Egypt or in Judæa, hastened to Babylon, leaving to his generals the care of bringing to Chaldea the captives taken in Syria, Judæa, Phœnicia, and Egypt; for according to Berosus, he had subdued all these countries. He distributed these captives into several colonies, and in the temple of Belus he deposited the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and other rich spoils.

Jehoiachim, king of Judah, continued three years in fealty to king Nebuchadnezzar, but then, being weary of paying tribute, he revolted. The king of Chaldæa sent troops of Chaldæans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who harassed Judæa, during three or four years; at last, Jehoiachim was besieged and taken in Jerusalem, put to death, and his body thrown to the birds of the air, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. See JEHOIACHIM.

In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar being at Babylon, in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals, a head of gold, a breast of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet partly iron, and partly clay: a little stone rolling by its own impulse from a mountain, struck this statue, and broke it. This dream gave him great uneasiness; yet afterwards he forgot it, and could not recover the least notion of it. He ordered all his diviners and interpreters of dreams into his presence, but none could tell him his dream. Nebuchadnezzar, in wrath, ordered them all to death, which was about to be put in execution, when Daniel was informed of the cause. He went immediately to the king, and desired him to respite the sentence a little, and he would endeavour to satisfy the king's desire. God in the night revealed to him the king's dream, and also the interpretation, to this effect:

Yourself, said Daniel, are represented by the golden head of the statue. After you will arise a kingdom inferior to your's, represented by the breast of silver; and after this another, still inferior, denoted by the belly and thighs of brass. After these three empires, (the Chaldean, Persian, and Greek) will arise a fourth, denoted by the legs of iron, (the Roman.) Under this last empire God will raise a new one, of greater strength, power, and extent than all the others: (that of the Messiah; represented by the little stone rolling from the mountain, and overthrowing the statue.)

Then the king raised Daniel to great honour, set him over all the wise-men of Babylon, and gave him the government of that province; at his request he granted to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the oversight of the works of the same province of Babylon.

Jehoiakin, or Jechoniah, king of Judah, having revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, was besieged by him in Jerusalem, and forced to surrender. Nebuchadnezzar took him with his chief officers, captive to Babylon, also, his mother, his wives, and the best workmen of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand men. Among the captives were Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, and Ezekiel the prophet. He took also all the vessels of gold which Solomon made for the temple, and the king's treasury: and set up Mattaniah, Jeconiah's uncle by the father's side, whom he named Zedekiah.

Zedekiah continued faithful to Nebuchadnezzar nine years; being then weary of subjection, he rebelled, and confederated with the neighbouring princes. The king of Babylon came into Judæa, reduced the chief places of the country, and besieged Jerusalem: but Pharaoh Hophra, or Vaphres, coming out of Egypt to assist Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar went to meet him, overcame him in battle, and forced him to retire to his own country. This done, he resumed the siege of Jerusalem, and was three hundred and ninety days before the place. But in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, A. M. 3419, ant. A. D. 588, the city was taken. Zedekiah attempted to escape, but was seized and brought to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah in Syria. The king of Babylon condemned him to die, caused his children to be put to death in his presence, and then bored out his eyes, loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon.

Three years after the Jewish war, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre, which siege lasted thirteen years. But during this interval, he attacked the Sidonians, Moabites, Ammonites, and Idumæans; and these he treated much as he had done the Jews. Josephus says, these wars happened five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, consequently A. M. 3421, ante A. D. 583. Tyre was taken A. M. 2432, ante A. D. 572. Ithobaal, the king, was put to death, and Baal succeeded him. The Lord to reward the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which had lain so long before Tyre, assigned them Egypt and its spoils. Nebuchadnezzar found it an easy conquest, because the Egyptians were divided by civil wars among themselves; he enriched himself with booty, and returned in triumph to Babylon, with a vast number of captives.

Nebuchadnezzar, being at peace, applied himself to the adorning, aggrandizing, and enriching Babylon with the most magnificent buildings. He now undertook those famous gardens, supported by arches, reckoned among the wonders of the world. Several also have ascribed to him the walls of Babylon; though many give the honour of that work to Semiramis.

About this time Nebuchadnezzar had a dream of a great tree, loaded with fruit. Suddenly an angel descending from heaven, commanded that the tree should be cut down, and the branches ches, leaves, and fruit be scattered; yet the trunk and the root should be preserved in the earth; that it should be bound with chains of iron and brass, &c. among the beasts of the field, for seven years. The king consulted all the diviners in the country, but none could explain his dream, until Daniel informed him, that this dream respected himself. You, says Daniel, are represented by the great tree: you are to be brought low, to be reduced to the condition of a brute, &c. but you shall afterwards be restored.

A year after, as Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace at Babylon, he began to say, "Is not this Babylon the Great, which I have built in the greatness of my power, and in the brightness of my glory?" Hardly had he pronounced the words, when he was struck by a distemper or distraction, which so perverted his imagination, that he thought himself to be metamorphosed into an ox; and assumed the manners of that animal. After having been seven years in this state, God restored his understanding to him, and he recovered his royal dignity.

Nebuchadnezzar's repentance was neither solid nor sincere. For the year of his restoration, he erected a golden statue, whose height was sixty cubits, in the plain of Dura, in Babylon. Having appointed a day for the dedication of this statue, he assembled the principal officers of his kingdom; and published by a herald, that all should adore this image, at the sound of music, on penalty of being cast into a burning fiery furnace. The three Jews, companions of Daniel, would not bend the knee to the image. Daniel probably was absent. Nebuchadnezzar commanded Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego to be called, and he asked them why they presumed to disobey his orders? They replied, that they neither feared the flames, nor any other penalty; that the God, whom, only, they would worship, knew how to preserve them; but if he should not think fit to deliver them out of his hands, nevertheless, they would obey the laws of God rather than men.

Hearing this, the king caused them to be bound, and to be thrown into the furnace, which being vehemently heated, the flame consumed the men who cast them in; but it spared Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. An angel of the Lord abated the flames, so that the fire did not affect them. Nebuchadnezzar seeing this miracle, was much astonished, and said to his nobles, "whence is it that I see four men walking in the midst of the flames? and the fourth is like a son of God." Then, approaching the furnace, he called the three Hebrews, who came out of the furnace in perfect health, to the great astonishment of the whole court.

Nebuchadnezzar now gave glory to the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, and he exalted the three Hebrews to great dignity in the province of Babylon. Dan. iv. 1, 2, &c.

Nebuchadnezzar died this year, A. M. 3442, ante A. D. 562, after having reigned forty-three years. Megasthenes, quoted by Eusebius, Præpar. lib. ix. cap. 41, says, that this prince having ascended to the top of his palace, was there seized with a fit of divine enthusiasm, and cried out, "O Babylonians, I declare to you a misfortune, that neither our father Belus, nor queen Baltis, have been able to prevent: a Persian mule shall one day come into this country, who, supported by the power of your gods, shall bring you into slavery. He shall be assisted by the Mede, the glory of the Assyrians!" (This Persian mule is Cyrus, who was born of a mother that was a Mede, and a Persian father. The Mede who assisted Cyrus was Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede.) Nebuchadnezzar added, "Would to God this conqueror might perish in the depths of the sea, or in some dismal wilderness where no human creature sets his foot, that we might not see the evils with which we are threatened! And would to God that I myself had had a happier fate before this had come into my mind!" Saying this he disappeared. It is doubted whether these words "he disappeared," should denote his death, or his flight and retreat, which accompanied his supposed metamorphosis into an ox.

Persian authors relate, that Lohorashb, the fourth king of Persia, of the dynasty of the Caianides, who succeeded Kaikosroo, made great conquests in the eastern, and afterward in the western parts, around his empire. He sent into Palestine one of his generals called Raham, surnamed Balkhtalnassar, the happiness of victory, from which the Hebrews formed Nebuchadnezzar, and the Greeks Nebuchodonosar; by whom all Syria was reduced to obedience. The king of Judah, of the race of Solomon, who then reigned at Jerusalem, refusing to submit, was attacked by Raham, who took Jerusalem, sacked and destroyed it.

Other historians give to Nebuchadnezzar the name of Gudarz, and say he was lieutenant-general to king Lohorashb; who having spent the greater part of his life in the eastern parts of the empire, was almost unknown to the Hebrews and the Arabians; while Gudarz, called also Raham, or Nebuchadnezzar, acquired a very great reputation, though he was but the subaltern or lieutenant-general of Lohorashb's army. But all are agreed about his great valour and martial exploits; and maintain, that king Lohorashb was contemporary with the prophets prophets Jeremiah, Daniel, and Esdras. It would be undoubtedly very difficult to reconcile all this with Scripture.

ON NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S METAMORPHOSIS.

It may not be amiss to add a word here, concerning the metamorphosis of this prince, which has afforded cause for many opinions. Origen believed the thing to be impossible, and turned it into an allegory. Bodin thought Nebuchadnezzar was really changed into a bull, and did not only lose the shape and sentiments, but even the soul of a man. Others maintain, that this change was only in his body and outward form, but not in his soul; the king preserving his reason in the midst of his misfortune, like Apuleius changed into an ass; and like those Italians mentioned by St. Austin, who having tasted some cheese given them by certain magicians of the country, were changed into beasts of burden, but after a time recovered their former shape, and their former condition. Some Rabbins pretend, that the soul of Nebuchadnezzar quitted the body of that prince, and gave place for a time, to that of an ox, which communicated its sentiments to him, and imparted to his body the same motions, the same taste, the same inclinations, as those of oxen. Others have acknowledged in Nebuchadnezzar only a vitiated imagination, and in his subjects a kind of fascination of the eyes, which made both believe that Nebuchadnezzar was changed into an ox, and had the figure of one, though really there was no such thing.

The most received opinion is, that by the effect of divine power, Nebuchadnezzar fell into maniac melancholy, and in his frenzy imagined that he was become an ox. As in the disease called Lycanthropy, a man is persuaded that he is changed into a wolf, a dog, a cat—[which only arises from his distempered brain, and heated imagination; since those about him perceive no such change in his outward figure; but only in his inclinations and behaviour.]—so that he howls and bites like a wolf, eats raw meat, runs into the fields, avoids human society, &c. So Nebuchadnezzar, imagining himself an ox, grazed on herbs, butted as with horns, let his hair and nails grow, lowed, went naked, and imitated the actions of an ox. His people, astonished at such a change, bound him, as madmen or idiots are bound; but he fled into the fields, [park, or garden of his palace] living there naked, exposed to the dew of heaven, and all other inclemencies of the weather, so that his hair grew like the feathers of an eagle, and his nails like the claws of a lion. Nothing more is required, to account for all that Scripture says of Nebuchadnezzar. There was nothing miraculous in this; except the warning of this distemper, and Daniel's prediction of it, its approach and its conclusion, just at the time marked by the prophet.

A question is moved concerning the duration of this disease. Some, as Theodoret, maintain, that the Persians distinguishing their years into two seasons, winter and summer, the seven years of Nebuchadnezzar must be reckoned in this manner, which will reduce it to three years and an half. Dorotheus, and the spurious Epiphanius, affirm, that in truth God had condemned Nebuchadnezzar to a seven years' habitation with the brutes, but that, at the instances of Daniel, the seven years were reduced to seven months. The false Epiphanius adds, that as Daniel constantly foretold to the great men of Chaldaea, that Nebuchadnezzar should again ascend the throne, and as the courtiers disbelieved and derided these predictions, in order to convince them, he obtained of God by his prayers that this time might be shortened. Others maintain, that this prince was changed into an ox only twenty-one months. They explain the seven "times" of Daniel, of seven times the space of three months; Tempus according to them being a quarter of a year, or three months. Peter Comestor makes it but seven months.

But we seek no other interpreter for Daniel, than Daniel himself. It is certain, that this prophet by Tempus, "a time," means a year. E. gr. to denote the space of three years and a half, he says, Tempus & tempora & dimidium temporis; we find the same way of speaking in the Revelations, and in the same sense.

NEBUCHADONOSAR, נְבוּכַדְרֶצַּר or NEBUCHADREZZAR. Tears, or anguish of generation; from בָּכָה bacah, and צָר tzar, as above, and דֹּר dor, generation.

NEBUSHASBAN, נְבוּשַׁשְׁבַּן, word, or prophecy that expands: from נָבָא prophecy, and צָב zub, to run out: otherwise, fruits that spread, or run out; from תְּבוּאָה thebuaah, fruits, and צָב zub, to expand: according to the Hebrew and Syriac, fruits of deliverance.

NEBUSHASBAN, or NABUSESBAN, general of Nebuchadnezzar, went with Nebuzaradan to take Jeremiah out of prison. Jer. xxxix. 13.

NEBUZAR-ADAN, נְבוּזַרְאֲדָן, fruits, or prophecies of judgment: or winnowed, or spread; from נָבָא niba, prophecy, and תְּבוּאָה thebuaah, fruits, and דָּן dun, judgment, and צָרָח zarah, to winnow. Compounded of the word Nebo, or Nabo, a deity of the Babylonians. [Lord of the splendor of Nebu, the god of science? From Nebu, the Deity, נָ, contracted from נֹר, splendor, and אֲדָן, adon, lord.]

NEBUZAR-ADAN,

NEBUZAR-ADAN, or NABUZARDAN, general of Nebuchadnezzar's armies, and chief officer of his household. He conducted the siege of Jerusalem, and took the city, while Nebuchadnezzar was at Riblah in Syria. Having plundered the city and the temple, he set them on fire. Afterwards, he assembled the captives at Ramah, and suffered Jeremiah and Baruch to go where they pleased; according to the king's order, Jer. xxxix. 11—24. xl. 1—6. The other captives he carried to Babylon, leaving Gedaliah to govern the miserable remains of Judah. Some have thought that Nebuzar-adan gave Jeremiah the ark of the covenant, the golden candlestick, the tables of incense, and of shew-bread, and that this prophet hid them in a cave of Mount Nebo, in the land of Moab. But this opinion is very uncertain.

Four years after Jerusalem was taken, while Nebuchadnezzar was engaged at the siege of Tyre, Nebuzar-adan brought to Babylon seven hundred and forty-five captives more. He afterwards marched against the Ammonites, wasted their country, and brought their king and princes captives to Babylon. Scripture makes no farther mention of him.

NECESSITY. This word is taken, not only for the need of several things, but also for perplexity, trouble, or disquiet, whether we be afflicted inwardly, or assaulted by our enemies outwardly, or in difficulty, &c. It sometimes answers to the Hebrew word zarah, angustia, and to mezukah, coarctatio, Judg. xi. 7. Jerom has often used necessitas, to express a thing that must be done immediately. But especially in the Psalms necessitates is put for angustia. Wisd. xviii. 21. it is said of Aaron, restitit iræ, & finem imposuit necessitati; he caused the dreadful plague to cease, with which God had visited his people, on occasion of the rebellion of Korah. Also chap. xix. 4. ducebat illos digna necessitas; the Egyptians were urged, as it were, into their calamity, by a kind of fatal necessity, of which their hardness of heart rendered them worthy.

St. Paul often speaks of the necessities of the saints, or of the new converts, who were in a true and real poverty.

The word necessary does not always denote an absolute necessity, but a necessity of decency, or of duty, or merely something useful and advantageous. So Matt. xviii. 7. "It must needs be that offences come;" God suffers them to come, and makes them subservient to his glory. And Tob. xii. 3. It was necessary, it was expedient, that you should be proved by temptation. And Luke xiv. 18. "I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see

VOL. II. PART XX Edit. IV.

it;" it is convenient that I go to see it. [We often use the word must in English in the same sense; I must do such a thing—i. e. it is fit and proper I should do it.]

NECHO, נֶכּוֹ, lame, or who was beaten.

[The deformity of person implied in the appellation lame, might be thought somewhat rudely applied to a king: it is, however, certain, that the famous Tamerlane was properly called Timur lenk, i. e. lame Timur; and both the Arabic and the Egyptian agree in assigning the import of this name to Necho: it should seem, nevertheless, that he must have had some other cognomen, by which to be distinguished, —even though he were lame from his birth: but of that we are ignorant.]

NECHO, or NECHAO, king of Egypt. This prince carried his arms to the Euphrates, where he conquered the city of Carchemish. He is known not only in Scripture, but by Herodotus, who says that Necho was son of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, and having succeeded him in the kingdom, he raised great armies, and sent out great fleets, as well on the Mediterranean sea as the Red sea; that he fought the Syrians near the city of Migdol, obtained the victory, and took the city Cadytis. The learned are not agreed about this city Cadytis. Some think it to be Cades in Arabia Petrea; others Jerusalem, called Cadyta or Cadytis, i. e. the Holy City, because of its temple. Others say, it is the city Cedes in Galilee, of Naphtali. See CADYTIS and MIGDOL. 2 Chr. xxv. 2 Kings xxiii.

Josiah, king of Judah, being a tributary to the king of Babylon, opposed Necho, who said to him, "What have I to do with thee, king of Judah? The Lord has commanded me to make war against another people." It is thought that Necho had received an admonition from Jeremiah, to march against Carchemish. [Or, this might be this Egyptian's manner of expressing his being commissioned by Providence.] Josiah would not hear the remonstrances of Necho, but gave him battle at Megiddo, where he received the wound of which he died. The people of Jerusalem set up Jehoahaz or Joachaz, for king of Judah, and Necho passed forwards, without making any long stay in Judæa.

But on his return, he halted at Riblah in Syria; and sending for Jehoabaz king of the Jews, he deposed him, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt. Then coming to Jerusalem, he set up Eliakim or Jehoiakim in his place, and exacted the payment of one hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold. Jeremiah, xlv. 2, acquaints us, that Carchemish was retaken by Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, in the fourth year of Jehoiachin king of Judah; so that Necho did not retain his conquest above four years. Josephus adds, that the king of Babylon pursuing his victory, brought under his dominion the whole country, between the river Euphrates and Egypt, excepting Judaea. Thus Necho was again reduced within the limits of his own country.

NECROMANCY, consists in raising up the ghosts of individuals deceased: as the witch of Endor professed. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7. The word necromancy is not in Scripture, but Moses forbids the Israelites from having recourse to diviners, who consult the dead. Deut. xviii. 11. נִדְּשׁ אֶל הַמֵּתִים. Non inveniatur in te, qui quaeratur à mortuis veritatem. The enchantress that raised up Samuel is called Baalath-ob, בַּעֲלַת אֹב, Mistress of Ob. The word Ob in Scripture, expresses a diviner, a magician, a necromancer, a ventriloquist, one who speaks in his belly, and thereby deceives the simple, making them believe that the voice issues out of the earth, as if from the dead. "Your voice shall be as that of an Ob, which speaks out of a depth of the earth," says Isaiah, to Jerusalem, chap. xxix. 4. Heb. You shall mutter, whisper, not daring to speak out; but with an obscure and hollow voice, as if rising from below ground. Necromancers were condemned to death, Levit. xx. 6. and Saul in pursuance of this law had extirpated them: but, it may be seen by the Kings and Chronicles, that they were but too numerous afterwards, and that the law was very ill observed in this article, as in many others.

The Rabbins think that necromancers used the bones of the dead in their invocations, and chiefly the skull. They offered incense to it, and did not leave off calling the ghost, till the dead appeared to them, or till some Demon taking the shape of the dead, presented himself, and gave an answer. In the History of the Pythoness of Endor, we do not find that she used any thing but words. Several have been of opinion, that the art of the necromancers consisted only in trick and juggling, or was at most an illusion of the devil; and that the spirits of the dead were never really raised. Some even believe, that Samuel appeared neither to Saul, nor to the witch; but that the sorceress abused the credulity of that prince, and his perplexity. See SAMUEL.

NEDABIAH, נִדְּבִיָּה, gift, or vow of the Lord, or the good pleasure of the Lord, or that offers himself to the Lord; from נָדַב nadab: otherwise, prince of the Lord; from נָדִיב nadib, and יָהּ jah, Lord. Son of Jeconiah. 1 Chr. iii. 18.

NEGINOTH, נִגְנוֹת. This term is read before some of the Psalms. It signifies stringed-instruments of music, to be played on by the fingers, or by female musicians; and the titles of these Psalms, may be thus translated; A Psalm of David to the master of music, who presides over the stringed instruments.

NEHEL, or NEHELAM, or rather NAHAL. Shemaiah, a false prophet of Judah, was of Nehe-lam. Jer. xxix. 24. Nehelamith may signify a dream. Thus Shemaiah the Nehelamite may signify Shemaiah the dreamer. We know a city called Nahallal or Nahalol in Zebulun. Joshua xix. 15. Judges i. 30. Perhaps Shemaiah may have been of this city.

NEHELAMITE, נְהֻלָּמִי, dreamer, or dream; from נְהַלָּה chalam: otherwise, vale or brook, or inheritance of the waters; from נָחַל nachal, brook, &c.

NEHEL-ESHCOL, נְהַל-אֶשְׁכּוֹל, Φάραγξ βότρυος, The brook, or vale of the cluster; or of the grape; from נָחַל nachal, a brook, or vale, and אֶשְׁכּוֹל eshcol, a bunch of grapes.

NEHEL-ESCHOL, a name given to that valley of the Land of Promise, wherein the spies of Israel gathered the bunch of grapes, which they brought to the camp at Kadesh, on a pole between two men. Numb. xiii. 23. Nehel-eschol was in the south of the promised land.

NEHEMIAH, נְחֻמְיָה, consolation, or repentance of the Lord; from נָחַם nacham: otherwise, rest of the Lord; from נָחַח nuach, rest: or, conduct of the Lord; from נָחַה nachah, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

NEHEMIAH, or NEEMIAS, son of Hachaliah, was born at Babylon during the captivity. He was, according to some, of the race of the priests; according to others, of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family. Those who maintain the first opinion, support it by 2 Macc. i. 18, 21. where it is said, Nehemiah the priest offered sacrifices; also Esdras x. 10. he is reckoned in the number of the priests. But those who believe that he was of the race of the kings of Judah, say, 1st, That Nehemiah having governed the republic of the Jews for a considerable time, there is great probability he was of that tribe of which the kings always were. 2dly, Nehemiah mentions his brethren Hanani, and other Jews, who coming to Babylon during the captivity, acquainted him with the sad condition of their country. 3dly, The office of cup-bearer to the king of Persia, to which Nehemiah was promoted, is a proof that he was of an illustrious family. 4thly, He excuses himself from entering into the inner part of the temple, probably because he was only a Laic. "Should such a man as I flee? And who is there that being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life?"

life?" Neh. vi. 11. [This latter argument appears to be very inconclusive.]

As to the Maccabees, where he is mentioned as a priest, it is answered, that the Greek text does not affirm him to be a priest, but only that Nehemiah ordered the priests to perform their functions. As to his singing among the priests, this he might do in quality of governor, which gave him at least equal rank with the priests. Lastly, the name of Nehemiah is found in no catalogue, or genealogy of Hebrew priests.

Scripture gives him the name, or title, of Tirshatha, i. e. cup-bearer; which office he held at the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He had a great affection for the country of his fathers, though he had never seen it; and one day, as some Jews newly come from Jerusalem acquainted him with the miserable state of that city, in its destruction, he fasted, prayed, and humbled himself before the Lord, intreating that he would be favourable to the design he conceived, of asking the king's permission to rebuild Jerusalem. The course of his attendance at court being come, he presented the cup to the king, according to his duty, but with a dejected countenance. The king entertained some suspicion at it, thinking he had some evil design. But Nehemiah discovering the occasion of his disquiet, Artaxerxes gave him leave to go to Jerusalem, and to repair its walls and gates; but appointed him a time to return.

Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem with letters and full powers, but was there three days before he opened the occasion of his journey. On the night of the third day he went round the city, and viewed the walls. After this he assembled the chief of the people, produced his commission and letters, exhorted them to undertake the repairing of the gates and walls of the city: and immediately all began the work. The enemies of the Jews only scoffed at them at first, but afterward, seeing the chief breaches repaired, they used stratagems and threats to deter Nehemiah. He therefore ordered part of his people to stand to their arms behind the walls, while others worked, having also their arms near them. His enemies then had recourse to craft and stratagem, endeavouring to draw him into an ambuscade in the fields, where they proposed to finish their dispute at an amicable conference. But Nehemiah gave them to understand, that the work he had begun required his close personal attendance, and therefore he could not come out to them.

About the same time he discovered, that a false prophet, called Shemaiah, had been corrupted by his enemies, and that some of the chief of the city were secretly in confederacy with them. All this did not discourage him; he continued his work, and happily completed it in fifty-two days.

Then he dedicated the walls, the towers, and the gates of Jerusalem, with solemnity and magnificence. He separated the priests, the Levites, and the princes of the people, into two companies, one of which walked to the south, and the other to the north, on the top of the walls. These two companies were to meet at the temple. The procession was accompanied with music, vocal and instrumental. When all were come to the temple, they there read the law, offered sacrifices, and made great rejoicings: and the Feast of Tabernacles happening at the time, it was celebrated with great solemnity. Nehemiah observing that the city was too large for its present inhabitants, ordered that the chief of the nation should there fix their dwelling; and caused them to draw lots, by which a tenth part of the whole people of Judah were obliged to dwell at Jerusalem.

Then Nehemiah applied himself to the reforming of such corruptions, as had crept into public affairs. He curbed the inhumanity of the great, who held in slavery and subjection the sons and daughters of the poor or unfortunate, keeping also the lands, which the poor had mortgaged or sold to them.

He undertook to dissolve the marriages with strange and idolatrous women, and sent away all such. He obliged the people punctually to pay the ministers of the Lord their due, and enjoined the priests and Levites to strict attendance on their respective duties, and functions. He enforced the observation of the sabbath, and would not admit strangers to enter the city to buy and sell, but kept the gates shut the whole day. And to perpetuate as much as possible these good regulations, he engaged the chief men of the nation solemnly to renew their covenant with the Lord:—an instrument to this effect was drawn up, and signed, by the principal men, of the priests and the people.

We read 2 Macc. i. 19, 20, 21, &c. that Nehemiah sent to search for the holy fire, which before the captivity of Babylon the priests had hid in a dry and deep pit; not finding any fire there, but instead thereof a thick and muddy water, he sprinkled this upon the altar; and presently the wood which had been so sprinkled, took fire as soon as the sun began to shine. [Vide NAPHTHA.] Which miracle coming to the knowledge of the king of Persia, he caused the place to be encompassed with walls where the fire had been hid, and granted great favours and privileges to the priests. It is recorded in the same books, that Nehemiah erected a library, wherein he placed whatever he could find, either of the books of the prophets, of David, or of such princes as had made presents to the temple. Lastly, he returned to Babylon, according to his promise to king Artaxerxes, about the thirty-second year of that prince. But afterwards he revisited Jerusalem, where he died in peace, having governed the people of Judah about thirty years.

The second book, which in the Latin bibles bears the name of Esdras, in the Hebrew bears the name of Nehemiah. This author speaks almost always in the first person; and at first reading one would think he had writ it day by day; but, if we read it with due attention, we may observe several things, which could not have been written by Nehemiah. For example, memorials are quoted, wherein were registered the names of the priests in the time of Jonathan, son of Eliashib, and even to the times of Jeddoah or Jaddus, who lived under Darius Codomannus, and under Alexander the Great. It is therefore very probable, that Nehemiah wrote memoirs of his government, which are cited 2 Macc. ii. 18. and that from these memoirs this book has been compiled.

[Mr. Whiston supposes that Nehemiah's library, with augmentations, continued in the temple till the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; from which prince Josephus received a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, fuller in many respects than our common copies. This may be true, at least so far as concerns the preservation of the original writings of Nehemiah himself.]

NEHILOTH, or NECHILOTH. This word is found at the beginning of the 50th Psalm, and signifies the dances, or the flutes. This Psalm is addressed to the master who presided over the dances, which were performed in certain religious ceremonies, or the band of music which performed on the flute. The title of the 50th Psalm may be thus translated, A Psalm of David, addressed to the master of music presiding over the dancers, or over the flutes.

NEHUSHTA, נחשטא, Νεβησταν, snake, soothsayer, or of brass; from נחש or נחש nachash. Daughter of Elnathan, and mother of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, 2 Kings xxiv. 8. [A bond of brass, to the parents? She was herself taken in bonds, fetters of brass, to Babylon, ib. verse 15. Jer. xxii. 26.]

NEHUSHTAN, נחשטן, which is of brass or copper; by derision, a trifle of brass; from נחש nachash. [the long creature, of brass?]

NEHUSHTAN. This name Hezekiah, king of Judah, gave to the brazen serpent, that Moses had set up in the wilderness, Numb. xxi. 8. and which had been preserved by the Israelites to this time. The superstitious people having made an idol of this serpent, Hezekiah caused it to be burnt, and in derision gave it the name of Nohestan, q. d. this little brazen serpent. 2 Kings xvi. 8. Vide SERPENT and PUNON. Comp. TANNIM, PLATES. [The triple serpent of brass formerly in the temple of Apollo, at Delphi, is still extant at Constantinople.]

NEIEL, נעיל, Ναιλ, shaking or motion of God; from נע nuah, to shake, and נע el, God. A city of Ashur, Josh. xix. 27.

[Some suppose, "a city firmly locked, or barred up, by God."]

NEIGHBOUR. Propinquus or proximus, signifies near relations, countrymen, those of the same tribe, or vicinage, and generally, all men connected by the bonds of humanity, and whom charity requires that we should consider as friends and relations. So Gen. xxiv. 41. says Abraham to Eliezer: When you shall arrive at my relations, my kindred. So Gen. xi. 3, 7. One said to another, one neighbour to another. So Levit. xxv. 25. If his neighbour, he that is of the same tribe, and of the same family, has a mind to redeem the field that was sold.

Propinquus is used in this sense throughout the book of Joshua, xx. 5, He killed a man at unawares. Judg. vii. 13, One soldier related his dream to his comrade.

At the time of our Saviour, the Pharisees had restrained the word neighbour to those of their own nation, or to their own friends; holding, that to hate their enemy was not forbid by the law, Matth. v. 43. Luke x. 29. But our Saviour informed them, that the whole world were neighbours; that they ought not to do to another, what they would not have done to themselves; that they ought to love all men as themselves; and that this charity extended even to enemies. See the beautiful parable of the good Samaritan: the real neighbour to the distressed. Luke x. 29.

God is a neighbour [near] to those who fear him, and call upon him, Psal. lxxxv. 9. cxlv. 18. He gives them tokens of his presence and protection. Am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off? am I one of those Gods that men have made not above two days ago? am not I an eternal God? Otherwise, I am a neighbour-God, that sees every thing, knows every thing, and not an absent, or a distant God, Jerem. xxiii. 23. Comp. Elijah and Baal's prophets.

NEKEB, נקב, Νεκβεβ, that bores or pierces, [an opening.] or that curses. [nomination, or explication.] A city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 33. the same as Adami.

[Probably this opening was something of a cave or grotto: or, this city might be named from from such a place in its vicinity. The import of the Chaldee and Syriac roots countenances this suggestion. Such places, and names derived from them, are frequent in the Holy Land. Comp. Reland, Palestin. p. 545.]

NEKODA, נקדא, painted, spotted of several colours: from נקד naked: otherwise, which is crooked, or shepherd that goads the cattle; from קד kadad: otherwise, burning; from קדח kadach.

NEMUEL, נמואל, נמול, or JAMUEL. God that sleeps, or sleep of God; from נמ, num, sleep, and אל el, God: otherwise, from the Arabic נמה namah, increase, and אל el, God. JAMUEL, God is his day; from יום jom, day, and the pronoun י o, his: otherwise, sea of God; from ים jam, the sea, and אל el, God.

I. NEMUEL, or NAMUEL, son of Eliab, of Reuben, brother of Dathan, and Abiram. Numb. xxvi. 9.

II. NEMUEL, or Jemuel, son of Simeon, head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 12.

NEOMENIA, Νεομηνια, new-moon; Coloss. ii. 16. A Greek word, signifying the first day of the moon or month, according to the Hebrews. From νέος, new, and μήν, month.

NEOMENIA. The Hebrews had a particular veneration for the first day of every month, and Moses appointed peculiar sacrifices for the day. Numb. xxviii. 11, 12. But he gave no orders that it should be kept as a holy day. Nor can it be proved, that the ancients observed it so: it was a festival of merely voluntary devotion. It appears that even from the time of Saul they made, on this day, a sort of family entertainment, since David ought then to have been at the king's table; and Saul took his absence amiss. 1 Sam. xx. 5, 16. Moses insinuates, that besides the national sacrifices then regularly offered, every private person had his particular sacrifices of devotion, Numb. x. 10. The beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at the offering of the solemn sacrifices. (ib.) But the most celebrated neomenia was that at the beginning of the civil year, or first day of the month Tizri, Levit. xxiii. 24. This was a sacred day, on which no servile labour was performed; on this they offered public, or national burnt-sacrifices, and sounded the trumpets in the temple.

In the kingdom of the ten tribes, the serious among the people used to assemble at the houses of the prophets, to hear their instructions. The Shunamite, who entertained Elisha, proposing to visit that prophet, her husband said to her; Why do you go to day, since it is neither sabbath, nor new-moon? 2 Kings iv. 23. Isaiah declares, i. 13, 14. that the Lord abhors the new-moons, the sabbaths, and other days of festival and assembly of those Jews, who in other things neglected his laws. Ezekiel says, xlv. 17. vide also 1 Chr. xxiii. 31. 2 Chron. viii. 13. that the burnt-offerings offered on the day of the new moon, were provided at the king's expence, and that on this day was to be opened the eastern gate of the court of the priests, Ezek. xlvi. 1, 2. Judith kept no fast on festival days, or on the new-moon, Judith viii. 6. The modern Jews keep the neomenia only as a feast of devotion, to be observed, or not, at pleasure. They think it rather belongs to the women than to the men. The women forbear work, and indulge a little more on this day than on others. In the prayers of the synagogue, they read from Psalm 113 to 118. They bring forth the roll of the law, and read therein to four persons. They call to remembrance the sacrifice, that on this day used to be offered in the temple. On the evening of the sabbath which follows the new moon, or some other evening following, when the new moon first appears, the Jews assemble, and pray to God, as the Creator of the planets, and the restorer of the new moon; raising themselves towards heaven, they intreat of God to be preserved from misfortune; then after mentioning David, they salute each other, and separate.

Spencer has a long dissertation on the Neomenia, in which he shews very well, that the Gentiles honoured the first day of the month, out of veneration to the moon. He would infer, that the Hebrews borrowed this practice from strange and idolatrous people. But he by no means proves this; and it is much more probable, that without any design of imitating the Hebrews, the Gentiles thought fit to honour the moon at the beginning of the month, i. e. her first appearance: this worship of the moon was general among many nations. [and the Druids.]

NEOPHYTE, Νεόφυτος, literally a new plant, or newly planted; from νέος, new, and φυτος, a plant. Vide NOVICE. [newly-baptized.]

NEPHATH-DOR, נפתח-דור, Νεφάθωρ, honeycomb of the habitation, [or habitation of the honeycomb,] or of the generation; from נופ nuph, honeycomb, and דור dur or dor, abode, or generation: otherwise, distillation, or sieve of the habitation, or of the generation; from nuph, and dor.

[A city in Manasseh, called also Dor, 1 Kings, iv. 11. where is corruptly read Nephad-Dor. From the Hebrew it might be rendered—in all the confines of Dor. Eng. Tr. “in all the regions of Dor.”] from נד phug. Son of David, 2 Sam. v. 15. 1 Chron. iii. 7. xiv. 6.

NEPHEG, נפג נאִפִּי, weak, feeble, faint; from

NEPHI, נִפְתָּי, Naphthar, purification; perhaps from נִפְּחַנָּה nuph, to winnow, to sift.

NEPHI. So several writers name that place, where Nehemiah found the pit where the holy fire had been hidden, 2 Macc. i. 36. But copies vary the word Nephi: the Syriac and Greek of the Roman edition read Naphtali; the Alexandrian MS. and other Greek copies, Nephtar. Comp. what is said under NAPHTHA.

NEPHTOAH, נִפְתּוֹחַ, Naphtō, opening, [or opened,] or sculpture; from פָּתַח pathach.

NEPHTOAH. A spring, well, or fountain, in Benjamin, Josh. xv. 9. Travellers are shewn a fountain, as the fountain of Nephtoah, near to which was formerly a church dedicated to John the Baptist, because it is believed that Zechariah and Elizabeth dwelt there, to whose use this fountain served.

[It might be a city deriving its name from a fountain; or perhaps the import is, the "water of opening." Comp. Zech. xiii. 1. and contra Gen. xxix. 2, 3. Cant. iv. 12.]

NEPHUSIM, נִפְּסִים, who are crumbled, or reduced to dust: from פָּסַס pasas.

NER, נֵר, lamp, brightness: otherwise, land newly tilled; from נִיר nir. Son of Abiel, and father of Abner, general of Saul's armies, 1 Sam. xiv. 50, 51. He was related to king Saul.

NEREUS, Νηρέας, light, or land newly tilled.

NEREUS. St. Paul, Rom. xv. 15. salutes Nereus and his sister. Some believe that this is the Nereus, whose fast is kept as of a martyr, with St. Achillæus, May 12. But there is little probability that the Nereus, mentioned by St. Paul, should have lived to the time of Trajan, fifty years; in which time the martyrdoms of Nereus and Achillæus are placed. However, the thing is not absolutely impossible. The acts of Nereus and Achillæus being works of no authority, we think it improper to extract from them.

NERGAL, נֵרְגַל, Νηργέλ, spy, or watchman; from רָגַל ragal: otherwise, light discovered, or preserved; from נֵר ner, light, and גָּלַל galal, to discover: otherwise, land newly cultivated, or discoveries; from נִיר nir, new-ploughed land, and גָּלַל galal, to discover. [revolving light.]

NERGAL, or NEREGAL, a god of the Cuthites, 2 Kings xvii. 30. The Rabbins, followed by some interpreters, think the god Nergal was worshipped under the shape of a wooden hen. Others, that the Cuthites adored fire, and maintained a perpetual fire on their altars, in honour of the sun. Ner signifies a lamp. Vide FRAG. No. CCXII. and PLATE. Comp. NERIG.

NERGAL-SHAREZER, a general of Nebuchadnezzar, Jerem. xxxix. 8. [the splendid light, revolving, or, morning splendor rising.]

NERI, Νηρι, my light.

NERIAH, נֵרְיָה, Νηριος, light, or land, of the Lord, or the Lord is my [rising] light; from נֵר ner. (See NER,) and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. NERIAH, or Neri, father of the prophet Baruch, Jer. xxxii. 12, &c.

II. NERI, son of Melchi, and father of Sala-thiel, Luke iii. 27.

NERIGLISSAR, or NIGLISSOR; he succeeded Evilmerodach, according to Berosus. See NIGLISSOR.

[NERIG, is a Syro-Chaldean term expressing a deity; from נֵרְגַל, nerga, a battle-axe, or spear: the Arabic has the same idea, but changes the term to the long bow; the bow that by its strength shoots an arrow to a great distance: it denotes, metaphorically, the planet Mars. From this, some derive נֵרְגַל, Nergal; which they understand of the deity of punishment, or force, whence they arm him with a scourge and cord: they also arm the god Mars, in like manner, with a spear and a scourge, or rod; and attribute to him all the evils and horrors of war; as so many punishments inflicted on the guilty. It is, therefore, probable, that the foregoing name of a king of Babylon, includes the name of a deity, as do many others, Nebuchadnezzar, &c.]

NERO. This prince is not named in Scripture; but is indicated by his title of emperor, and by his surname Cæsar:—for, to Nero St. Paul appealed after his imprisonment by Felix, and his examination by Festus, who was swayed by the Jews. St. Paul was therefore carried to Rome, where he arrived in February, A. D. 60. Here he continued two years, preaching the gospel with freedom, till he became famous even in the emperor's court, in which were a good number of Christians: for he salutes the Philippians in the name of the brethren who were of the household of Cæsar, that is, of Nero's court, Philip. iv. 22. i. 12, 13. We have no particular information how he cleared himself from the accusations of the Jews, when answering before Nero, or whether his enemies dropped their prosecutions;—[which seems probable from Acts xxviii. 21.] but this is certain, that he was liberated A. D. 62.

St. Paul returned to Rome A. D. 65, the 11th of Nero: having, it is said, converted a concubine [his cup-bearer, οὐνοχοον, also, Chrysost.] of this prince, he was imprisoned by him. He appeared before him, forsaken by every body on that important trial; but God delivered him at this time "out of the mouth of the lion," 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17. He appeared before him subsequently ly, and was condemned to be beheaded A. D. 66. The apostle Peter was also apprehended, and put to death by order of the same prince, at the same time.

Nero is reckoned the first persecutor of the Christian church; A. D. 64. Nero, the most cruel, and savage of men, also the most wicked and depraved, began his persecution on pretence of the burning of Rome, of which crime all thought himself to be the author. He endeavoured to throw the odium on the Christians; those were seized first who were known publicly as such, and by their means many others were discovered. They were condemned to death, and insult was added to their sufferings. Some were sewed up in skins of beasts, and then exposed to dogs to be torn in pieces: others were nailed to crosses; others perished by flames; [they were sewed up in pitched coverings, which being set on fire, served as torches to the people] and were lighted up in the night time. Nero permitted his own gardens to be the scene of all these cruelties. From this time edicts were published against the Christians, and many martyrs suffered, especially in Italy. We have mentioned the death of St. Peter and St. Paul, consequent on this persecution; which probably continued to the demise of Nero, A. D. 68, the 14th of this emperor, who killed himself the 9th or 11th of June. The revolt of the Jews from the Romans happened about A. D. 65 and 66, the 12th and 13th of Nero. The city of Jerusalem making an insurrection A. D. 66, Florus slew there 3,600 persons, and thus began the war. Not long afterwards the people of Jerusalem killed the Roman garrison. Cestius on this came to Jerusalem, to suppress the sedition; but was forced to retire, after having besieged it about six weeks, and was routed in his retreat, November 8, A. D. 66. About the end of the same year Nero gave Vespasian the command of his troops against the Jews. This general carried on the war in Galilee, and Judæa, during A. D. 67 and 68, the 13th and 14th of Nero. But Nero killing himself the 14th year of his reign, Jerusalem was not besieged till after his death, A. D. 70, the 1st and 2d of Vespasian.

NERONIAS. Josephus says, that the younger Agrippa gave the name of Neronias to the city of Paneas, near the source of Jordan.

[NESIB, standing, or a station, or erect; i. e. as a mark, or inscription; Syriac, plantation.

A city of Judah. Josh. xv. 43.

A military station, perhaps; denoted by a token of some kind, whether a banner, or flag, standing erect.

The same sense, probably, attaches to the name Nisibis or Nisibin: the military stations, præsidia.]

[NETHANEEL, vide NATHANIEL. Several persons of this name are mentioned in the Old Testament.]

NETHANIAH, נְתַנְיָהּ, gift of the Lord; from נָתַן nathan, a gift, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

I. NETHANIAH, or NATHANIAS, of the blood royal of Judah, and father of Ishmael, who slew Gedaliah, 2 Kings xxv. 23.

II. NETHANIAH, a Levite, head of the fifth band of musicians, 1 Chron. xxv. 2, 12.

NETHINIM, נְתִינִים, given, or offered; from nathan, to give. Servants given and dedicated to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the most laborious offices; as carrying of wood and water. At first the Gibeonites were destined to this station: afterwards, the Canaanites who surrendered themselves, and whose lives were spared. We read, Ezra viii. 20. that the nethinim were slaves devoted by David, and other princes, to the service of the temple; and Ezra ii. 58. that they were slaves given by Solomon: the children of Solomon's servants. And we see, 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. that that prince had subdued the remains of the Canaanites. It is very probable, that he gave a good number of them to the priests and Levites, for the temple service. The nethinim were carried into captivity with the tribe of Judah, and great numbers were placed not far from the Caspian sea, whence Ezra brought 220 of them, Ez. viii. 17. At the return from the captivity, they dwelt in cities appointed for their residence. There were some also at Jerusalem, who inhabited that part of the city called Ophel. Those that followed with Zerubbabel made up three hundred ninety-two. Nehem. iii. 26. This number was but small in regard to their offices; so that we find afterwards, a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple, with great ceremony, to keep up the fire of the altar of burnt sacrifices, Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17. sen la in Græco.

NETOPHA, נְטוּפָה, Netwphâb, drop, distillation, amber, myrrh, or gum, &c. from nataph: otherwise, inclination of the mouth; from נָתַן natah, and פֶּה pe, the mouth.

[Perhaps, this name imports dripping, or dropping. So we have a famous dropping-well near Knaresborough in Yorkshire. But springs dropping from the clefts of rocks are by no means uncommon.]

NETOPHA, NETUPHA, NETUPHAT, or NETOPHATHI, a city and country between Bethlehem and Anathoth, Ezra ii. 22. Neh. vii. 26. Jer. xi. 8.

xi. 8. and 1 Chron. ix. 16. We find several persons in Scripture, natives of Netopha.

NETOPHATI, son of Salma, 1 Chron. ii. 54. Probably this Netophati was father of the inhabitants of Netuphat. 2 Sam. xxiii. 28.

NEW, is put for extraordinary or unusual. The Lord has chose a new method of making war; says Deborah, in her song, Judg. v. 8. "If the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up," you shall thereby know that they have blasphemed the Lord, Numb. xvi. 30. And Wisdom xv. 3. speaking of manna, says, the Hebrews tasted a new kind of food; God gave them bread from heaven: also, speaking of the quails, Viderunt novam creaturam avium, chap. xix. 11.

God promises a new heaven and a new earth, at the time of the Messiah; Isai. lxv. 17. lxvi. 22. that is, a universal renovation of manners, sentiments, and actions, throughout the world. This passage is also referred to the end of the world; when will commence a new heaven and a new earth; not that the present heaven and earth will be annihilated; but the air, the earth, and the elements will be more perfect, or at least, together with the inhabitants, shall be of a nature superior to those vicissitudes and alterations, that now affect these elements.

God also promises to his people "a new covenant, a new spirit, a new heart;" and this promise was fulfilled, in the covenant of grace, the Gospel, Ezek. xi. 19. xviii. 31. xxxvi. 26.

A new hymn, a new song; things of this kind generally please, the more they have the character of novelty.

God says he is going to create a new thing on the earth, a woman shall compass a man, which has been understood of the conception of the Messiah. Jerem. xxxi. 22. Several of the moderns understand it otherwise. I am going to do a new thing in Israel: hereafter women shall seek men in marriage. Vide MARRIAGE. [But it is thought the word rendered to compass should be rendered to turn about—a woman shall repel—discomfit—turn away a man, a strong man, a hero.]

NEW MOON. See NEOMENIA.

NEZIAH, נִזְיָה, Νεζία. victorious, strong, or eternal; from netzac. Ezra ii. 54. A Nethinim.

NEZIB, נִזִּיב, which stands upright, a statue, or elevated pillar or garrison: from נִזְבִּיב netzib: Syriac, a plant. Josh. xv. 43. a city. See NESIB.

NIBHAZ, נִבְחַז, that fructifies, or that produces vision; from נִבָּה nub, to be fruitful, and נִבָּח chazah, to see: otherwise, to prophecy, to foretel, or to speak; from נִבָּא niba. This is a Medish word; its true etymology is not in the Hebrew. [High, most exalted: Comp. NEBO.]

NIBHAZ, or NEBACHAS, a god of the Hivites, 2 Kings xvii. 31. It is not known who this god was. Literally, it may imply Nebo the seer, the oracle of Nebo. The Rabbins followed by several commentators, think Nebachas had the shape of a dog, something like the Anubis of Egypt:

Omnigenūmq̃ue Deūm monstra et latrator Anubis.

VIRG. Æneid. vi.

Nabac in Hebrew signifies to bark. To support this opinion, they observe that some of the Orientals had a great veneration for the dog. Among the Egyptians whole cities worshipped this animal. The Magians, says Herodotus, differ from the Egyptian priests, for the Egyptians kill no animal, except what they sacrifice to their gods: whereas the Magians slay all kinds of animals, excepting men and dogs. They even think it meritorious to kill great numbers of reptiles, serpents, and other such creatures. They sacrificed a dog to Hecate, (the moon) and this animal was consecrated to her. There was also a dog in the mysteries of Mithras, or the sun; and in a sacrifice to this deity, on an ancient bas-relief, is a dog licking up the blood of the bull. It is said, that Zoroaster inserted among his rules of charity, that dogs were to be protected and loved. The Persians exposed dead bodies to dogs, before they buried them, thinking it a token of happiness, to be drawn about by dogs. This animal is the symbol of fidelity and vigilance; yet I do not know that any one has advanced, that dogs were worshipped any where besides in Egypt. Vide DOG. Comp. Plates, TERAPHIM, LARES.

[It should be observed that the Orientals attributed a great extent of power to this deity, Nibhaz. They place his throne on the earth, on the confines of light and heat; but they conceive that his feet rest on the regions of the dead, on Acheron, and the lower hell. It is very likely, therefore, that the Cerberus attendant on Pluto, the Triple-headed dog of hell,

(*Cerberus hæc ingens latratu regna trifauci
Personat adverso recubans immanis in antro.
Cui vates horrere videns jam colla colubris,
Melle soporatum et medicatis et orgibus offam Objecit.*—VIRG. En. vi. 417.) is the representative, with diminished powers, of the Cuthean Nibhaz. Moreover, this dog, Cerberus, is described by other poets as possessing truly formidable powers: Hesiod calls him, the dog of Hell;

Blood-fed and brasen-voiced, and bold and strong,
The fifty headed Cerberus:—

Pindar doubles this number of heads, and calls him εκατον τα κεφαλον, the hundred headed Cerberus. Nevertheless, usually, his heads are but three.

NIBSHAN, נִבְשָׁן, [discourse,] prophecies: or fruits of sleep, or of change; from נִבָּא, or נִבָּא, and שָׁנָה, to change, and יָשָׁן, to sleep: otherwise, prophecy of the tooth, or of ivory; from שֵׁן, A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 62.

[Simon thinks equal, level, soft, referring to the soil: he derives the name from bashan.]

NICANOR, Νικάνωρ, victorious; from the Greek νικάω, to conquer.

I. NICANOR, son of Patroclus: he returned from Rome with king Antiochus Epiphanes, and had a great share in his favour. 2 Macc. viii. 19. Chap. xiv. 12. says, he was master of the elephants. He was sent into Judæa the first time, A. M. 3839, by Antiochus Epiphanes, or rather by Lysias, who governed for Antiochus, then gone into Persia. Nicanor was sent into Judæa with Gorgias, to counteract Judas Maccabæus. He thought himself so sure of victory, that he pretended to pay the two thousand talents which the king owed the Romans for tribute, with the money that should arise from the sale of Jewish slaves; and sent to the cities on the sea-coast, to invite merchants to come and buy such slaves, promising them fourscore and ten for one talent.

Judas Maccabæus having intelligence of this incursion prepared to resist it, which he did effectually, (vide MACCABÆUS JUDAS) for, distributing his army into four bodies, he gave the command of fifteen hundred men to each of his three brothers, Simon, Joseph, and Jonathan; and having given them for the watch-word, the assistance of God, he put himself at the head of three thousand men, attacked Nicanor, killed above nine thousand of his men, and routed his whole army.

About four years afterwards, when Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus, was come back into Syria, and had ascended the throne of his ancestors, he sent Nicanor into Judæa, with orders to destroy all who should dispute his commands, and to establish Alcimus who had bought the high-priesthood.

At first he endeavoured to get Judas into his power by stratagem, but Judas perceiving the design, withdrew in time. Then he marched against Nicanor with his army, and gave him battle at Capharsalama. Nicanor had about five thousand men killed on the spot, and the rest fled to Jerusalem. He came thither also himself, where he ridiculed the burnt offerings offered for the kings of Syria, treated the priests with contempt, and threatened at his return to burn the temple, if they did not deliver Judas into his hands.

At length he encamped near Bethoron, where he received a reinforcement of Syrian troops. Judas also with his army encamped at Adarna, four miles from Bethoron. The battle was fought the thirteenth day of the month Adar, when Nicanor's army was intirely routed, and himself slain. The Jews cut off Nicanor's head, and his right hand, which he had sacrilegiously stretched out against the temple; these they brought, and hung them up in the sight of Jerusalem, and ordered that for the future, this day should be celebrated as a festival by all Israel. A. M. 3843, ante A. D. 161.

The second book of the Maccabees relates at length this last expedition of Nicanor against Judæa, 2 Macc. xiv.

II. NICANOR, one of the first seven deacons, who were chosen and appointed at Jerusalem soon after the descent of the Holy Ghost, on occasion of a division among the believers, into those who spoke Greek, and those who spoke Hebrew, i. e. Syriac, Acts vi. 5, &c. Nothing particular is known of Nicanor. The Roman martyrology says, he obtained the crown of martyrdom January 10, in the island of Cyprus. The Greeks keep his feast August 27, with that of the saints Procorus, Timon, and Parmenus. Dorotheus says he was put to death with many others the same day as St. Stephen; which insinuates that he suffered martyrdom at Jerusalem, and not in Cyprus. His name is found in the Menæa, December 28.

III. NICANOR, or Nicator. Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, ascended the throne in A. M. 3854, ante A. D. 150. See DEMETRIUS.

NICHES. It is said by the prophet Amos, v. 25. that the Israelites in their wanderings in the wilderness, "bore the tabernacle of their Moloch, and Chiun their images, the star of their gods, which they made to themselves." St. Stephen, Acts vii. 43. upbraids them with the same. It is thought, with great probability, that Moloch, and those other Pagan deities, which they carried with them in the desert, were borne in niches upon men's shoulders, or drawn about in covered carriages, as we know the heathen carried their idols in procession, or in public marches. Some believe that those silver temples of the goddess Diana, which were made and sold at Ephesus, were also these niches, or portable temples, for the devotion of pilgrims. We must a little farther illustrate this piece of antiquity.

The custom of carrying the images of the gods under tents, and in covered litters, came originally originally from the Egyptians. Herodotus speaks of a feast of Isis, wherein her statue was carried on a chariot with four wheels, drawn by her priests. The same author speaking of one of their deities, says, they carried it from one temple to another, inclosed in a little chapel made of gilt wood. Clemens of Alexandria speaks of an Egyptian procession, wherein they carried two dogs of gold, a hawk, and an ibis. The same Father quotes the words of Menander, who rallied those vagrant divinities, that could not continue in one place. Macrobius says, the Egyptian priests carried the statue of Jupiter of Heliopolis on their shoulders, as the gods of the Romans were carried in pomp at the games of the Circus. Philo of Biblos relates, that they used to carry Agrotas, a Phœnician deity, in a covered niche upon a car drawn by beasts. Euseb. Prep. lib. i.

The Egyptian priests placed Jupiter Ammon in a little boat, whence hung plates of silver, by the motion of which they inferred the will of the Deity, and made their responses to such as consulted them. The Egyptians and the Carthaginians, as Servius reports, had little images, which were carried on chariots, and gave oracles by the motion they communicated to those carriages. The Gauls, as we are told by Sulpicius Severus, carried their gods abroad into the fields, covered with a white veil. Tacitus speaks of an unknown Goddess, who resided in an island of the ocean. They keep for her a covered chariot, which none dare approach but her priest: and when he says that the goddess is entered therein, two heifers are harnessed to it, who draw the chariot where they think fit, and then bring it back into her grove. They wash the chariot, also the veils that cover it, and drown the slaves that were employed in the service. Here therefore are examples of gods carried in niches and in chariots. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXIII. DIII. also PLATES of INDIA, No. 3. SIDON, Nos. 8. 9. The car of Jaganauth, and others in the East Indies, will press themselves on the mind of the intelligent reader.]

We must also give some examples of little temples of metal. Diodorus Siculus speaks of two small temples of gold. There was at Lacedæmon, one entirely of brass, and therefore called Chalcotoichos, or the house of brass. Victor in his description of Rome gives instances of some of the same metal in that city; but I should rather think, that the little temples of Diana of Ephesus, which were made and sold by Demetrius the silversmith, were either small models of the temple of this goddess, or niches wherein the goddess herself was represented. NICODEMUS, Νικόδημος, innocent blood; from νῆσι naki, innocent, and αἷμα dam, blood. According to the Greek, victory of the people; from νικάω, to conquer, and δῆμος, the people.

NICODEMUS, a disciple of Jesus Christ; by nation a Jew; by sect a Pharisee, John iii. 1. The gospel calls him a ruler of the Jews; and our Saviour entitles him a master in Israel. When Jesus began to manifest himself by his miracles at Jerusalem, at the first passover after his baptism, Nicodemus came to him by night, for further information. Jesus among other things, observed, that no one could see the kingdom of heaven, except he were born again. Nicodemus taking this literally, answered, How can a man that is old, be born again? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb? Jesus proceeded to explain the nature of this new birth: alluded to the history of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, and hinted at his salutary mission to redeem mankind.

After this conversation Nicodemus became a disciple of Jesus Christ, and no doubt attended to hear him, as often as our Saviour visited Jerusalem. When the priests and Pharisees had sent officers to seize Jesus, who returning to them, reported, that never man spoke as he did; the Pharisees replied, "Are you also of his disciples? Is there any one of the elders or Pharisees that has believed in him?" Then Nicodemus thought himself obliged to answer, saying, Does the law permit us to condemn any one before he is heard? To which they replied, Are you also a Galilean? Read the Scriptures and you will find, that never any prophet came out of Galilee." The council broke up suddenly. Nicodemus declared himself openly a disciple of Jesus Christ, when he came with Joseph of Arimathea to pay the last duties to the body of Christ crucified, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in the sepulchre. So far Scripture relates: But, some say—

Nicodemus received baptism from the disciples of Christ, but it is uncertain whether before or after Christ's passion. The Jews then deposed him from his dignity of senator, excommunicated him, and drove him from Jerusalem. Photius, Cod. 171. It is said also, that they would have put him to death, but that in consideration of Gamaliel, who was his uncle or cousin-german, they contented themselves with beating him almost to death, and plundering his goods. Gamaliel conveyed him to his country-house, provided for his support; and when he died, buried him honourably near St. Stephen. His body was discovered in 415, with those of St. Stephen and Gamaliel, and the Latin church pays honour to all three together, August 3. Vide Lucian, de St. Steph. invent.

There is extant an apocryphal gospel under the name of Nicodemus, which in some MSS. is entitled the Acts of Pilate. But it is very certain this is not what is cited by the ancients under the name of "the Acts of Pilate," which he sent to Tiberius; being modern, and deserving no consideration. At the end of this spurious gospel are these words, which sufficiently shew its falsity. "In the name of the Holy Trinity here end the Acts of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which were found at Jerusalem by Theodosius the Great, in the Pretorium of Pontius Pilate, in the public Acts which were written in the nineteenth year of the emperor Tiberius, and the seventeenth year of Herod, son of Herod, king of Galilee, the eighth day before the kalends of April, which is the twenty-third day of March, in the year of the two hundredth and second Olympiad, under the chief priests Joseph and Caiaphas. Which were brought to the form of a history by Nicodemus, and written in Hebrew after the crucifixion and passion of our Saviour."

NICOLAS, Νικόλαος, Νικολαίται, victory of the people; from νικάω, to overcome, and λαός, the people.

I. NICOLAS, of Damascus, a peripatetic philosopher, poet, and historian, surnamed of Damascus, because a native of that city. He lived in the time of Augustus, a little before the birth of Jesus Christ. He had a great share in the favour of that emperor, and also of Herod the Great, king of the Jews, who employed him in several affairs of consequence, [he was Herod's ambassador to Rome.] of which he always acquitted himself very honourably. Josephus often quotes his history; but in several places accuses him of disguising the truth, in favour of Herod, to whom he had devoted his pen. He wrote a general history, and Josephus quotes something from it, which he had said of Antiochus Epiphanes. Suidas reckoned only eighty books of the history of Nicolas of Damascus. Josephus cites the 124th, and Athenæus reckons as far as 144. He composed several other works. Henry de Valois, published at Paris in 1634, in Greek and Latin, the collection made by Constantine Porphyrogenetus, of the several works of Nicolas of Damascus. These collections belonged to M. de Peiresc, who had caused them to be purchased in the sale of Cyprus.

II. NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, i. e. converted from Paganism to the religion of the Jews. Afterwards he embraced Christianity, and was among the most zealous and most holy of the first Christians; so that he was chosen for one of the seven first deacons of the church at Jerusalem, Acts vi. 5.

His memory has been tarnished in the church by a blemish, from which it has not been possible to clear him, hitherto. Certain heretics were called Nicolaitans, from his name; and though perhaps he had no share in their errors, nor their irregularities, yet he is suspected to have given some occasion to them. This is what the ancients inform us in this matter. He had a wife who was very handsome, and in imitation of those who aimed at a great degree of perfection, he left her, to live in a state of continence. Epiphanius says he did not persevere in this resolution, but took his wife again, and in order to justify this conduct, he advanced principles contrary to truth and purity. He plunged himself into irregularities, and gave beginning to the sect of the Nicolaites, to that of the Gnostics, and to several others, who followed the bent of their natural passions, to crimes and wickednesses.

Epiphanius is supported in this by Irenæus, Tertullian, Hyppolytus, Hilary, Gregory of Nyssa, Phylaster of Bressa, Jerom, Cassian, Gregory the Great, Pacian, pope Gelasius, Gildas, and several moderns, who say that Nicolas the deacon was head and author of the impious and infamous sect of the Nicolaitans.

But Clemens Alexandrinus, who is more ancient than Epiphanius, expresses much esteem for Nicolas; and relates the affair otherwise, Strom. lib. iii. The apostles, says he, having made some reproaches to Nicolas, as being too jealous of his wife, he introduced her before them, and declared that any one might espouse her that pleased. This declaration, made in pure simplicity, and without reflection, was only designed as a proof that his attachment and passion for his wife did not overcome him; and in reality, adds Clement, I have been informed, he never cohabited with any other woman. His son and his daughters, who lived very long, always remained single. But such as were glad to catch at the pretence of his authority, screened themselves under what he had done; in order to palliate and vindicate their irregularities.

These heretics grounded themselves, says the same Clement, on a word that Nicolas let fall, that "the flesh ought to be abused." By which he meant nothing else, but that we ought to controul and suppress our inclinations to sensuality and concupiscence; the passions, and the impetuosities of the flesh; whereas, these disciples of pleasure explained the words according to their own sensuality, and not according to the meaning of this apostolical man. Eusebius having related, that the Nicolaites gloried in having Nicolas the deacon as the author of their sect; he confutes them by this passage of Clemens Alexandrinus. Theodoret does the same, and declares still more openly for the sentiment of Clemens. For, excusing the permission of Nicolas, by which he allowed any one to marry his wife, he says, that the deacon had, in fact, no inclination to realize it, but only intended by this voluntary offer, to confute the murmuring raised against him. St. Austin, Victorinus Petaviensis, Isidorus, and the council of Tours acquit him, likewise. The Apostolical Constitutions, and the interpolated letters of St. Ignatius the martyr, affirm that the Nicolaitans falsely assumed his name.

Cassian says, that some distinguish Nicolas founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans, from Nicolas one of the seven deacons. Jesus Christ, Rev. ii. 6, 15. condemns the actions and the doctrine of the Nicolaitans. He says he hates them; he makes it a merit in the bishop of Ephesus that he abhors them; and he reproaches the bishop of Bergamus that some of his church adopted their doctrine. In all these passages St. John intimates no excuse for Nicolas, nor does he attempt to clear him from the accusation of being the author of the sect of the Nicolaites; and we see that no Christian church has ever paid any honour to the memory of Nicolas, which is a great circumstance against him: [nevertheless, if Nicolas the deacon, were not the same Nicolas as the founder of the sect, this observation is of no force: and it is quite as strong taken the other way: for St. John does not hint at his ever having been in any honourable office, and subsequently behaving unworthily, or becoming depraved, &c. which probably he would have done, had this Nicolas been the deacon.]

[The story of Nicholas the deacon introducing his wife to the Apostles, does not hang well together, since no decent man could act so, and no decent woman would bear it. Such words might drop from him, hypothetically; but, the fact reported must be false. Nor could this Nicholas give beginning to the sect of the Gnostics; that sect undoubtedly, arose from other causes. The Nicolaitans seem to be assimilated in the Revelations, to those who held the doctrine of Balaam, and of Jezebel, which surely could not be said of Nicholas the deacon.]

NICOLAITES, or NICOLAITANS. They were frequent in Asia from the end of the first century: since Jesus Christ expressly condemns them, in the Revelations. St. Irenæus says, that fornication, and the use of meats offered to idols, were held as indifferent things among them. Victorinus Petaviensis says, that they ate these meats after having exorcised them, and forgave fornicators eight days after their offence. Theodoret says, that the two distinguishing characters of this heresy were libertin-ism and folly. Epiphanius gives a long account, of their infamous actions, and their extravagant opinions concerning God and the creation. St. Austin says, that they have women in common, and make no scruple to conform to all the Pagan superstitions. They tell a number of fables about the creation and disposition of the world, intermingling many barbarous names of angels and princes, to amaze their auditors; though to people of understanding they are rather subjects of mirth than of terror. Through all their disguises it is easy to perceive, that they hold, the world was not created by God, but was the work of certain powers, whom they feign with an insupportable temerity, or whom they take for granted, on the credit of others, with a credulity not less blameable.

Irenæus calls them a branch of the Gnostics, and says, it was against them St. John wrote his gospel. Clemens Alexandrinus says, they had a certain book on the authority of which they relied, and by which they imputed to God himself the infamous actions they committed. They continued but a very little time, according to Eusebius; at least, the name of Nicolaites did not continue long: but their errors were adopted by other sects, and Tertullian says, by the Cainites. See CAINITES. The Nicolaites were revived under the reign of Lewis le Debonaire, about A. D. 852, as Sigebert of Gemblours says in his Chronicon; and again in the eleventh century, under pope Urban II. The Nicolaites were certain priests, deacons, and subdeacons, who maintained that marriage was allowed them. They were condemned by the council of Placentia in 1095. Hæresis Nicolaitarum, id est, incontinentium subdiaconorum, diaconorum et præcipue sacerdotum, irretractabiliter damnata est, etc. [This allusion to the marriage of the Clergy, seems to point out the true cause of giving the name of Nicolaitans to those who held it to be lawful. Is it possible, that something similar, misunderstood, might be the origin of the aspersion cast on Nicholas the deacon?]

NICOPOLIS, Νικόπολις, the city of victory, or victorious city; from νικάω, to conquer, and πόλις, a city.

I. NICOPOLIS, a city of Epirus, on the gulph of Ambracia; here St. Paul passed his winter A. D. 64. He wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him hither, Tit. iii. 12. Some are of opinion, that the Nicopolis, where St. Paul then was, was not that of Epirus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus [but, the former is the prevailing opinion.]

II. NICOPOLIS, otherwise Emmaus, a city of Palestine. See EMMAUS. It began to bear the name name of Nicopolis under the emperor Alexander, son of Mammæus. Julius Africanus, an ecclesiastical author, famous for his Chronicles, was sent to the emperor to solicit the re-establishment of this city, which before was called Emmaus. It is doubted whether this Emmaus be the same as that mentioned in the gospel. See Reland, Palestine, lib. ii. cap. 6. also, lib. iii.

NIDDUI, נִדְּוִי, separated, excommunicated.

NIDDUI. This was (it is said) the lesser sort of excommunication used among the Hebrews. He who had incurred this, was to withdraw himself from his relations, at least to the distance of four cubits. It commonly continued thirty days. If it was not then taken off, it might be prolonged for sixty, or even ninety days. But if within this term the excommunicated person did not give satisfaction, he fell into the cherem, which was the second sort of excommunication; and thence into the third sort, called schammatha, the most terrible of all. See EXCOMMUNICATION, and CHEREM.

NIGER, surnamed Simon, Acts xiii. 1. He was a prophet and teacher, and one who laid his hands on Saul and Barnabas, for the execution of that office to which the Holy Ghost had appointed them. Some believe he is that Simon the Cyrenian, who carried the cross of Christ to Mount Calvary: but this opinion is founded only on a similitude of names. Epiphanius speaks of one Niger among the seventy disciples of our Saviour. The church makes no mention of Simon Niger in its offices, nor in its martyrologies.

[It is not "Niger surnamed Simon," but Simon surnamed Niger, of whom we read Acts xiii. 1. i. e. the swarthy, or dark complexioned, which agrees extremely well with a native of Cyrene in Africa: this accords also, with what the Evangelist had already told us, chap. xi. 20. that many Christians of Cyrene had been dispersed by persecution, and had preached the gospel in distant parts, and in Antioch. It is remarkable, that this Simon is placed immediately after Barnabas, who was sent by the Apostles; before Luke, before Manahen, and before Paul. Probably, this was the order of their ages; if so, Simon was well advanced in years; which agrees with the notion of his being Simon the Cyrenian, then in robust life, when he assisted Jesus in carrying the cross; as does the notion of his being the "father of Alexander and Rufus," men of eminence in the church, with the precedence assigned him among the teachers of the faithful at Antioch.]

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next evening; so that the night preceded the day, whence it is said, Gen. i. 5. evening and morning one day. They allowed twelve hours to the night, and twelve to the day. The hours of the day and those of the night were not equal, except at the equinox. At other times, when the hours of the night were long, those of the day were short, as in winter; and contrary-wise, when the hours of the night were short, as at Midsummer, the hours of the day were long in proportion. See Plates WATCHES and HOURS.

Night is put for a time of affliction and adversity, Psal. xvii. 3. "Thou hast proved mine heart, thou hast visited me in the night, thou hast tried me;" that is, by adversity and tribulation. And Isaiah xxi. 12. "the morning cometh, and also the night." The morning is come, and behold the night; we expected peace, but we are overwhelmed with troubles and disasters. Vide FRAG. No. CLXXXVIII.

Night is also put for the time of death, John ix. 4. "The night cometh wherein no man can work." I must fulfil, says Christ, the duties of my mission while it is day, while I am yet alive. And St. Paul says, 1 Thess. v. 2. that "the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night." It is thought the end of the world, and the day of Judgment, will come in the night time. [This can be understood only of the inhabitants of some certain place of the earth; because when it is night in one part of the earth, it is day in another part.]

Children of the day, and children of the night, in a moral and figurative sense, denote good men and wicked men, Christians and Gentiles. The disciples of the Son of God, are children of light: they belong to the light, they walk in the light of gospel truths; while children of the night walk in the darkness of ignorance and infidelity, and perform only works of darkness. "Ye are all the children of the light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness." 1 Thess. v. 5.

The ancient patriarchs, as also the heroes in the heroical ages, rose very early in the morning, and even by night, before day break. Hence it is, that to rise in the night to do any business, is put for being careful and diligent. God says, that he rises early to call his people, by the voice of his prophets; he has omitted nothing that might reform them. See DARKNESS.

NIGLISSOR, or NIGLISAR, or NERIGLISSOR, or NERIGLISSOROR, successor of Evil-merodach in the kingdom of Chaldea. Josephus speaks of Niglissor: Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12, He says Evil-merodach being dead, after he had reigned eighteen years, [months?] Niglissor his son succeeded to the kingdom, and having reigned forty years, [q. an error for four?] he died, and left left his kingdom to Laborosoarchod his son. He reigned but nine months, and had Balthasar for his successor, whom the Babylonians call Naboandel. Cyrus and Darius, king of the Medes, made war against him, &c. In the first book against Appion, he cites the historian Berosus, who speaks of him thus in his third book. After the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach his son succeeded him in the kingdom of Chaldæa. Evil-merodach having given himself up to all sorts of irregularities and debaucheries, was treacherously killed by his brother-in-law Niriglissor, after he had reigned two years. His assassin usurped his throne, and held it for two years. After his death, his son Laborosoarchod ascended the throne, though he was but a child, and reigned only nine months. His courtiers made him away, because he appeared to have evil inclinations. Those that put him to death having consulted together, resolved to translate the government to a Babylonian called Nabonides. In the seventeenth year of his reign came Cyrus to attack Babylon, &c. [The reader will observe that the emendations suggested above are only conjectural.]

Megasthenes, quoted by Eusebius, says, that Nebuchadnezzar having disappeared from among men, had Evil-merodach for his successor, who was treacherously killed by his brother-in-law Niriglissor: he left a son named Labassoarach, who also ended his life by a violent and tragical death. After his death, they set upon the throne Nabannidoch, who was not of the royal family, nor did he belong to it in any manner. Cyrus having subdued all Babylonia, gave Nabannidoch the government of Carmania.

It is not easy to reconcile these accounts. Josephus seems only to have followed Berosus; for Scripture says nothing of Niglissor, or Laborosoarchod, or Nabonides; but only of Nebuchadnezzar, of Evil-merodach, and of Belshazzar. Usher endeavours to regulate the history thus:—Nebuchadnezzar dies A. M. 3442. Evil-merodach reigns after him, and is killed 3444 by Niriglissor, who succeeds. He dies in 3448, and Laborosoarchod follows him. He holds the empire but nine months, and has Belshazzar for successor, who is called Nabonides by Berosus, Labynites by Herodotus, and Nabannidoth by Abydenus. Berosus and Ptolemy allow him seventeen years at Babylon.

Several skilful interpreters believe, that Scripture mentions only Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach, and Belshazzar, because these only were lawful heirs to the crown of Chaldæa, the others being usurpers and intruders. But I doubt the sufficiency of this reason. Scripture, as well as other histories, mentions indifferently, lawful kings and usurpers, those of the royal family, and those who are not. The laws of history do not require, that the historian should judge of the rights of princes; but record their actions and successions. [Yet Scripture sometimes mentions only princes who had some share in Jewish affairs, omitting others who intervened, but had no such share.]

M. Du Pin proposes to reconcile sacred and prophane history, by the following system. After Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned forty-three years, succeeded his son, Evil-merodach, who reigned two years complete, and begun the third year. This, says he, is the Belshazzar, so often called son of Nebuchadnezzar, in Daniel. (It is to be observed, that the name Evil-merodach is not in that prophet; which may confirm the conjecture that Evil-merodach and Belshazzar are the same person.) Evil-merodach is killed by Niriglissor his brother-in-law, who reigns four years: he also may pass for a son of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, being his son-in-law, by having married his daughter. Laborosoarchod, his son, reigned nine months, and was killed by a conspiracy of Babylonian nobles, who set up in his stead one of the conspirators, named Nabonides, being sixty-two years old; a Babylonian indeed, but a Mede by descent, and son of Ahasuerus. He is called Nabonides by the Babylonians, but Darius by the Medes. He reigned seventeen years.

But this system is incumbered with great difficulties. 1st, It confounds Evil-merodach with Belshazzar. 2dly, It confounds Nabonides with Darius the Mede. 3dly, Lastly, it reconciles Josephus neither with Scripture, nor with Berosus, especially in that duration of eighteen years, which this historian assigns to Evil-merodach, and in that of forty years, which he allows Niriglissor. So that we must own it is absolutely impossible, to reconcile things so directly contrary to each other, and to extricate historical facts which are so extremely perplexed.

NILE, שַׁחַר, black, muddy, dark, or the morning; from שַׁחַר shachar. Rather from נַחַל nahal, a river, a brook.

NILE, a river of Egypt, whose fountains are in the upper Ethiopia. It proceeds from two springs, or two eyes, which are not far distant from each other. The largest of them is worshipped by the inhabitants of the country, who are idolaters. Its depth is something more than five and twenty palms; the other spring is about sixteen palms deep. Its course is first toward the north; afterwards it winds about to the east, and passes into a great lake. Coming out out of this lake, it proceeds toward the south. It waters the country of Alata, where it has several falls. It continues its course far into the kingdom of Goiam. Then it winds about again, from the east to the north: at length, running northward, it enters Egypt at the cataracts, which are water falls made by meeting with rocks, of the length of two hundred feet.

After passing these rocks the Nile flows through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, according to Villamont, is about a league broad. Eight miles below Grand Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which make a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean sea, and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure Δ . These two arms are divided into others, which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean, whose distance from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven mouths: —SeptemPLICIS ostio Nili. Ptolemy makes them nine, others four, others eleven, others fourteen. Others maintain, that there are no more than the mouths of Damietta, of Rozetta, and of the two canals, one of which passes by Alexandria, and the other is very small.

Several have thought that the Nile was the Gihon, one of the four rivers mentioned by Moses, as flowing from the terrestrial paradise. But this opinion is not to be supported, since the other rivers are too far from the Nile. Yet the inhabitants of the kingdom of Goiam, call this river Gihon. The Abissins call it Ab Euchi, Abay, or the father of rivers. The Negroes call it Tami. Homer, Diodorus Siculus, and Xenophon testify, that its ancient name was Egyptus, and Homer mentions it by no other name. Diodorus says, it took the name of Nilus after a king of Egypt, called by that name. Pliny relates the opinion of king Juba, who affirmed that the Nile had its source in Mauritania, that it appeared and disappeared in different places, first hiding itself under ground, and then shewing itself again; that in this country it was called Niger, and in Æthiopia it had the name Astapus; that about Meroë it was divided into two arms, of which the right was called Astusapes, and the left Astaborus; and lastly, that it obtained the name of Nile only below Meroë.

Pliny, Plutarch, Dionysius the geographer, and some others, testify, that it was also named Siris. Dionysius says, that the Ethiopians call it Siris, and that after it passes Syena, it has the name of Nilus. It is probable, that the name Siris comes from the Hebrew Sihor, which signifies trouble; and that Nilus comes from the Hebrew, Nahal, which signifies river, or torrent. In Scripture the Nile has seldom any other name but the river of Egypt. Joshua and Jeremiah express it by the name Sihor, or the river of troubled water. "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Sihor?" says Jeremiah. The Greeks give it the name of Melas which also signifies black, or troubled. And indeed travellers inform us, that the water of this river is generally something maddy, but it is easily fined by throwing into it some almonds or skinned beans. Servius, explaining that verse of Virgil, where speaking of the Nile he says: Georg. iv. 291.

Et viridem Ægyptum nigra fecundat arena.

observes, that the ancients called the Nile, Melo: Melo in Hebrew signifies full, which may well agree with the Nile, because of its great floods, which continue for about six weeks in the heat of summer, and overflow Egypt.

Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians knew the Nile, is Oceanus. It had also the name of Aigle, afterwards of Ægyptus, and lastly of Nilus, from king Nileus. The Ægyptians paid divine honour to the Nile, and called it Jupiter Nilus:

Te propter nullos tua tellus postulat imbres,
Arida nec fluvio supplicat herba Jovi.

Perhaps for this reason, the Lord in the prophets sometimes threatens to smite the river of Egypt, to dry it up, and kill its fishes; as it were, to shew the Egyptians the vanity of their worship, and the impotence of their pretended deity. Isaiah xi. 15. Ezek. xxix. 3, 4, &c.

Scripture marking the limits of the Land of Promise, sometimes puts the river or the stream of Egypt for its southerly limits. "From the entering in of Hamath, unto the river of Egypt," 2 Chron. vii. 8. Or, "from the channel of the river (Euphrates) unto the stream of Egypt," Isai. xxvii. 12. Some interpreters doubting whether the dominion of the Israelites extended to the Nile, have imagined that the stream of Egypt was a stream that fell into the Mediterranean sea, between Rhinocorura and Gaza, which is called in Scripture the river of the wilderness, Amos. vi. 14. But it is certain, that the Land of Promise was to reach the Nile. Joshua shews it plainly, chap. xiii. 3. xv. 4. compared with 1 Chron. xiii. 5.

The Arabians and other Orientals often give the Nile the name of a sea, and the surname or epithet of Faidh, which is common also to the Euphrates, because these two rivers by their overflowing increase the fertility of the countries they pass through. They also give it the name of of Mobarek, [blessed] as well because of the fruitfulness it occasions to the land, as the fecundity it is thought to procure to the women.

When the Nile rises only to the perpendicular height of twelve cubits, a famine necessarily follows in Egypt; nor is the famine less certain, if it should exceed sixteen cubits, as Pliny says; so that the just height of the inundation is between twelve and sixteen cubits.

The Nilometer is a pillar erected in the middle of the Nile, on which are marked degrees measuring the ascent of the water. There were several of these in different places.—At this day there is one in the island, which divides the Nile into two arms, one of which passes to Cairo, and the other to Gizah. M. d'Herbelot notices several others, built or repaired by the reigning Caliphs. The ancients have preserved the memory of the Nilometer in their monuments. See Antiquity Explained, tom. iii. p. 185. Heretofore they kept the measure of the rising of the Nile in the temple of Serapis, as a sacred relic; and the emperor Constantine had it transported to the church of Alexandria. The Pagans then affirmed, that the Nile would not overflow any more; but Serapis being provoked, would be revenged of Egypt, and would cause a sterility there. However, the Nile overflowed, and rose to its usual height, the years following.

The Nile overflows yearly in the month of August, in the higher and middle Egypt, where it hardly ever rains. But in lower Egypt the flood is less sensible and less necessary, because it frequently rains there, and the country is sufficiently watered. It is less sensible, because they make fewer dikes there, or receptacles for the water, and the inundation spreading itself equally over the country, does not rise higher than a cubit through the whole Delta. Whereas in higher and middle Egypt, they have deep canals, to receive the waters of the river. They make a breach in these dikes by authority of the Bacha, and when one district is sufficiently watered, the dike is stopped up, and another is opened. The Egyptians have often contentions, village against village, which shall have the first distribution of the waters; and when the overflowing comes as they desire, they celebrate a great festival throughout the country.

When the waters are subsided, the culture of the land is easy. The seed is cast on the mud, and with little tillage produces great plenty. The mud which the Nile, brings is earth washed away from the banks in its course; which same mud covering the land marks and furrows of the fields, obliges the proprietors to have recourse to the line and the measuring-rod, to measure out their lands and inheritances every year anew.

[We shall add an extract or two from late travellers into Egypt.

“Some descriptions of Egypt would lead us to think that the Nile, when it swells, lays the whole province under water. The lands adjoining immediately to the banks of the river are indeed laid under water, but the natural inequality of the ground hinders it from overflowing the interior country. A great part of the lands would therefore remain barren, were not canals and reservoirs formed to receive water from the river, when at its greatest height, which is thus conveyed every where through the fields, and reserved for watering them, when occasion requires.” NIEBUHR'S Travels, Vol. I. p. 87,

“It is to be remarked, that though this water becomes thick, by washing off the clayey soil over which it passes, it appears, when drank, as light and limpid as the clearest; the Egyptians themselves believe it nourishing, and say, whoever drinks of the river will never remove to any great distance from its banks.

“The divine honours which the ancient Egyptians paid to the Nile, and for which the plenty it occasions may be some justification, are, in a manner, still preserved under the Mahometans; they give this river the title of Most Holy, they likewise honour its increase with all the ceremonies practised by Pagan antiquity.” Baron du TOTT, Vol. II. p. 24, Part. 4.

“This mud, likewise is only washed off by the Nile from its two banks, with the clayey part of which it becomes loaded. Its lightness, together with the motion of the waters, keep the particles suspended, till, at length, the sandy part sinks down, and appears in heaps, after the decrease of the inundation. These, the industry of the husbandman turns to his advantage, tempering the dryness of the sands with pigeon's dung, and the seeds of water melons, which he sows in it, and gathers an abundant harvest, before the returning floods again destroy these fields, and form others in their stead.” Ib. p. 31.

“The Egyptians still retain a religious veneration for the Nile: they called it holy, blessed, sacred; and, on the appearance of the new waters, that is, on the opening of canals, mothers are seen plunging their children into the stream, from a belief that these waters have a purifying and divine virtue, such as the ancients attributed to every river.

“For six months of the year the water of this river is so thick, that it must have time to settle before it can be drank: and during the three months which precede the inundation, reduced to an inconsiderable depth, it grows heated, becomes green, fetid, and full of worms, and it is necessary to have recourse to that which has been before drawn and preserved in cisterns. At all times, people of delicacy take care to perfume it, and cool it by evaporation.

"Bitter almonds are made use of to purify the water, with which the vessel is rubbed, and the water then becomes really light and good.

"Earthen vessels unglazed, are kept carefully in every apartment, from whence the water continually transpires. This transpiration produces the more coolness, in proportion as it is more considerable; for which reason, those vessels are often suspended in passages where there are currents of air, and under the shade of trees. In several parts of Syria they drink the water which has transpired; in Egypt they drink that which remains; beside, in no country is so much water used. The first thing an Egyptian does on entering a house, is to lay hold of the kolla (the pitcher of water) and take a hearty draught of it, and, thanks to their perpetual perspiration, they feel no inconvenience from the practice." VOLNEY'S Travels, Vol. I. p. 19.

The superior veneration paid to the east branch of this celebrated river appears from the variety of names given to it, as well as from the import of these names; of which Mr. Bruce gives a full account, but of which we shall only quote a part. By the Agows it is named Gzeir, Gersa, or Seir; the first of which terms signifies a god. It is likewise called Ab, father; and has many other names, all implying the most profound veneration. In Gojam it is named Abay, which signifies overflowing. By the Gongas on the south of mounts Dyre and Tagla, it is called Dakli; by those on the north, Kowass, both of which imply dog star. Formerly, the Nile had the name of Siris, both before and after it enters Beja, which the Greeks imagined was given to it on account of its black colour during the inundation; but Mr. Bruce assures us that the river has no such colour. He affirms, with great probability, that this name in the country of Beja imports the river of the dog-star, on the vertical appearance of which, this river overflows: "and this idolatrous worship (says he) was probably part of the reason of the question the prophet Jeremiah asks:—What has thou to do in Egypt to drink the waters of Seir, or, the water prophaned by idolatrous rites?" The inhabitants of the Barabra call it Bahar el Nil, the sea of the Nile, in contradistinction to the Red Sea, for which they have no other name than Bahar el Molech, or the Salt Sea. roë; the Tacasse, which washes the east side, and joins the Nile at Maggiran in N. Lat. 17°; and the Mareb, which falls into this last something above the junction, gives the name of Triton to the Nile. The ancient name Egyptus given it in Homer is supposed to have been derived from its black colour; but Mr. Bruce derives it from Y Gyp, the name given to Egypt in Ethiopia, i. e. the Country of Canals.

We shall also quote from Mr. Bruce what he has said concerning the natural operation by which the tropical rains are produced; which are now universally allowed to be the cause of the annual overflowing of this and other rivers. "The air is so much rarified by the sun, during the time he remains almost stationary over the tropic of Capricorn, that the winds loaded with vapours rush in upon the land from the Atlantic ocean on the west, the Indian ocean on the east, and the cold Southern ocean beyond the Cape. Thus a great quantity of vapour is gathered, as it were, into a focus; and as the same causes continue to operate during the progress of the sun northward, a vast train of clouds proceeds from south to north, which are sometimes extended much farther than at other times.—In April all the rivers in the south of Abyssinia begin to swell, and greatly augment the Nile, which is further enlarged by the vast quantity of water poured into the lake Tzana. In the beginning of June the rivers are all full, and continue so while the sun remains stationary in the tropic of Cancer. This excessive rain, which would sweep off the whole soil of Egypt into the sea, were it to continue without intermission, begins to abate as the sun turns southward; and on his arrival at the zenith of each place, on his passage towards that quarter, they cease intirely. Immediately after the sun has passed the line, he begins the rainy season to the southward.

"There are three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile. Every morning in Abyssinia is clear, and the sun shines. About 9 a small cloud, not above 4 feet broad, appears in the east, whirling violently round as if upon an axis; but, arrived near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapours from all the opposite quarters. These clouds, having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its form on the collection of clouds opposite; and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible to be conceived instantly follows, with rain: after some hours the sky again clears, with a wind at N. and is always disagreeably cold when the thermometer is below 63°. The second thing remarkable is the variation of the thermometer. When the sun is in the southern tropic, 36° distant from the zenith of Gondar, it is seldom lower than 72°; but it falls to 60°, and 63°, when the sun is immediately vertical; so happily does the approach of rain compensate the heat of a too scorching sun. The third is that remarkable stop in the extent of the rain northward, when the sun, that has conducted the vapours from the line, and should seem now more than ever to be in possession of them, is here overruled suddenly; till, on his return to Gorri, again it resumes the absolute command over the rain, and reconducts it to the line, to furnish distant deluges to the southward."

"The river passing through the kingdom of Senaar, the soil of which is a red bole, becomes coloured with that earth; and this mixture, along with the moving sand of the deserts, of which it receives a great quantity when raised by the wind, precipitates all the viscous and putrid matters which float in the waters; whence Dr. Pococke judiciously observes, that the Nile is not wholesome when the water is clear and green,—but when so red and turbid that it stains the water of the Mediterranean."

This redness of the waters of the Nile, as the reader will observe, is noticed in Egypt. The following account is from Father Vansleb, whose remarks were made at Cairo.

"This is remarkable of Nilus: 1. That it begins to increase and decrease on a certain day precisely. 2. That when it first increaseth it grows green. 3. That afterwards it appears red; and 4. That it changeth its channel sometimes.

"The day in which it begins to increase is yearly the 12th day of June, on which day they observe the feast of St. Michael, the Arch-Angel:—on this day the drops fall. Now these drops are nothing else, according to the judgment of the inhabitants, but the mercies and blessings of God. As soon as this dew is fallen, the water begins to be corrupt, and assumes a greenish colour; this colour increaseth more and more, till the river appears as a lake covered all over with moss. This colour is to be seen not only in its great channel, but also in all the ponds and branches that come from thence: only the cisterns keep the water pure. Some years this green colour continues about 20 days, and sometimes more, but never above 40. The Egyptians call this time, when the river is green, il chad raviat, for they suffer much, because the water is corrupt, without taste, and unwholesome; and good water is very rare.

"As soon as the green colour is gone, the river Nilus begins to become red, and very muddy: 'tis then no doubt but the fermentation is passed, and that the waters of Ethiopia are arrived in Egypt, which are of that colour, because of the red earth which the furious torrents from the mountains carry into the river; for it is not possible that the land of Egypt, which is very black, should give it that colour. In the year 1673, in the beginning of July, the water began to be red, and so continued till the end of December, the time when the river returns to its ordinary dimensions.

"The Egyptians believe that the river Nilus decreaseth also at a certain day; Sept. 24.

"The waters of this river cause an itch in the skin, which troubles such as drink of them when the river increases. This itch is very small, and appears first about the arms, next upon the stomach, and spreads all about the body, which causeth a grievous pain. This itch comes not only upon such as drink of the river; but such as drink of the waters of the cisterns filled with the river water. It lasts about six weeks.

"When the river runs over, it makes a great destruction; it carries away not only great pieces of the bank, but destroys sometimes towns and villages near to it."

The prophet Nahum calls this river by the name of a sea, when describing the rampart of populous No, which, says he, "was the sea, and her wall was from the sea."

This may appear extraordinary to British readers; but, the account of Ibn Haukal, who uses the same phraseology, will justify it.

He thus writes, Sir W. Ouseley's Trans. p. 34. "In this sea there are islands, to which one may pass in boats or vessels. Of these islands are Teneis, and Damiat. In each of these, agriculture is practised, and cattle are kept: and the kind of clothes called rekia come from these places.

"The waters of this sea are not very considerable, and vessels move on it by the help of men.... From the borders of this sea, to those of the sea of Syria, it is all sand."

In these passages the mouths of the Nile, the lakes adjacent to them, the marshes, &c. appear to be called seas, in the Arabic; as such collections of water also are in the Hebrew.

"The Nile," says Ibn Haukal, Sir W. Ouseley's Trans. p. 31. "produces crocodiles, and the fish sekenkour: and there is also a species of fish called raadak, which if any person take in his hand, while it is alive, that person will be affected by a trembling of his body: when dead this fish resembles other fishes. The crocodile's skin skin is so hard, that it resists the blows of all weapons when stricken on the back: they therefore wound him under the arm-pits and between the thighs. The sekenkour is a species of that fish, (the crocodile) but the crocodile has hands and feet: and they use the sekenkour in medicinal and culinary preparations."

It deserves notice that the crocodile is here reckoned a fish, though it is, as we well know, a lizard; and the sekenkour, or skinkore, or skink, of European naturalists, is referred to the same genus, i. e. of fishes, though that also is a lizard, is amphibious, and is found in various countries of the East.

It appears that the ancient Hebrews also included lizards in the division of TANNIM, which comprised not only fishes but amphibia; creatures using the water, generally; and even serpents. The crocodile, therefore, being called a fish by this Arab writer, we need not hesitate to admit the same idea among the learned Hebrews. Comp. Aquatics. NAT. HIST.]

NIMRAH, נמרה, Νεμβρωδ, leopard; from נמר namer: otherwise, bitterness, or rebellion; from מרר marar, bitterness, or מרה marah, rebellion: or change; from מור mur.

NIMRAH, or NEMRA, a city of Gad, or rather of Reuben, east of the Dead Sea, Numb. xxxii. 3. Eusebius on the word Nebra says, there is a large village in Batanea called Nabara. I make no doubt but Nemra, Nimra, Nimrim, Nemrim, and Beth-nemra, are the same city. Jeremiah, xlviii. 34. speaks of Nimrim and its pleasant waters. Isaiah, xv. 6. also mentions the waters of Nimrim. Jerom says, that Nimrim is situated on the Dead Sea, and takes name from the bitterness of its waters, which have this quality since the desolation of the city, as had been denounced by the prophets Isaiah, and Jeremiah; [whence some incline to derive its name from copious streams, according to the Arabic, rather than from a leopard. But, as I suppose that the term Beth implies a temple, wherein the leopard was a symbol, whether accompanying a figure or not, so I incline to derive the name from some sacred establishment by the ancient inhabitants of the country. Leopard Town: Leopard Temple.—Beth-nimra.]

NIMROD, נמרד, Νεμβρωδ, rebellion, or sleep of descent, or of him that rules; from מרה marah, or מרד marad, rebellion, and נם num, sleep, slumbering, and רד radad, descent: or dominion; from רדה radah. [TIGER. Arab.]

NIMROD, or NEMBROD, son of Cush, "a mighty hunter before the Lord," Gen. x. 8, 9. He began to monopolize power on the earth, and gave occasion to the proverb, "like Nimrod, the great hunter before the Lord." His hunting was not only of wild beasts, but also to subdue men, to reduce them under his dominion. Ezekiel, xxxii. 30. gives the name of hunters to all tyrants. The foundation of the empire of Nimrod was at Babylon; and, very probably, he was among the most eager undertakers of the Tower of Babel, and he built Babylon at, or near, that famous tower. From thence he extended his dominion over the neighbouring countries, and Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar.

Moses adds: "out of that land went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city." This, Bochart understands still of Nimrod, and translates "From this place he went out to go into Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen." i. e. when Nimrod had established the beginning of his empire at Babylon, and in the land of Shinar, he advanced towards Assyria, where he built powerful cities, as so many fortresses, to keep the people in subjection. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXXVIII.

Some Rabbins take in a good sense what is said, that Nimrod was a mighty hunter before the Lord, saying he had a particular address and dexterity in hunting; and what game he took he offered to the Lord. It must be owned the words before the Lord, are commonly taken favourably, as heightening the good qualities of any one; but in this place most interpreters take them in a bad sense, in the same manner as when it is said of the men of Sodom, that they were great sinners before the Lord, Gen. xiii. 13.—Also of Er the eldest son of Judah, that he was very wicked before the Lord, Gen. xxxviii. 7.

Some have confounded Nimrod with Belus, founder of the kingdom of Babylon, and with Ninus, founder of that of Nineveh: but these are much later than Nimrod. Profane authors have embellished the history of Bacchus, with several circumstances taken from that of Nimrod. The name Nebrodeus or Nebrodes, given to Bacchus, is evidently derived from Nembrod, or Nimrod, though the Greeks derive it from a goat-skin, with which they pretend Bacchus was clothed. The name Bacchus may also be derived from Bar-chus, "son of Cush;" because Nimrod was indeed the son of Cush. The Greeks give to Bacchus the name of hunter, just as Moses gives it to Nimrod. The expeditions of Bacchus into the Indies are formed on the wars of Nimrod in Babylonia and Assyria. To Nimrod is imputed the invention of idolatrous worship paid to men.

The history of Nimrod is adorned with fables by the Persian authors. Some confound him with Zabac, the first king of the Dynasty of those princes which reigned immediately after the deluge. Others will have Nimrod to be the same as Caioacus, the second king of the second Persian Dynasty, called that of the Caianaidæ.

It is supposed that Moses makes Nimrod the immediate son of Cush. The Persians make him son to Canaan, and brother to Cush. Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, says, that Nimrod was the first author of the religion of the Magians, and the worshippers of fire.

NIMSHI, נִמְשִׁי, rescued from danger; from נִמַּשׁ, or מִשָּׁה mashah: otherwise, that touches; from מִשׁ mush. Father of Jehu, king of Israel, 1 Kings xix. 16.

NINEVEH, נִנְוֶה, Ninevê, handsome, agreeable; from נָחַה naah: otherwise, dwelling; from נָוָה navah.

NINEVEH, capital of Assyria, founded by Ashur, son of Shem; or by Nimrod, son of Cush; for in Gen. x. 11. Moses, according to some has relation to Nimrod, who was mentioned before. Vide NIMROD. [Comp. FRAG. No. DXXVIII.] It must be owned, Nineveh was one of the most ancient, the most famous, the most potent, and most extensive cities of the world. It is very difficult to assign the time of its foundation; but it cannot be long after the building of Babel. It stood on the banks of the Tigris; and in the time of the prophet Jonah, who was sent thither under Jeroboam the second, king of Israel, and, as we judge, under the reign of Pul, father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria; its circuit was three days journey. Diodorus Siculus, lib. ii. says, it was one hundred and fifty stadia in length, fourscore and ten stadia in breadth, and four hundred and fourscore stadia in circuit; i. e. about seven leagues long, three leagues broad, and eighteen leagues round. Its walls were a hundred feet high, and so broad, that three chariots could drive abreast upon them. Its towers, of which there were fifteen hundred, were each two hundred feet high.

Some place it on the west, others on the east bank of the Tigris. At the time of Jonah's mission Jonah iv. 11, it was reckoned to contain more than six score thousand persons, who could not distinguish their right hand from their left: this is generally explained of young children, which had not attained the use of reason. By this reckoning, there ought to have been then in Nineveh more than six hundred thousand persons.

Nineveh was taken by Arbaces and Belesis, A. M. 3257, ante A. D. 747, under the reign of Sardanapalus, in the time of Abar, king of Judah, about the time of the foundation of Rome. It was taken a second time by Astyages and Nabopolassar, from Chinatadan, king of Assyria, A. M. 3376, ante A. D. 626. Nineveh no more recovered its former splendor. It was intirely ruined in the time of Lucian of Samosata, (in Επιτομ. p. 346) who lived under the emperor Adrian. However, it was rebuilt under the Persians, but was destroyed by the Saracens about the seventh century. See Marsham's Canon Egypt. sæculo xviii. tit. Nini excidium, and Usher, A. M. 3257 and 3378.

Modern travellers say, that the ruins of ancient Nineveh may still be seen on the eastern bank of the Tigris. The city of Mosul or Mozil, which many do not distinguish from Nineveh is on the western side. Prophane histories say that Ninus founded Nineveh. The sacred authors make frequent mention of Nineveh, and its kings, Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib, Shalmanezzar, and Esar-haddon. Tobit lived in this city. Nahum and Zephaniah foretold its ruin in a very particular and pathetic manner; which Tobit repeated. The behaviour of Jonah at Nineveh is well known; with the signal repentance of the Ninevites; which is even commended in the gospel, Matt. xi. 41. Luke xi. 32. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. III.

[Nineveh, i. e. "Mosul," says Otter, "the capital of the district of Dgeziré, is situated on the western bank of the Tigris. It has a wall, ditches, and a rampart by the side of the river. The caravanserais, palaces, and other edifices, built of hard stone, are beautiful enough. The air is good in spring, which is the most advantageous season for this country. The heat is great in summer, the cold severe in winter, and fevers prevail in autumn. The city is rich, and the inhabitants are brave. They commonly speak four languages,—the Arabic, Turkish, Persian, and Kurd. A great commerce is carried on here, especially in cotton cloths, black and white, manufactured in this city. Indian commodities brought from Bosra, are also sold here: and cloths and other European articles are procured by the way of Aleppo." Otter, Vol. I. p. 137.

Michaelis has nothing to add to what is generally known in relation to this city.

The best account of Nineveh is given by Niebuhr, vol. ii. p. 286, &c. French edit. He mentions the site of the ancient Nineveh, now called Nunia, as opposite, across the river, to the present Mosul: and here he was shewn on a hill, a mosque, in which the prophet Jonah is said to be interred. The Tigris is about 300 feet in width. It sometimes rises very rapidly. The number number of houses in Nineveh is calculated at from 20,000 to 24,000. It has fifteen okas, or places of public resort, where strangers may lodge. The number of Christians may amount to 1200 families: about one fourth of whom are Nestorians, the rest are Jacobites. Few of those born in the city speak the Syriac language; but it is still used in the country villages. The books of devotion are written in the ancient dialect. The Christians and Turks live in remarkable harmony together. The Jews are about 150 families; they are despised, and ill-treated. In general, the country around is fertile; yet the miseries of famine have been severely felt. The terrible winter of 1756, when the Tigris was frozen over for many days, succeeded by the locusts of 1757, reduced this district to a deplorable condition.

Mr. Rich, Resident at Bagdad, has lately favoured the public with accounts of the ancient Nineveh, which contain particulars well worthy of notice, and promise further discoveries.

"Opposite the town of Mousoul is an inclosure of a rectangular form, corresponding with the cardinal points of the compass; the eastern and western sides being the longest, the latter facing the river. The area, which is now cultivated and offers no vestiges of building, is too small to have contained a town larger than Mousoul; but it may be supposed to answer to the Palace of Nineveh. The boundary, which may be perfectly traced all around, now looks like an embankment of earth or rubbish, of small elevation; and has attached to it, and in its line, at several places, mounds of greater size and solidity. The first of these forms the south-west angle; and on it is built the village of Nebbi Yunus (described and delineated by Niebuhr as Nunia), where they show the tomb of the prophet Jonas, much revered by the Mahometans.

"The next, and largest of all, is the one which may be supposed to be the monument of Ninus. It is situated near the centre of the western face of the inclosure, and is joined like the others by the boundary wall;—the natives call it Koyunjuk Tepé. Its form is that of a truncated pyramid, with regular steep sides and a flat top: it is composed, as I ascertained from some excavations, of stones and earth, the latter predominating sufficiently to admit of the summit being cultivated by the inhabitants of the village of Koyunjuk, which is built on it at the north-east extremity. The only means I had at the time I visited it of ascertaining its dimensions was by a cord which I procured from Mousoul. This gave 178 feet for the greatest height, 1850 feet the length of the summit east and west, and 1147 for its breadth north and south.

"Out of a mound in the north face of the boundary was dug, a short time ago, an immense block of stone, on which were sculptured the figures of men and animals. So remarkable was this fragment of antiquity, that even Turkish apathy was roused, and the Pasha and most of the principal people of Mousoul came out to see it. One of the spectators particularly recollected, among the sculptures of this stone, the figure of a man on horseback with a long lance in his hand, followed by a great many others on foot. The stone was soon afterwards cut into small pieces for repairing the buildings of Mousoul, and this inestimable specimen of the arts and manners of the earliest ages irrecoverably lost. To this day stones of very large dimensions, which sufficiently attest their high antiquity, are found in or at the foot of the mound."

The Turks employ these stones in their public buildings, as the Bridge, &c. but, it is earnestly to be hoped that those containing Sculptures, or inscriptions, will be preserved.]

I. NINUS, son of Belus the Assyrian, founder of the Assyrian monarchy, A. M. 2737, ante A. D. 1267; about the time of the government of Deborah and Barak in Israel. Herodotus says, lib. i. cap. 95. that for a hundred and twenty years this monarchy was in possession of Upper Egypt. Ctesias, and after him Diodorus Siculus, lib. ii. Trogus, also Justin, lib. i. say, that Ninus brought into subjection all the princes of Asia, except those of India. Zoroaster, king of the Bactrians opposed him, but at last was subdued. Julius Africanus assigns to this prince a reign of fifty-two years; but Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in the first book of his Roman Antiquities, shews, that the first kings of Assyria possessed but a small part of Asia.

II. Ninus, surnamed the younger, succeeded Sardanapalus, in the kingdom of Assyria. Sardanapalus having been compelled to burn himself in Nineveh, Arbaces and Belenis, on the dissolution of the Assyrian monarchy, founded two others, that of the Medes, and that of the Babylonians. The empire of Assyria, reduced to very narrow limits, was continued to Ninus, called in Scripture Tiglath-pileser, 2 Kings xv. 29. xvi. 7, 10. and Thilgamus by Elian, Hist. Animal. lib. xii. cap. 21. Eusebius in his Chronicon, after Castor of Rhodes, allows him a reign of nineteen years: from A. M. 3257, to 3276. His successor was Salmanezzar.

moon. It was the seventh month of the civil year; but was made the first month of the sacred year, at the coming out of Egypt. Exod. xii. 2. In Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan is only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon.

The first day is the Neomenia. A fast for the death of the sons of Aaron, Lev. x. On the tenth day a fast for the death of Miriam, sister of Moses; also, every one provided himself with a lamb for the passover. On this day the Israelites passed over Jordan under Joshua. Josh iv. 19. On the fourteenth day in the evening they sacrificed the paschal lamb, and the day following, being the fifteenth, was held the solemn passover, Exod. xii.* 18, &c. On the sixteenth they offered a sheaf of the ears of barley, as first-fruits of the harvest of that year, Levit. xxiii. 9. The twenty-first was the octave of the passover, which was solemnized with particular ceremonies. The twenty-sixth the Jews fasted in memory of the death of Joshua. On this day they began their prayers to obtain the rains of the spring. On the 29th they call to mind the fall of the walls of Jericho.

NISROCH, נִסְרוֹךְ, Nesopàx, 'Asopàx, flight, or standard, or proof and temptation, tender, or delicate; from נוּס nus, to fly; or from נָסַס nasas, standard; or from מָסַח massah, temptation, and רַךְ rac, tender, delicate. The root of this word is not in the Hebrew.

NISROCH, or NESROCH, a god of the Assyrians. Sennacherib was killed by one of his sons, while worshipping his god Nisroch in his temple, 2 Kings xix. 37. It is not known who this god Nisroch was. The Seventy call him Nes-rach, Josephus calls him Araskes. The Hebrew of Tobit published by Munster calls him Dagon.

The name of this deity may be traced in the words Sarac, and Sargon, kings of Assyria: and perhaps Sarac is the same as Sarak. But nothing of this informs us who this god Nisroch was.

NITOCRIS. Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 186, 187. speaks of queen Nitocris, mother to king Labyrinthus, from whom Cyrus took Babylon: but Scripture tells us, that the king from whom Cyrus took Babylon, was Belshazzar, son or grandson to Nebuchadnezzar; it seems to follow, that Nitocris was queen to Nebuchadnezzar the Great, and the same as Amytta, daughter to Astyages, king of the Medes.

Nitocris is celebrated by Herodotus as a heroine. While the king her son abandoned himself to pleasures, she sustained the burthen of government, and did all that human prudence could do, for the security of the empire. She completed with incredible diligence the works that Nebuchadnezzar had left unfinished, particularly the walls of Babylon, the quays along the river, &c.

In the last year of Belshazzar's reign, while Babylon was besieged by Cyrus, Dan. v. that king made a feast for his wives and concubines, at which he prophaned the holy vessels of the temple of Jerusalem; then there appeared on the wall of the room, over against the candlestick, a hand that wrote these words, Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. The sight of this prodigy terrified the king and all his company. Nitocris, the queen-mother, went into the hall, and told the king, that Belteshazzar excelled in explaining difficulties. Daniel was sent for, who gave the explication of it. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCV.

NITRE. A sort of salt, or of salt-petre, common in Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt. The Hebrews call it Nether, and use this word to express a salt proper to take spots out of cloth, and even from the face. The wise man says, Prov. xxv. 20. "As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre; so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart." Music is as serviceable in dispersing sorrow, and in restoring a cheerful temper, as nitre dissolved in vinegar is useful in taking away blemishes from the face, or from cloth. They always dissolved the nitre in vinegar when they applied it to this use. [The above seems to me to miss the true sense of the passage in Proverbs. I have always taken it otherwise—He makes bad worse who deprives the shivering wretch of a garment in cold weather; so doth he, which sings to a heavy heart: vinegar produces ebullition;—merriment, jollity and song are equally out of time, unsoothing, unsuitable to a mind overwhelmed by profound grief.] Jeremiah speaking to his people under the image of a faithless and abandoned spouse, says, "Though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God." Thou art too much polluted in my eyes ever to be made clean. This passage proves the use of nitre, to purify from outward spots and blemishes. [N. B. The nitre common among us, from which gunpowder is made, is not the nitre of the Scriptures: it is nearer, I believe, to sal-ammoniac.]

NO, or NO-AMMON, a city of Egypt, which Jerom always translates by Alexandria. But it is rather the city of Diospolis in the Delta, between Busiris to the south, and Mendesium to the north. See Jeremiah xli. 25. Ezek. xxx. 14, 15, 16. Nahum iii. 8. Comp. DIOSPOLIS and AMMON No. Also the FRAGMENTS.

No-armor

No-ammon signifies the habitation of Ammon. Several are of opinion, that Ammon is the same as Ham son of Noah, who, they say, fixed his dwelling in Egypt.

NOACHIDÆ. This name is given to the children of Noah, and in general, to all men not of the chosen race of Abraham.

The Rabbins pretend, that God gave Noah and his sons certain precepts, which contain the natural duty common to all men; the observation of which, alone, will be sufficient to save them. The Hebrews would not suffer any stranger to dwell in their country, unless he would conform to them.

THE NOACHICAL PRECEPTS.

I. Obedience is due to judges, magistrates, and princes.

II. The worship of false gods, superstition, and sacrilege, are absolutely forbidden.

III. Also, cursing the name of God, blasphemies, and false oaths.

IV. Likewise, all incestuous and unlawful conjunctions or copulations.

V. Also, the effusion of the blood of all sorts of living animals, murder, wounds, and mutilations.

VI. Also, theft, cheats, lying, &c.

VII. The parts of a living animal are not to be eaten: as was practised by some Pagans, says Arnobius, contra Gentes, lib. v. Caprorum reclamantium viscera cruentatis oribus dissipant.

Maimonides says, that the first six of these precepts were given by Adam; the seventh was added by Noah. What inclines us to doubt of their antiquity, is, that no mention is made of these precepts, in Scripture, in Onkelos, in Josephus, or in Philo; nor in any ancient father.

NOADIAH, נֹאדִיָּה, Nwadia, witness; from נָדָה hadad: or assembly, or ornament of the Lord; from נָדָה hedah, &c. and יָה jah, the Lord.

NOADIAH. A false prophetess employed by the enemies of Nehemiah, to endeavour to intimidate him. But Nehemiah, accomplished his undertaking. Neh. vi. 14. ante A. D. 454.

NOAH, נֹחַ, Nsa, that quavers or totters; from נָח nuah. Daughter of Zelophehad, Numb. xxvi. 33. [Wandering; Josh. xix. 13.]

NOAH, נָח, repose, or rest; from נָח nuach: otherwise, consolation; from נָחַם nacham, by cutting off the mem.

NOAH, or NOE, son of Lamech, was born A. M. 1056, ante A. D. 2948. Amidst the general corruption of mankind, Noah found favour in the eyes of the Lord. God seeing that all men had corrupted their ways, said to Noah; "The end of all flesh is resolved on before me; the earth is filled with the iniquities of men; and I will destroy them from the face of the earth. Make an ark of wood, &c. for thy preservation, and that of animals, plants, &c.

This Noah performed; and, A. M. 1656, ante A. D. 2348, God caused all the animals to come to Noah, into the ark; after which he ordered him to go in himself, with his wife, his three sons, and their wives. (Noah was then six hundred years old.) Presently the waters of the deluge began to fall, insomuch that whatever had life on the earth, or in the air, was destroyed; except such animals as were with Noah in the ark.

The Lord remembering Noah, caused the waters to diminish; so that the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat, says the Hebrew. The tenth day of the tenth month, the tops of the mountains began to appear. After forty days Noah let go a raven, who went out of the ark, and returned, according to the Hebrew; or returned not, according to the Septuagint and the Vulgate; or he went out, and went and came, flying about the ark, and alighting upon its roof. Afterwards, Noah sent forth a dove, which not finding a place to set his foot, returned into the ark. Seven days after, he sent it out again, and it returned in the evening, bringing in its mouth a branch of an olive-tree, having green leaves on it, which the tree had shot out since the assuaging of the waters. See FRAGMENTS, No. DXVIII. He staid yet seven days longer; then he uncovered the roof of the ark; and observing the whole surface of the earth was dry, he received orders from the Lord to go out of the ark, with all the animals. He therefore came out in his six hundred and first year.

Then he offered as a burnt sacrifice to the Lord one of all the pure animals that were in the ark; and the Lord accepted his sacrifice, and promised to bring no more a deluge over the earth; of which promise the sign he gave to Noah was the rainbow.

Noah being a husbandman, cultivated the vine; having made wine and drank thereof, he unwarily intoxicated himself, and falling asleep in his tent, happened to expose himself. Ham the father of Canaan discovering him in this condition, made sport of him, and jeered with his two brothers: but they, instead of sporting, going backwards, covered their father's nakedness, by throwing a mantle over him. Noah awaking, and knowing what Ham had done, foretold the doom of slavery to Ham, and his posterity: [vide FRAGMENTS, No. XIX. XX.] while he blessed his other sons.

Noah lived after the deluge three hundred and fifty years; his whole life was nine hundred and and fifty years. He died A. M. 2006, ante A. D. 1998. He left three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, (vide their Articles) and according to the common opinion, he divided the whole world among them. To Shem he gave Asia; to Ham, Africa; and to Japheth, Europe. Euseb. Græc. Chronic. seu Thesauri tempor. p. 10. Philastr. de Hæres cap. 70. Some insist, that besides these three sons, he had several others. The spurious Berosus gives him thirty, called Titans, from their mother Titæa. Some say, that the Teutons or Germans are derived from a son of Noah called Thurscon. The false Methodius also makes mention of Jonithus or Jonicus, a pretended son of Noah. Consult the Scholastic History of Peter Comestor, lib. i. cap. 37. and Tostat on Genesis.

St. Peter calls Noah a preacher of righteousness, 2 Peter ii. 5. because, before the deluge he was incessantly declaring to men, not only by his discourses, but by his unblameable life, and by building the ark, in which he was employed six score years, the coming of the wrath of God. Vide Matth. xxiv. 37. We find among the verses of the pretended Sybils, a description of mankind before the deluge, and Noah's preaching to them. Theophilus of Antioch, lib. iii. ad Autolyc. p. 129, seems to believe, that the name Deucalion, who is the same as Noah, comes from the Greek Deute, and calein, come and call; because Noah speaking to men before the deluge, used the words, Come, God calls you to repentance.

St. Peter says, "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, (that he might bring us to God) being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is eight souls, were saved by water." 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, 20. Several of the ancient fathers took these words literally: as if Christ after his resurrection [death] had really preached to those men, who before the deluge were disobedient to the preaching of Noah. Others by prison understand the body, which is, as it were, the prison of the soul. Others, that Jesus Christ, by his spirit, with which Noah was replenished, preached by the mouth of that patriarch to the unbelievers before the deluge, whose souls were then in the prison of the body; but at the time when St. Peter wrote were in the prison of hell. Other interpretations also are given to this passage.

[It is certain, that the term "he went and preached"—may signify only "he preached," as Eph. ii. 15, "he came and preached peace to you who were afar off,"—not in person; but by his agents, his apostles. In this sense Noah in his day, was an agent of Christ, being actuated by his Spirit. It is likely, that as fallen angels are described as being held in chains of darkness, unto judgment, so disobedient human spirits may be described as being in prison, i. e. reserved to future judgment. Comp. Job xxvi. 5. as usually understood.]

The eastern people had a notion, that Noah received orders from God to take the body of Adam, and put it in the ark, to preserve it from the waters of the deluge; and that when he found himself near his death, he called his son Shem to him, entrusted him with this depositum, and bid him carry it to Melchisedech, the priest of the Most High, that they might bury it in such place as the angel of the Lord should shew them. Shem went therefore to Melchisedech, and they buried Adam on mount Calvary, which is the middle of the earth.

A prayer which, it is said, Noah repeated daily while he was in the ark. "O Lord, thou art truly great, and there is nothing so great as that it can be compared to thee. Look upon us with an eye of mercy, and deliver us from this deluge of waters. I entreat this of thee for the love of Adam thy first man, for the blood of Abel thy saint, for the righteousness of Seth, whom thou hast loved. Let us not be reckoned in the number of those who have disobeyed thy commandments, but still extend thy merciful care to us, because thou hast hitherto been our deliverer, and all thy creatures shall declare thy praise. Amen."

Several learned men have observed, that the Pagans confounded Saturn, Deucalion, Ogyges, the god Cælus, or Ouranus, Janus, Protheus, Prometheus, Vertumnus, Bacchus, Osiris, Vadimon, and Xisuthrus, with Noah. See Bochart, Geog. Sacr. lib. i. cap. 1. Huet, de concord. Rat. et Fidei, lib. ii. Grot. de verit, Relig. Christ. lib. i. Natalis Comes, Mytholog. lib. viii. cap. 17. Octav. Falconer, Dissert. de Nummo Apameas. Dickinson, Delphi Phœnicizantes. Also Fabricius, Apochryph. V. T. p. 247, &c. also FRAGMENTS, passim.

[This proposition has been more strongly enforced, and more distinctly elucidated, by the late learned JACOB BRYANT, in his Mythology, &c. than by any or all of the former writers.]

Several writings have been ascribed to Noah. Some Hebrews have thought, that Moses quotes a work composed by Noah, when he says, Gen. vi. 9. "These are the generations of Noah." And elsewhere, Gen. x. 1. "Now these are the generations of the sons of Noah." The false Berosus

Berosus ascribes also a book to him, Of the Secrets of Natural Things; and the Cabalists maintain, that this book was stole from Noah by his son Ham, and given to Mizraim. W. Postel speaks of it in the title of his book called, De Originibus, seu de varia ac potissimum Orbi Latino ad hanc diem incognita, aut inconsiderata historia, etc. Ex libris Noachi, et Hana-chi, etc. Lambecius in his Catalogue of the Emperor's Library, speaks of a book with this title: "The Method which was revealed to the Prophet Noah by the Angel of the Lord, to discover sixteen figures, proper to foretel what shall come hereafter." But all these are justly ranged among fables and impostures. There is no proof that Noah ever wrote any thing; much less that any thing of his is preserved to our times. [in the form in which he left it; but the Institutes of Menu are possibly repetitions of maxims by which he desired his posterity should be governed.]

The eastern people think that Noah came out of the ark on the tenth day of the first month of the Arabian year, called Meharram; and that this patriarch instituted a fast on that day, which they still observe, in commemoration of deliverance from the waters of the deluge. Then Noah was appointed of God as a new Adam, to re-people the world. All nations derive their origin from him. From Shem the Hebrews, the Arabians, the Persians, the Syrians, and the Greeks; from Japheth the Scythians, the Moguls, the Getæ, the Tartars, the Chinese, the Turks, the Hyperboreans, Gog and Magog: from Ham the Indians, the Africans, the Blacks, &c. [But certainly, Noah had also other posterity, after the deluge: Possibly the Chinese, eastward.]

Besides these three sons of Noah, the Orientals have given him a fourth, called Maghestan, unknown to the sacred books of the Hebrews. They say moreover, that God sent ten books to Noah, which signifies, according to their way of speaking, that when he died he left ten volumes behind him, in which were written the revelations, and commands he had received from God. But these books, if ever they were at all in being, are now lost. [unless the Sanscrit retains memorials of them; as already observed.]

The fable of Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha, Appollodor. lib. i. is manifestly derived from the history of Noah. Deucalion by the advice of his father built an ark, or vessel of wood, in which he stored all sorts of provisions necessary for life, and entered it, with his wife Pyrrha; to secure themselves from a deluge, that drowned nearly all Greece. All the people almost of this country were destroyed, none escaped but those who took refuge on the tops of the highest mountains. When the flood was over,

VOL. II. PART XXI. Edit. IV.

Deucalion came out of his ark, and found himself on mount Parnassus. There he offered sacrifices to Jupiter, who sent Mercury to him, to know what he desired. He requested that he might become the restorer of mankind, which Jupiter granted him. He and Pyrrha were ordered to cast stones behind them, which immediately became so many men and women.

The Pagans struck medals to preserve the memory of this famous event. Octav. Falconerii, Inscript. Athlet. Rom. 1568. Kircher, de Arca Noe, p. 138. Vide APAMBA, and PLATES of NOAH'S ARK; also DAGON, &c.

NOAH'S WIFE, is called Noriah by the Gnostics; Barthenos or Bathenos by Epiphanius; Noema or Tethiri, by some ancient Rabbins. But this has as little certainty, as what we have mentioned of Noah's works.

[The name Nuraito given to the wife of Noah by the Syro-Chaldee, is derived from the Syriac, נורא, which signifies fire; hence Pyrrha (fire) is, by the Greeks, said to have been the name of the wife of Deucalion; and so far the Grecian story rests on authority more oriental than itself. Epiphanius, cont. Gnost. sect. xxvi. has a reference to this derivation: he calls her "Noria, said to be the wife of Noah, whose name is by interpretation, Pyrrha." There is also, much allegory couched under the names of Deucalion's father, Prometheus (foresight) by whom he was advised to build a vessel, and Pyrrha's father, Epimetheus, whose wife was Pandora, accomplished by gifts from all the gods, with her box of evils, in which when opened, remained only Hope, &c. &c.]

NOB, נוב, Noβa, discourse, prophecy; [otherwise, fruitful, or germinating.] Neh. xi. 32.

NOB, or NOBE, or NOMBA, a sacerdotal city of Benjamin or Ephraim. Jerom says, in Epitaphio Paulæ, (Vide Euseb. in locis, voce, Nom-bra.) that in his time it was intirely destroyed, and that the ruins of it might be seen, not far from Diospolis. When David was driven away by Saul, he came to Nob, and asking the high-priest Abimelech for food, he gave him the bread which had been lately taken off the holy table: also he gave him the sword of Goliath. Saul being informed of this by Doeg, caused all the priests of Nob to be slain, and destroyed their city, 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c. xxi. 6, 7, 8, &c.

[The Rabbins say that Jerusalem might be seen from this town. The tabernacle resided some time at Nob; after this town was destroyed that structure was removed to Gibeon; "and the days of Nob and Gibeon," says Maimonides, "were fifty-seven years,"]

NOBAH, נבה, Naβa, that barks or yelps; from נבא nabach.

NOBAH, or NOBE, or CHANATHA, or CANATH, a city

N O D

a city beyond Jordan. It took the name of Nobah from an Israelite who conquered it, Numb. xxxii. 42. Gideon pursued the Midianites to this city, Judg. viii. 11. Eusebius mentions a forsaken place of this name, about eight miles from Heshbon, south. But that could not be this Nobah, because this was much farther north.

[As the Arabic root of these names, Nob, and Nobah, implies height, it is thought that these towns stood on elevations, and derived their name from that circumstance. Heights, High Town.]

[NOBLE, a person distinguished by dignity. Nobility is not hereditary in the East; nevertheless, the pride of descent from noble parentage is not unknown there. All Jews considered themselves as noble, being descended from Abraham, &c.

Nobles signify the chiefs, heads of tribes, or of families, &c. so we read of the nobles of Judah, Neh. vi. 17. the nobles of Israel, Exod. xxiv. 11. Numb. xxi. 18.

Noble is given as a title of office, like "your excellency" among us, to Felix, Acts xxiv. 3.

Noble is used to signify a liberal, candid, generous disposition of mind: the Bereans were more noble than those of Thessalonica, and therefore searched the Scriptures daily, &c. but some think this also refers to descent, they were of superior rank, had greater advantages, were more given to liberal studies. Acts xvii. 11.]

[NOBLEMAN, John iv. 46. This was probably an officer of king Herod's court, and of considerable distinction; not an hereditary nobleman. The word βασιλικός signifies a servant of the king; as the Syriac and Arabic versions render it. Many have conjectured that this nobleman, or royal servant, was Chuza, Herod's steward, whose wife is thought to have been converted on this occasion, and afterwards to have become an attendant on Jesus. Luke viii. 3.]

NOD, נֹד, vagabond: or a country so called.

NOD, or the land of Nod. Hither Cain withdrew after his fratricide, Gen. iv. 16. The LXX. and Josephus, read Naid instead of Nod, and have taken it for the name of a place. It cannot be easily known what country this was, unless perhaps it was Nyse, or Nysea, towards Hyrcania. Jerom and the Chaldee have taken the word Nod in the sense of an appellative, a vagabond, or fugitive.

[The Samaritan reads Nad: a wanderer, or trembler in the land. Nevertheless, taken as the name of a country it imports wandering, or exile, perhaps wildness, or the wilds: as we say a stragglng country: meaning, one wherein animals or men may stray, and lose themselves with little hope of recovery.]

N O P

NODAB, נֹדָב, Nádaß, he that vows: or liberal; or prince, or chief; from נָדָב nadab.

NODAB, a country bordering on Iturea and Idumea, but now unknown. We read, 1 Chron. v. 19. that the tribe of Reuben, assisted by Gad and Manasseh, had a war against the Hagarites, the Jeturites, and the people of Nephith and of Nodab, in which the Israelites had the advantage.

NOGAH, נֹגַה, Nayè, brightness, splendour. A son of David, 1 Chron. iii. 7. xiv. 6.

NOHAH, נֹחַה, Nsà, he that rests; from נָח nuah: chief, manager; from נָחַח nachah, to manage. Fourth son of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 2.

[NOON. The middle time of the day, when the sun is highest in his daily course: in modern language when he is direct south, on the meridian of any place, 1 Kings xviii. 27. Psalm lv. 17. This time of the day being the brightest, is made a subject of comparison in several places of sacred Scripture. Vide Job v. 14. Psalm xxxvii. 6. The apostle Paul says, the brightness in which he beheld the Lord Jesus, was superior to that of the sun at noon, Acts xxvi. 13.]

[NOPH, a city of Egypt, Isaiah xix. 13. Jer. ii. 16. xlv. 1. xlv. 14. Ezek. xxx. 13, 16.

It is generally believed to have been the same with Moph, i. e. Memphis. Vide MEMPHIS. Hiller deduces its name from the slightness of the rains, which reach so far into the country from the sea, as Philo observes, De Vita Mosia, cap. 1. which idea he compares with that of the Hebrew root, importing to drop, to distil; and the Ethiopic, to descend gently as dew; heavy dews being equivalent to small rains. Vitringa on Isaiah, xix. 13. thinks Moph, written for Menuph, means the land, or place, of Meni, from a king named Menes, who built it, says Herodotus, lib. ii. Comp. AMMON-NO.]

NOPHAH, נֹפַח, that breathes; from נָפַח naphach: otherwise, that chains, or ties up; [entangling,] from נָפַח puach: or that fears; from נָפַח pachad: otherwise, that speaks, or murmurs; from נָפַח japhach.

[Probably, a place exposed to gales of wind; wherein the wind blows freely: well ventilated.]

NOPHAH, or NORNE, a city of the Moabites, which afterwards belonged to the Amorites, and lastly to the Israelites, Numb. xxi. 30. Nephah was near to Medebah. There is some probability that it is the Nephiz, Esdr. v. 21. or Nebo or Nabo, Neh. vii. 31, Ezra ii. 20. The situation agrees perfectly well. Nebo is joined with Medeba in Isaiah, xv. 2. xlv. 1.

NOPHET, נֹפֶת, honey-comb; from נָפַח naph; or sieve, or that drops: from the same.

NOPHET,

NOPHET, Josh. xvii. 11. and elsewhere, is taken for a district, or province. Often it is joined to Dor, as Nophet-dor, Josh. xi. 2. xii. 23, the district round the city Dor, on the Mediterranean, south of Mount Carmel, and north of Caesarea of Palestine. Two thirds of it was possessed by Zebulun, and one third by Manasseh.

[NORTH. As it was customary for the Hebrews to consider the cardinal points of the heavens in reference to a man whose face was turned toward the east, the north was consequently to his left hand.

The north wind dissipates rain, Prov. xxv. 23. this must depend on the situation of a place; as in different places the same wind has different effects.]

NOSE. Narus, Nares. The Hebrews commonly place the seat of anger in the nose. "There went up a smoke out of his nostrils," 2 Sam. xxii. 9. Psalm xviii. 8. "The anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man," Deut. xxix. 20. And Job, "Out of his nostrils goeth smoke," Job xli. 21. The ancient Greek and Latin authors speak pretty much after the same manner :

— Ἀνὰ ῥίνας δέ οἱ ἦδη
Δρυμὲ μενύος προὔτυψε.

HOMER, Odys. xxiv.

Οἱ αἰ δρυμῆα χολὰ ποτὶ ῥινὴ κάθηται.
Sharp anger always sits on his nostrils.

THEOCRITUS. Idyll. i.

Thus Persius,

Diace, sed ira cadat naso, rugosaque sanna.

And Plautus,

Fames et mora bilem in naso conciant.

The eastern women in several places wore golden rings in their nostrils. Solomon alludes to this custom when he says, Prov. xi. 22. "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman without discretion." And Ezekiel, xvi. 12. "And I put a jewel on thy forehead [Heb. nose,] and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head."

They also put rings in the nostrils of oxen and camels, to guide them by. "I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips," 2 Kings xix. 28. And Job xli. 2.

NOTHING, Nihilum, is sometimes put in opposition to body, solidity, or mass. It is also put for vacuity, and for what is not sensible. Job says, xxvi. 7. "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing," upon the vacuum. Isaiah says, xl. 22. Vulg. "God spreads out the heavens as nothing," extendit tanquam nihilum cælos; he extends them in the air, in invisible space. The wise man says, Wisd. ii. 2. Vulg. we are born of nothing, and in some sense shall return to nothing again: Ex nihilo nati sumus, et post hoc erimus tanquam non fuerimus. We shall disappear from the face of the earth, as if we had never been there. And Isaiah says, xli. 24. "Behold ye are of nothing, and your works of nought; an abomination is he that chooseth you."

Idols are often called nothings, non-entities. "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought," Amos vi. 13. And Esther, Apoc. xiv. 11. "O Lord, give not thy sceptre unto them that be nothing;" deliver not over thy people to those gods that are nothing. And St. Paul, "we know that an idol is nothing in the world." 1 Cor. viii. 4.

To bring to nothing, i. e. to exterminate, to destroy, utterly to root out any thing.

NOVICE, or NEOPHYTE. Νεόφυτος, from νεός, novus, and φύς, plantatus, satus, literally newly sown, or planted. This name was given to new converts to Christianity, or to those newly baptized. St. Paul advises, 1 Tim. iii. 6. that a novice should not be made a bishop, for fear, says he, "lest being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." As Lucifer, being puffed up with those eminent qualities he possessed, became proud and insolent, and was therefore precipitated into hell, so a man who finds himself suddenly exalted in dignity, easily flatters himself, and conceits that he has more real worth than others, that there is great occasion for his services, &c. Hence arise presumption and pride, and then follows the judgment of God, who always humbles the proud. [The term Neophyte continued to be used among the primitive Christians during several ages, as appears from the tombstones of children, &c. who died when recently baptized.]

NUMBER. This word is sometimes taken to signify a small number, such as is soon reckoned; sometimes it signifies the contrary. We are but few in number, says Jacob to his sons, when they had assaulted Shechem, Gen. xxxiv. 30. literally, Ego autem viri numeri, "I being men of number." And Moses says, Deut. iv. 27. "Ye shall be left few in number among the heathen." And Job, "when a few years are come," Heb. years of number. And the Psalmist, cv. 12. "When they were but a few men in number:" literally, men of number.

Number sometimes stands for a great number, or a multitude. Thus, Psalm cxlvii. 4. "He telleth the number of the stars," or their multitude, as the Septuagint and Vulgate translate it. Solomon says, Eccles. ii. 3. Quo facto opus est sub sole, numero dierum vite sue.

The number of the beast, or number of the name of the beast, Rev. xiii. 17, 18. stands for the numerical value of the letters that compose his name. Vide ANTICHRIST.

NUMBERS. The book of Numbers is the third of the Pentateuch. The Hebrews call it וַיְדַבֵּר Vajedabber, And he spoke, because in the Hebrew it begins with these words. Some Jews call it בְּמִדְבָּר, Bemiddebar, In the desert, because it includes the history of the Israelites' journeying in the wilderness. The Greeks, and after them the Latins, call it the book of Numbers, because the first three chapters contain the numbering of the Hebrews and Levites, which was performed separately, after the erection and consecration of the tabernacle.

The people having departed from Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, went to the wilderness of Paran, and thence to Kadesh, whence they sent spies to view the Land of Promise. At their return the people were discouraged; for which God condemned them to die in the desert. And having journeyed thirty-nine years in the wilderness, they arrived at last at the plains of Moab, beyond Jordan. What happened during this interval is recorded in the book of Numbers.

NUMENIUS, Νυμνίος, new-moon, new month, or the first day of the month. See NEOMENIA.

NUMENIUS, son of Antiochus, was sent by Jonathan Maccabæus to renew the alliance made by the Jews, with the Romans and Lacedæmonians. He was again commissioned for the same purpose some years after, by Simon Maccabæus, brother of Jonathan. It is not easy to know who this Numenius was, but he appears to have been a person of great capacity, since he was employed in such important negotiations, which he always managed with address. Josephus also mentions letters of the Roman senate in favour of John Hyrcanus, given in the ninth year of his high priesthood, wherein Numenius, son of Antiochus, is named as ambassador from the Jews.

NUN, נון, son. Son of Elishamah, and father of Joshua, of the tribe of Ephraim. The Greeks give him the name of Nave instead of Nun.

[Nun, should seem to import augmentation, assistance; so Joshua was assistant to Moses: but some think, an adopted son; and suppose Joshua to have been adopted by Moses: others say, the reading of the LXX. alludes to dwelling, or rest: as if Joshua were a man to be relied on, in whom confidence might reside safely.]

NUTS, a fruit well known and very common. The only passage in which mention is made of nuts, is Cant. vi. 11. "I went down into the garden of nuts," or of nut-trees.

NYMPHAS, Νύμφα, spouse; from νύμφη.

NYMPHAS. St. Paul, Coloss. iv. 15. salutes Nymphas, and the church in his house. Some Latins have thought, that Nymphas was the name of a woman: but the Greek text shews plainly it must be a man. The Greeks keep his feast, Feb. 28, and give him the name of an apostle: they add, that he died in peace.

O

[OAK. The religious veneration paid to this tree, by the original natives of our island in the time of the Druids, is well known to every reader of British history. We have reason to think that this veneration was brought from the east; and that the Druids did no more than transfer the sentiments their progenitors had received in Oriental countries. It should appear that the patriarch Abraham resided under an oak, or a grove of oaks, which our translators render the plain of Mamre; and that he planted a grove of this tree, Gen. xxi. 23. In fact, since in hot countries nothing is more desirable than shade, nothing more refreshing than the shade of a tree, we may easily suppose the inhabitants would resort for such enjoyment to Where'er the Oak's thick branches spread,

A deeper darker shade.

Oaks, and groves of oaks, were esteemed proper places for religious services; altars were set up under them, Josh. xxiv. 26. and probably, in the east as well as in the west, appointments to meet at conspicuous oaks, were made, and many affairs were transacted, or treated of, under their shade, shade, as we read in Homer, Theocritus, and other poets.

It was common among the Hebrews to sit under oaks, Judg. vii. 11. 1 Kings xiii. 14. Jacob buried idolatrous images under an oak, Gen. xxxv. 4. Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried under an oak, xxxv. 8. Vide 1 Chron. x. 12. Abimelech was made king under an oak, Judg. ix. 6. Idolatry was practised under oaks, Isaiah x. 29. lvii. 5. Hosea iv. 13. Idols were made of oaks, Isaiah xlv. 14.

There are several kinds of oak in the east; as Tournefort observes: one of which he calls "the fairest species of oak in the world:" he describes it as growing in the isle of Zia, vol. ii. p. 16. he says also, of Anatolia, vol. iii. p. 268. "Beside the common oaks, and that which bears the Velanede, we saw several other kinds in the valleys." And it is very reasonable to suppose, that more than one kind is mentioned in Scripture.

Aleh, אֵלֶךְ, is a species of oak, which occurs frequently; Alun, אֲלֹן, is another species: the Chaldee Ailun, אֵלֶן seems also to be a species of oak, Dan. iv. 7, &c. Ashal, אֶשֶׁל, also appears to be an oak, 1 Sam. xxxi. 13, compare 1 Chr. x. 12. This is the tree which Abraham planted, Gen. xxi. 33. This word is rendered grove in our version, but probably it was a kind of oak, of which a number were planted together.

The famous oracle of Dodona stood among oaks; the oak was sacred to Jupiter, who often on medals, &c. wears an oaken garland: sacra Jovi Quercus: the asylum of Romulus at Rome stood between two sacred groves of oaks, Dion. Halic. lib. ii. cap. 15.]

OATH. God has prohibited all false oaths, and all useless and customary swearing in ordinary discourse: but when the necessity or importance of a matter requires an oath, he allows to swear by his name; but not in the name of any false god, or in the name of inanimate things, whether on earth or in heaven, or by the stars, or by the life of any man. Our Saviour forbids all kinds of oaths, Matt. v. 33. and the primitive Christians understood and observed this command in a literal sense, as may be seen from Tertullian, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Basil, Jerom, &c. However, it must be acknowledged, that neither the apostles nor fathers absolutely condemned swearing, or the use of oaths, on every occasion, and on all subjects. There are circumstances wherein we cannot morally be excused from it. But we ought not to swear except on urgent necessity. We ought to live with such integrity and veracity, as not to need an oath in confirmation of what we say; but that our word may be taken equal to an oath: nor must we ever swear but with a strict regard to justice and truth. See St. Austin, Ep. 157. n. 40. and the commentators on Matthew. v. 33, 34.

[We ought to remember that anciently an oath was administered by the judge, who stood up, and abjured the party who was to be sworn: to this mode of administering an oath Moses alludes, when he says, Lev. v. 1. "if a person sin, hearing the voice of swearing, i. e. of adjuration, being called on to witness, whether he hath seen or known of the transaction then in judgment, &c. And this I take to be the true import of Prov. xxix. 24. "Whoso is partner, accomplice, even after the fact—with a thief, hateth his own soul: he heareth the voice of cursing, i. e. the adjuration by the judge, when inquiry is making after the truth of a fact, but does not discover his knowledge of the matter: consequently, he is guilty of perjury. Vide THIEF; also 1 Kings viii. 31. 2 Chron. vi. 22.

In this manner our Lord was adjured by Caiaphas, Matth. xxvi. 63. Jesus had remained silent under long examination, when Caiaphas rising up, knowing he had a sure mode of obtaining an answer, said, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, &c." To this oath, thus solemnly administered, Jesus confessed a good confession. That the high-priests had this power, vide Ex. xxii. 11. Lev. v. 1, Prov. xxix. 24. xxx. 9. Probably, they might thus interfere only on occasions of some moment; and when the most solemn kind of oath was necessary.

An oath is a solemn appeal to God, as to an all-seeing witness, and an almighty avenger, if what we say be false, Heb. vi. 16. It is an act of religious worship; whence God requires it to be done in his name, Deut. x. 2. and points out the manner in which it ought to be administered, and the duty of the person who swears, Psalm xv. 4. xxiv. 4. Jer. iv. 2. An oath in itself is not unlawful, either as it is a religious act, or as God is called on to witness. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXVII.

God himself is represented as confirming his promise by oath, Heb. vi. 13, and thus conforming himself to what is practised among men, v. 16, 17. The oaths forbidden, Matth. v. 34, 35. Jam. v. 12. refer only to the unthinking, hasty, and vicious practices of the Jews; otherwise, Paul would have acted against the command of Christ, Rom. i. 9. 2 Cor. i. 23. Neither atheists nor Epicureans, who deny, the former the being, the latter the providence, of God, can take an oath administered, and be bound by it, from the very form of an oath, which declares the omniscience and vindictive justice of God. That person is obliged to take an oath, whose duty duty requires him to profess the truth. As we are bound to manifest every possible degree of reverence towards God, the greatest care is to be taken that we swear neither rashly nor negligently in making promises: to neglect performance is perjury: unless the promise be contrary to the law of nature; in which case no oath is binding. A person is guilty of perjury, who takes an oath in a sense different from that in which it is (lawfully) tendered: such simulation and dissimulation, or mental reservation, is contrary to the law of nature, because a violation of duty. To swear by a creature is simply unlawful, from the nature of an oath, which implies omniscience and omnipotence in the party appealed to, and sworn by, perfections incompetent to any creature. Oaths are either assertory, in which we affirm something as true, as in the case of bearing testimony; or promissory, Gen. xxix. 3. Josh. ix. 15. The former regards past or present, the latter future time.

We find Joseph using an extraordinary kind of oath, as it appears to us, Gen. xlii. 15. "As Pharaoh liveth," or, by the life of Pharaoh. This custom of swearing by the king still continues in the East. The most sacred oath among the Persians is "by the king's head," says Hanway, Trav. Vol. I. p. 313. and among other instances of it, we read in the Travels of the Ambassadors, p. 204. "There were but sixty horses for ninety-four persons. The Mehemander, (or conductor) swore by the head of the king (which is the greatest oath amongst the Persians) that he could not possibly find any more." And Thevenot says, Trav. p. 97. Part ii. "his subjects never look upon him but with fear and trembling, and they have such respect for him, and pay so blind an obedience to all his orders, that how unjust soever his commands might be, they perform them, though against law both of God and nature. Nay, if they swear by the king's head, their oath is more authentic and of greater credit, than if they swore by all that is most sacred in heaven and upon earth."

These instances seem allied to that very common oath in Scripture, "as the Lord liveth:" and it should seem, that as this oath could not be taken without naming the name of God, which the later Jews regarded as a profanation, that they gradually introduced the custom of swearing (not judicially) by sacred things, as heaven, the temple, the gold of the temple, the altar, &c. all which our Lord forbids, and refers oaths to the great object of swearing, God; or, if the subject in debate be too trivial to call upon God about, then swear not at all—use no subterfuge, no lesser oath, but either affirm, or deny, simply.

Our Lord further says, thou shalt not swear by thy head, as some we see are accustomed to do by the king's head. The apostle Paul observes; "men verily swear by a greater than themselves;" as those no doubt understood they did, who swore by the king.

Grievous curses are promulgated against false swearers, and false oaths are among the greatest abominations before both God and man.

That a person swear lawfully, he must swear by the Most High God, since only the Most High God can judge of the sincerity of his affirmation, which is the essence of an oath: to swear by any person or thing not omniscient to know, and omnipotent to remunerate, is to trifle with an oath. 2. The veracity of an oath is its essence: to preserve this veracity we should swear only on due deliberation, only on actual knowledge, only agreeably to justice and equity: openly, candidly, with due circumspection, and if necessary, with due enquiry and explanation. 3. The end of an oath is to glorify God, by acknowledging his attributes of holiness, justice, truth, knowledge, &c. and to appease man, by determining controversy, clearing the innocent, satisfying our brethren, or discharging our own consciences: and an oath should be "an end of all strife!"—If such be the essence and nature of oaths, what apology shall be made for profane swearing? swearing without an object, and to no avail; for who credits such asseverations beyond what they would credit simple assertion?]

OB, a spirit of Ob, or Python. See PYTHON.

OBADIAH, עֲבַדְיָה, Ὀβδίας, Vulgate, Obdias. A slave, or labourer of the Lord; from עָבַד kabad, a servant, slave, or labourer; and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. OBADIAH, or OBDIAH, second son of Uzzi, of Issachar, 1 Chron. vii. 3.

II. OBADIAH, son of Arnan, and father of Shechaniah, 1 Chron. iii. 21.

III. OBADIAH, son of Azel, of the race of Saul, 1 Chron. viii. 38.

IV. OBADIAH, son of Shemaiah, of the race of the Levites, 1 Chron. ix. 16.

V. OBADIAH, a valiant man of David's army, who joined him in the wilderness, 1 Chr. xii. 9.

VI. OBADIAH, one whom king Jehoshaphat sent into the cities of Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7.

VII. OBADIAH, a principal man of Judah, who signed the covenant, Neh. x. 5.

VIII. OBADIAH, the prophet. He foretold the return from the captivity in these terms according to the Vulgate, Obad. 20. The army of the children of Israel, who had been transplanted out of their own country, shall possess all the land land of the Canaanites as far as Sarepta, and the cities of the south shall be in subjection to those that had been carried away from Jerusalem as far as the Bosphorus." The Hebrew [and English translation] read it thus: "The captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites even unto Zarephath; and the captivity of Jerusalem which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south." Some Hebrews by the name of Canaanites here understand Germany, and France by the name of Zarephath, and Spain by the name of Sepharad. The Jew that taught Jerom Hebrew, by Sepharad, understood the Bosphorus, which he connected with the preposition ב, b, signifying within, and made but one word of them. But it is better to follow the reading of the Septuagint. The Israelites at their return from the captivity shall possess the land of the Canaanites, or of the Phœnicians, as far as the city of Sarepta, which was near to Tyre and Sidon, the capital of Phœnicia. And the captives that should return to Jerusalem shall possess the country from Ephrata towards the south of the Land of Promise.

[IX. OBADIAH, governor of the house, or steward, to Ahab king of Israel. He had feared the Lord from his youth; and had secreted a hundred prophets of the Lord from the fury of Jezabel. He was sent by Ahab in search of grass for the cattle in the time of famine; and met Elijah the prophet; whose presence he announced to his master. 1 Kings xviii. 3.]

OBAL, עֹבֵל, inconvenience of old age, or of the flux: from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, or from בָּלָה jahal, flux, and חָוָה havah, naughtiness. In the Arabic, he that walks; from חָבַל hubal.

[But some think fat, very fat. He is written עֹבֵל, 1 Chr. i. 22, and עֹבֵל, Gen. x. 28, but here the Samaritan has also עֹבֵל. The names of his brothers Abimael, which from the Arabic imports father of fat, and Ophir, which also imports fatness, (whence Bochart, Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 27. supposes it imports opulence, as the name of a country) appear to justify this derivation. Probably, the family was naturally bulky, fat. So among the Latins Crassus, Opimus, Opimius, &c. Mount Ebal is allied to this root; but rather in the sense of round, thick, or something.]

OBAL, or EBAL, eighth son of Joktan, Gen. x. 28. generally thought to have peopled a part of Arabia.

OBED, עֲבָד, a servant, or diligent labourer.

I. OBED, son of Boaz and Ruth; father of Jesse, grandfather of David, Ruth iv. 17.

II. Obed, son of Ephthal, father of Jehu, of Judah. 2 Chron. ii. 37.

OBED-EDOM, עֲבָד-עֲדֹם, the slave of Edom, or the Idumæan: or labourer of the man, of red, or earthy; from עָבַד abad, a slave, and from עֲדָם adam, man, or Edom, Idumæan.

OBED-EDOM, son of Jeduthun, a Levite, 1 Chron. xvi. 38. He had a numerous family, says 1 Chron. xxvi. 4. because the Lord blessed him. After the death of Uzzah, David, terrified at that accident, durst not remove the ark into the apartment he had provided for it in his palace, but left it in the house of Obed-Edom, near the place where Uzzah was struck. The presence of the ark became a blessing to Obed-Edom, which encouraged David some months afterward to remove it to the place he had appointed for it. Afterwards, Obed-Edom and his sons were assigned to the keeping of the doors of the temple, 1 Chr. xv. 18, 21. In 2 Sam. vi. 10. Obed-Edom is called the Gittite, probably because he was of Gath Rimmon, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan, Josh. xxi. 24, 25.

[OBER E NAHR, Vide MAWR E NAHAR.]

OBIL, אֹבִיל, 'Αβιλ, that weeps, or deserves to be bewailed; from אָבַל abal: otherwise, ancient; from בָּלָה balah: otherwise, who is brought; from יָבַל jabal.

[It may be questioned whether this name be any thing more than an expression of this man's profession,—CAMEL-HERD; as we have among ourselves Shep-herd, i. e. keeper of sheep, Cow-herd, keeper of cows, &c. Such appellations were common among the Greeks, the Latins, and indeed in all nations. Comp. Eustathius on Homer, Iliad B. and among the Romans Agaso, Agricola, Arator, Bubulcus, &c.]

OBIL, or UBIL, an Ishmaelite, master of the camels to king David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 30. probably, because these people knew better than others the manner of rearing and managing these animals, which were very common in their country.

OBLATION. See SACRIFICE.

OBOTH, אֲבוֹת, spirits of Python, false oracles; or bags, goat-skins serving for vessels to put liquors in; [skin bottles: Vide FRAGMENT, No. LXVIII.] from אָב ob: otherwise, desires; from אָב ab.

[The place of skin bottles, i. e. where bottles of this kind might be filled with water. Hiller, in his Onomast, p. 899, derives it from the Arabic, which imports "water there"—hither and thither water is found. Query, a place where skin bottles were made?]

OBOTH, an encampment of the Hebrews in the wilderness. From Pausa they went to Oboth, and from Oboth to Je-abarim, Numb. xxi. 10. xxxiii. 43. Ptolemy speaks of a city called Oboda, or Eboda, in Arabia Petraea; Pliny

Pliny and the geographer Stephanus mention it also. Stephanus assigns it to the Nabatheans, and Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 28. to the Helmodeans, a people of Arabia. At Oboth they worshipped the god Obodos; which Tertullian joins with Dusares, another king of this country, Ad Nation. lib. ii. cap. 8.

OBSCURE, is put for adversity, see NIGHT and DARKNESS. An obscure, dark, or sad countenance is opposed to a serene and open one. Jesus Christ upbraids the Pharisees, that they had obscure or sad aspects, Matt. vi. σκύδωποι, when they fasted. And Nahum, ii. 10. speaking of the destruction of Nineveh, says, their faces were as black as a pot, Heb. as if they had blacked their faces with soot. Some travellers, as Tavernier, Voyage of Persia, lib. ii. cap. 7. affirm, that by way of mourning the Orientals daub their faces with the black of a kettle. Joel alludes to this custom, ii. 6. All faces shall gather blackness. Isaiah xiii. 8. Their faces shall be as flames. And Ezek. xx. 47. All faces from the north to the south shall be burned. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCCV.

Obscure places denote the grave, Psalm cxliii. 3. "The enemy hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those who have been long dead." In Psalm lxxiv. 20. we read, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty," which some understand of the obscure places of prisons, wherein tyrants often keep the weak and unfortunate; because the obscure of the earth, the poor Israelites, are reduced to captivity in the houses of the Babylonians. Solomon speaks of the obscure, the poor, as opposed to the great and rich. Prov. xxii. 29. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men." Heb. coram obscuris.

In great calamities, the sun is said to be obscured, and the moon covered with darkness, Matt. xxiv. 29. Luke xxiii. 45. Vide also Nah. iii. 19. Jer. xiv. 2. [Political convulsions.]

Obscurity of the heart and mind, according to St. Paul, is put for the wilful ignorance and hardness of the Jews. Rom. i. 21. Eph. iv. 18.

OBSERVATION. To observe the commandments of the Lord, his laws, his solemnities, his covenant, &c. are expressions that occur very frequently in Scripture. Exod. xxiii. 21. Observe him, and hear his voice: Heb. be on your guard in his presence, and fear him. You shall not observe dreams, Levit. xix. 26. לֹא תִרְאֶה חֲזוֹן. Some translate, you shall use no sorcery; others, you shall cast no nativities; or, you shall not enchant the eyes; or, you shall use no auguries by the flight of birds.

Observare custodias. To keep guard in the temple, at the gate of a prince, in a camp, or even to keep watch over a flock that lies out in the field, 1 Sam. ii. 22.

To observe the mouth of any one, to be a spy on his words, in order to surprize him. The Babylonians observed Daniel, that they might find opportunity to accuse him to the king. The Pharisees observed Jesus Christ, and endeavoured to catch him in his discourses. Solomon, Eccl. viii. 2. advises to observe the mouth of the king, to keep his ordinances, to be obedient to his commands; but Eccl. xi. 4. says, he that observes the winds shall not sow. St. Paul reproves the Galatians, iv. 10. for observing days and months; imitating the Jews in their superstitious distinctions of days. Ezekiel says, xxxiii. 4, 5. that he who does not observe himself, who takes no care of himself, shall die by the sword. Psalm cxxx. 3. "If thou Lord shouldst mark (or observe) iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?" If thou shouldst enter into a rigorous observation of our faults, who can bear such a scrutiny, who can abide such enquiry?

OCRAN, עָרָן, disturber; or that disorders; from עָרָר hucar, to trouble. Father of Pagiel, of Asher, Numb. i. 13.

ODALIA, a Levite, Neh. ix. 5. [Hodajah.]

ODED, דָּוָד, to sustain, to hold, to lift up; from דָּוָד hoded.

I. ODED, father of the prophet Azariah, called Obed in some ancient bibles and Latin concordances, 2 Chron. xv. 1.

II. ODED, a prophet of the Lord, 2 Chron. xxviii. 9. who being at Samaria, when the Israelites returned from the war against Judah, with their king Pekah, and brought 200,000 captives; he went to meet them, and remonstrated effectually with them; so that the principal men in Samaria took care of them, gave them clothes, food, and other assistances, with horses, because the greater part of them were exhausted, and unable to walk. Thus they conducted them to Jericho, on the confines of Judah.

ODONARKES, 'Οδοῦνκας, or ODAREN, song of praise; from דָּוָד hod, praise, and רָנָן ranan, a song: otherwise, witness of the ark; from דָּוָד hud, witness, and אֲרוֹן aron, ark. An ally of Bacchides, killed by Jonathan Maccabæus, with other Syrians, 1 Macc. ix. 66. A. M. 3846, ante A. D. 158.

[OFFENCE, vide SCANDAL.]

Offence may be either active or passive; we may give offence by our conduct, or we may receive offence from the conduct of others. We should be very careful to avoid giving just cause of offence, that we may not prove impediments to others in their reception of the truth, in in their progress in sanctification, in their peace of mind, or in their general course toward heaven. We should abridge or deny ourselves in some things, rather than by exercising our liberty to the utmost, give uneasiness to Christians weaker in mind, or weaker in the faith, than ourselves. Vide 1 Cor. x. 32. On the other hand, we should not take offence without ample cause; but endeavour by our exercise of charity, and perhaps by our increase of knowledge, to think favourably of what is dubious, as well as honourably of what is laudable.

It was foretold of the Messiah, that he should be "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence." Perhaps predictions of this kind are among the most valuable which Providence has preserved to us: as we see by them, that we ought not to be discouraged because the Jews, the natural people of the Messiah, rejected him, and still reject him; since their very offence, the offence they take at his humiliation, death, &c. is in perfect conformity to, and fulfilment of, those prophecies, which foretold, that however they might profess to wish for the great deliverer, yet when he came they would overlook him, and stumble at him.]

OFFERINGS. The Hebrews had several kinds of offerings, which they presented at the temple. Some were free-will offerings; others were of obligation. The first-fruits, the tithes, the sin-offerings were of obligation: the peace-offerings, vows, offerings of wine, oil, bread, salt, and other things, made to the temple, or to the ministers of the Lord, were offerings of devotion. The Hebrews called offerings in general Corban, קרבן. But the offerings of bread, salt, fruits, and liquors, as wine and oil, presented to the temple, they called Mincha, מנחה. Sacrifices are not properly offerings; nor commonly included under this name.

Offerings of grain, meal, bread, cakes, fruits, wine, salt, oil, were common in the temple. Sometimes these offerings were alone; sometimes they accompanied the sacrifices. Honey was never offered with sacrifices,—but it might be presented alone, as first-fruits, Levit. ii. 11, 12.

These were the rules observed in presenting those offerings called Mincha, or Korban Mincha: Levit. ii. 1. קרבן מנחה, LXX. δῶρον θυσίας, Vulg. Oblationem sacrificii. There were five sorts of these offerings. 1. Fine flour, or meal. 2. Cakes of several sorts, baked in the oven. 3. Cakes baked on a plate. 4. Another sort of cakes baked on a plate with holes in it. 5. The first-fruits of the new corn, which were offered either pure and without mixture, or roasted, or parched in the ear, or out of the ear.

VOL. II. PART XXI Edit. IV.

The cakes were kneaded with oil-olive, or fried in a pan, or only dipped in oil after they were baked. The bread offered to the altar, was without leaven; for leaven was never offered on the altar, nor with the sacrifices, Levit. ii. 11, 12. But they might make presents of common bread to the priests and ministers of the temple.

These offerings were appointed in favour of the poor, who could not afford the charge of sacrificing animals. Those also who offered living victims were not excused from giving meal, wine, and salt, which were to accompany the greater sacrifices. Those who offered only oblations of bread, or of meal, offered also oil, incense, salt, and wine, which were in a manner their seasoning. The priest in waiting received the offerings from the hand of him who brought them, laid a part on the altar, and reserved the rest for his own subsistence, as a minister of the Lord. Nothing was wholly burnt up but the incense, of which the priest retained none. See Lev. ii. 2, 13. Numb. xv. 4, 5.

When an Israelite offered a loaf to the priest, or a whole cake, the priest broke it into two parts, setting aside that part he reserved to himself, and broke the other into crumbs, poured on it oil, salt, wine, and incense, and spread the whole on the fire of the altar. If these offerings were accompanied by an animal for a sacrifice, this portion was all thrown on the victim, to be consumed with it.

If these offerings were ears of new corn, (wheat or barley) these ears were parched at the fire, or in the flame, and rubbed in the hand, and then offered to the priest in a vessel; over the grain he put oil, incense, wine, and salt, and then burnt it on the altar, first having taken his own portion. Levit. ii. 14, 15.

The greater part of these offerings were voluntary, and of pure devotion. But when an animal was offered in sacrifice, they were not at liberty to omit these offerings. Every thing proper was to accompany the sacrifice, and what served as seasoning to the victim. In some cases the law required only offerings of corn, or bread; as when they offered the first-fruits of harvest, whether offered solemnly by the nation, or as the devotion of private persons.

As to the quantity of meal, oil, wine, or salt, to accompany the sacrifices, I cannot easily see that the law determines it. Generally the priest threw a handful of meal, or crumbs, on the fire of the altar, with wine, oil, and salt in proportion, and all the incense. The rest belonged to himself himself, the quantity depended on the liberality of the offerer. I observe, that Moses appoints an assarón, or the tenth part of an ephah of meal, for those who had not wherewithal to offer the appointed sin-offerings. See Levit. v. 11. xiv. 21. In the solemn offerings of the first-fruits for the whole nation, they offered an intire sheaf of corn, a lamb of a year old, two tenths or two assarons of fine meal mixed with oil, and a quarter of a hin of wine for the libation. Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, 12, &c. Numb. v. 15.

In the sacrifice of jealousy, when a jealous husband accused his wife of infidelity, the husband offered the tenth part of a satum of barley meal; without oil, or incense, because it was a sacrifice of jealousy.

Offerings of fruits of the earth, of bread, of wine, oil, and salt, are the most ancient of any that are known. Gen. iv. 3, 4. Cain offered to the Lord fruits of the earth, the first-fruits of his labour. Abel offered firstlings of his flock, and of their fat. The heathen religion has nothing more ancient, than these sorts of offerings made to their gods. They offered clean wheat, flour, and bread:

*Farra tamen vertebres jaciebant, farra metebant,

OVID. Fast. ii.

Numa Pompilius, the Romans' legislator, who established their religious rites, taught them to offer to the gods, fruits, corn, meal, or the crumb of bread, with salt, wheat roasted or parched. Numa instituit fruge Deos colere, & molâ salsâ supplicare, atque, ut author est Hemina, far torrere, Pliny, lib. xviii. cap. 2. Before the use of bloody sacrifices they offered only corn:

Ante Deos homini quod conciliare valeret, Far erat, & puri lucida mica salis.

OVID. Fast. i.

Theophrastus, apud Stobæum, observes, that among the Greeks, meal mingled with wine and oil, which they call Thylemata, was the ordinary sacrifice of the poor.

The difference between the offerings of meal, wine, and salt, with which the Greeks and Latins accompanied their bloody sacrifices, and those used by the Hebrews in their temple, consisted, chiefly, in that the Hebrews cast these oblations on the flesh of the victim, being already offered and laid on the fire, whereas, the Greeks put them on the head of the victim while alive, and just going to be sacrificed. See LIBATION.

OG, ny, a cake, bread baked in the ashes.

OG, king of Bashan, or of part of the Land of Promise, beyond Jordan, between the mountains of Gilead east, Jordan west, Libanus and mount Hermon north, and the brook Jabok south. Og was a giant, of the race of the Rephaim. We may judge of his stature by the length of his bed, which was long preserved in Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites, Deut. iii. 11. It was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad; fifteen feet four inches long, and six feet ten inches broad. Vide FRAG. No. XIII.

Moses says, Numb. xxi. 33. that after having conquered Sihon, king of the Amorites, he advanced toward the country of Bashan; wherein Og reigned, who marched against him to Edrei, with all his subjects. Og was conquered, and slain, with his children, and all his people. Og and Sihon were the only kings that withstood Moses. Their country was given to the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and to half the tribe of Manasseh.

OHAD, חַד, that praises; from חָדַד jadah, to praise. Third son of Simeon; went down into Egypt with Jacob his grandfather and Simeon his father, Gen. xvi. 10. A. M. 2298, ante A. D. 1706.

OHEL, הֵיכָל, 'Oðl, tent, tabernacle: otherwise, brightness; from הִלּוּל hillul. Son of Zerubbabel, and grandson of Josiah, 1 Chr. iii. 20.

[OINTMENT, vide PERFUMES.

As perfumes are seldom made up among us in the form of ointment, but mostly in that of essence, while ointments are rather medical, we do not always completely discern the beauty of those comparisons in Scripture, wherein ointments are mentioned. "Dead flies, though but small insects, cause the ointment of the apothecary—it should be—the fragrant unguent of the perfumer—to emit a foetid vapour; so does a small proportion of folly, or perverseness, overcome—prevail above—overpower by its foetor, the fragrance of wisdom and glory." Eccl. x. 1.

There is another passage where ointment is mentioned, which appears sufficiently strange; I am not sure that the following is the true sense of the allusion, but it may lead to it, Prov. xxvii. 15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day, and a woman of fineries—delighting in fine clothes, are alike: (or, as LXX. drive a man out of his house:) Whoso hides—conceals—her from sight, confines the wind, —spirit: i. e. it is a very troublesome undertaking: (And, or) but, the fatness—abundance—accumulation—of his right hand—his labours—exertions, shall be emphatically glory: i. e. if he can check her vanity, and stop her expences, he shall acquire substantial wealth and honour.

It is evident that our translators, like others, were perplexed by the expressions in this passage.

age; and perhaps to enquire what is the ointment of the right hand, by which they have rendered it, would only increase the perplexity.

We read of ointments for the head, Eccl. ix. 8. our own pomatums, some of which are pretty strongly essenced, may indicate the nature of these, as being their representatives in this country.

Ointments, and oils, were used in warm countries after bathing: and as oil was the first recipient of fragrance, probably, from herbs, &c. steeped in it, many kinds of unguents not made of oil (olive oil) nevertheless retained that appellation. As the plants imparted somewhat of their colour as well as of their fragrance, hence the expression green oil, &c. in the Hebrew.]

OLD, ancient. We say the Old Testament, by way of contradistinction from the New. Moses was the minister of the Old Testament, of the old age of the letter; but Jesus Christ is the Mediator of the New Testament, or of the new covenant, not of the letter, but of the spirit, Heb. ix. 15—20.

The old man, Rom. vi. 6. the old Adam, in a moral sense, is our derived corrupted nature, which we ought to crucify with Jesus Christ, that the body of sin may die in us. In Col. iii. 9. the apostle enjoins us, "to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him." And Eph. iv. 22. we are to "put off the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts.

The old leaven, is concupiscence, and adherence to the literal and ceremonial observances of the law. St. Paul advises, 1 Cor. v. 8. "to keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." Jesus Christ expresses almost the same thing, when he says, Luke v. 37. that "no man putteth new wine into old bottles, else the new wine will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish."

The old fruits and the new, which succeed one another, Levit. xxv. 22. xxvi. 10. and Cant. vii. 13. denote great abundance. You shall have so much, that to make room for the new, you shall be obliged to remove the old.

[OLD AGE, is promised as a blessing by God, to those who maintain obedience to his commands, and it is probable that Providence did, (and does) watch over and prolong the lives of eminently pious men. It was formerly thought a great blessing to come to the grave in a good old age, or "as a shock of corn fully ripe;" and though "they are not to be heard, which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises," yet I think we may venture to say they did on various occasions expect peculiar mercies from God, even in this life; and that their expectations were not disappointed.

Old age was entitled to peculiar honour, and no doubt, when men lived to the age of several hundred years, the wisdom they must needs have acquired, the influence they must needs possess over the younger part of the community, must have been much greater than they are among ourselves. Very venerable must have been the personal appearance of a patriarch of three or four hundred years, or even of half that age, in the eyes of his family, and of his descendants, whether immediate or remote.

There is nothing more decidedly recorded than the respect paid among the ancients to old age; of which Grecian story affords highly pleasing proofs; and that it was equal among the Orientals we learn from various allusions in the book of Job, the Proverbs, &c.]

There is some difficulty in St. Paul's description of himself, as Paul the aged, Philemon 9. if that epistle were written as supposed, A. D. 63. for since he is called young at the death of Stephen, about A. D. 34, he was then under 30 years of age, how much we cannot tell; but we can hardly suppose he would call himself old till sixty, unless indeed, the fatigues and sufferings he had undergone had enfeebled him, and made him old, as it were, before his time: the apostle therefore seems to use the word old with a latitude; and certainly some persons are older at 58 or 59, than others are at 64 or 65, which difference of four or five years is the whole; however St. Paul's age be calculated.

Old is spoken of what is decaying, Isaiah l. 9. Heb. viii. 13. of what has been destroyed, 2 Pet. ii. 5. of former times, Lam. i. 7.]

OLIVE-TREE. St. Paul in his epistle to the Romans, xi. 24. distinguishes two kinds of olive-trees; 1. the wild and natural; and 2. those under care and culture. The cultivated olive-tree is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth, ash-coloured; its wood is solid and yellowish; the leaves are oblong, almost like those of the willow, of a green colour, dark on the upper side, and white on the under side. In the month of June it puts out white flowers that grow in bunches. Each flower is of one piece, widening upwards, and dividing into four parts; the fruit oblong and plump. It is first green, then pale, and when it is quite ripe, black. In the flesh of it is inclosed a hard stone, full of an oblong seed. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts.

When Noah sent forth the dove out of the ark, ark, it brought back to him a small olive-branch with its leaves; Gen. viii. 11. which was a token to the patriarch, that the waters of the deluge were sunk away. In the temple of Jerusalem Solomon made of olive wood the cherubim, and the portal that parted the sanctum from the sanctuary, 1 Kings vi. 23, 33. Eliphaz in Job xv. 33. compares a wicked man to a vine which sheds its blossoms, and to an olive whose flowers fall before their season, and consequently it brings no fruit. The sacred writers often use similes taken from the olive.

OLIVES, Mount of, is situate east of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the brook Kidron, and by the valley of Jehoshaphat. Vide the Map of JERUSALEM. On this mount Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives, 1 Kings, xi. 7. Hence the Mount of Olives is called the Mountain of Corruption, 2 Kings xxiii. 13. הר המשוהית, Vulg. Mons Offensionis: or, Mons Corruptionis. Josephus, says, Ant. lib. xx. cap. 6. that this mountain is five stadia (or furlongs) from Jerusalem; 625 geometrical paces; a sabbath-day's journey, says St. Luke; about eight furlongs, i. e. to the top of it. Acts i. 12. The Mount of Olives has three summits, ranging from north to south; from the middle summit our Saviour ascended into heaven; on the south summit Solomon built temples to his idols; the north summit is distant two furlongs from the middlemost. This is the highest, and is commonly called Galilee. [rather Viri Galilæi, from the expression used by the Angels, ye men of Galilee.] Vide Reland, Palæst. tom. ii. p. 338.

In the time of king Uzziah, the Mount of Olives was so shattered by an earthquake, that half the earth on the western side, fell, and rolled four furlongs, or five hundred paces, toward the opposite mountain on the east; so that the earth blocked up the highways, and covered the king's gardens. Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11. Zech. xiv. 5.

This mountain is become an object of veneration among Christians, since from hence our Saviour ascended into heaven. Eusebius, de Vita Constant. lib. iii. cap. 43. assures us, that in the place of the ascension was a cavern, where, said tradition, our Saviour entered, to communicate to his disciples some of his most sacred mysteries; whether by these words may be understood the holy Eucharist, or a repast he took with them, mentioned Acts i. 4. or, particular instructions. The fathers inform us, that when our Saviour ascended into heaven, he left his footsteps imprinted on the earth [rock]; that they always subsisted, though the faithful continually took away the ground from [about] this place, by way of devotion. Thus is literally accomplished, Zech. xiv. 4. "his feet shall stand in that day on the Mount of Olives."

It is added, that the empress Helena having caused a magnificent church to be built, in the midst of which was this rock, when they would have paved it with marble like the rest, they never could accomplish it; every thing that was put there by way of ornament removed from its place; so that they were forced to leave it as it was. To this day, it is said, the impression of our Saviour's left foot is visible, in the rock, three fingers breadth; also, that the stone, wherein was the impression of his right foot, was taken away at the time of the Crusades, and placed in the temple, which at present is one of the principal Turkish mosques, where some think it may still remain: for the Christians have not liberty to enter therein to inform themselves. Jerom, in Epitaph. Paula, et alibi, speaks of a great cross, set up on the Mount of Olives, which might be seen afar off. The same father assures us, that when they endeavoured to shut up the cave which answered to the place whence our Saviour ascended into heaven, —[the opening in the roof of the edifice]— they could never accomplish their design: but were forced to leave this part free and open. But observe, that the impressions of our Saviour's feet must have been sunk very deep into the mountain, and that the Christians must very nicely have observed the place, since the tenth Roman legion, encamped on this mountain, at the siege of the city by Titus, as Josephus says, de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 3. could not efface these sacred footsteps, nor erase them out of the memory of the faithful. [Query, are not these last expressions metaphorical, signifying that the memory and effect of our Lord's life and ascension were perpetual, and indefeasible? in which sense we may still justly say, the way he went to heaven continues open to all believers.] Vide ASCENSION.

ADDITION.

[Though this mount was named from its olive-trees, yet it abounded in other trees also. It was a station for signals, which were communicated from hence by lights and flames, on various occasions. They were made of long staves of cedar, canes, pine-wood, with coarse flax, which, while on fire, were shaken about till they were answered from other signals.

What is said in Midras Tellim, by Rab. Janna, is extremely remarkable: "The Divine Majesty stood three years and a half on Mount Olivet, saying, Seek ye the Lord, while he may be found; call on him, while he is near." Is this the language of a Jew?

The names of the various districts of this mount deserve attention, as, 1. Geth semani, the place of oil-presses; 2. Bethany, the house of dates; 3. Bethphage, the house of green figs; and probably, other names in different places.

The Talmudists say, Hier. Berac. fol. 16. that on Mount Olivet, were shops, kept by the children of Canaan, of which shops some were in Bethany. They say, that under two large cedars which stood there, were four shops, where things necessary for purification were constantly on sale, such as doves or pigeons for the women, &c.

Probably, these shops were supplied by country persons, who hereby avoided paying rent for their sittings in the Temple. The mention of these residences implies that this mount had various dwellings upon it.

There was also a collection of water at Bethany, on this mount: which was by some used as a place of purification.

OLIVES, Mount of, is a very steep hill on the east of Jerusalem; the valley of Jehoshaphat lying between the mount and the city. The small building, erected over the Place of Ascension, is contiguous to a Turkish mosque, and is in possession of the Turks, who shew it for profit; and subject the Christians to an annual contribution for permission to officiate within it on Ascension-day. From the mosque we had a fine and commanding view of Jerusalem, Mount Sion, and the Dead Sea. Dr. WITTMAN, p. 168. See the PLATE of JERUSALEM. T.]

[The GARDEN OF OLIVET, (the scene of our Saviour's Agony) is at the foot of the Mount of Olives, near the origin of the brook Kedron. It contains eight large and extremely ancient olive trees. It were too much to affirm that these trees escaped the ravages of the soldiers of Titus, and are as old as his destruction of Jerusalem; yet, as a fresh olive tree springs from the old stump, these may be successors to those of antient date. The olive wood between Athens and Eleusis contains trees, perhaps of equal age, or apparently little short of it: Certainly, these in the garden of Olivet, date from before the conquest by the Turkish arms, as they pay a tax of only one medine to the Sultan; while all planted since the conquest, pay half their produce. They form, says Dr. E. D. CLARKE, "a grove of aged olive trees, of most immense size."

Dr. CLARKE found on the top of the Mount of Olives, a vast and very antient Crypt, in "the shape of a cone, of immense size; the vertex alone appearing level with the soil, and exhibiting by its section at the top, a small circular aperture; the sides extending below to a great depth, lined with a hard red stucco." He thinks it to have been an idolatrous construction, perhaps as old as Solomon, and profaned by Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 13. The number of Crypts about Jerusalem, is well deserving attention. If Solomon built this Crypt, he might, as the Jews say he did, construct one of the same kind, for the reception of the ark, &c. in case of danger: but, this must continue undecided, till the "times of the Gentiles are fulfilled."

"So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, (says Dr. CLARKE,) that the eye roams over all the streets, and around the walls, as if in the survey of a plan or model of the city. The most conspicuous object is the Mosque, erected upon the site and foundations of the Temple of Solomon." Hence the observation of the Evangelist, Luke xix. 37, that Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it, acquires additional force. "Towards the south appears the Lake Asphaltites, a noble expanse of water, seeming to be within a short ride from the city; but the real distance is much greater. Lofty mountains inclose it with prodigious grandeur. To the north are seen the verdant and fertile pastures of the Plain of Jericho, watered by the Jordan, whose course may be distinctly discerned." Travels, Vol. II. p. 572.

Compare Mr. MAUNDRELL's Account, April 7, in FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVI. et seq.]

OLYMPAS, Ὀλυμπίας, ὀλυμπᾶν, from ὀλύμπιος, of Mount Olympus.

OLYMPAS, or OLYMPIAS; St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 15. salutes Olympas, a believer of distinguished virtue and merit. The particulars of his life are unknown. The Greeks honour him Nov. 10. and say he was beheaded at Rome the same day that St. Peter was crucified there.

OLYMPIAD, a space of four years. The Greeks commonly computed time by Olympiads. They began to reckon in this manner chiefly from the 28th Olympiad, in which Choroebus was victor; which was about one hundred and eight years after their first establishment by Iphitus. Before this they kept no exact register of the conquerors in the Olympic games; and it is thought that Timæus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, was the first historian who inserted the years of the Olympiads into his history. After him Eratosthenes and Polybius followed the same method. Before them the Greek historians were not very careful in the dates of their chronology. See Marsham's Canon. Egypt. Sacul. 15.

The Olympic games, celebrated at Elis every four years, with a vast concourse of people, began A. M. 3120, ante A. D. 884. But generally their beginning is taken only from the twenty-eighth eighth Olympiad, wherein Choroebus was conqueror, A. M. 3228, ante A. D. 776. This is properly the epocha of historical time among the Grecians; previous to this their history has a great mixture of fable. Vide YEAR, ERA, &c.

OLYMPIAN. Jupiter Olympicus. The Grecians often gave to Jupiter, and to other gods, surnames from places where they had temples dedicated to them. Jupiter was called Jupiter Idæus, from Mount Ida, where he was educated:—Cretensis, from the island Crete, where he was born, and where his sepulchre was:—Capitolinus, because of his temple in the capitol at Rome:—Fulminator, because of his thunder:—Hospitalis, because he presided over hospitality; and so of others. Antiochus Epiphanes having profaned the temple of Jerusalem, caused the statue of Jupiter Olympicus to be set up there, where it remained three whole years, 2 Macc. vi. 2, till Judas Maccabæus removed it, and restored the worship of the Lord. This idol Daniel called the abomination that maketh desolate, Dan. xii. 11. At the same time the same Jupiter was set up in the temple of mount Gerizim in Samaria, under the name of Jupiter Hospitalis, 2 Macc. vi. 2. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7. Ἐλληνίς, that the Samaritans offered of their own accord to consecrate their temple of Gerizim to Grecian Jupiter.

OMAR, אֹמֶר, he that speaks; from אָמַר amar: otherwise, bitter; from מָרַר marar. Second son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15.

[OMEGA, Ω, the last letter of the Greek alphabet: Alpha Α, and Omega Ω, therefore include all; the first and the last. Vide ALPHA.]

OMER, or GOMER, עֹמֶר: LXX. Γόμορ; a measure of capacity among the Hebrews; six pints very nearly; the tenth part of an ephah. See ASSARON.

OMRI, אֹמֶרִי, my words, my discourses. Son of Imri, 1 Chron. ix. 4.

OMRI, עֹמֶרִי, Ὠμρί, with αὖ hain, sheaf, or bundle of corn; from עָמַר: or rebellion; from מָרַר marar: or bitter; from מָרַר marar. [raised very high; or increasing, continually growing?]

I. OMRI, or AMRI, general of the army of Elah, king of Israel. Being at the siege of Gibbethon, and hearing that his master Elah was assassinated by Zimri, who had usurped his kingdom, he raised the siege of Gibbethon, and, being elected king by his army, marched against Zimri, attacked him at Tirzah, and forced him to burn himself and all his family, in the palace wherein he had shut up himself. Zimri reigned but seven days, A. M. 3075, ante A. D. 929. 1 Kings xvi. 9.

After the death of Zimri, half of Israel acknowledged Omri for king, the other half adhered to Tibni son of Gineth: this division continued four years. When Tibni was dead, the people united in acknowledging Omri as king of all Israel, who reigned twelve years: six years at Tirzah, and six at Samaria.

Till then Tirzah had been the chief residence of the kings of Israel. But when Omri purchased the hill of Shomeron, 1 Kings xvi. 24. about A. M. 3080, ante A. D. 924, for two talents of silver, (£684) he there built a new city, which he called Samaria, from the name of the first possessor Shemer or Shomer; and there he fixed his royal seat. From which time Samaria was the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes.

Omri did evil before the Lord, and his crimes exceeded those of his predecessors. He walked in all the ways of Jeroboam son of Nebat. He died at Samaria A. M. 3086, ante A. D. 918. His successor was Ahab.

II. OMRI, son of Becher, of the tribe of Issachar. 1 Chron. vii. 8.

III. OMRI, son of Michael, of Issachar. 1 Chr. xxvii. 18. chief of his tribe in the time of David.

ON, אֵן, pain, force, iniquity. Numb. xvi. 1. A city of Egypt. See HELIOPOLIS.

[ON, properly AUN, a mansion, or quiet residence, if from the Syriac, Arabic, or Greek; but, if from the Egyptian, the present Coptic has light, by metonymy for the sun: as we learn from Jablonski, Diss. de Terra Gosen. p. 44. May we not consider this appellation as the same with the Hindoo AUM, and in its Hebrew sense importing “the generative power:” personally, the great patriarch Noah, father of all mankind. Comp. FRAGMENTS, passim.

1. Heliopolis, a city of Egypt, by Ptolemy called Onion; q. Aun-i-Aun? light of light, Ezek. xxx. 17. called On, Gen. xli. 45. xli. 20. and Beth Shemesh, the temple of the sun, Jer. xliii. 13, which agrees with the Egyptian idea of the name.

2. A valley of Damascus, Amos i. 5. (Eng. Tr. plain.) noticed in Museum Bremens. vol. i. p. 282.

3. Beth On, or rather Beth Aun, the temple of rest, or quiet, say most commentators; but, if Aun alone implies the mansion of rest, a temple dedicated to this mansion appears to be an absurdity: there is, however, no absurdity in supposing a temple to the generative power, or great patriarch. It was a city of Benjamin, Josh. vii. 2. xviii. 12. 1 Sam. xiii. 5. xiv. 23. Hos. v. 8.

4. By a paranomasia, the prophet Hosea is usually understood to play on the name Bethel, which he changes [to Beth Aun, or Aven, intending tending the temple of vanity, of a vain idol: Hos. iv. 15. x. 5. called simply Aven, x. 8. xii. 12. Amos. v. 5. But, if my conjecture be correct, there is no paranomasia here, the prophet merely repeating the name given by the heathen to one of their temples in this place: i. e. the temple of the generative power: or, taking El in the sense of God, as is regular, the great one, then El and Aven are of equal import, which certainly they were, among the idolaters.]

ONAM, אָנָם, 'אָנָם or 'אָנָם, their trouble; from אָנָם anah: otherwise, their strength, or their iniquity; from אָנָם on, or aven, according to different readings, and the pronoun אָנָם, their's. Son of Shobal, Gen. xxxvi. 23.

ONAN, אָנָן, 'אָנָן, pain, strength, power, iniquity. See ONAM.

ONAN, son of Judah, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob. Judah having given a young woman named Tamar to his eldest son Er for a wife, Er died without children. Judah then caused his second son Onan to marry Tamar, that he might raise successors to his brother. But Onan knowing that the children begotten by him would be deemed to belong to his brother, withheld from Tamar the means of becoming a mother. This was so displeasing to the Lord, that he caused him to die, Gen. xxxviii. 6. probably by an extraordinary [wasting] malady. The time of this affair is wholly uncertain. The Testament of the twelve Patriarchs, a book very apocryphal, says, that Onan lived a year with Tamar without consummating his marriage; Tamar complaining of this to Judah, he expostulated with Onan, who followed the counsel of his mother who was a Canaanite, and who had an aversion for Tamar.

ONESIMUS, 'Ονήσιμος, useful; from ὀνήσιμος. Philem. verse 10. Comp. verse 11.

ONESIMUS, a Phrygian by nation, slave to Philemon; having run away from his master, and also having robbed him, (Philem. verse 18. Chrysost. Prolog.) went to Rome about A. D. 61. while St. Paul was there in prison, the first time. As Onesimus knew him by repute, (his master Philemon being a Christian) he sought him out, acquainted him with his transgression, owned his flight, and did him all the service Philemon himself could have done, had he been at Rome. St. Paul brought him to a sense of the greatness of his crime, instructed him, converted him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon, with a letter inserted among St. Paul's epistles; which is universally acknowledged as his.

Philemon not only received Onesimus as a faithful servant, but as a brother and a friend; and after a little time, he returned him to Rome, that he might continue his services to St. Paul, in his prison. After this, Onesimus carried such epistles as the apostle wrote at that time: as that to the Colossians, A. D. 62.

From this time Onesimus's employment was in the ministry of the gospel. The Apostolical Constitutions, lib. vii. cap. 46. report that St. Paul made him bishop of Berea in Macedonia. The martyrologies call him apostle, and say he ended his life by martyrdom. The Roman martyrology mentions him as being made bishop of Ephesus by St. Paul, after Timothy. Others add, that it was he whom Ignatius the Martyr speaks of, as bishop of Ephesus, A. D. 107: but this opinion has no solid proof. See Tillemont, Note 70. on St. Paul. The same martyrology places his feast Feb. 16, and says, that having succeeded Timothy in the bishopric of Ephesus, and having been charged by him with preaching the gospel, he was taken into custody and sent to Rome, where he was stoned for his faith in Jesus Christ. His body was buried there, but was afterwards taken up and carried to the place where he had been bishop. The Greeks celebrate his feast, Dec. 15.

ONESIPHORUS, 'Ονήσιφορος, who brings profit: from ὀνήσις, usefulness, and φόρος, he that brings. Compare ONESIMUS.

ONESIPHORUS, mentioned honourably by St. Paul, 2 Tim. i. 16. He came to Rome A. D. 65, while St. Paul was in prison there for the faith, and at a time when almost every one had forsaken him. See 2 Tim. i. 16, 18. and Theodoret, in 2 Tim. He arrived there from Asia, where he had already been very serviceable to the church. Having found St. Paul in bonds, after long seeking him, he repeatedly assisted him to the utmost of his power. For which the apostle wishes all sorts of benedictions on himself and his family. The Greeks place his festival April 29, and December 8. On April 29 they make him bishop of Colophon in Asia; and December 8. they make him bishop of Cesarea, without distinguishing which Cesarea. They place him among the seventy disciples, and seem to ascribe martyrdom to him. The Roman martyrology on December 16, says he suffered martyrdom on the Hellespont, where he went to preach the gospel with Porphyrius: that having been apprehended by command of the pro-consul Adrian, and carried into an idol temple, to offer incense, which he courageously refused to do; he was cruelly whipped with rods; then tied to a horse's tail, and drawn about till he expired.

ONIAS, 'Ονίας, strength of the Lord, or the Lord is my strength; from אָנָם on, and אָנָם jah, the Lord: otherwise, ship of the Lord; from אָנָם ani, and אָנָם the Lord.

I. ONIAS,

I. ONIAS, high priest of the Jews, son and successor of Jaddoa or Jaddus; Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult. ad finem. He was made high priest A. M. 3682, and governed the Hebrew republic twenty years, to A. M. 3702, ante A. D. 302. Onias had two sons, Simon, and Eleazar. Simon, surnamed the Just, succeeded him.

II. ONIAS, son of Simon the Just, high priest of the Jews, did not immediately succeed his father, who died A. M. 3711, because of his minority. Eleazar, his uncle by the father's side, succeeded Simon the Just, and held the high-priesthood near thirty years. He died A. M. 3744, and had for his successor, not Onias II. his nephew, who was lawful heir to this dignity, but Manasseh his great uncle, who died in 3771. Onias II. at last enjoyed the high-priesthood, and held it to 3785, ante A. D. 219. Josephus says, Ant. lib. xii. cap. 3, 4. that this Onias was a man of a mean spirit, and so sordidly covetous, that he had like to have lost his country by it. For the high priests, his predecessors, having been used to pay out of their revenue the tribute of the country to the king of Egypt, which was but twenty talents, (about £6,850) he refused to continue this custom.

Ptolemy Euergetes king of Egypt, incensed against Onias, sent a messenger to him, threatening that if he did not speedily pay what he owed to the king's treasury, he would give up Judea to his soldiers, and send thither other inhabitants instead of the Jews. The people were terrified at these threats; but the avarice of the high priest still rendered him insensible. Josephus, nephew of Onias, son of one Tobias, and of a sister of the high priest, obtained his leave to go in his name, and in that of the people, to remonstrate to the king of Egypt. Josephus coming to court, so well managed the tempers of the king and the queen, that he obtained from them all he desired.

Onias II. had for successor Simon II. his son, raised to the high priesthood in 3785. Some think it is Onias II. whose commendation is given by Jesus son of Sirach, chap. i. and whom he calls Simon: they say also that it was to him, the Lacedæmonians writ the letter mentioned by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. v. But others with more reason refer it to Onias III.

III. ONIAS, son of Simon II. high priest of the Jews, was established in the priesthood A. M. 3805, ante A. D. 199. Josephus relates the succession of Onias III. very differently from the second book of the Maccabees, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 5. The high priest Simon had three sons, Onias III.—Jason or Jesus,—Onias, otherwise called Menelaus. Onias III. at his death left a son under age named Onias. As he was not capable of exercising the high-priesthood, king Antiochus Epiphanes conferred it on Jason brother of Onias III. But he did not long enjoy it, for falling into disgrace with this prince, he dispossessed him of the priesthood, and gave it to Menelaus, otherwise called Onias. So that the three sons of Simon the Just successively enjoyed this dignity; but the last two obtained possession of it to the exclusion of Onias IV. son of Onias III. to whom it belonged by right of succession. But, 2 Macc. chap. iii. iv. says, it was under the pontificate of Onias III. that the history of Heliodorus happened, who having been sent by king Seleucus to take away the treasure from the temple of Jerusalem, was repelled by angels. In consequence of which, Onias having been accused to the king of Syria, by one Simon, as a traitor to his country, and author of the disturbances at Jerusalem when Heliodorus came thither; he thought fit to take a journey to Antioch, to vindicate himself to the king. While this was doing king Seleucus died, and his brother Antiochus Epiphanes succeeded him, at his return from Rome, A. M. 3828, ante A. D. 176. Then Jason brother to Onias came to Antioch, offered money to Epiphanes for the high-priesthood, and obtained it. He returned to Jerusalem while Onias continued at Antioch, disappointed of his dignity.

Three years afterwards Jason having sent Menelaus, brother of Simon, to Antioch, (observe he does not call him brother of Jason, or of Onias) to carry money to the king, and to consult him on some affairs of importance; Menelaus insinuated himself into the king's favour, obtained the sovereign priesthood from him, for which he offered three hundred talents above what Jason had given. Jason being thus deprived of his dignity, was obliged to retire into the country of the Ammonites. But as Menelaus was not able to pay what he had promised the king so soon as was expected, his brother Lysimachus was substituted in this office. In the mean while, Antiochus Epiphanes being obliged to depart in haste for Cilicia, to suppress a rebellion of some cities there, he left as governor, at Antioch, one Andronicus, who, corrupted by the money given him by Menelaus, put to death Onias III. the lawful high priest. 2 Macc. iv. 32. A. M. 3834, ante A. D. 170.

The unjust death of so holy a man filled with indignation, not only the Jews, but even the Pagans, themselves. As soon as the king returned, they complained to him of this murder. The king, though naturally little inclined to favour the Jews, could not refrain from tears, remembering remembering the wisdom and the moderation of Onias. He caused Andronicus to be stripped of the purple he wore, made him walk in disgrace through the streets of Antioch, and ordered him to be put to death in the same place where he had killed Onias. Thus the Lord brought upon him that punishment he had so justly deserved.

There are few persons to whom greater praises have been given than to Onias III. It is thought that to him Areus king of the Lacedæmonians wrote the letter, 1 Macc. xii. 20, 21. But we have assigned reasons which render it more probable that it was sent to Onias I. See LACEDÆMON.

Jonathan Maccabæus sending ambassadors to Rome A. M. 3860, ordered them at their return to take Lacedæmon in their way, and to renew the alliance with the Lacedæmonians as they had done with the Romans; and in his letter to the Lacedæmonians, he recites that of king Areus. Josephus also gives it intire, lib. xii. cap. 5. but changes the terms and manner of expression. For the character given to the high priest Onias III. See 2 Macc. iii. iv. xv. 12, 13. where we read that Onias appeared to Judas Maccabæus, accompanied by the prophet Jeremiah, who presented a sword to Judas.

IV. ONIAS, son of Onias III. never enjoyed the high-priesthood. The ambition of his uncles Jason and Menelaus, with the injustice of the kings of Syria, kept it from him. However, he had hopes of obtaining it, till the death of his uncle Menelaus: but when after that he saw that Antiochus Eupator appointed as his successor, Alcimus or Jacinus, who was indeed of the race of Aaron, but not of the family of Onias; and that Lysias, regent of the kingdom of Syria, had advised the king no longer to continue the high-priesthood in this family: Onias IV. perceiving his utter exclusion, took refuge in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor, where he obtained permission to build a temple to the true God, in the prefecture of Heliopolis, 2 Macc. xiii. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 15. A. M. 3842. ante A. D. 162. This temple was not built till A. M. 3854, ante A. D. 150: it was called Onion. See ONION.

Josephus in his second book against Appion, says, that Ptolemy Philometor and Cleopatra his queen, placed so great confidence in Onias and in Dositheus, both Jews, that they intrusted them with the command of their army. And after the death of king Philometor, Cleopatra being desirous to secure the kingdom to her son, who was the lawful heir of Philometor, but this being opposed by Ptolemy Euergetes, or Physcon, the queen employed Onias IV. to make war against him. Onias advanced towards Alexandria with a small army of Jews, and appeased a sedition there. But Ptolemy having compelled the queen to marry him, put to death all who were in the interest of the young prince, and killed him in the arms of his mother the very day of their marriage, in the very midst of the solemnity. It is not said whether Onias was put to death on this occasion; but it is very probable.

V. ONIAS, called otherwise Menelaus, whom Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 4, 5. describes as son to Simon the Just, and brother of Onias III. and whom 2 Macc. iv. 23. describes as brother to a certain Simon of Benjamin, an enemy and accuser of Onias III. This Menelaus, or Onias V. was created high priest A. M. 3882, and put to death in 3842, ante A. D. 162. Jason the usurper of the high-priesthood having sent Menelaus to Antioch, to carry money to king Antiochus Epiphanes, and to receive his answer to some important queries; Menelaus managed the king's temper so dexterously, that he acquired his confidence, and obtained the high-priesthood for himself, by offering three hundred talents more than Jason had sent for it: and having received the king's sanction, he returned to Jerusalem, puffed up with his new dignity. Jason was forced to withdraw into the land of the Ammonites.

But Menelaus not sending punctually to the king the money he had promised, though Sos-tratus governor of the castle had urged the payment; they were both summoned to appear before the king, who conferred the high-priesthood on Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus. In the mean time Antiochus having been obliged in great haste, to go to quell an insurrection of some cities in Cilicia, Menelaus took the opportunity to engage Andronicus, governor of Antioch in the absence of the king, to put to death Onias III. But at the return of Antiochus he was convicted of this crime, and punished in an ignominious manner.

Menelaus supported himself yet some time. Lysimachus, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had appointed high priest, having by advice of Menelaus committed many disorders, and violences in the temple, the people mutinied, and several of his attendants were wounded, some slain, and himself was killed on the spot. Menelaus was accused as the author of these disorders. But Antiochus coming to Tyre, Menelaus by a large sum gained to his interest Ptolemy, son of Dorimenes; and by his means he not only escaped the death he deserved, but even obtained the condemnation of the deputies sent by the Jews, to accuse him. He returned to Jerusalem more insolent than ever, increasing in malice, and continually laying snares for the citizens. In the interim, Antiochus went into Egypt, and a report was spread of his death; on this Jason the intrusive high-priest, with a thousand men, besieged Jerusalem, which he shortly took, and forced Menelaus to retire into the citadel, to the Syrian garrison. But this report proving false, Jason was obliged to withdraw, and Menelaus was re-established at Jerusalem with new authority, by which he distressed the citizens.

After the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, his son Antiochus Eupator, under the conduct of Lysias regent of the kingdom, marched against Jerusalem. Menelaus was with the army, and pretended to intercede with Eupator in favour of the Jews his countrymen, flattering himself that he should soon recover his authority at Jerusalem. But Lysias having acquainted Eupator, that Menelaus was the cause of all the troubles in Judæa, the king caused him to be apprehended, and secured till his return. Being come to Berea, he was carried to the top of a tower fifty cubits high, wherein had been collected a great quantity of ashes, into which Menelaus was thrown, and died miserably.

ONION. This name was given to the temple built by Onias IV. in Egypt, about A. M. 3854, ante A. D. 150. Onias IV. retiring into Egypt, obtained the favour of Ptolemy Philometor, and Cleopatra his queen: of which taking advantage, he asked leave to build a temple in Egypt, after the model of that at Jerusalem, and therein to settle priests and Levites of his own nation. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 6. What determined him to this, was chiefly, a passage of the prophet Isaiah, who more than six hundred years before had foretold, that the Lord should one day have a temple in Egypt, by means of a Jew, who should build it there.

Josephus does not quote the words of Isaiah, but the following is received as the passage, chap. xix. 18, 19. "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, (the Hebrew) and swear to the Lord of hosts; one shall be called the city of destruction" (or of cursing, or of Heres, i. e. the Sun, עיר חרם Gnir Hacherem, Civitas Anathematis, Aquila, Sym. Theodoret: but the Vulgate reads עיר חרם Gnir Hacheres, Civitas Solis. Perhaps, it was this that suggested to Onias, to build or consecrate this temple in the canton of Heliopolis.) "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign, and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts, in the land of Egypt."

Onias built at Bubaste a temple, resembling that at Jerusalem, but not so large or magnificent. He found also priests and Levites as little scrupulous as himself, who engaged in the service of this temple, and observed the same ceremonies there, as were customary in the temple of Jerusalem. Josephus describes this temple as having a tower like that of Jerusalem, sixty cubits high, built with very large stones: The altar of the same structure as that at Jerusalem: The building adorned with gifts and precious offerings, given by the Jews of Egypt: but instead of the candlestick which was in the temple of Jerusalem, a golden lamp, suspended, enlightened the Onion. The circumference of the temple was inclosed by a wall of brick, with gates of stone. King Philometor endowed it with large revenues and much land. The Jews and priests of Jerusalem could not see this temple without vexation; and it was always a subject of division between them and the Jews of Egypt.

After the ruin of the temple at Jerusalem by the Romans, A. D. 70. there was reason to fear, that the expatriated Jews, might retire into Egypt, and meeting in the temple, Onion, might occasion new revolts. For which reason Lupus, governor of Alexandria, and prefect of Egypt, having informed Vespasian of what had passed on occasion of the Jewish assassins which had resorted to Egypt: that prince gave him orders to demolish the temple. But Lupus satisfied himself with shutting it up, about A. D. 73, about 226 years after its foundation. Paulinus, who succeeded him shortly after, took away all its ornaments and riches, and closed up the whole. Such was the end of the temple Onion. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 37.

ONKELOS, the famous author of the Chaldee paraphrase on the Pentateuch. The Jews pretend that Onkelos was a Gentile by birth and religion; that he was converted to Judaism while Hillel was alive, who lived some time before our Saviour. His paraphrase is, without dispute, the best, the most sensible, and the most literal, of any among the Jews; and it were to be wished that he had explained all the Hebrew books of the Old Testament, as he has done the Pentateuch. Father Morin suggests that this paraphrase is much more modern than the Jews report. He thinks it dates before the Talmud of Babylon, but after the Talmud of Jerusalem: that Jerom knew nothing of it, and very likely, that it was composed after his time.

Some Jews have pretended, that Onkelos was son to the emperor Titus; others, that he was his nephew, a son of his sister. Others think, the author of the paraphrase was more ancient than than the time of Titus. Several Rabbins have maintained, that Onkelos the paraphrast was the same as Aquila, the famous Greek interpreter of Scripture. But F. Morin, who reports all these particulars, has well confuted them in his Exercit. 8. cap. 6.

The reasons which have induced some to believe that Onkelos was the same as Aquila of Pontus, are 1. The similitude of names; for Onkelos and Aquila, or Akilas, are the same. 2. Aquila as well as Onkelos, was a proselyte. 3. They lived about the same time; A. D. 150. To these reasons it may be answered; 1. That the difference between the names Onkelos and Aquila, is sufficient to prove them distinct persons. 2. That the character of a proselyte given to Onkelos is not well grounded. 3. That Aquila lived in the second century of the Christian church, whereas Onkelos lived in the time of Hillel, some years before Jesus Christ. It is true, they say he lived till after the death of Gamaliel the grandson of Hillel, who died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem; but this is distant enough from the time of Aquila. It is true, also, that the author of Bereshith Rabba wrote a Rabbinical Commentary on Genesis, and some Rabbins after him mention the Targum of Aquila; but this Targum is the Greek version of Aquila. Targum may be taken either for a version, or a paraphrase.

The Targum of Onkelos has always been greatly esteemed among the Jews. Elias Levita says, that the Jews think themselves obliged to read a section of the law every week in their synagogues, which is the lesson of the week. They read this section twice, first in the Hebrew original, afterwards in the Targum, i. e. in Chaldee; and for this they use the Targum of Onkelos. Thus it was read in his time, i. e. in the beginning of the sixth century. Hence, according to the observation of this author, this Targum was so well known among them, while the others were very scarce; insomuch that it was not easy to find a copy of the other Targums in a whole province, whereas copies of Onkelos were very common.

As to what Father Morin says, that the Targum of Onkelos was not composed till after the Talmud of Jerusalem; his reasons only prove, that some additions have been made to Onkelos's text, and some words inserted. But as to the body of the work, it cannot be doubted, but that it was wrote about the time of Jesus Christ. Jerom's silence is but a negative argument; he might not have known it, though it were in being; or he might have known it, and yet neither quote it, nor mention it.

In many copies of the Bible, the Jews inserted the Targum of Onkelos, after the original text; and put the same musical notes to it, as to the Hebrew; so that it might be read with a kind of chanting in their synagogues, at the same time as the original, and to the same tune.

Though Onkelos generally follows his original, word for word, very closely and justly: yet he explains some passages of the original which he thought required it. E. gr. in most of the passages, where the name Jehovah is found, he puts מִמְרָא דִּיהוָה Memra, Verbum Jehovah, the Word of Jehovah; and he distinguishes Memra, Word, from pitgama, which signifies discourse; ascribing to Memra all the actions of Supreme Deity. To Memra he ascribes the creation of the world; Memra appeared to Moses on Mount Sinai, and gave him the law: to him Jacob made his vow, saying: "If the Word shall conduct me, and bring me back to the house of my father, then he shall be my God." The same Word appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre. Jacob appealed to this Word as a witness between himself and Laban, &c. See WORD.

ONO, אֹנוֹ, his trouble, [grief] his strength, his iniquity; from אָן on, or aven, and וֹ, his.

ONO, a city of Benjamin: built, or at least rebuilt, by the family of Elpaal, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 12. It was five miles from Lod, or Lydda, also built by Benjaminites.

[In Nehem. vi. 2. we have mention of "The Valley of Ono," which probably was not far from the city.

Simon renders, mansion, i. e. the very safe abode of quiet.]

ONO, second son of Lod, Ezra ii. 33. where I take Lod to be Lydda, and Ono its daughter, as in Scripture villages are named daughters of the great cities, to which they owe their origin. Compare 1 Chron. viii. 12.

ONYCHA, or Onyx. This word is used in two senses in Scripture. 1. For an odoriferous nail or shell. 2. For a stone named Onyx. According to the etymology, Onyx signifies a nail of the finger, or toe. The Hebrew שְׁחֵלֶת Shecheleth, Exod. xxx. 34. which Jerom after the LXX. translates by the aromatic shell or nail, others understand of Labdanum, or of bdellium. But the greater part of commentators explain it by the onyx, or the odoriferous shell, a shell like that of the shell-fish purpura. The onyx is fished for in watry places of the Indies, where grows the spica nardi, which is the food of this fish, and what makes its shell so aromatic. They gather these shells when the heat has dried the marshes. The best onyx is found in the Red Sea, and is white and large. The Babylonian is black and smaller. So says Dioscorides.

ONYX, a precious stone so called, the eleventh in the high priest's pectoral. Exod. xxviii. 20. שֹׁהֶם Shohem, LXX. Joseph. Aquil. Hieron. Jun. Lud. de Dieu, alii plures—Onychinus lapis: But, Exod. xxviii. 9. the same term is translated by Jerom, Sym. and Theodot. Onyx, by the LXX. and many others, Smaragdus. We think its true signification to be the emerald. The onyx is a kind of agate, of a whitish black colour: and as the white therein has something of the colour of a man's nail, it has obtained the name of onyx, or the nail.

OPHEL, פֶּהֶל, Vulg. tower, or elevated place; from פֶּהֶל hophel; otherwise, obscurity; from פֶּהֶל hiphah. [or clouds, or cloudy.]

OPHEL. A wall, rather a tower so called at Jerusalem, [not far from the temple: a cliff, or acclivity, an ascent; a part of Mount Zion, on the east, say some, not far from Mount Moriah.]

Jotham, king of Judah, made several buildings on, or within, the wall of Ophel, 2 Chron. xxvii. 3. Manasseh, king of Judah, built a wall west of Jerusalem and the fountain Gihon, beyond the city of David, from the fish-gate to Ophel, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. At the return from the captivity, the Nethinim dwelt at Ophel, Neh. iii. 26. xi. 21; whence we guess, that this wall and tower were in the neighbourhood of the temple, since the Nethinim ought to be at hand, and ready at all times for their duty therein. Micah, iv. 8. mentions the tower of Ophel: "And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion." Heb. And thou, tower of the flock, Ophel, daughter of Zion:"—though some translate Ophel—by bulwark, or strong hold. There was at Jerusalem a sheep-gate, and a tower of Ophel. Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 18. vi. 6. vii. 13. speaks of Ophlas, which is the same as Ophel: and it seems to me, by what he says of it, that it must be near the temple.

OPHIR, אֹפִיר, ashes; from אֹפִיר epher.

[The Arabic root denotes fat, or slippery; Bochart thinks it imports opulence, Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 27.]

The region of Ophir is mentioned 1 Kings ix. 28. on occasion of which history, Josephus, lib. viii. says, it was called the "golden land:" whence Aurum Ophirizum, or Obrizum, was descriptive of very fine gold.

The word also occurs, Job xxviii. 16. Psalm xlv. 10. Isaiah xiii. 12.]

I. OPHIR, son of Joktan. Moses says, Gen. x. 26—30. that the dwelling of the sons of Joktan extended from Mesha to Sephar, a mountain of the east. We think Mesha to be Mount Masius in Mesopotamia; and Sephar to be the country of the Sepharvaites, or Saspires, which divided Media from Colchia. Scripture does not record the descendants of Ophir, nor what province was peopled by him between Mesha and Sephar; but it cannot be doubted that the country of Ophir, whatever country that was, was peopled by the posterity of Ophir, son of Joktan.

II. OPHIR, a country much celebrated in Scripture; about which critics have proposed a great number of conjectures. It is agreed, with great reason, that this country was peopled by Ophir, son of Joktan; and Moses says the thirteen sons of Joktan dwelt from Mesha to Sephar, a mountain of the east, Gen. x. 30. But as Mesha and Sephar are as much unknown as Ophir itself, we must take another method to discover Ophir. All the passages have been examined which mention this country, 1 Kings xxii. 48. compared with 2 Chron. xx. 36. also 1 Kings ix. 28. x. 22. and it has been observed, that the same ships that went to Tarshish, went also to Ophir; that these ships set out from Ezion-geber, a port of the Red-Sea, 1 Kings xxii. 49. ix. 26. x. 22.; that three years were required for Solomon's fleet to make the voyage of Ophir; that this fleet returned freighted with gold, peacocks, apes, spices, ivory, and ebony, 1 Kings ix. 28. x. 11, 12. compare 2 Chron. viii. 18. ix. 10, &c. lastly, that the gold of Ophir was in the highest esteem, and that the country of Ophir more abounded with gold than any then known. By these tokens interpreters have undertaken to search for Ophir, but almost all have taken different ways.

Josephus says, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2, that the country of Ophir is in the Indies, and is called the Gold Country. It is thought, he means Chersonesus Aurea, known now by the name of Malacca, a peninsula opposite to Sumatra. Lucas Holstenius, notis in Ortelium, after many enquiries, thinks we must fix on India generally, or on the city of Supar in the island of Celebes. Others place it in the kingdom of Malabar, or in Ceylon, i. e. the island of Taprobana, so famous among the ancients. Bochart has laboured to support this opinion. Eupolemus, apud Euseb. lib. ix. cap. 30. has placed Ophir in the island Durphe in the Red-Sea. Maffeus believed it was Pegu, and it is said the Peguans pretend to be descended from those Jews, whom Solomon sent to work in the mines of this country. Lipenius, who has composed a treatise concerning Ophir, places it beyond the Ganges, at Malacca, Java, Sumatra, Siam, Bengal, Pegu, &c. Others, as Arias Montanus, Genebr. Vatab. have sought for Ophir in America, and have placed it in Hispaniola. Christopher Columbus who first discovered this island, A. D. 1492, used used to say he had found the Ophir of Solomon. He saw there deep caverns, extending under ground sixteen miles, whence he thought Solomon might have dug his gold. Postel and some others have placed it in Peru, a country famous for its gold. Others have sought it in Africa. They say that the inhabitants of Melinda, or Sofala, on the eastern coast of Africa, by tradition, and in books, affirm, that Solomon every three years sent his fleet thither, to fetch gold, there it abounds. Juan dos Santos relates, that in Monomotapa in a mountain called Fura, where are excellent mines; that on this mountain stands an old castle, which tradition says was the habitation of the queen of Sheba; and that this is the real Ophir. Others place it at Angola, still on the eastern coast of Africa; others at Carthage, in N. Africa, though this city was not built till long after Solomon. Others have placed it in Spain.

Grotius, on 1 Kings, ix. 28, conjectures, that Solomon's fleet did not perhaps go to the Indies, but only to a port of Arabia, by Arrian called Aphar, by Pliny Saphar, by Ptolemy Sapphera, and by Stephanus Saphinira. This city was situated on the coasts of Arabia that were washed by the ocean. That the Indians brought their merchandize thither, and that Solomon's navy went thither to meet and bring it home. Huetius in his Dissertation on the navigation of Solomon, says, that Ophir was Zanguebar, in Africa, E. that the name Ophir was given more particularly to the small country of Sophala, on the same coast; that Solomon's fleet went out of the Red Sea; that it doubled cape Guadarfui, and coasted along Africa to Sophala: that there was found in abundance whatever was brought to Solomon by this voyage. [Mr. BRUCE has laboured to support this opinion, by a variety of very ingenious arguments: especially the names of places on the coast, and the courses of the winds. Compare the MAP of AFRICA.]

Goropius Becanus and Bivarius, suppose Solomon's fleet did not depart from the Red sea, but from the Mediterranean. They pretend that the port of Ezion-geber was on this sea: that Ezion-geber, according to Scripture, was in Idumæa; that Idumæa bordered on the Mediterranean; that on this sea is found Gaston-gabria in Strabo, and Beto-gabria in Ptolemy; which is probably Ezion-geber. True it is, that Scripture places Ezion-geber on the Red-sea, or according to the Hebrew the sea of Zuph: but they pretend that this name may express in general the sea of limits, which agrees as well to the Mediterranean as to the Red-Sea. Hornius does not disapprove this opinion; but it is easily confuted by two or three arguments.

1. The sea of Zuph is never taken for any other sea than the Red-Sea.

2. Ezion-geber was on the gulph of Elath, which is an arm of the Red-Sea.

3. Idumæa might extend to the Mediterranean in the time of Ptolemy the geographer; but in the time of Solomon, and long after, it extended into Arabia Petræa, towards Elath and Ezion-geber.

The abbé de Choisy, in his Life of Solomon, inclines to place Ophir in the kingdom of Siam. In this kingdom and about it, are found all those things, which Solomon's navy brought from Ophir; and the voyage is long enough for three years, between this place and Ezion-geber.

But we have taken a new course in quest of Ophir. We think that Ophir, the son of Joktan, with his brethren, peopled the countries between the mountain Masius and the mountains of Saphar, which are probably those of the Tapires or Suspires, towards Armenia, Media, and the sources of the Tigris and the Euphrates; for we do not pretend at this day to assign the limits of those countries. Eustathius of Antioch, in Hexæmer, as well as we, places Ophir in Armenia. The emperor Justinian divided Armenia into four parts, and one of these parts was called Sophara. Strabo, lib. xi. places on the Phasis a people called Sarapenes. Quadratus, apud Stephan. in Ὠρήνη, speaks of the Qbarrenians on the river Cyrus; and Pliny of the Suarni, situated between the Caspia Porta, the Gordian mountains, and the Euxine sea. The gold of Pharvaim, or of Sepharvaim, is the same as the gold of Ophir. 1 Kings ix. 26, 27, 28. compared with 1 Chron. xxix. 4:—an S has often been added to the beginning of words to mark their aspiration; the Septuagint also, sometimes read Sophir for Ophir. Sepharvaim has much relation to Mount Saphar mentioned by Moses.

Perhaps to this will be replied, First, that in the country where we place Ophir all the things are not to be found, that were brought to Solomon by his fleet. Secondly, that this country does not border on the sea, nor was it accessible to a fleet. Thirdly, that this could not be a three years' voyage. But I answer, that the fleet of Solomon in its voyage stopped at several harbours, in each of which it took in certain things. It took in apes, ebony, and parrots on the coasts of Ethiopia. It took in gold at Ophir, or at the place of traffic, whither the people of Ophir resorted. It might also find ivory there, or, if you please, in some of the ports of Arabia, where also it might be supplied with spices; it might trade on both sides of the Red-Sea; on the coasts of Arabia and Ethiopia; and on the parts of Ethiopia beyond the Straits; when it had entered the ocean. Thence it passed up the Persian gulph, and might visit the places of trade on both its shores, and run up the Tigris or the Euphrates, as far as either river was navigable.

The ancients name several places of traffic on the Tigris and Euphrates, which were heretofore famous, before they had raised banks on the Tigris, or made out-lets in the Euphrates, which interrupted the navigation of those rivers, or made it more difficult. Vide Strabo in the first book of his Geography. Thus, though the countries were not maritime, yet they might trade with them by going up either river.

Before the reign of David the Hebrews did not much apply themselves to trade by sea. The Canaanites or Phœnicians were in possession of all the commerce of the Mediterranean; and as the Hebrews had little or no territory on the shore of this sea, and nothing on the ocean, it is not to be wondered at, that they did not think of making sea voyages. Beside, from Joshua's time to David, they had hardly any enjoyment of peace, and were not in condition of applying themselves to navigation. But after David had conquered Idumæa, and was master of Elath, and Ezion-geber, on the Red-Sea, (Vide 1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 17. 1 Kings xi. 15, 16. 1 Chron. xviii. 13) he considered the advantage those ports afforded for trade on the ocean. He sent fleets, and very probably, from their voyages he obtained the three thousand talents of gold of Ophir, which he bequeathed to the building of the temple. 1 Chron. xxix. 4.

Solomon continued the adventure to Ophir, whence his fleet in one voyage, brought 450 talents of gold, 2 Chron. viii. 18. He improved and perfected what his father had begun at Elath and Ezion-geber, 2 Chron. viii. 17. He went in person to these cities, ordered ships to be built there, caused those two harbours to be fortified, and gave the necessary orders, not only that the trade of Ophir might be effectually carried on, but also might be extended to such other places, as the Red-Sea opened him access to. He also brought to these two harbours from the maritime places of Palestine, as many sea-faring people as he possibly could, especially Tyrians, with whom his friend and ally king Hiram supplied him. This was the chief source of the immense riches of king Solomon; in which, as well as in wisdom, he exceeded all the kings of his time.

Solomon's successors, the kings of Judah, who possessed Idumæa, carried on this traffic; they used the port of Ezion-geber, down to the time of Jehoshaphat. But this king having here prepared a fleet to go to Ophir, in conjunction with Abaziah king of Israel, which fleet was there destroyed, it sunk the reputation of this harbour, at the entrance of which is a chain of rocks, upon which the fleet was driven by the winds, when it attempted to quit the port, and was there dashed to pieces. The year after, Jehoshaphat fitted out another fleet from the port of Elath, to go to Ophir, and would not let Ahaziah share in the undertaking. See 1 Kings xxii. 49. 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37.

Under Jehoram, son and successor of Jehoshaphat, 2 Kings viii. 20, 22, the Idumæans revolting against Judah, obtained their liberty, and the kings of Judah lost Elath and Ezion-geber, by which they had carried on commerce with Ophir, 2 Kings xiv. 22. 2 Chr. xxvi. 2. But Uzziah, or (Azariah) king of Judah, having recovered Elath at the beginning of his reign, fortified it anew, peopled it with his own subjects, and restored the trade of Ophir, which was continued to the reign of Ahaz. Then Rezin, king of Damascus, surprized Elath, drove out the Jews that were settled there, and put Syrians in their place, with design of promoting the trade with Ophir, and the south, for his own advantage. But the year following, Tiglath-pileser wrested Elath from Rezin, and, acquired the property of the trade. After this time the affairs of the Jews would no longer allow them to think of Ophir, or of extending their commerce by sea. Nor do I find so much as the name mentioned in their books, written after the captivity of Babylon.

[If the region of Ophir took its name from Ophir, son of Joktan, Gen. x. 29. as is usually supposed, we must, in order to ascertain where this region lay, discover where Ophir settled. Moses says expressly that the sons of Joktan dwelt between Mesha and Mount Sephar, a mountain of Kedem. If we place Kedem at or near the head of the river Indus, we shall find the land of Havilah, brother of Ophir, in the land of Cabul, Cabilah, in that region; and consequently we may seek Ophir not far from it.

To this agrees the sentiment of the Targumist on Eccl. ii. 5. who says, "I planted me all trees of spice, which the goblins and dæmons brought me out of India (Hendica)."
We know no more likely opportunity for this bringing to Solomon, than that by his Ophir fleet: and it certainly supposes an intercourse between Solomon and the regions where we have placed Ophir. The spice trees, we know, are natives of the hottest climates: and possibly the phrase "goblins and dæmons" may refer to the Tyrian sailors, sailors, by whom Solomon's fleet was navigated; and to the deities they worshipped; with the rites they practised in their voyage. We can hardly suppose Solomon would let them erect their idols in conspicuous places in his ships: or consecrate them openly to their deities, as we know they did their own. Comp. FRAG. Nos. CCXIV. CCXXVI. But he could not prevent their customs out at sea; nor their giving any names they pleased, in a sailor's manner, to the vessels they navigated; even the names of goblins and daemons.

The former part of this article, exhibits the train of reasoning which induced the learned CALMET to place Ophir at the head of the Euphrates: but, had he considered the much readier way for Solomon to maintain an intercourse with that country by land, he would never have made him undertake a three years' voyage to that region. The case is different in trading to the Indus; because, this was a regular voyage from Egypt, and still is; also, from the coast of Malabar to Mocha, antiently to Berenice, Cosseir, &c. in the Red Sea, being a line of intercourse never wholly abandoned. With regard to the length of time, three years, I presume we are to take it according to the Hebrew manner of reckoning, for part of the first year, the whole of the second year, and part of the third year. If then we suppose with Mr. Bruce, that Solomon's fleet, following the course of the winds during June, July, August, September, and October, had sailed down the Red Sea for the ocean, say they passed the Straits of Babelmandel in October, they might then pass over to the Indus, spend one year in taking in their lading there, &c. and repass the Straits homeward in the months of November, December, January, February, March, and April. This the Hebrews would reckon three years, the space included being part of the first, and part of the third year. Supposing the fleet to be arrived at the mouth of the Indus, it could do no business except in places where commerce was carried on, nor could it procure gold, except in some capital trading city: it was therefore under the necessity of advancing up the river, to some of those famous marts which occupied its banks; and in this navigation a considerable portion of time must have been consumed: Or, it may be admitted, that the gold of Ophir was brought down the Indus, to a station, say the present Moulton, and that here the Tyrians exchanged their cargoes for it. If it be thought unlikely that the Jewish vessels should sail so high up the Indus, we may suppose that they went to the same places and ports as the Egyptian navigators afterwards did: i. e. to Musiris, a harbour on the Malabar coast, now Merjee; or to Barace, now Barcelore. Pliny calls Musiris the first emporium in India; and stating the time occupied in the navigation between the two countries he informs us, that from Berenice, in Egypt, ships take their departure at Midsummer; in 30 days they reach the mouth of the Arabian Gulph; thence in 40 days to Musiris. They begin their voyage home early in December, and complete their passage in less than a year. We must understand, that at this time the vessels followed the coast, for the most part, to the mouths of the Indus, and from thence down the western shore of the continent to Musiris. But the object of these vessels was certainly commodities, not the gold of Ophir; for in quitting the mouths of the Indus they quitted the course to that country. We consider it, therefore, as very probable, that the difference of time was lost, either in ascending the Indus in those vessels which composed this fleet; or in transshipping into vessels of the country the goods they had brought, and receiving others in return.

That the river Indus was capable of receiving ships of burden is evident from the history of Alexander. The following extracts are from Mr. Arrowsmith's Large Map of the Course of the Indus, and agree perfectly with what we have suggested. It is the opinion of Major Rennell, that, under the Ptolemies, the Egyptians extended their navigation to the extreme point of the Indian Continent, and even sailed up the Ganges to Palibothra, now Patna. What Major Rennell supposes might be done in the Ganges, I suppose might be done in the Indus.

"The river Indus admitted of an uninterrupted navigation from the [sea up the] Gulph of Cutch, to Lahore; for vessels of near 200 tons: a distance of about 760 geographical miles." "Scylax built vessels and sailed down the Indus," on the Cow, or Cowmull River; which joins the Indus about lat. 32. 45. almost three degrees higher than the branch which communicates with Lahore. "Alexander built vessels on the Hydaspes, now the Jhylum or Bebut River," in about the same latitude, but on a branch of the Indus, which is but small in comparison with the main river. From lat. 33. to 34, the river Indus was three quarters of a mile, to a mile across, in July, 1783.

Attock Benares, probably the most antient university for learning, a city reckoned sacred by the Hindoos, and a city of great trade in antient time, is situated on the Indus at this part of the river.

This Attock Benares precisely answers our purpose purpose as to a commercial town on the Indus. The streams which fall into the Indus, from the Caucasian mountains, would convey the productions of the land of Ophir. An idea of what these generally were, may be formed from Major Wilford's description of the land of Chabila, adjacent to Ophir. He mentions particularly gold, as found near the surface of the earth, but purer still by digging to a considerable depth; and that it might be procured in great quantities. Comp. OPIINI, עָפִי, 'Aphi, who is weary; from עַיַּי jahaph: or that stools; from הָפָה huph: according to the Syriac, who is folded or plaited.

OPHNI, a city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 24. עֲפִנִי Ophni or Gophni. Probably the same as Gophni or Gophna. For in Hebrew the letter y Hain is often pronounced as a G. Gophna, according to Josephus, was about fifteen miles from Jerusalem, towards Naplouse or Shechem, says Eusebius, Onomastic. ad vocem φάραγξ βοτρυος. He says, in vocem Geba, it was five miles from Geba, or Gabaa. Josephus often speaks of Gophna, and of the toparchy of Gophna, and all he says agrees very well with the position of Eusebius. He says, that Vespasian having subdued the country of Gophna, brought also Bethel and Ephraim into subjection, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 8: also, lib. vi. cap. 1. that Titus advancing from Samaria towards Jerusalem, passed by Gophna.

OPIIRAH, עֶפְרָה, 'Aphar, dust, fawn; from עָפָר haphar: otherwise, lead; from עֶפְרַת hophereth. A city, Josh. xviii. 23.

OPHRAH, אֶפְרָה, a cow: from פָּר par, [q. a hind, or young deer?] otherwise, abounding in fruit; from פָּרָה parah: otherwise, ashes; from אֶפֶר apher, cinis, [or dust, or lead.] Son of Meonothai, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 14.

[1. A city of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 23. 1 Sam. xiii. 17.

2. In the prophet Micah, i. 10. we have a temple mentioned, as the house of Ophrah, where the paranomasia clearly points at dust, as the import of this name: "In the temple of Ophrah (dust) roll thyself in the dust." But this phrase might be adopted by the prophet, by reason of the similarity of sound, though not of sense, between the two words.

3. Ophrah, a city of Manasseh, the birth-place of Gideon. Judg. vi. 11. viii. 27. ix. 5.

The soil adjacent to these places might be light and dusty.]

[OPPRESSION, is the spoiling or taking away of men's goods or estates by constraint, terror, or force, without having any right thereto; working on the ignorance, weakness, or fearfulness of the oppressed. Men are guilty of oppression, when they offer violence to the bodies, estates, or consciences of others; when they crush or overburden others, as the Egyptians did the Hebrews, Exod. iii. 9. there may be oppression which maligns the character, or studies to vex another, yet does not affect his life: as there is much persecution, for conscience sake, too, which is not fatal, though distressing.]

OPPRESSOR, vide DOVE, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIX.

ORACLE. Jerom often translates by oraculum, what in many other places he calls propitiatorium. The Hebrew (Exod. xxv. 18, 20. xxxvii. 6, et passim.) is כַּפֹּרֶת Caphoreth, LXX. Ἰλαστήριον [Mercy-Seat, Eng. Tr.] it comes from the verb caphar, to expiate, to pardon sins, to cover, to harden any thing. This word may be rendered, a covering; and indeed it was the cover of the ark of the covenant, or of the sacred chest in which the laws of the covenant were contained. At each end of this cover was a cherub of beaten gold; these stretching out their wings towards each other, formed a kind of throne, upon which the Lord was considered as sitting. Hence they invoked him sometimes as, he Who sitteth upon the cherubim. And perhaps, by translating Caphoreth by propitiatory, [or mercy-seat] it may be insinuated, that from thence the Lord hears the prayers of his people, and pardons their sins: while, by translating it oracle they would shew, that from hence he manifested his will and pleasure, and gave responses: as he did to Moses.

[From the similitudes connected with this term in the N. T. it is scarcely possible to attach too much consequence to it; nor can a few words do it justice, though they may contribute to explain its nature, and import.

The root of the term, Ilasko, signifies to placate, to pacify, to at-one, to reconcile; or, that intervening, or mediating power, or thing, or consideration, by which two parties at variance are reconciled. So Heb. ii. 17. "to make reconciliation, ἰλασκεσθαι, for the sins of the people;" and Luke xviii. 13. the publican prayed "God be merciful, ἰλάσθητι—be reconciled to—be at one with me, a sinner." Comp. LXX. Psalm xxv. 11. lxxviii. 38. Dan. ix. 19.

The propitiation, ἰλάσμος, is properly an offering from one party to another, which possesses the power or property, or influence of reconciling, or re-uniting those who have been separated by offences: it answers to סְלִיחָה remission, forgiveness, Psalm cxxx. 4. Dan. ix. 9. and to כַּפֹּרֶת, Numb. v. 8. "the ram of atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for his sins." So 2 Macc. iii. 33. Certain tain of Heliodorus's friends prayed Onias that he would call on the Most High to grant him his life . . . so the high priest offered a sacrifice for the man's restoration to health;—Now, as the high priest was making an atonement—rather, the atonement, τὸν ἱλασμόν, i. e. by means of the sacrifice. And this term is expressly applied to Christ, by the Evangelist John, 1 Epist. ii. 2. iv. 10. “he is a propitiation—a means of at-one-ment for our sins, and not for our's only, nor for those of the Jewish nation only, as were the sacrifices offered on the day of expiation, but for the whole world.—“God sent his son to be the propitiation for our sins,” in other words “that we might live through him,” verse 9. i. e. through his death, as the propitiating, the mediating sacrifice. (By the way, this allusion seems to suppose the rite of expiation to be in a course of performance, at the time when this epistle was written.)

Ilasterion is certainly taken for the Mercy-seat, Heb. ix. 5. “and over it (the ark of the covenant) the cherubim of glory shadowing the Mercy-seat, ἱλαστήριον.” Nevertheless, it may be doubted whether Christ is, strictly speaking, assimilated to the Mercy-seat itself, but rather to the sacrifice by which that Mercy-seat was understood to be reconciled to the people who had offended. For, it seems very harsh to say, that the victim which effected reconciliation was the same with one of the parties to be reconciled; but the Mercy-seat, accepted figuratively for the Supreme Deity, who sat on it, was a party to be reconciled. Moreover, the apostle, alluding to the rite of expiation, Rom. iii. 25, says, “whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, ἱλαστήριον, through faith in his blood,”—the victim had blood; but the Mercy-seat had none: and to say that the blood sprinkled on the Mercy-seat is the blood of the Mercy-seat, is to force a sense on the passage. Yet the term has been so understood by many; among whom, Theodoret, Le Clerc, and Luther; for the other explanation are the Vulgate version, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Erasmus, &c. and it seems, on the whole, to be the easiest, the most consistent, and the best supported sense.]

Oracle is also taken for the sanctuary, or for the place wherein was the ark of the covenant. The LXX. 1 Kings vi. 5, 16, 17. viii. 6, &c. have preserved the Hebrew דָּבִיר Dabir, Δαβίρ, Δαβίρ. Aquil. Sym. χρηματιστήριον, Psalm xxviii. 2. Ναός. Chrematisterion, by which Aquila and Symmachus have rendered it, signifies an oracle. The Chaldees, the house of propitiation. But Dabir properly signifies an oracle.

Oracle is also put for the oracles of false gods.

VOL. II. PART XXI. Edit. IV.

The most famous oracle of Palestine was that of Baal-zebub, king of Ekron, which the Jews themselves consulted. 2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16. There were also oracular Teraphim, as that of Micah, Judg. xvii. 1, 5; the ephod of Gideon, viii. 27, &c. and the false gods adored in the kingdom of Samaria, which had their false prophets, and consequently their oracles; whether these oracles were really delivered by assistance of the devil, or that the priests and false prophets imposed on the people, making them believe they were inspired, though they only spoke by their own seducing spirit.

Among the Jews we distinguish several sorts of oracles.

1. Oracles delivered vivâ voce; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend speaks to another, Numb. xii. 8.

2. Prophetical dreams from God; as the dreams which God sent to Joseph, and which foretold his future greatness, Gen. xxxvii. 5, 6.

3. Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy had supernatural revelations, Gen. xv. 1. xlii. 2.

4. The oracle of Urim and Thummim, which accompanied the ephod, or the pectoral, worn by the high-priest, Numb. xii. 6. Joel ii. 28. This manner of inquiring of the Lord was often used, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9. xxx. 7.

5. After the building of the temple they generally consulted the prophets, in Judah and Israel.

After Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the last of the prophets of whom any writings remain, the Jews pretend that God gave them what they call Bath col, the daughter of the voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, either by a strong inspiration, or internal voice, or by a sensible and external voice, heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony of it. For example, such was the voice heard at the baptism of Jesus Christ, saying, This is my beloved son, &c.

In the early Christian church the gifts of prophecy and inspiration were frequent; after that time the greater part of the heathen oracles fell into contempt and silence.

Much has been written on the subject of oracles, and the learned have been divided on this matter. Some have ascribed to demons all the oracles of antiquity; others to the knavery of the priests; others have pretended that there were several kinds of oracles; some were illusions and tricks of the devil, others were effects of juggling and contrivance. Scripture affords us examples of these sorts of oracles.

The number of false prophets was always great great in Israel. These deceivers spoke in the name of the Lord, though the Lord had not sent them. Moses, Deut. xiii. 1, &c. forewarns Israel, that false prophets and dreamers should arise, who would foretell future events; and that their predictions might possibly be verified. It cannot be doubted, but that among other nations, barbarians and idolaters, the devil had a still greater power, and a greater number of disciples.

Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, was in great reputation for delivering oracles, since Ahaziah king of Israel, being dangerously wounded, sent to consult him, whether he should recover from his bruises, 2 Kings i. 2, 3. But Elijah by a command from God, and an oracle of the Lord, prevented that of the devil.

The idol Bel, worshipped at Babylon, as a living, eating, and drinking god, very probably also gave oracles, Vide Apoc. Dan. xiv. 2, or the story of Bel and the dragon.

We read in Scripture, that some families of Dan seeking a settlement, sent out men on the discovery, to find a proper place for them, Judg. xviii. 5, 6, 7. These messengers passed by the house of Micah, who had in his service a young Levite; they pressed him to consult a superstitious figure that he had made. He answered them boldly; "Go in peace; before the Lord is your way, wherein ye go." They went and succeeded. Can we say this Levite was inspired of God, and that he pronounced this oracle from him? This is hardly probable; and it is much more likely, that he made this answer from himself; or that he was moved by a lying spirit.

It cannot be denied that the Pagans addressed themselves to their idols to receive oracles from them. They obtained therefore sometimes responses; for can any be so senseless as to ask, where they know it is absolutely impossible to receive an answer? Hosea, chap. iv. 12, reproaches Israel with consulting wooden idols. "My people asketh counsel of their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them." The book of Wisdom says, xiii. 16, 17, that when a man had cut down a tree from the forest, after he has taken from it wherewithal to warm himself, he makes an idol of the remainder, which he is so foolish as to consult about his most important affairs. Habakkuk testifies the same thing, ii. 19, "Woe unto him that saith to the wood, awake; to the dumb stone, arise, it shall teach."

The Hebrews living in the midst of idolatrous people, accustomed to receive oracles, to have recourse to diviners, magicians, and interpreters of dreams, would they not have been under a temptation to imitate these practices, these impieties, and superstitions, if God had not afforded them certain means of knowing some future events by priests and prophets, in their most urgent necessities? Thus when Moses had forbid the Israelites to consult magicians, witches, enchanters, and necromancers, he promised to send them a prophet of their own nation, who should instruct them, and discover the truth to them. "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren like unto me, unto him ye shall hearken," Deut. xviii. 10, 11, 15, &c.

And these oracles of truth had no necessary connection either with time or place, or any other circumstance; or with the personal merit of the individual by whom they were uttered. The high-priest, clothed with the ephod and pectoral, gave a true answer, whatever were his personal character. Sometimes he gave an answer, without knowing clearly the subject of the question he was consulted about. Caiaphas pronounced an oracle relating to Jesus Christ, whom he hated, and whose destruction he desired; and this oracle he understood not himself. For he says, John xi. 49, 50, 51. "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." It is added, "and this spake he—not of himself, but being high-priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation." And when the high-priest Ahimelech was consulted by David, he gave an answer, though David did not plainly acquaint him with the occasion of his journey. 1 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 3. xxii. 13. Micah says, iii. 11. that "the heads of Judah judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money," nevertheless, the prophets declared the truth to them. At the day of judgment many will say to Jesus Christ, Matt. vii. 22. "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name have done many wonderful works?" Notwithstanding this, he will say to them, "I never knew you."

The Fathers inform us, that at the coming of the Messiah, the oracles of the heathen were struck dumb. It is plain, that since the preaching of the gospel, the empire of the devil is much contracted and weakened, and that the most famous oracles are insensibly fallen into contempt. But it must be allowed, that this silence of the oracles did not happen all at once; and that a good while after our Saviour's time there were impostors, who gave out oracles, and that the devil still uttered them in some temples of idols. St. John, Rev. xiii. 5, 6, 13, describing a persecution of the church, speaks of signs, wonders, and delusions, which the deceiver and his accomplices should produce, to excite men to worship the image of the beast, and to entice them to idolatry.

ADDITION.

[Many difficulties combine with the subject of oracles. It may assist in forming a right notion of them, to separate those which are proper oracles from those which are oracles in a qualified sense, only. The witch of Endor was no oracle, though irregularly applied to by Saul, when he could obtain no answer from the instituted means of consulting the Lord. The hag Erichto, in Lucan's Pharsalia, was no oracle, as no temple, &c. was extant in her cave. Nor is that properly an oracle, which consists in catching up words which fall from certain persons: So Alexander the Great, by the false pronunciation of a Greek word, by the priest of Ammon, "Ὁ παῖ-διος instead of "Ὁ παῖ-διον, was made to pass for son of Jupiter, διος, (says Plutarch) and likewise, when he visited the Delphic prophetess on a wrong day, and urged her; she at length complied; saying, Thou art irresistible, my son! "That is all I want, (answered Alexander)—to be irresistible, is enough." These are not oracles: though policy and flattery, might make them pass for such.

The most antient oracle, on record, probably, is that given to Rebekah, when pregnant, Gen. xxv. 22. "She went to enquire of the Lord;" doubtless, to some place of worship, where she enquired by the intervention of an established minister of the altar.

The most complete instance is that of the child Samuel, 1 Sam. iii. The place was the residence of the ark, the regular station of worship. The manner was by an audible and distinct voice, "The Lord called SAMUEL! and the child mistook the voice for that of Eli; (and this more than once;) for he did not yet know the word of the Lord:" the subject was of high national importance; no less than a public calamity, with the ruin of the first family in the land. Nor could the child have any inducement to deceive Eli; as in that case, he would have rather invented something flattering to his venerable superior: this communicative voice, issuing from the interior of the sanctuary, was properly an oracle.

The highest instances of oracles, are those voices, which being formed in the air by power superior to nature, bore testimony to the celestial character of the Divine Messiah: as at his Baptism, Matth. iii. 17. Mark i. ii. Luke iii. 22. and again at his Transfiguration, Matth. xxii. 2. Luke ix. 29. "and this voice that came from heaven, says Peter, we heard;" 2 Epist. i. 18. Nothing can exceed the grandeur and majesty of these oracles; and they could not but forcibly impress the minds of all who witnessed them.

Now, it should be observed, that these communications were marked by simplicity and distinctness; they were the most remote possible from ambiguity and double meaning: they spake out their purport explicitly.

Prophetic impulses, or communications, are with less propriety called oracles: as, when Samuel went to Bethlehem, to anoint the future king of Israel, his own opinion fixed on Eliab, "Surely, the Lord's anointed is before him:" but the Lord corrected his judgment; not by an audible voice, that must have been heard by all the company, but, by some internal monition. 1 Sam. xvi. 6. It will appear, also, that in the time of Saul and David, when application for advice was made to the oracle, it could only be given in a regular manner to one party, as there were not two tabernacles, and two arks of the covenant, with which sacred objects the oracle was connected. Neither were there two high-priests' pectorals, on which the names of the tribes were written: the priest who did not wear these names on his breast, could not enquire as representative of the tribes, of the whole nation; and, by what means he received an answer is uncertain. It could not be, as some have supposed, by radiation of the letters on the precious stones; since he did not wear them.

We read very little, or nothing, of oracles given by the high-priest, in succeeding ages. When Jehoshaphat desired Ahab to enquire at the word of the Lord, to-day," there is no mention of an oracle, as connected with the established worship in Israel; 1 Kings xxii. nor do we read that when the copy of Moses's law was found in the temple at Jerusalem, king Josiah applied to the oracle for advice: neither did Zedekiah, king of Judah, though the very existence of his country depended on the policy he adopted; and no crisis could be more important.

Dreams, visions, the bath kol, &c. are not properly oracles: nor is the sentiment uttered by Caiaphas, which recommended the policy of cutting off one man, even though no malefactor, rather than hazarding the fate of the nation, an oracle. It was a maxim of a statesman, applicable to the designs of Providence; but not properly an oracle.

It is probable, that oracles are extremely antient among the heathen: they were known before the Trojan war; as appears from Homer; and Ovid makes Deucalion consult an oracle, immediately after his deluge.

ORA

The reader will perceive the intention to establish a strong distinction between the oracles of the Bible, and those promulgated by the Heathen. When Cræsus applied to the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, to know whether he should attack Cyrus, he received for answer, Cræsus transgressus Halym maxima regna perdet :

or, as Cicero quotes it,

Cræsus Halym penetrans magnam pervertet opum vim :

If Cræsus crosses the river Halys he will overthrow a great empire." This he understood of the empire of Cyrus; the event proved his own overthrow. The same ambiguity attends the famous reply of the same oracle to Pyrrhus;

Aio te, Æacida, Romanos vincere posse :

I do pronounce that Rome
Pyrrhus shall overcome.

Now, this may be interpreted to mean, either, that Rome should overcome Pyrrhus; or, that Pyrrhus should overcome Rome. Whoever reads Herodotus and Pausanias carefully, will find most of their oracles—and they record many—either so dark, as to be unintelligible; or so equivocal, as to bear whatever interpretation policy might be pleased to impose on them.

The Heathen drew auguries from almost every thing: from the flight of birds; from the manner of certain chickens' feeding; and above all, from the entrails of victims, offered in sacrifice: this most ridiculous superstition was not lawfully practiced among the Jews;—their sacrifices were simply offered to the Deity. It was, however, customary in the East; for the king of Babylon not only divined by arrows, and consulted images, but he looked in the liver. Ezek. xxi. 21. Nor should we forget, that it is equally to the credit of Christianity, that surrounded, as the Christians were, by the most inveterate of oracular prejudices and impostures, no such mummary profaned their assemblies.—The reader has only to compare Lucan's description of the violences practiced on the priestess at Delphi; the furious contortions of her person; or Virgil's of the Sybil, at Cumæ; with the calm observation of the Apostle—"the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets,"—with his injunctions of order, on various occasions, and with his strict prohibition of indecent forwardness in women, while at worship, indecorous exposure of their persons, disorderly dress, &c. &c. to evince this.

It is truly painful, to remark the infinite variety of methods taken by man, to obtain a knowledge of futurity,—that is to say, to anticipate the evils of life, and to double them—more than double them—by a consciousness of acting under the oppression of inevitable fate.

It is well to know, that in the remains of several heathen temples, though in ruins, there are traces of the secret ways of access, which the priests possessed, undiscovered by the spectators. Dr. E. D. CLARKE found such in a temple at Argos; also a secret chamber, in an oracular cave at Telmessus. A private staircase still exists, leading to the Adytum, in the temple of Isis, at Pompeii; undoubtedly, for oracular purposes.

To do this subject justice here, is impossible; some able pen, well acquainted with the charlatanerie of antient days, might render it equally amusing and instructive, to not a few among our own nation, who have opportunities of knowing better—very much better—than their practice implies.]

[ORDINANCE, an institution established by lawful authority. Religious ordinances must be instituted by the great institutor of religion, or they are not binding: but minor regulations are not properly ordinances. Ordinances once established are not to be varied by human caprice, or mutability. The original ordinance, seems to have been sacrifice, to which praise and prayer were naturally appended. Circumcision was an ordinance appointed to Abraham and his family: baptism and the eucharist, are ordinances under the gospel.

Human ordinances established by national laws, may be varied by other laws, because the inconveniences arising from them can only be determined by experience: yet Christians are bound to submit to these institutions, when they do not infringe on those established by divine authority: not only from the consideration, that if every individual were to oppose national institutions, no society could subsist; but by the tenor of Scripture itself. Nevertheless, Christianity does not interfere with political rights, but leaves individuals, as well as nations, in full enjoyment of whatever advantages the constitution of a country secures to its subjects.

The course of nature is the ordinance of God; and every planet obeys that impulse which the divine Governor has impressed on it, Jer. xxxi. 36.]

OREB, עֹרֵב, oreb, [crow] sweet, caution, or mixture; from עֹרֵב harab: otherwise, evening; from עֹרֵב hereb, by a different reading.

[The name Crow is common among ourselves, without importing any particular blackness peculiar to the person, or his family: I do not therefore attach any great importance to the conjecture of Bochart, that it might express rapacity; or eyes and hair black like the plumage image of a crow, which was esteemed handsome antiently; though this idea has been adopted by Chabot on Horace, lib. i. Ode 32, Cyprian in Franzii, Hist. Anim. p. 1173. and Arnzenius, Diss. de colore et tinctura Capillorum, cap. 4. Comp. Caut. v. 11. The name Corax, Corvus, Corbinus, in Latin, is well known.

Other languages, as the Arabic, have the same appellation.]

OREB, a prince of the Midianites, killed with Zeeb, another prince of the same people, Judges vii. 25, A. M. 2759, ante A. D. 1245. While Gideon pursued the army of the Midianites, he directed Ephraim to secure the passes of the Jordan, that the Midianites might not escape into their own country. The Ephraimites, therefore, took the two chiefs of the Midianites, and killed Oreb at the rock of Oreb, and Zeeb at the wine press of Zeeb. Some think that Oreb, or the rock of Oreb, was a village, or, at least, that from this time a village was gradually formed there. Eusebius and Jerom, in Arava, vel Araba, speak of a little place called Araba, three miles from Scythopolis, west; and Herman Vanderhart, Vide Reland, Palæst. 1, 2. thinks it was here the Orebim dwelt, who fed the prophet Elijah when concealed near the brook Chereth, 1 Kings xvii. 3, 5. He pretends that the translators have very preposterously made ravens of these Orebites, ערבים, Corvi.

The organs at present used in our churches, are comparatively a late invention: the earliest known in Europe, being sent to Pepin, king of France, about A. D. 758. but that was, no doubt very different from the present structure and combination of the instrument.]

ORION. A constellation in the heavens just before the sign Taurus. כסיל Chesil signifies, according to the ancient Hebrews, that star of the second magnitude which astronomers call the scorpion's heart. It appears at the beginning of the autumnal equinox, and forebodes cold or frost. Virgil calls it Nimbosus Orion. It also marks the west. Hence the LXX. on Job ix. 9. and Theodotion on Amos v. 8. translate it vesperum.

ORNAN, ארנן, that rejoices; from רנן ranan: otherwise, their bow or ark; from ארן aron: otherwise, light of the son; from אור or, light, and נן nan, a son. Vide ARAUNAH. Josephus calls him Orphona, Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 3. and says that David, saved his life when he took Jerusalem.

ORONTES, a river of Syria: it rises in mount Libanus, passes by Emessa, Apamea, Epiphania, and Antioch, and falls into the Mediterranean. Pliny says, its source is between Libanus and Antilibanus. Scripture makes no mention of the Orontes; but its name is frequent in commentaries on the sacred writings.

ORPAH, ערפה, the neck, or the skull, nakedness of the mouth, or face; from נרץ harah, to be naked, and פה pe, the mouth: or awaking of the mouth; from נרץ har, awaking.

ORPAH, a Moabite, wife of Chilion, son of Elimelech, and Naomi. Chilion the husband of Orpah being dead, she lived with Naomi her mother-in-law; who returning into her own country, Orpah was prevailed on to stay in Moab, but Ruth followed Naomi to Bethlehem, Ruth i. 9. 10, &c. See NAOMI.

ORPHA, Several think this to be the city Ur, whence Abraham departed, Gen. xi. 28, 31.

[ORPHAN, vide FRAGMENT, No. CLXXXI.]

ORTHOSIAS, Ὀρθωσιὰς, or Orthosis, Vulgate, Orthosias, which is right; from ὀρθος, right, upright.

ORTHOSIAS, a maritime city of Phœnicia, over against the island of Aradus, not far from Tripolis. Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, escaped from Dora in Palestine, where he was besieged, to Orthosias, and thence into his own country, Apamea, 1 Macc. xv. 25—37.

[A town and port of considerable importance, on the coast of Syria; now called Tortosa, says Mr. Maundrell, north of Rouad, or Arpad. It was a bishop's see in the province of Tyre, and formerly a place of great strength. It still possesses interesting antiquities.]

ORYX, a sort of wild goat. Aristotle says, Hist. Anim. lib. i. it has a horn in the middle of its forehead; Appian says, it has more than one. Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 53. xi. 46. says its hair is curled and turned towards its head. Several have confounded it with the antelope. Juvenal, Sat. ii. informs us, that it was eaten formerly, but that its flesh was not much in esteem with those of nice palates;

Et Getulus oryx hebeti lautissima comæ.

The Hebrew Tho, תו or תוא, Isaiah li. 20. is commonly translated a wild bull, [as in our English translation.] But the Septuagint, and other Greek interpreters, the Syriac, and the Vulgate, place it among goats, since they translate it oryx.

OSPNEY, or OSSIFRAGA, ערש Peresh, a kind of eagle, whose flesh is forbid, Lev. xi. 13. The ossifraga, or osprey, is thus called, because it it breaks the bones of animals, in order to eat the marrow. It is said to dig up bodies from church-yards, or burying-places, to eat what it finds in the bones, hence the Latins call it Avis bustaria, and the Persians, Ustukhan-khour, the bone-eater.

The Arabians and Persians also call it Humai, and say it is the most innocent of all birds, because it does no harm to any animal, and only feeds on dead bones.

Aristotle says, the ossifraga is the greatest of eagles, except those of Germany. Its plumage is of an ash-colour, approaching towards white. Pliny says, it is produced by the sea-eagle, which ingenders with all birds of prey. She does not only feed her own young, but those also that any other eagle has forsaken. Her sight is but weak, which is contrary to the nature of other eagles.

Aldrovandus gives this description of the ossifraga. Its beak is exceedingly crooked, and in the place where it is hooked, it is two fingers broad, and about a span long. Its colour is like brown horn, approaching dark blue. The opening of its beak is about a hand's breadth, the tongue resembles that of a man, and is broad at the end, and on the two sides it has two hooks made like fish-hooks. Its head and neck are covered with long narrow feathers, and from its chin hang down small hairs like a beard. The ground of its plumage is diversified by three colours, whitish, dark, and ruddy; the great feathers are brown, inclining towards chestnut. The twelve feathers of its tail are a little reddish, spotted with black and white. Its legs are covered with dark feathers a little ruddy, so that there remains but a small part of the legs uncovered of about two fingers breadth. This uncovered part is of a very fine yellow. Its talons are black and shining. Aldrovandus says, this bird feeds only on fish; so that it must be very different from the ossifraga above mentioned. But indeed, the whole that is said of that ossifraga, or bone-eater, seems to be fabulous.

OSTRICH, Struthio, is often mentioned in Scripture. Moses forbids it to the Hebrews. Lev. xi. 16. Deut. xiv. 14. [The English translation reads owl.] Interpreters are not agreed about the signification of the word Jaana, נֶחֱשִׁי, or נֶחֱשִׁי נֶחֱשִׁי, Στροβοκάμηλος, which the LXX. Jerom, Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion render ostrich. Several moderns take it for the owl, ulula. We have proposed some conjectures to prove it to be the swan.

We find in Job xxxix. 13. another Hebrew word רֶחֱנָנִים, Rhenanim, translated ostrich. Others take it for a peacock, but able interpreters apply the word נֶחֱשִׁי Noza to the ostrich, which is read in the same verse. The marks Job ascribes to the Noza agree very well to the ostrich.

This bird is very large, has very long legs, very short wings, the neck about the length of four or five spans, its wing feathers are in great esteem, as ornaments for hats, beds, canopies. They are stained of several colours, and made into beautiful tufts. Their plumage is white and black; the females have a mixture of grey, black and white. They are hunted by way of coursing, for they never fly; but they use their wings to assist them in running more swiftly.

There are many ostriches in Africa. The ostrich lays her eggs in June, on the ground, covers them with sand, and the sun hatches them. Probably on this account, she is made the symbol of cruelty and forgetfulness. Jeremiah says, Lam. iv. 3. "Even the sea-monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones. The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness." Job, xxxix, 13, &c. sets forth at length the cruelty and forgetfulness of the ostrich: "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacock, or wings and feathers unto the ostrich? which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust. And forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them. She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers; her labour is in vain without fear. Because God hath deprived her of wisdom; neither hath he imparted to her understanding. What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider."

Here is, in short, almost all that we are told of the ostrich. It lays its eggs on the ground, hides them under the sand, and the sun hatches them. This is not incredible. We know that in Egypt a vast quantity of eggs are every day hatched in ovens made on purpose, and heated to a certain degree. As the ostrich is extremely large and heavy, it would break its eggs were it to sit on them like other birds. She therefore hides them in the sand, watches them, and hatches them, as we may say with her eye, according to Vansleb's account of Egypt, p. 103. The male and female stay with them alternately, and while one of them goes to seek its provision, the other does not leave sight of them. However, if either of them should be driven away or go too far from their nest, they could not find their eggs again. And it is probable, that this has given occasion to what is said of their cruelty and forgetfulness.

Among

Among the great number of eggs laid by the female, (ten, twelve, fifteen, or twenty,) it commonly happens that some miscarry. These supply food to the young. Lastly, Job says, that God has deprived the ostrich of understanding. This is justified by what is related of this bird. She suffers herself to be taken by a man covered with the skin of an ostrich, Strab. lib. xvi. who puts his arm into the opening of the neck, lifts it up on high, and imitates the motion of the head. Others say, (Claudian, in Extrop. Oppian, Halieut. lib. iv.) that when pursued by the hunters, she hides her head in the sand, continues there, and thinks herself secure. Pliny says, she thrusts her head into a bush, and there remains, as if her whole body were concealed. Lastly, they say that she is naturally deaf, (Marmol, Afric.) which does not a little contribute to her stupidity.

"She lifteth up herself on high, and scorneth the horse and his rider." The ostrich is very lofty; an ostrich was dissected at the Academy of Sciences, which was seven feet and an half high, from the top of the head to the ground. Pliny says, lib. x. cap. 1, she exceeds in stature the height of a man on horseback. As to its swiftness, it is agreed, that few horses can overtake it by fair running.

Moses forbids the use of ostriches' flesh: at least our translators say so. Lev. xi. 16. Deut. xiv. 14. It is certain they are eaten in Africa, where they are common. Marmol acknowledges, that their flesh has an ill scent, and is sticky, especially that of the thighs; yet they eat it, however. When the people of Numidia take young ones, they rear them, fatten them, and lead them in flocks into the desert, to feed. And when they are fat, they kill them and salt them. The Ethiopians also eat their eggs, as delicious food. These eggs are generally of the bigness of a large bowl, but some not so big. The Ethiopians are said to make cups of the egg-shells. Pierius affirms, that they even make caps of them, which they wear, and value very much.

Scripture speaks of the ostrich in several other places, but it is doubted whether the original word really signifies this bird. See the commentators on Isaiah xiii. 21. xxxiv. 13. xliii. 20. Jer. i. 39. Mic. i. 8. Vide FRAG. No. CXLIV, and PLATE: also NAT. HIST.

[It is likely that the manners of the ostrich differ in different countries; and that in the less sultry regions of Africa, the female sits on her eggs; while in the more sultry, she leaves them to the heat of the Sun. The observations made by Vallant in Southern Africa, justify this explanation.]

OTHNI, אֶתְנִי, my time, my hour; from אֶתְ heth, and נִי, my, or mine. Son of Shemaiah, a valiant man of David's army, 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

OTHNIEL, אֶתְנִיֵּל, Γοθωννῆλ, the time, or the hour of God; from אֶתְ heth, time, and אֵל el, God.

OTHNIEL, or OTHONIEL, son of Kenaz of Judah, Josh. xv. 17. Scripture says, Othniel was brother to Caleb, Judg. i. 13. Hence arise some difficulties. 1. If Caleb and Othniel were brothers, Othniel could not have married his niece Achsah, daughter of Caleb. 2. Scripture never assigns to Caleb and Othniel the same father: it always names Kenaz as father of Othniel, and Jephunneh as father of Caleb. 3. Caleb must be much older than Othniel, since he gave Othniel his daughter Achsah in marriage. Thus it seems much better to suppose Kenaz and Jephunneh to be brothers, and that Othniel and Caleb were cousin-germans, and in this sense brothers, according to Scripture language. Thus Achsah being but second cousin of Othniel, he might marry her without offending the law.

Caleb having received his portion in the mountains of Judah, in the midst of a country possessed by giants of the race of Anak, having taken the city of Hebron, he advances towards Debir, otherwise Kirjath-sepher, and declares, "I will give my daughter Achsah in marriage to him that shall take Kirjath-sepher." Othniel took it, and had Achsah to wife. But as the bride was bringing home to her husband with the usual solemnity, Achsah took occasion to ask of her father Caleb a field of springs, that was near, and above another dry field that Caleb had given. By the Hebrew it should seem, that it was Achsah who desired Othniel to ask this of Caleb. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLVII.

After the death of Joshua the Israelites not exterminating the Canaanites, and not continuing in their fidelity to the Lord, he delivered them to Chushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, under whom they continued in subjection eight years, Judg. iii. Then they cried to the Lord, who raised them up for a deliverer Othniel son of Kenaz, who was filled with the spirit of God, and judged Israel: and the country had rest forty years. That is to say, it was in peace the fortieth year after the peace that Joshua had procured for it, A. M. 2960, ten years before his death. The year of Othniel's death is unknown.

[OVEN, vide BREAD, also FRAGMENTS, No. CIX, CLXXV.]

OWL; Bubo, Ulula, Noctua, Nycticorax; it is often taken for the screech owl, a bird of the

the same kind; that flies by night, and lives in darkness. Moses places the owl among unclean birds, Lev. xi. 17. When Isaiah speaks of Babylon as reduced to a wilderness, he says that the owls shall answer one another there, chap. xiii. 22. Finally, the Psalmist says, that in his affliction he was as the owl sitting alone on the house-top, Psal. cii. 7. But interpreters are not agreed on the signification of the Hebrew words translated Bubo, Ulula, Nyctiorax, Noctua, and Passer.

They reckon several species of owls. This bird has a head like a cat; also large sharp claws. It catches mice like a cat; its eyes cannot bear the great light of the sun. Day birds hate it, and pursue it; and in return the owl hunts and eats the lesser birds. Its cry is mournful and dismal. It passes for a bird of ill omen. It was consecrated to Minerva, and on this account was honoured by the Athenians, who represented it on their medals.

OYL. It is known that the Hebrews anointed themselves all over with oyl: but especially the head: they anointed also their kings, and high-priests. See UNCTION.

Isaiah calls an eminence, or vineyard, that was fruitful and fat, a horn the son of oyl: chap. v. 1. x. 27. He says, that God would make the yoke of the Israelites to putrify, by the quantity of oyl that he would pour thereon. Computrescere faciam jugum in facie olei. He would take from it all its roughness and hardness. The high-priest Joshua, and the prince Zerubbabel, are called sons of oyl, Zech. iv. 14. i. e. each of them had received the sacred unction. Job, speaking of the condition of his first prosperity, says that the rocks were then fountains of oyl to him, Job xxix. 6.

The oyl of gladness, Psalm xlv. 7. and Isaiah lxi. 3. was the perfumed oyl with which they anointed themselves on days of rejoicing and festivity. Moses says, Deut. xxxii. 18. that God made his people to suck oyl and honey out of the rocks, i. e. that in the midst of dismal deserts, he abundantly provided them with all things not only necessary, but agreeable. The olive-tree shall fail to bring forth fruit, says Habakkuk, iii. 17. The foolish virgins in the gospel took no oyl with them, to replenish their lamps, Matt. xxv. 8. See LAMP. St. James directs, "Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oyl in the name of the Lord." James, v. 14. PACORUS, son of Orodes, king of the Parthians; entering Syria, with a powerful army, besieged the Roman general, Cassius, in Antioch; who so bravely defended himself, that Pacorus was forced to raise the siege, Dio. Cass. lib. xl.

He then sat down before Antiochia, which was not far off; but the Parthians were so little skilled in the art of attacking places, that they were obliged to ~~quit~~ this siege also. Cassius then laid an ~~ambush~~ ^{ambush} for them, and they were intirely routed.

Pacorus came again over the Euphrates after the death of Julius Cæsar, with Labienus, who had been sent by Brutus and Cassius to the court of Parthia, to desire assistance. After the defeat of these, Labienus continued among the the Parthians till the Aradians, the Palmyrenians, and the tyrants, or little kings, of Syria, invited them to their assistance, against the tax-gatherers that oppressed them. Pacorus with his troops reduced all Syria and Phœnicia, but it was not possible for him to subdue Tyre, wherein the remains of the Roman army had sought shelter.

Having taken Sidon and Ptolemais, he sent a detachment into Judæa, with orders to set Antigonous son of Aristobulus on the throne. This party was commanded by his chief cup-bearer, called also Pacorus. Antigonous had promised the Parthians a thousand talents, and five hundred Jewish women; and having got some troops together, he entered Judæa, supported by the Parthians. He subdued the first that opposed him, and pursued them directly to Jerusalem, into which he entered, and fortified himself in the temple. Herod and Phasaël, who supported the interests of Hyrcanus, took possession of the palace.

The Feast of Pentecost being come, the two parties began to treat of an accommodation, to prevent that disorder which the confluence of such a multitude of strangers was likely to produce. Antigonous proposed to Herod and Phasaël, to take for arbitrator the chief cup-bearer, Pacorus, who was incamped near the city; in this they acquiesced. He therefore entered Jerusalem with his troops, and persuaded Hyrcanus and Phasaël to appear before Barzapharnes, the governor of Syria for the Parthians, in hopes to obtain some regulations that might be beneficial to the province. Thither they went, conducted by Pacorus, who then returned to Jerusalem.

When Barzapharnes thought that Pacorus might be got back to Jerusalem, he arrested Phasaël and Hyrcanus. Pacorus had orders to do the same by Herod; but he got some hint of the design, and escaped to Massada. The Parthians plundered Jerusalem, set Antigonous on the throne, and delivered up to him Phasaël and Hyrcanus, in chains. Phasaël killed himself; and Antigonous caused Hyrcanus's ears to be cut off, to render him incapable of the high-priesthood. After which he delivered him again to the Parthians, who carried him with them beyond the Euphrates.

The Parthians did not long hold the kingdom of Syria. Ventidius, general of the Roman troops, having beat their armies, obliged Pacorus to retire over the Euphrates. The year after, Pacorus having again got a great army together, came again into Syria, but was there beat and killed by Ventidius. Vide PHASAEL.

PALAL, פלל, פלללי, that thinks, or prays, or judges; from פלל pillel, to beseech, to judge. Son of Uzai, Neh. iii. 25.

PALESTINE, פלשתינה, Ἀλλόφυλοι, 1 Sam. vi. 17. which is covered, watered; from פלש palash: otherwise, to bring, or cause ruin; from פלש shuth, to put, and פלש maphalah, ruin. This word is not Hebrew. [It is lately thought to be Sanscrit, Palli signifying shepherds.]

PALESTINE, taken in a limited sense, denotes the country of the Philistines or Palestines, including that part of the Land of Promise which extended along the Mediterranean sea, from Gaza south to Lydda north. The LXX.

were of opinion that the word Philistim which they generally translate Allophyli, signified strangers, or men of another tribe.

Palestine taken in a more general sense, signifies the whole country of Canaan, the whole Land of Promise, as well beyond, as on this side, Jordan; though pretty frequently it is restrained to the country on this side that river: so that in later times the words Judea and Palestine were synonymous. We find also the name of Syria Palestina given to the Land of Promise, and even sometimes this province is comprehended in Cæle-Syria, or the Lower Syria. Herodotus, lib. vii. cap. 89. lib. ii. cap. 6. is the most ancient writer we know, that speaks of Syria-Palestina. He places it between Phœnicia and Egypt. See Reland, Pal. lib. i. cap. 7, 8. See JUDAH, and MAPS.

Moses speaks of Palestine as of the finest country in the world, a land flowing with milk and honey. Profane authors also speak of it much in the same manner. Hecateus, apud Joseph. contr. App. p. 1049, who had been brought up with Alexander the Great, and who wrote in the time of Ptolemy I. mentions this country as very fruitful and well-peopled, an excellent province, that bore all kinds of good fruit. Pliay, lib. v. cap. 14, 15, gives a like description of it; he says Jerusalem was not only the most famous city of Judea, but of the whole east. He describes the course of the Jordan, as of a delicious river; he speaks advantageously of the lake of Gennesareth, of the balm of Judea, its palm-trees, &c. Tacitus, Hist. lib. xv. cap. 6, Ammianus Marcellinus, and most of the ancients, who have mentioned Palestine, have spoken of it with equal commendations.

The Mahometans speak of it extravagantly. They tell us, that besides the two principal cities of the country, Jerusalem and Jericho, this province had a thousand villages, each of which had many fine gardens. That the grapes were so large, that five men could hardly carry a cluster of them, and that five men might hide themselves in the shell of one pomegranate! That this country was anciently inhabited by giants of the race of Amalek.

Notwithstanding these testimonies of the ancients, we find people very incredulous as to the fruitfulness of the Holy Land. Travellers who now visit it, generally speak little to its advantage. The country, they say, appears to be dry and barren, ill watered, and has but few cultivated plains. Strabo, lib. xvi. among the ancients, speaks of it with contempt. He says, that this province is so barren, that it moves no body's envy, that there is no need of fighting for it, in order to obtain it, and that Jerusalem stand on a dry and barren spot.

Jerom was an eye-witness of it, and very well acquainted with those qualities which Scripture ascribes to it. He says that Palestine is full of mountains, that dryness and drought are very common, that they had only rain-water, which they caught, and preserved in cisterns, which supplied the absence of fountains. Yet Jerom speaking of the fertility of Palestine, says no country could dispute with it in fruitfulness. Modern travellers who notice the present sterility, do not deny that it still preserves traces of its ancient fecundity in some places, which produce all sorts of fruits almost without culture. In other places the herbs grow with great profusion, and to an extraordinary height. If some mountains, and some plains, are barren, it is because they are but little cultivated, for want of inhabitants. How many other countries, heretofore renowned for fertility, are now reduced to barren and dreadful wildernesses! See VOLNEY's account of its present state, among the FRAGMENTS.

PALM, palmus, a measure of four fingers breadth, or 3,648 inches, Hebr. תפח, Tophach, LXX. Παλαίης, Exod. xxv. 25. The Heb. Zereth זרת, LXX. Σπιθυμή, Exod. xxviii. 16. is often translated palmus, and in Greek spithame, though it signifies a half-cubit, and contains three ordinary palms; which ought to be observed, that two measures so unequal may not be confounded. Jerom sometimes translates Tophach by four fingers, and sometimes by a palm; but he always renders Zereth by palmus; and the Septuagint by Spithame. Goliath was in height six cubits and a Zereth, i. e. six cubits and an half, making eleven feet ten inches and something more. We find Isaiah xl. 12. an expression that proves the Zereth, or palm, to signify the extent of the hand from the end of the thumb to the end of the little finger. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with a span?"—a Zereth.

PALM-TREE; this was very common in Palestine. The Hebrews called it תמר Tamar: and the Greeks φοῖνιξ, Phœnix. The finest palm-trees were about Jericho and Engeddi. There were many also along the banks of the Jordan, and towards Scythopolis. Jericho is called the City of Palm Trees, Deut. xxxiv. 3. Beside dates the palm-tree produces a kind of honey, little inferior to common honey, Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. and they likewise drew a wine from it, much used in the east. St. Chrysostom and Theodoret think it was this palm-wine that Moses mentions, Lev. x. 9.

It is said Job xxix. 18. Vulgate, I shall multiply my days as the palm-tree. Some ancient read, read; I shall live as long as the Phœnix.—

Hebr. לִּחְיֵי כַּסְפִּי כִּסְפֵּי הַיָּם. LXX. Ἡ ἡλικία μου ὡς τὸ ἰσάριον τοῦ σάβαντος τοῦ ποταμοῦ. Eng. Tr. I shall multiply my days as the sand. The Greek word Phœnix signifies a palm-tree; and is also put for a Phœnix [bird] or for a Phœnician.

The palm, or a branch of the palm-tree, as a symbol of victory, was carried before a conqueror in processions and rejoicings for victory. The Jews sent a golden branch of a palm-tree to the kings of Syria, as a kind of tribute, or present. This they call baina in Greek. They also offered them in the temple of Jerusalem. I conceive that all these customs were derived from the Greeks; for I find nothing of them in the Old Testament before the Maccabees.

The city of Palms is Jericho, as may be seen Deut. xxxiv. 3. Judg. i. 16. iii. 13. 2 Chr. xxviii. 15. the palm-trees of the plain of Jericho are famous throughout Scripture, and even in profane authors. In the temple of Jerusalem, Solomon caused pillars or pilasters to be made, in the form of palm-trees, 1 Kings vi. 29, &c. probably in imitation of the Egyptians, who adopted such pillars in their temples, Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 169.

Palm-trees from the same root produce a great number of suckers, which form a kind of forest by their spreading upwards, says Pliny, lib. xii. cap. 4. Procerioribus sylva, arbore ex ipsâ. Under a little wood of palm-trees (perhaps, of this kind,) the prophetess Deborah dwelt between Ramah and Bethel, Judg. iv. 5. Probably to this multiplication of the palm-tree, the prophet alludes, when he says, "The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree, Psalm xcii. 12. And Ecclesiasticus l. 14. represents the priests, the sons of Aaron, round about the high priest Onias, as so many young palm-trees, shooting up from the root of an old palm-tree.

Jeremiah says, chap. x. 5, speaking of the idols of the heathen carried in procession, that they were in the shape of palm-trees: i. e. tall, stiff, and erect. The ancients, before the art of carving was carried to perfection, made their images all of a thickness, strait, having their hands hanging down, and close to their sides, the legs joined together, the eyes shut, with a very perpendicular attitude, and not unlike to the body of a palm-tree. Such are the figures of those antique Egyptian statues that still remain. The famous Greek architect and sculptor Dædalus, set their legs at liberty, opened their eyes, and gave them a more free, more easy attitude, Diodor. Sicul. Bibl. lib. iv. The Spouse in the Canticles, vii. 7, is compared to a palm-tree as to stature: this is a noble compari-son. [The comparison of a young woman to a cypress is common among the Arabian poets; and the term "cypress waist," expressed the slenderness of the female figure; as also the palm. Comp. THEOCRITUS.]

The Spouse in the Canticles, v. 11, compares the hair of her lover to the fruit of the male palm-tree, and to the blackness of the raven. The palm-tree produces its leaves, or, if you please, its hair, at the top of its trunk: Coma omnis in cacumine, says Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 14. The male palm-tree renders the female fruitful, by means of a flower inclosed in its fruit. This fruit of the male palm-tree in Greek is called elatae. The comparison of a head of hair to the branches of the palm-tree is the more just, as these leaves turn round like curls, and their extremities hang down towards the ground. They are long, double, and narrow like a sword; the flowers are fastened by a very small stalk, they grow in clusters, and resemble those of saffron, except that they are smaller and white.

[The palm-tree was adopted as the type of Judea; as appears on various medals. Comp. PLATES OF JUDEA, JEWISH COINS, &c.]

PALMYRA, תַּדְמוֹר, TADMOR; the palm, or palm-tree; from תַּדְמוֹר tamor: otherwise, bitterness; from מַרָּר marar: otherwise, change; from מִרְּר mur. Comp. TADMOR.

PALMYRA, a city of Syria, built by king Solomon; situated in a wilderness of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Deserta, towards the Euphrates. Josephus places it two days' journey from the upper Syria, one day's journey from the Euphrates, and six days' journey from Babylon. He says there is no water in the wilderness, but in this place. There are vast ruins of this city still subsisting, with numerous inscriptions, most of which are Greek, the others in Palmyrene characters. Nothing relating to the Jews is seen in the Greek inscriptions; and the Palmyrene inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language and the characters of that country. [This was true when CALMET wrote; but a considerable part of the language has since been recovered, and is understood by the learned. It reads much like Hebrew. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCXC. et. al.]

Palmyra preserved the name of Tadmor to the time of Alexander. Then it received the name of Palmyra, which it preserved for several ages. About the middle of the third century, it became famous, because Odenatus and Zenobia his queen, made it the seat of their empire. When the Saracens became masters of the east, they restored its ancient name of Tadmor, which it has retained since. Its situation is much like that of Ammon in Lybia, being in the midst of deserts; a kind of island in the main land, amidst an ocean of sand.

Its situation between two powerful empires, that of the Parthians to the east, and that of the Romans to the west, exposed it often to danger from their quarrels. But in time of peace it soon recovered itself, by its trade with both empires. For the caravans of Persia and of the Indies, which now unload at Aleppo, then used to stop at Palmyra. From hence they carried the merchandize of the east, which came to them by land, to the ports of the Mediterranean; and returned the merchandize of the west.

It is surprising that history gives no account, neither when, nor by whom, Palmyra was reduced to its present condition.

PALSIE, Παράλυσις, solution. This distemper is a preclusion, or stoppage, of one or more of the limbs, which deprives them of motion, and makes them useless to the patient. Some palsies are very painful, others not so much, from the nature of the cause. Our Saviour cured several paralytics by his word alone. See Matth. iv. 24. viii. 6. ix. 2. Mark ii. 3, 4, Luke v. 18. The sick man that was lying near the pool at the sheep-market, for thirty eight years was a paralytic, John v. 5. The Greek Paraluo, signifies to resolve or relax; importing that the palsie is a relaxation of the nerves. But it may be produced by other causes.

PALTI, פלטי, deliverance, or flight; from פלטי palat. [Asylum? Comp. BETH-PALET.]

I. PALTI, or PHALTI, son of Raphu; one of the twelve spies sent to examine the Land of Promise, Numb. xiii. 9.

II. PALTI, seems to be a city, 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. Helez the Palhite. So 1 Chron. xi. 27. But we know nothing of this city.

PALTHIEL, פלתיאל, deliverance, or flight of God; from פלטי palat, and אל el, God. Son of Azzan, of Issachar. One of the commissioners appointed to distribute the Land of Promise, Numb. xxxiv. 26.

PAMPHILIA, Παμφιλία, altogether lovely; from παν all, and φίλος amiable.

PAMPHYLIA, a province of Asia, having Cilicia east, Caria west, the provinces of Asia north, and the Mediterranean south, [hereabouts called the Sea of Pamphylia. Part of Mount Taurus was included in this province. Ptolemy mentions this region, lib. v. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 27. Pomp. Mela. lib. i. Here was situated Perga, where Paul and Barnabas preached, Acts xiii. 13. xiv. 24. Volaterra, lib. x. He says, it was also called Mesopias.] 1 Macc. xv. 23.

PANEAS, a city of Syria, formerly called Leshem, afterwards Dan, from the conquest made of it by some Israelites of the tribe of Dan; afterwards Paneas from Mount Paneus, at the foot of which it was situated; then Cæsarea Philippi, in honour of the emperor Augustus, to whom Philip, son of Herod the Great, consecrated it. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3. His father Herod had a good while before built a magnificent temple here to the honour of Augustus, says Josephus, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13. Lastly, young Agrippa changed the name of Cæsarea into that of Neronias, in honour of Nero. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. In the time of William of Tyre it was called Belinas, Hist. lib. xv. Some doubt whether Paneas be the same as Dan. Eusebius and Jerom make a manifest distinction, in Dan, since they affirm that Dan is four miles from Paneas on the road to Tyre. But most writers confound them together, and Jerom himself says, in Ezek. xlvi. that Dan or Leshem was afterwards called Paneas. It was situate about the place where Jordan issues out of the ground; for this river has its source in the lake called Phiala, a hundred furlongs from Paneas. See JORDAN.

[Burckhardt is the latest traveller who has visited Paneas, 1811. He says "from Mount Hermon I went to Bania, the ancient Cæsarea Philippi, where I saw some ruins, and copied some inscriptions. At an hour's distance from it, is the source of the river El Dhan, (Jordan) in the plain of the Houle, or lake Samachanitis." This justifies Jerom and Eusebius, in Dan.]

PANEUS, or PANIUS, a mountain, otherwise called Hermon, making part of Mount Libanus, at the foot of which was the city Paneas, Hieronym. in Hermon, seu Ærmon. It is said there was an ancient temple upon this mountain, which was so high, that the snow might be seen on it the whole summer long, Hieronym. Onomast. in Ærmon. See HERMON.

PANION, a cavern in the mountain Paneus, near the source of Jordan, where Herod the Great built a temple of white marble in honour of Augustus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13.

PANTHER. The Jews, and after them some of the Fathers, have owned the name of Panther among the ancestors of Jesus Christ; but they are not agreed about his place in this genealogy. The surest way is absolutely to reject him, as contrary to the evangelists, who make no mention of him; and as being maliciously introduced by the Jews into the genealogy of our Saviour, to make it precarious and contemptible.

PAPER, papyrus. The Papyrus is a kind of bulrush, which grows in Egypt, in the Nile. The Egyptians applied it to several uses; as to make baskets, shoes, clothes, Herod. lib. ii. 37. little boats to swim on the Nile, Theophrast. Hist.

*Hist. Plant. lib. iv. Pliny lib. vi. cap. 22. vii. 56. xii. 11. and paper to write on. That part of the papyrus near the root, is good to eat. Isaiah, xviii. 2. נַחֲלֵי בָבֶל, speaks of a kind of vessel or little bark of paper: made, as some think, in form of a head, wherein the Egyptians put a letter, to inform the people of Biblos of the discovery of their god Adonis, whom they bewailed as dead. They committed this embarkation to the Mediterranean, and made the people believe that it came of itself in the space of seven days to Biblos, on the coast of Phœnicia, which was more than fourscore leagues from Egypt. Lucian, de Dea Syr. Cyrill. Alex. tom. ii. lib. ii. Procop. in Isai. The Hebrew goma, used by Isaiah, signifies a rush or reed; Moses uses the same word to denote the materials of that little ark, in which his parents exposed him on the Nile. Exod. ii. 3. תִּיבַת גֹּמָא. Arca Junci. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXII.*

The writing-paper of the ancients was very different from that used by us; it was composed of the leaves of the papyrus, whence our name for paper. Vide Book.

There is great probability that it is this paper of Egypt, which is expressed in several passages of [the Vulgate] Scripture by the words Charta and Liber; and that the ancient volumes were only Egyptian paper. The fine vellum and parchment was introduced but late: yet I no where find that they made long rolls of mere paper. This substance was not solid enough, nor firm enough, to be sewed thus together from end to end. It is much more probable, that these rolls were made of skins or of vellum, as they are now. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the Persians formerly wrote their registers on skins; Herodotus mentions skins of sheep and goats, used by the ancient Ionians to write on.

We must therefore admit, that the king of Pergamus only improved the dressing of skins, into parchment, pergamena, and prepared them so perfectly, that he had no longer any occasion for the paper of Egypt. And indeed vellum is of much better use than the Egyptian paper. All the most ancient manuscripts we have, whether Greek or Latin, are written on vellum, and there hardly remains any thing of the Egyptian paper in our archives, but some old titles; and they are almost gone to decay. Vossius thinks the use of vellum was much more ancient than the kings of Pergamus. Origin. de arte Grammat. lib. i. cap. 38.

ADDITION.

[This article would admit of much curious learning; but it can here receive only what is connected with Scripture. There were in Egypt extensive manufactories of paper; and some names were in high repute as makers. There were also many different sorts; some as fine, as beautiful, and as pliable, as our best writing paper: others, coarse as the kinds used for wrapping groceries, &c. Whether both kinds were equally plentiful as paper is at present, may be doubted: probably, the contrary. Pliny passim.

It is likely, that we have more than one name for paper in S. S. St. John, writing to Gaius, says he would not write with paper, δια χαρτου, which is the Latin word, charta, in Greek letters; and possibly means a sheet of writing paper, of no very large size; as that epistle is not long. I suppose, it was the name at Rome, for that kind of paper.

The common name for book, βιβλια, seems to be taken more generally; it is used by Herodotus. lib. v. cap. 58. to denote the Egyptian papyrus, and it certainly means books made of that plant, though the term has been thought sometimes to describe those made of skins, as Mark xii. 26. Luke iii. 4. et. al. Papyrus being, however, more common and less costly than dressed skins, it should appear, that notes, memoranda, and first draughts of writings, to be afterwards more carefully revised and finished, were made on papyrus sheets, not on skins; but skins were used for receiving the finished performance; as among our lawyers. This distinction gives a directly contrary import to the the directions of the apostle, 2 Tim. iv. 13. bring with thee the books, βιβλια, but, especially the parchments, μεμβρανα,—(another Latin word, in Greek characters)—from what has usually been supposed. The learned Bishop Bull, and others, have thought that the membrana were St. Paul's common place book, in which he had written extracts from various authors sacred or profane. I rather think that the membrana contained finished pieces, of whatever kind (which accounts for the apostle's solicitude about them, his especially) while the papyrus books were of less value and importance, being imperfect. It appears, that Herodotus uses the term biblion, for a letter of no great length; lib. i. cap. 124. 5. and it is used to mark a bill or billet of divorcement, which, if Lightfoot be right, was always of twelve lines in length; neither more nor less. Matt. xiv. 7. Mark x. 4. It is possible, that biblos expresses a catalogue, or list of names, Matt. i. 1. and this gives the true import of the phrase book of life, meaning, the list of Christian professors; (allusive to those records of names kept in the churches. Comp. Acts i. 15. Phil. iv. 3. Rev. iii. 5. &c.) and these, most likely, were not written on parchment, membrana, but on the paper most common, and least costly.

It may be added, that as the papyrus plant was (and is) eaten, at least in part, the idea of eating eating a book made of it, is not so completely foreign from the nature of the article, as it would be, if such a thing were proposed among ourselves; or, as eating a book made of skins, would be.

Under the kinds of Books treated on, in FRAGS. No. LXXIII. the reader has seen that some were of a square form, others were rolls.—It might be thought, that the papyrus books were usually folded into squares: and into volumes of small extent, containing four foldings, Quaterni, or perhaps four sheets sewed together, or six, or eight foldings, at the utmost.—Hence, some writers have been said to be authors of so many hundreds, or thousands of volumes: hence, also, the hazard of placing one of these small volumes in a wrong order, in a numerous series; with the inevitable errors committed by subsequent transcribers, &c. &c. But that papyrus books were made into rolls, is sufficiently evident from the contents of the library discovered at Herculaneum, where, so far as appears, all the books (upwards of 1500) are rolls. I am not aware that any membrana are among them.

Mr. Parkhurst observes, that Biblion does not necessarily mean a small book, but like other diminutive terminations, oikion from oikos, &c. has a simple sense. It is well, however, to reflect that a book may be small in more senses than one; it may be like our 18mo, or 24mo, or 32mo, of small dimensions: or it may be of a folio size, but contain only a few pages. It is probable, that books of smaller size and lighter matters, were seldom of parchment.

CALMET was perfectly right, in saying, that the most antient MS. known, are on parchment: that was true in his day; but since Europeans have obtained from Egypt, mummies in their perfect state, a number of papyrus MS. have been brought to light, which certainly are older than any parchments known. They are small scrolls, containing inscriptions, usually held in the hand of the corpse: but, of this more in another place.]

PAPHOS, Πάφος, or Paphus, which boils; or which is very hot; from παφλάζειν, to boil, or to be very hot, [perhaps, glowing.]

PAPHOS, a famous city of the Isle of Cyprus, where St. Paul converted the proconsul Sergius Paulus, and struck with blindness a Jewish sorcerer, called Bar-jesus, who would have hindered his conversion. Paphos was at the western extremity of the island. Acts iii. 6. A. D. 44.

[This place was very subject to earthquakes; and the old city is now in ruins, which mark its ruin, says Jerom, on Acts xiii.]

Facitus, Ann. lib. iii. Hist. lib. ii. says this city had a most ancient temple of Venus, which he particularly describes. It became at length, says Arator, Carm. l. 2. lascivus ager excrilegusque libidinis antrum. Justin, lib. x. cap. v. says, that virgins prostituted themselves here before marriage, to procure a dowry: they were probably of the same description as those attached to the temples among the Hindoos.

There were, however, two towns of this name: New Paphos, as Ptolemy calls it, was about sixty stadia distant from old Paphos: and this new town is commonly understood by this name. It was also called Augusta, in honour of Augustus: having suffered by an earthquake, it was assisted by the benevolence of that emperor. Dion. lib. liv. It was probably at old Paphos that the famous temple of Venus stood, since there the goddess came ashore after rising from the sea. Yet the figure under which she was worshipped here was not of the human form, but a simple meta, or upright stone. Connecting this with the testimony of Pausanias, that this worship was taught at Paphos by Phenicians from Ascalon, who themselves had received it from the ancient Assyrians, there can be no doubt as to the object worshipped, which is the same as is commemorated in India to this day. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DIIL. &c. It assists also in proof that the Philistines, who held Ascalon, derived their descent from the original Assyria, very far east, as we have supposed: since they worshipped the deity of that country under the same symbol. The symbol appears repeatedly on our medals. It was reported of this temple that no rain ever fell in the area of it. Pliny, lib. ii. cap. 96. See the PLATES, MEDALS of CYPRUS, &c.]

PARABLE, Παραβολή, (Heb. מִשְׁלָּה, Mashi-lim) from the verb paraballein, signifies to compare things together, to form a parallel, or similitude of them, with other things. In Scripture are often confounded comparison, simile, parable, the sententious manner of speaking by proverbs, sentences, or similitudes. What we call the Proverbs of Solomon, which are moral maxims and sentences, the Greeks call the Parables of Solomon. And when Jerom would express the poetic and sententious style of Balaam, Numb. xxiii. 7, 18, &c. he says, he began to speak in a parable: Assumpta parabola dixit. In like manner, when Job answers his friends, it is said, he began to take up his parable: Job xxvii. 1. xxix. 1. Assumpsit parabolas suas, dixit. The parabolical, enigmatical, figurative, and sententious way of speaking was the language of the Eastern sages and learned men; and nothing was more inapplicable than to hear a fool utter parables: The legs of the lame lamb are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools," Prov. xvi. 7.

The prophets use parables, the more strongly to impress prince and people with their threatenings or their promises. Nathan reproves David under the parable of a rich man who had taken away and killed the lamb of a poor man. 2 Sam. xii. 2, 3, &c. The woman of Tekoah, who was hired by Joab to reconcile the mind of David to Absalom, proposed to him the parable of her two sons that fought together, and one having killed the other, they were going to put the murderer to death, and so to deprive her of both her sons, 2 Sam. xv. 2, 3, &c. Jotham, son of Gideon, addressed to the Shechemites the parable of the bramble of Libanus, whom the trees chose for king, Judg. ix. 7, 8, &c. The prophets often reprove the infidelity of Jerusalem by parables—the adulterous wife, &c. &c.

Our Saviour in the Gospel seldom speaks to the people but in parables: thereby verifying the prophecy of Isaiah, vi. 9. that the people should see without knowing, and hear without understanding, in the midst of instructions. Jerom in Matth. xviii. observes, that this manner of instructing and speaking by similitudes and parables was common in Syria, and especially in Palestine. It is certain that the ancient sages employed this style, if I may so say, even to affectation.

Some parables in the New Testament are supposed to be true histories: As that of Lazarus and the wicked rich man; that of the good Samaritan; that of the Prodigal Son. In others our Saviour seems to allude to some points of history in those times; as that describing a king who went into a far country, to receive a kingdom; which may hint at the history of Archelaus, who after the death of his father Herod the Great went to Rome, to receive from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will, by which he had bequeathed the kingdom of Judæa to him.

Lastly, the word parable is sometimes used in Scripture in a sense of reproach and contempt. God threatens his people to scatter them among the nations, and to make them a parable, or a fable [English translation, a proverb], to the people. 2 Chron. vii. 20. So that when any one would express a nation hated of God, and which has suffered his fierce anger, he shall say, May you become like Israel!

PARACLETUS, Παράκλητος, from παρίκαλεω, exhortor, consolator, defendo, intercedo; Paracletos, or Paracletus, according to another pronunciation of the word, changing the Eta into an Iota; one that exhorts, defends, comforts, that prays or intercedes for another. Paracletus is a title given to the Holy Ghost by our Saviour, who says, John xiv. 16. "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, Paracletus, that he may abide with you for ever." And St. John, 1st Epist. ii. 1. says, "we have an advocate (Paracletus) with the Father:" this advocate, Paracletus, defender, mediator, is Jesus Christ the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins. But the name Paracletus is chiefly ascribed to the Holy Ghost, John xiv. 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7.

PARADISUS, פֶּרְדִּים, Παράδεισος, a garden planted. From the Hebrew, or rather the Chaldee, Pardes, of which the Greeks made Paradisos, and the Latins, Paradisus. The original should properly signify an orchard, a plantation, of fruit-trees, or, sometimes, a forest. This word is found in three places of the Old Testament. (1) Nehem. ii. 8. where Nehemiah desires king Artaxerxes, that letters may be made out for him to Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he might have what timber was necessary: in this place Paradisus denotes a forest of trees fit to build with. (2) Solomon, Ecclesiastes ii. 5. says, he made him gardens and paradises, or orchards. (3) In the Song of Solomon, iv. 13. he says, that the plants of the Spouse are as an orchard of pomegranates, or a paradise. The Greeks acknowledged that the word paradisus came to them from the Orientals, or Persians, who gave the name of paradise to their fruit-gardens, and their parks. Xenophon and other Greek authors often use this word in this sense. [perhaps, a dressed garden, &c.]

The Septuagint use the word Paradisus, Gen. ii. 8. פֶּרְדִּים גֶּן, Παράδεισον ἐν Ἑδὲν. Vulg. Paradisum voluptatis, when they speak of the garden of Eden, which the Lord planted, and placed Adam and Eve therein: and this famous garden is commonly known by the name of the Terrestrial Paradise. There have been many enquiries about its situation. Some have thought that it never existed, but that whatever is said of it in Scripture, ought to be taken allegorically. Others believed, it was beyond the confines of this world. Others, that it was only in the beginning, or at the creation. It has been placed in the third heaven, in the orb of the moon, in the moon itself, in the middle region of the air, above the earth, under the earth, in a distant place concealed from the knowledge of men, in the place which is now possessed by the Caspian sea, under the arctic pole, and in the utmost southern regions. See the several opinions collected together in M. Huet's Dissertation concerning the Situation of the earthly Paradise.

There is hardly any part of the world, in which it has not been sought: in Asia, in Africa, in ca, in Europe, in America; in Tartary; on the banks of the Gauges, in the Indies, in China, in the island of Ceylon, in Armenia; under the equator; in Mesopotamia, in Syria, in Persia, in Babylonia, in Arabia, in Palestine, in Ethiopia, among the mountains of the Moon; near the mountains of Libanus, Antilibanus, and Damascus. M. Huet places it on the river produced by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, now called the river of the Arabs; below this conjunction and the division of the same river, before it falls into the Persian sea.

He selects the Eastern shore of this river, which being considered (says he) according to the disposition of its channel, and not according to the course of its stream, was divided into four heads, or four different openings: i. e. two upwards, the Tigris and Euphrates, and two below, the Pison and Gihon. The Pison, according to him, is the western channel, and the Gihon is the Eastern channel of the Tigris, which discharges itself into the Persian gulph. It is said that M. Bochart was pretty much of the same opinion. Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 4. De Anim Sacr. Part, ii. lib. v. cap. 6.

Other skilful men have placed the Terrestrial Paradise in Armenia, between the sources of the rivers 1. Tigris, 2. Euphrates, 3. Araxis, 4. Phasis, taken to be the four rivers described by Moses. Euphrates is expressly mentioned; Hiddekel is the Tigris, still called Diglito. The Phasis is Pison, in which the resemblance of the words is apparent. The Gihon is the Araxes. Araxes in Greek, as Gihon in Hebrew, signifies rapid or impetuous; and there is no river more rapid than the Araxes. The land of Eden was in this country, as far as can be judged by some traces of it, yet remaining in Scripture. The land of Cush is the ancient Scythia, situate on the Araxes. Havilah is plainly Cholchis, a country very famous for its gold. Travelers that have visited this country give sufficient testimony of its great fruitfulness, and there is a tradition among the inhabitants, that paradise was in their province. Comp. FRAG. Nos. DV.

Ecclesiasticus xlv. 16. says, that Enoch being agreeable to God was translated into paradise. The Latin fathers, who read the word paradise in the Vulgate, thought that this patriarch was transported into the celestial paradise, according to some, or the terrestrial paradise, according to others. But the Greek fathers, who did not read the word paradise, in the Greek, have not determined to what place Enoch was translated. Jerom often has the word paradise, in imitation of the Septuagint; but incorrectly. He generally translates the Hebrew gan by paradise; but gan only signifies a garden, whether a kitchen-garden, orchard, or park.

In the New Testament, paradise is put for a place of delight, where the souls of the blessed enjoy happiness. Thus Jesus Christ tells the penitent thief on the cross, Luke xxiii. 43. "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise," i. e. in the state of the blessed. And St. Paul speaking of himself in the third person says, 2 Cor. xii. 4. "I knew a man that was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." Jesus Christ says, Rev. ii. 7. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God. The Jews commonly call paradise the garden of Eden; and they imagine, that at the coming of the Messiah they shall here enjoy an earthly felicity, in the midst of delights; and that till the resurrection, and the coming of the Messiah, their souls shall abide here in a state of rest.

The Orientals think, that the terrestrial paradise was in the island of Serendib, or Ceylon; and that when Adam was driven out of paradise, he was sent to the mountain of Rakoun in this island, two or three days journey from the sea. The Portuguese call this mountain Pico de Adamo, or Mountain of Adam, because it is thought that this first of men was buried under this mountain, after he had lived in repentance a hundred and thirty years. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 708.

The Mussulmen do not believe that the paradise, in which Adam was placed, was terrestrial, but that it was in one of the seven heavens; and that from this heaven Adam was thrown down into the island of Ceylon, where he died, after having made a pilgrimage into Arabia, where he visited the place appointed for building the temple of Mecca.—They say also, that when God created the garden of Eden, he created there what the eye had never seen, the ear has never heard, and what has never entered into the heart of man to conceive. That this delicious garden has eight doors: whereas hell has but seven, and that the porters which have the care of them are to let none enter before the learned, who make a profession of despising earthly, and of desiring heavenly things.

The Orientals reckon four paradises in Asia. (1) About Damascus, in Syria. (2) About Obollah in Chaldaea. (3) About the desert of Naoubendigian in Persia, in a place called Schab-Baovan, watered by the Nilab. And lastly, in the isle of Ceylon, or Serendib.

We may perceive from hence, that the opinion which places the terrestrial paradise about Damascus, Damascus, and near the sources of the Jordan, is no novel opinion, nor peculiar to European writers. Heidegger in the Lives of the Patriarchs, M. le Clerc, father Abraham, and father Haddon, having maintained this opinion.

PARAN, פָּרָן, beauty, glory, ornament; from par peer. [many diggings? from the Arabic root, par, to dig.]

Simon thinks there might be many wells in this district. Vide Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 7. Hiller, Onom. p. 114.

PARAN, EL-PARAN, or PHARAN, a desert of Arabia Petræa, south of the land of Promise, and north-east of the gulph Elanitis. Chedorlaomer and his allies ravaged the country, to the plains of Paran. Gen. xiv. 6. Hagar being sent from Abraham, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where she lived with her son Ishmael, Gen. xxi. 21. The Israelites having decamped from Sinai, came into the desert of Paran, Numb. x. 12. From hence Moses sent out spies to inspect the Land of Promise, Numb. xiii. 3. and consequently Kadesh is in the wilderness of Paran, since these men were sent from Kadesh, verse 26.—Moses seems to place Mount Sinai in Paran, when he says, that the Lord appeared to the Israelites on the mount of Paran, Deut. xxxiii. 2: Habakkuk iii. 3. seems to say the same. When David was persecuted by Saul, he withdrew into the wilderness of Paran, near Maon and Carmel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2. Hadad son of the king of Edom was carried when a child into Egypt, 1 Kings xi. 18. Those who conducted him came from the eastern parts of Idumea (or Edom) into the country of Midian, from thence into the country of Paran, and so into Egypt. The greater part of the habitations of this country were dug in the rocks, Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 7. and here Simon of Gerasa gathered together all that he took from his enemies. [See the MAP of the TRAVELS of ISRAEL; in which are marked two Parans; for, that near Maon and Carmel, could not be that near the Red-sea.]

PARAN was a city of Arabia Petræa, three days' journey from Elah, or Ailat, east. This city gave name to the desert of Paran.

[1. A city, Deut. i. 1. 1 Kings, xi. 18.

2. A mount, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Hab. iii. 3.

3. A desert, Gen. xiv. 6. xxi. 21. Numb. x. 12. 1 Sam. xxv. 1. Valley of,] PARANYMPHUS, Παράνυμφος, according to the force of the Greek, signifies he that is near the bridegroom, the friend of the bridegroom, he that performs the solemnities of the wedding, and conducts the bride to the bridegroom. The Rabbins say, Gemar. Hierosol.

VOL. II. PART XXI. Edit. IV.

Cithubeth, cap. 1. that the principal office of the Paranympus was, to observe that the bridegroom and bride committed no fraud in relation to the marks of the bride's virginity. John the Baptist says, that there is a great difference between the bridegroom and the Paranympus. The bridegroom has the bride, and for him the marriage is made; the Paranympus, or the friend of the bridegroom, performs the orders of the bridegroom, and rejoices to hear him, John iii. 29. Among the Grecians the Paranympus kept the door of the nuptial chamber, and had the care and management of the feast, and all the other rejoicings. Vide POLLUX. Some think the Architriclinus, John ii. 8. at the marriage of Cana was the same as the Paranympus. Gaudentius Brixienensis assures us, Tract. 9. from the tradition of the ancients, that commonly the president of the nuptial feast was chosen from among the priests, that he might take care nothing passed contrary to the law, or to the rules of decency. See MARRIAGE, ARCHITRICLINUS.

PARAPHRASE, Chaldee. See TARGUM.

[PARBAR, a gate in the temple, 1 Chron xxvi. 18. 2 Kings xxiii. 11. For the probable situation of it, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXLII. In the Plate it is marked 1.]

[PARDON, entire remission of punishment due to guilt. God extends mercy as his darling attribute, and mercy delighteth in pardon-ing. God is said to multiply pardons, to be ready to pardon, to pardon for his name's sake, &c. Various similies are used to denote the nature of pardon, as, to take away iniquity, to cover sin, to blot out our sin, to cast sins behind the back, not to remember them, &c. Man is liable to recollect transgressions, after having pardoned them, but God pardons effectively, and completely. The Gospel furnishes the noblest motive to us to pardon others; "even as God for Christ's sake hath pardoned us."]

PARENTS, a name properly given to a father and mother, but extended also to relations by blood, especially in a direct line, upward. Scripture commands children to honour their parents, Exod. xx. 12. i. e. to obey them, to succour them, to have an inward and outward respect for them, to give them all assistance that nature, and their, and our, circumstances require. Christ, in the Gospel, Matth. xv. 5, 6. condemns that corrupt explication which the doctors of the law gave of this precept; by teaching that a child was disengaged from the obligation of supporting and assisting his parents, when he said, "It is a gift by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me. q. d. I am no longer master of my own estate, it is consecrated to the Lord." See CORBAN.

Marriages among parents and relations were forbid within certain degrees, Levit. xviii.

[PARLOUR, that room in a house where the master or his family customarily speak with visitors: whether the word rendered parlour has always this import in the Hebrew, may be doubted. Comp. Judg. iii. 20. 1 Sam. ix. 22.]

PARMASHTA, פרמשתא, bursting of the foundation; from פרם param, to break, to divide, and from שותות shatoth, foundation: or that puts the rupture; from שות shuth, to put, and param, rupture; according to the Syriac and Hebrew, a calf, or bull of a year old. This name is Persian or Medish. Seventh son of Haman. Slain by the Jews, with his father, Esth. ix. 9. [from the Persian, strong hand.]

PARMENAS, Παρμενάς, that abides, and is permanent; from παραμένω, I abide.

PARMENAS, one of the seven deacons chosen, Acts vi. 5, 6. A. D. 33. Scripture gives them all great commendation, as "men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom." Epiphanius thinks, they were of the number of the seventy disciples. As to Parmenas, we have nothing certain of his life or death. The Greeks say he fell asleep before the eyes of the apostles. Adon places his martyrdom at Philippi in Macedonia, January 23. The martyrology notices his death under Trajan in that city.

PARNACH, פֶּרֶן, Παράναχ, a bull struck or beaten, or that strikes; from פר par, a bull, and נָכָה nacah, to beat; otherwise, fruit, or production of perfumes; from פָּרָה parah, to produce, and nacah, perfume. Father of Elizabeth, of Zebulun, Numb. xxxiv. 25. [From the Chaldee, swift and active, the same as Phar-naces.]

PAROSH, פֶּרֶשׁ, Φόρος, a flea, an insect that leaps; from פָּרַשׁ parosh: otherwise, fruit of the moth; from פָּרָה parah, to fructify, and עַשׂ hash, a moth. His children returned from Babylon, in number 2172. Ezra ii. 3. viii. 3. x. 25.

PARSHANDATHA, פֶּרֶשׁנְדָּתָא, revelation of corporal impurities, or of his trouble; from פָּרַשׁ parash, exposed, revealed, and נָדָה nadah, impurities of women, or trouble: otherwise, dung of impurity; from נָדָה nadah, and parash. This name is Persian or Medish. Eldest son of Haman, put to death with his father, Esther ix. 7. [In Persian, son of a noble; "Prince's Son."]

PART, PORTION. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance," Psalm xvi. 5. "Thou art my refuge, and my portion in the land of the living," Psalm cxlii. 5. And, Israel is the part, or portion, of the Lord, his peculiar people: "The Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance," Deut. xxxii. 9. But with this difference, that God makes and constitutes the happiness of his people, but his people cannot augment God's happiness or glory.

Part or portion also signifies recompence, or correction, "This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God." Job xx. 29. "They shall be a portion for foxes." Psalm lxiii. 10. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup," Psalm xi. 6. This is their part or portion, and the just punishment of their iniquity. The Lord shall "appoint him his portion with the hypocrites." Matt. xxiv. 51.

[PARTHIA. A region in Asia; part of Persia, having the Indus and the Arrias east; the Tigris and Media west; southward it was terminated by the desert of Caramania, northward by Hircania, as Pliny informs us, lib. vi. cap. 25. Ptolemy, lib. vi. cap. 5. Justin mentions this region, lib. xli. Strabo, lib. xv.

It is said the Parthians were either refugees or exiles from the Scythian nations. Jews from among them were present at Jerusalem at the Pentecost. Acts ii. 9.

The Parthians are more distinguished in later ages than the Persians. Their empire lasted 400 years. They disputed the dominion of the east with the Romans. They were distinguished for the veneration they paid to their kings: for their manner of fighting on horseback, when affecting to retreat, they discharged their arrows with great precision and effect, shooting them backwards over their heads. Vide PERSIA; also PLATES, MEDALS of PARTHIA, &c.]

PARTHIANS, Παρθοί, horsemen, from פָּרַשׁ parash, a horseman.

PARTHIANS. They were called Persians in the time of the prophets, and Parthians in our Saviour's time. The proper name of the Persian nation is Ælam. Probably they received the name Peraschim, because of their excellent horsemanship, which continues to this day. None of the sacred writers mention the Persians till toward the time of Cyrus. Ezekiel, xxvii. 10. puts the Persians among the troops of the king of Tyre: also in the army of Gog, prince of Magog, Ezek. xxxviii. 5. Judith said, that the Persians admired her courage, xvi. 10. Daniel often speaks of the king of the Persians, who was to destroy the Chaldean monarchy. The name of Parthians is only read Acts ii. 9. where they appear as if distinct from the Elamites, though they originally made but one people. See ÆLAM. Elymais was the capital of Ælam, and Susa the capital of the Persians.

The first Epistle of St. John in several manuscripts has the title "to the Parthians."

PARTRIDGE.

PARTRIDGE. The partridge is a bird of low flight, and of little compass: it is good for food. The grey partridges are the more common, but the red ones are the larger. There are white partridges in the Alps, which have hairy feet. St. Austin says, tom. v. Serm. 46, that the partridge is a quarrelsome animal, and loves contention. In order to catch it, the same inclination is made use of, that moves it to quarrel; by which means it throws itself greedily into the nets of the fowler. He compares heretics to them who are greedy of dispute, always striving for victory to lead away the simple. He applies to them the passage of Jeremiah, xvii. 11. "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." St. Ambrose, lib. vi. Hexaemer, cap. 3. & Ep. 32, and Jerom, in Jer. xvii. inform us, that the partridge carries away the eggs of another partridge, and sits upon them as her own; but when she has hatched them, and the young ones are able to fly, they fly away, and follow the voice of their true dam. But it will be difficult to give good proofs of this, from natural history.

The LXX read, "The partridge cried, it gathered together what it had not produced." On which Theodoret observes, in Jer. xvii. that fowlers use tame partridges, by which to catch others; and doubtless this is what St. Austin means when he says, that the partridge is taken by his obstinacy, in pursuing the tame partridge into the net. Elian observes the same, lib. iv. cap. 16. de Animal. as also the author of Ecclesiasticus, "Like as a partridge taken and kept in a cage, so is the heart of the proud; and like as a spy, watcheth he for thy fall." The tame partridge makes as it were sport and diversion in the destruction of other partridges.

Some translate the Hebrew, Jer. xvii. 11. קרא דגל ולא ילד.—"The partridge lays many eggs, but does not hatch them all." Because she makes her nest upon the ground, and is therefore often obliged to quit her eggs, for fear of cattle, dogs, or sportsmen, which chills her eggs, and makes them unfruitful. Rain and moisture also may spoil them, and sometimes the male-partridge breaks them.

Others think that the Hebrew word Kore, here translated partridge, rather signifies a cuckow; Kore signifies that which cries, and the cuckow is little known but by its crying: it does not sit upon its own eggs, but lays its eggs in other birds' nests. This agrees with what is said by Jeremiah. We have no proof that the Hebrew word signifies a partridge, but the testimony of the Septuagint, who thus translate it. Bochart thinks it rather signifies a woodcock, rusticula.

PARUAH, פרוח, Φαρι, flourishing; from פרח parach: according to the Syriac, that flies away. Father of Jehoshaphat, of Issachar, made governor by Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 17. [So the Latin Florus, Floridus, the Greek Euanthes, the name flower among ourselves, &c.]

[PARVAIM, the fertile.

The name of a region, 2 Chron. iii. 6, in the dual form, because it consisted of two parts. Thought to be the same as Ophir.

Such are the sentiments of Simon: but if the Parvaim were mountains, then the plural or dual, is easily accounted for. There is no need for making them the same as Ophir, and the construction of the passage where this name occurs is, apparently, intended to distinguish these Parvaim from Ophir: but they might both be in the same region. Vide OPHIR.]

PASACH, פסח, Φασίχ, your fragment, your diminution; from פסס pasas, fragment, and the affix י ec, your. [cut off, i. e. the mother from the son: but, can there be any allusion to the Cæsarean operation, in this name? cut out, i. e. the son from the mother. 1 Chr. vii. 33.]

[PASDAMMIM, the portion, or diminution of blood; otherwise, the diminution of silence, or similitude.

The cessation of blood, as some think, i. e. where a stop was put to slaughter: as the Jews express this term in Midrash Ruth, f. 48. col. 2.

This place is mentioned as being in the tribe of Judah, a city, 1 Sam. xvii. 1, where it is called Ephes-dammim, and appears to be the same as in Chronicles xi. 13. is called Pas-dammim, which is of the same import. Perhaps it was an antient asylum.]

PASEAH, פסע, Φασί, leap, passage. Son of Eshton, and grandson of Caleb, 1 Chr. iv. 12.

PASHUR, פשור, that extends, or multiplies the hole, or whiteness; from פשח pashah, to spread, or extend, and חור chur, a hole, a cave, or whiteness: otherwise, that multiplies, or extends the liberty or the principality; from pashah, to extend, and חרר charar; whence חורים chorim, nobles, freemen.

I. PASHUR, or PHASSUR, a descendant of Immer, &c. Jer. xx. 1. called Magor-missabib.

II. PASHUR, Phashur, or Psheshur, 1247 of his children returned from Babylon: Ezra ii. 38. Neh. vii. 41.

PASSION. This word has several very different significations; first, it signifies the passion or suffering of Jesus Christ. "To whom also he shewed himself alive after his passion," Acts i. 3. It is also put for the sufferings of the saints, Heb. x. 32. Vulg. Magnum certamen in tribulationibus passionum. Ye have suffered great afflictions. Rom. viii. 18. Vulg. Et non sunt condigne passionibus hujus temporis ad futuram gloriam. Secondly, it signifies shameful passions, Rom. i. 26. to which they are given up, whom God abandons to their own desires. And the passions of sin, Rom. vii. 5. passionibus peccatorum, which act in our members, to bring forth the fruit of death. The passions of desires, 1 Thess. iv. 5. passio desiderii, our evil inclinations, the motions of concupiscence, to which the heathen abandoned themselves without scruple.

PASSOVER, PASCHA, פסח, PESACH, Ezek. xii. 21. Leap, passage. In Chaldee, ܡܫܚܐ pa-scha, whence pascha, or πάσχα, by changing the ܡ cheth into ܚ chi; as, Charan for Haran.

PASSOVER, or PASCHA, passage. The Jews pronounce it Pesach. They gave the name of passover to the festival established in commemoration of the coming forth out of Egypt. Exod. xii. because the night before their departure, the destroying angel who slew the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews without entering therein, because they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the Paschal Lamb.

The month of the Exodus from Egypt, (called Abib, in Moses; afterwards called Nisan) was ordained to be thereafter the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, i. e. between the sun's decline and his setting; or rather according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox, they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the foregoing evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days: but only the first and the seventh day were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb ought to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid, in each family; and if the number of the family were not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together.

With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel beholding the blood might pass over them. They were to eat the lamb, the same night, roasted, with unleavened bread, and a salad of wild lettuces; or bitter herbs: it was forbid to eat any part of it raw, or boiled, nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the horns. If any thing remained to the day following, it was thrown into the fire, Exod. xii. 23. Numb. ix. 12. John xix. 36. They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their reins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and eating in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed, at least it was of no obligation after that night they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the passover no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last day of the feast; yet it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbid on the Sabbath-day.

The obligation of keeping the passover was so strict, that whoever should neglect it was condemned to death [?] Num. ix. 13. But those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary, or involuntary; for example, those who had been present at a funeral, or &c. were to defer the celebration of the passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Jiar, (which answers to April and May.) We see an example of this postponed passover under Hezekiah. 2 Chron. xxx. 2, 3, &c.

We may add that the Oriental Christians, and especially the Syrians, insist, that on the year that Christ died, the feast was celebrated on the thirteenth of Adar, being Saturday, that it began at the conclusion of the Friday before, and that our Saviour forestalled it by a day, and celebrated it on the Friday, (beginning from the evening of the Thursday before) because he was to suffer on the Friday. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 349. Calvisius also places the same passover on Saturday, April 4. A. D. 33, the thirty-fifth of Jesus Christ, the 344th year of Alexander.

The ceremonies with which the modern Jews celebrate their passover, are such as these, Leo of Modena, Part iii. cap. 3. The feast continues a week, but the Jews out of Palestine extend it to eight days, according to an ancient custom, by which the Sanhedrim sent two men to observe the first appearance of the new moon, and immediately to give notice of it to the chief of the council. For fear of error, they kept two days of the festival. One was called dies latentis lune; the other dies apparentis lune. So that the first two days of the passover, and the last two also are sacred; both from labour, and business. But it is allowed to prepare victuals, and to remove from place to place, whatever they have occasion for. For the four intervening days it is only forbid to work; but they may manage money matters; and these days are distinguished from working-days only by some particulars. [Will not these two days reconcile concile the day on which our Saviour kept the passover, with that of other Jews ?—It cannot be thought that the priests at the temple would kill the lamb for any body, before the proper time.]

During the eight days of the feast, the Jews eat only unleavened bread, and it is not allowed them to have in their custody any leaven, or bread leavened. And they examine all the house with a very scrupulous care, to reject whatever may have any ferment in it. Vide LEAVEN.

Presently after, they begin making unleavened bread, which they call Mazzoth; and make enough to serve all the eight days of the feast. They take care that the flour has not been wet, or warmed, for fear it may have been fermented. They make it into large and thick cakes, of different figures; and that they may not rise, they bake them immediately in the oven. Some make their cakes with eggs and sugar, for persons that are nice or sick; these they call Mazza aschiras, i. e. rich cake without leaven.

On the fourteenth of Nisan, the first-born of every family fasts, in memory of what happened that night when God smote the first-born of Egypt. At evening they go to prayers, and at their return they sit down to table, which is prepared in the day-time, and as well furnished as their circumstances will allow. In order to observe the command, Exod. xii. 8, that the lamb must be eaten with unleavened bread, and with bitter herbs, they have in a dish, some part of a lamb, or kid, prepared with bitter herbs, such as celery, succory, or lettuce, and a little plate of sauce. This is to remind them of the lime and the bricks that their ancestors were forced to make in Egypt: holding glasses of wine in their hands, they tell of the hardships their forefathers endured there, and the wonders God performed to deliver them from thence. Lastly, they return thanks to God for these mercies, and repeat Psalms cxii. to cxviii. Bless the Lord, O my soul, &c. and those that follow, beginning with Hallelujah; after which they go to supper. When they have supped, they say or sing, the rest of these Psalms, with other thanksgivings. The day following they repeat the same things.

The morning prayers are the same as those of other festivals, but they add the Psalms peculiar to this. From the roll of the Pentateuch, they read Exodus, xii. which contains the institution of the passover; and Numbers, xxviii. relating to the sacrifices proper to this feast. Then the prayer Mussaph; and afterwards they read out of the prophets passages having relation to what has been read out of the Pentateuch. This last lesson is called Astara, which is as much as to say, dismissal; because after this they go away. After dinner they make a commemoration of the festival, and give a blessing to the prince under whose dominion they live, and pray God to preserve him in peace and happiness, &c. and that he may cherish their nation; according to the advice of Jeremiah, xxix. 7.

The same things are repeated the two following days. This festival is concluded by the ceremony Habdala, or distinction. This ceremony is performed at the closing of the sabbath-day, when the master of the house pronounces certain words, and benedictions, to desire that every thing may succeed the coming week. At going out of the synagogue they go to eat unleavened bread for the last time.

From the second evening of the passover they reckon forty-nine days to the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost. And from the day after the passover they reckon thirty-three days, during which they neither marry, nor make new clothes, nor cut their hair, nor celebrate any public rejoicing; but they spend this time in a kind of mourning, because of a great mortality which happened, say they, among the disciples of the Rabbin Akiba. The thirty-third day is kept as a festival, because on this day the mortality ceased. This day is called Lag, because the two Hebrew letters L and G stand for 33, in their numerical value.

The Rabbins inform us of other particulars; as that, if any one neglects to remove the leaven out of his house, he incurs the penalty of the whip. He that eats it by mistake, and without knowing of it, must pay a fine. They may either burn the leaven that they find, or reduce it to crumbs, and cast it into water. Some carry their scrupulosity so far, as not to name the word leaven before their children, for fear they should have a mind to it; in like manner, as they do not call pork by its proper name, that they may not make it too well known. They call it aliala רבר ארר aliala res, another thing.

They are careful in choosing the wheat or barley that is to be used in making the unleavened bread; and they take all possible caution to hinder it from growing sour, or fermenting, whether before or after the grinding. They take care of the bag it is put in, and will not carry it to the mill on any horse's back, that it may not heat. They mingle neither butter, nor salt, nor oil, with the unleavened bread, for fear they should cause any fermentation. It must be a Jew who kneads it, and the most famous Rabbins have not disdained to take this trouble.

While the temple was in being, the Jews sacrificed crificed a lamb in the temple, between the two evenings, (i. e. after the noon of the 30th of Nisan, from about two o'clock to six in the evening) private persons brought them to the temple, and there slew them; then they offered the blood to the priests, who poured it out at the foot of the altar. The person himself, or a Levite, on this occasion, might cut the throat of a victim, but the effusion of the blood at the foot of the altar was appropriate to the priest. Philo says, that at this feast, a Levite, or even a Jewish layman, might perform the priest's function; which is to be understood in the sense we have now explained it. De Vita Mosis, lib. iii.

On the vigil of the feast, the matron of the family sets out the table in the neatest manner she can; on which are set two unleavened cakes, two pieces of the lamb, one a shoulder roasted, to put them in mind that God delivered them with a stretched-out arm. The other piece is boiled, in memory of the sacrifice. To this they add, as is said, (Machazer Bonor. 1. Part. Paschas, apud Bartolocci Bibl. Rabb.) some small fishes, because of the Leviathan; a hard egg, because of the bird Ziz; some meat, because of the Behemoth. (The Leviathan, the Behemoth, and the Ziz, are three animals appointed for the feast of the elect in the other life) Nuts and pease for the children, to provoke their curiosity to ask reasons for this ceremony. They have a kind of mustard that has the appearance of mortar, which was heretofore made of dates, and dried figs: at present it is made of chestnuts and apples, to represent the labour of making bricks: They call it חריסת Charoteth. The father of the family sits down to table with his children and slaves: because on this day all are free. Being sat down, the chief of the family takes of the bitter herbs about the bigness of an olive, which he dips in the Charoteth, eats it, and distributes to the rest.

When they have done eating, they withdraw a little from table, and then a young lad, whose turn it is to give out the hymn, proposes several questions, as, "Why on this night they must eat none but unleavened bread? Why they use none but bitter herbs?" &c. They sit again to the table, and the father of the family explains the history of the paschal lamb, and of all the ceremonies that accompany it. He concludes with prayer, and by exhorting to pray for the restoration of Jerusalem, and of the ancient sacrifices, that they may there eat the paschal lamb, and make God propitious to them by its blood. He gives thanks to the Lord, for having procured their ancestors such a glorious deliverance. After prayer, he washes his hands, and taking one of the unleavened loaves, he breaks and blesses it. He does not bless the other loaves on the table, because that night they are to be contented with a little bit of bread: "For it is the bread of affliction; bread appointed for slaves and miserable wretches."

He mingles this bread with the bitter herbs, and the Charoseth, and eats it, praising God for having given this ordinance to his people. Then he takes a bit of the lamb, which he eats, giving thanks to God in the same manner. Afterwards, he takes another little bit of bread, and then he must eat no more. But they drink a third and a fourth cup of wine, in which water is mixed. They thunder out psalms and thanksgivings, while this action is performing. Heretofore, and before the destruction of the temple, the paschal lamb was to be intirely roasted; but at present they think it is not allowed to use the lamb either intirely roasted, or intirely boiled; because that would be to offer sacrifices, and to eat them out of Jerusalem and the temple. But they roast one part of it, and boil another, or they take away a part of the animal, that it may not be intire, and so cannot pass for a sacrifice.

To fix the beginning of the lunar month, and consequently of the Feast of the Passover, which was celebrated on the 14th day of the moon of March, the Rabbins (Maimon. Tract. tom. i. ii. חדרש חדרש) inform us, that their ancestors placed centinels on the tops of mountains, to observe the moment of the appearance of the new moon, and that as soon as they had seen it, they ran in all haste to inform the Sanhedrim, who dispatched messengers to the neighbouring cities, to acquaint them that the Neomenia was begun. But we observe no trace of this either in Josephus, in Philo, or in Scripture. Besides, it appears to us certain, that the old Hebrews did not use lunar months; which overthrows this whole system of the Rabbins. See MONTHS and YEARS.

As to the Christian Passover, it was instituted by Jesus Christ, when, at the last passover supper he ate with his apostles, he gave them a sign of his body to eat, and a sign of his blood to drink, under the species of bread and wine; prefiguring that the day after he should give up his body to the Jews, and to death. The paschal lamb that the Jews killed, tore to pieces, and ate, and whose blood preserved them from the destroying angel, was a type and figure of our Saviour's death and passion, and of his blood shed for the salvation of the world.

Even from the beginning there was a diversity of sentiments, and of practice, about the celebration of this Christian passover. From the time of St. Polycarp the churches of Asia kept Easter-day on the fourteenth day of the moon of March,

March, whatsoever day that might happen upon, in imitation of the Jews; the Latin church keeps it on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March. Polycarp came to Rome and conferred with Anicetus on this subject; but neither of them being able to persuade the other, they thought they ought not to disturb the peace of the church about a matter of mere custom. The dispute on this subject growing warm under the pontificate of Victor, about A. D. 188, the Asiatics continued their practice, and Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, with the other bishops of Asia, having written to the pope a long letter in support of their opinion, Victor sent letters through all the churches, by which he declared them excommunicate!! The other churches did not approve of this rigour, and notwithstanding his sentence, they continued in communion with those who still kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon of March.

At the council of Nice, A. D. 325, the greater part of the churches of Asia were insensibly fallen into the practice of the Romans. That council ordained, that all the churches should celebrate Easter-day on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon of March: and the emperor Constantine caused this decree to be published through the Roman empire. Those who continued their old practice, were looked on as schismatics, and had the name, in Latin, of Quarto-decimans given them, or partizans of the 14th day; in Greek, Tessares-decatites.

It is a famous question, whether our Saviour kept the legal and Jewish passover the last year of his life? Some have thought that the supper he ate with his disciples on the Thursday evening, when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, was an ordinary meal, without a paschal lamb. Others, that our Saviour anticipated the passover, keeping it on the Thursday evening, and the other Jews on the Friday. Others have advanced that the Galileans kept the passover on Thursday, as Jesus Christ did; but that the other Jews kept it on Friday. It is the most general opinion of the Christian church at this day, as well Greek as Latin, that our Saviour kept the legal passover on the Thursday evening, as well as the rest of the Jews.

The evangelists Matthew, Mark, and Luke, seem favourable to the opinion, that he kept the passover on the Thursday evening, as also the other Jews. But we must own, that St. John seems to contradict it, since he says that Jesus being at the table with his disciples, "before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come," &c. John xiii. 1, 2, &c. And afterwards, when the Jews had led Jesus to Pilate, he observes, that "they themselves went not into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover," John xviii. 28. Lastly, he says, that Friday was "the preparation of the passover," and that the Saturday following was the great day of the feast, "the Sabbath-day; for that Sabbath-day was a high day," John xix. 14, 31. and why so, if not because it was the passover? And on this account the Friday before it, was the preparation of the passover, which was to be celebrated the day following.

In a dissertation on our Saviour's last passover, we have endeavoured to shew, that our Saviour did not celebrate the passover the last year of his life; at least, that the Jews celebrated it on Friday, the day of his death, and that he died on Calvary at the same hour that the Jews offered the paschal sacrifice in the temple; so that the substance and the shadow coincided. Several of the ancients thought that the true day of the legal passover fell this year on the Friday, the day on which our Saviour suffered. So Tertullian against the Jews, cap. 8. The word PASCHA is taken, 1. for the passing over of the destroying angel. 2. For the paschal lamb. 3. For the meal at which it was eat. 4. For the festival instituted in memory of the coming out of Egypt, and the passage of the destroying angel. 5. For all the victims offered during the paschal solemnity. 6. For the unleavened bread eat during the eight days of the passover. 7. For all the ceremonies of this solemnity.

PASTOPHORION, Παστοφόριον, chamber, secret place, nuptial chamber; from πασός, thalamus, and φέρω, I bring. An apartment in the temple, where the priests' habits were kept, [a vestry] 2 Macc. iv. 38.

[PASTOR, a shepherd who watches, defends, sends, feeds, heals, &c. a flock, whether his own property, or committed to his charge.

The office of shepherd is applied figuratively to God and to Christ, Gen. xlix. 21. Psalm xxiii. 1. lxxx. 1. Isaiah xl. 11. Zech. xiii. 7. John x. 14. Christ is the shepherd, inspector or overseer, and guardian of souls, 1 Pet. ii. 25. Ministers of God's holy word are shepherds, Jer. xvii. 6. Eph. iv. 11. 1 Peter v. 1—4. Vide Ezek. xxxiv. 1, &c. Kings are called in Homer "shepherds of men," &c. and governors are alluded to under this character, Jer. x. 21. xii. 10. See an instance, 2 Sam. vii. 8. "I took thee (David) from following sheep, to be ruler—royal shepherd—over my people Israel, &c.]

PATARA, Παράρα, which is trod under foot; from παρίω, I tread under foot. A maritime city of Lycia. St Paul going from Philippi to Jerusalem, found at Patara a ship bound for Phœnicia, in which he sailed. Acts xxi. 1. A. D. 58.

[PATH, the general course of any moving body: so we say, the path of the sun in the heavens; and to this the wise man compares the path of the just, which is, says he, like day-break, it increases in light and splendour till perfect day; it may be obscure, feeble, dim, at first, but afterwards it shines in full brilliancy. Prov. iv. 18.

The course of a man's conduct and general behaviour is called the path in which he walks, by a very easy metaphor: and as when a man walks from place to place in the dark, he may be glad of a light to assist in directing his steps, so the word of God is a light to guide those in their course of piety and duty, who otherwise might wander, or be at a loss for direction.

Wicked men, and wicked women, are said to have paths, and these are full of snares. To make straight paths for the Lord, comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CLXXI. The clouds are called the paths of God, Psalm lxxv. 11. The dispensations of God are his paths, Psalm xxv. 10. The precepts of God are paths, Psalm xvii. 5. lxxv. 4. The phenomena of nature, or general conduct of the world, are paths of God, Psalm lxxvii. 19. Isaiah xliii. 16. to those depths, which are beyond human inspection, the course of God in his providence is likened; if his paths are obscure in nature, so they may be in Providence, and in grace too: may he shew us, with increasing clearness, "the path of life"!]

PATMOS, Πατμός, mortal; from the Greek παρίωμαι, I am squeezed to pieces.

PATMOS, an island of the Ægean sea, one of the Sporades, whither the apostle and evangelist St. John was banished, A. D. 94, Rev. i. 9. In this island he had his Revelations or Apocalypsis. Most interpreters think, he wrote them in Patmos, during the two years of his exile; others think, that he did not write them till after his return to Ephesus. The island of Patmos is between the island of Icaria, and the promontory of Miletus. It is now called Patino or Pactino, or Patmol. Its circuit may be five and twenty or thirty miles. It has a city called Patmos, with a harbour, and some monasteries of Greek monks. They shew you a cave, now a chapel, where they pretend St John wrote his Revelations. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCVIII. and PLATE, GROTTO of the APOCALYPSE.

[Patmos has an excellent harbour; and the town, being situated on the loftiest part of the island, makes a pretty appearance on entering. The houses, being constructed of a white free-stone, have a peculiarly neat aspect. It has been calculated that the town has an elevation of nearly five hundred feet above the level of the sea. In its centre is a large convent dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, who was banished to this island. Here he wrote his Revelations. We saw, in walking to the summit of the hill, the grotto in which he is said to have composed them. The convent has a resident bishop, with a considerable number of monks, and is a college for the education of young men of the Greek persuasion. In those parts of the island which the inhabitants are able to cultivate, we saw several small fields, or patches of corn, banked up with stones to prevent the soil from being washed away by the rains. It appeared, however, to be capable of producing but an inconsiderable quantity of grain. The inhabitants procure sheep and cattle from the neighbouring islands. The town contains about two hundred houses. The women are to the men in the proportion of five to one. Dr. WITTMAN, p. 113.

DE LA MOTRAYE, vol. i. p. 151. describes St. John's convent as the principal thing worth seeing on this island; it is a sort of castle, flanked with several towers, with a church but indifferently built, and yet worse painted within. It is pretty well walled, as are most of the others, in general; but, what I never saw in the Turkish dominions except there, at Scio afterwards, and Mount Athos, there were two bells hanging at the gate of the convent. In this monastery there were ninety-three Calayeros, or Greek monks, and (as they told me) above one hundred churches, or rather chapels, on the island, to which they had then but ten secular priests, which, with the Calayeros, were more than sufficient for the number of inhabitants, who were not four thousand. I saw also the hermit's cell, called by the people of the country Apocalypsis, where they pretend that St. John wrote his Revelations.]

no path, mouthful, and פת רסס, to water; otherwise, persuasion, or dilatation of ruin; from pathak, to persuade, or pathac, to dilate, and rasas, which also signifies to destroy. The name of a place in Egypt, whose etymology is not to be had from the Hebrew.

PATHROS, or PHATURIS, in Egypt, mentioned by the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Jer. xlv. 1, 15. Ezek. xxix. 14. xxx. 14. We do not very well know its situation, though Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 20. v. 9. has Phaturites nomos, and Ptolemy the geographer, speaks of Phaturis, and it appears to have been in Upper Egypt. Isaiah xi. 11, calls it Pathros, and it is the country of the Pathrusim, the posterity of Mizraim, of whom Moses speaks, Gen. x. 14. Ezekiel threatens them with entire ruin. The Jews retired thither, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Jeremiah, and the Lord says, by Isaiah, that he will bring them back from thence.

[Bochart places Pathros in Upper Egypt, in the Thebais, where was a district called the Phaturitic nome. The Arabic root imports dryness, whence it has been thought that the Nile was very shallow in this nome. Hiller thinks it was a nome of Lower Egypt, and that the name imports the angle of dew, from Patrus: but Pa is an Egyptian article, as is proved by Haæus, in Biblioth. Brem. class. v. p. 595. who yet leaves the name unexplained.

It is remarkable that the Chaldee renders the land of their habitation: and most of the Rabbins following Christian interpreters, render, the land of their nativity: yet Michaelis doubts whether the Hebrew word, strictly taken, will bear this sense; and instead of native land, would render the land of their sellings; i. e. where they were sold as captives, having been conquered, and there reduced to slavery. The Syriac renders, the land out of which they were bought. It is, however, certain, that it imports delivery, i. e. the progress of proceeding, passing from, an original place (or state) to a secondary: or else, that original place itself from whence a person, or thing, proceeds, or passes away.

If we enquire what names of places elsewhere have any affinity to this name, probably we shall find it in Pethor, whence Balaam came; and in the Pataras among the Greeks. There was a Patara in Lycia, where was a temple and oracle of Apollo, who from thence was called Patareus. Hor. Od. iii. 4. 64 Ovid, Met. i. 516. Cic. Flacc. 32 Patras in Achaia appears to me also to be related to this name.

I presume the original of these appellations is the Oriental Pethor.]

PATHEUSIM, פתוסי, Παθουσισμ, inhabitants or people of Pathros. Fifth son of Mizraim, he peopled the country Pathros, or Patros, in Upper Egypt. See PATRUS.

PATIENCE, PATIENT. The patience of Job is commended, who, amid the misfortunes which God permitted to afflict him, did not behave impatiently, James v. 11. The patience of God, 1 Pet. iii. 20. which invites our conversion, and delays to punish us, is another kind of patience: it is the effect of his mercy, and of his infinite power, who does not hasten his vengeance.—The patience of the poor, which shall not be lost, Psalm ix. 18.—also, thou art my patience and my God, Psalm lxxi. 5.—is another thing; for patience in this place rather signifies hope and expectation. The hope which the poor has placed in God, shall not be in vain, Matth. xviii. 26. Luke xviii. 7. They bring forth fruit with patience, Luke viii. 15. They must wait till the time comes, [rather amid sufferings, which exercise their patience, and perfect it:—with perseverance. Not unlike this, is the expression, in your patience possess ye your souls,—keep your minds quiet; and your self-possession shall enable you to save your lives, out of pressing dangers.]

[PATRA, vide PATARA.]

PATRIARCHS. This name is given to the ancient fathers, chiefly those who lived before Moses, as Adam, Lamech, Noah, Shem, &c. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the sons of Jacob, and heads of the tribes. The Hebrews call them princes of the tribes, or heads of the fathers, Roshe Aboth. The name Patriarch is from the Greek Patriarcha, head of a family. By an extention and imitation of this name Patriarch is given as a title, to the bishops of the first churches of the East, as Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople; also to the first founders of certain religious orders, as St. Basil, St. Bennet, St. Austin, &c. For the Patriarchs of the Jews in later times, see JEWS.

After the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersion of the Jews, that unfortunate nation was without a king, without a temple, without sacrifices, without altar, without priests, without ephod, without any solemn exercise of national religion. For the services still kept up in their synagogues, were but shadows of a part of what had been. They offered neither offering nor sacrifice; there was no altar of incense, nor of shew-bread, nor of burnt-offerings, nor the candlestick. The tribes and great families themselves were involved in the utmost disorder and confusion: and even the sacerdotal families were so confounded with the rest, that they could no longer be distinguished.

Yet notwithstanding this disorder, as well those those Jews who continued in Palestine, as those who inhabited beyond the Euphrates, endeavoured to preserve some form of government among themselves, especially as to what related to their ecclesiastical polity. Those of Judæa chose a head, to whom they gave the name of Patriarch: while those beyond the Euphrates gave their chief the title of Prince of the Captivity. The first governed the Jews that dwelt in Judea, Syria, Egypt, Italy, and the provinces of the Roman empire. The second exercised jurisdiction over those who inhabited Babylonia, Chaldæa, Assyria, and Persia. Vide CAPTIVITY.

If the Jews may be believed, the establishment of Patriarchs was before the destruction of the temple, a hundred years. For they reckon that Hillel surnamed the Babylonian, because he came out of that country, on his arrival at Jerusalem, was consulted about the celebration of the feast of the passover, which in that year fell on a Saturday; that they were so well pleased with his answer, that they made him Patriarch of the nation, and they say, that his posterity succeeded him down to the fifth century of the Christian church, in which the Patriarchs of Judæa were abolished.

But what gives reason to doubt of this supposed antiquity of the Patriarchs of Judæa is, that neither Scripture, nor Philo, nor Josephus mention it; and that neither the Asmonean princes, nor Herod the Great, or his successors, nor the high-priests, who were at Jerusalem, would have suffered them in Palestine, with that plenitude of power which the Rabbins invest them with. The contradictions and differences among the Jewish authors, who have given us a succession of these pretended Patriarchs that preceded the destruction of the temple, is a farther proof of their being supposititious. These Patriarchs are only known among the Rabbins that are posterior to the Talmudists, and consequently too modern to give any authority to a thing of this nature.

LIST of the PATRIARCHS of PALESTINE, as given by the RABBINS.

1. HILLEL, the Babylonian.
2. SIMEON, Son of Hillel.
3. GAMALIEL, Son of Simeon.
4. SIMEON II. Son of Gamaliel.
5. GAMALIEL II. Son of Simeon.
6. SIMEON III. Son of Simeon II.
7. JUDAH, Son of Simeon III.
8. GAMALIEL III. Son of Judah.
9. JUDAH II. Son of Gamaliel III.
10. HILLEL II. Son of Judah.
11. JUDAH III. Son of Hillel II.
12. HILLEL III. Son of Judah.
13. GAMALIEL IV. Son of Hillel.

David Ganz in his Chronology, intituled Tzemach David; (i. e. the offspring of David) reckons them thus:

1. HILLEL, the Babylonian.
2. Rabban SIMEON, his Son.
3. R. GAMALIEL Ribbona.
4. R. SIMEON, Son of Gamaliel. This is probably the same who ought to be reckoned as the first patriarch, who was established under the government of Adrian.
5. Rabban GAMALIEL, Son of Simeon.
6. R. JETRUDA, the Prince.
7. HILLEL, the Prince; his Son.
8. Rabban GAMALIEL the elder.
9. R. SIMEON III.
10. R. JUDAH, Nasi; or the Prince.

PATROBAS, Πατρόβας, paternal, or that pursues the steps of his father; from the Greek πατήρ, a father, and βαίω, I go.

PATROBAS, a disciple mentioned by St. Paul; Rom. xvi. 14, he was at Rome A. D. 58. No particulars of his life are come to our knowledge. The Greeks place his death Nov. 4, or 5, and make him bishop of Pozzuolo in Campania, in the kingdom of Naples. Origen thinks Patrobas lived with Asyncritus, whom St. Paul salutes in the same verse, Origen. in Rom.

PATROCLUS, Πατρόκλος, glory of the father, or of his country; from πατήρ, a father, and κλεως, glory. Father of Nicanor, 2 Macc. viii. 9.

PAU, πῦδ, Φαῖ, Φογῶ, that cries aloud: from πῦδ pahah: otherwise, that appears. A city of Edom, where dwelt king Hadar, Gen. xxxvi. 39.

PAUL, Πᾶυλος, small, or little; paulus quasi pusillus. [short?] His Hebrew name was SAUL, demanded. Comp. SAUL.

PAUL, originally named Saul; of the tribe of Benjamin, native of Tarsus in Cilicia, a pharisee by sect; first a persecutor of the church, afterwards a disciple of Jesus Christ, and apostle of the Gentiles. It is thought he was born about two years before our Saviour, supposing he lived sixty-eight years, as we read Chrysost. tom. vi. Hom. 30.

The Ebionites, says Epiphanius, Hæres. 30. 16, related several particulars of the education, the family, and the conversion of St. Paul; but they do not deserve insertion. He was a Roman citizen, Acts xxii. 27, 28, because Augustus had given the freedom of Rome to the freemen of Tarsus, in consideration of their firm adherence to his interests. His parents sent him to Jerusalem, where he studied the law at the feet of Gamaliel, a famous Doctor, Acts xxii. 3. He made very great progress in his studies, and his life was blameless before men; being very zealous ious for the full observation of the Mosaic law.— His zeal persecuted Jesus Christ in his members, 1 Tim. i. 13, and when the protomartyr Stephen was stoned, Saul was not only consenting to his death, but he even stood by, and took care of the clothes of those who stoned him, Acts vii. 58, 59. This happened A. D. 33, some time after our Saviour's death.

At the time of the persecution against the church, after the death of Stephen, Saul was one who shewed the most violence in distressing believers, Gal. i. 13. Acts xxvi. 11. He entered their houses, and forcibly seized men and women, and sent them to prison, Acts viii. 3. xxii. 4. In the synagogues he caused those to be beaten who believed in Jesus Christ, compelling them to blaspheme the name of the Lord. Having received credentials from the high-priest Caiaphas, and the elders of the Jews, to the chief Jews of Damascus, with power to bring with him to Jerusalem all the Christians he should find there, he departed, full of threats, and breathing out slaughter. But, on the road, near Damascus, suddenly about noon, a great light from heaven encompassed him and all his company. This splendor struck them to the ground, and Saul heard a voice saying to him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Saul answered, "Who art thou, Lord?" the Lord replied, "I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest; it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." Saul in consternation, asked, "Lord, what is it that thou wouldest have me to do?" Jesus bid him go to Damascus, where he should learn his will.

Saul, now, though his eye-lids were open, yet had no sight; but his companions led him by the hand to Damascus, where he continued three days, unable to see, or to take nourishment. On the third day, the Lord commanded Ananias, a disciple, to find out Saul, to lay his hands on him, and to cure his blindness: which he did; then Saul was baptized, and filled with the Holy Ghost. He continued some time with the disciples at Damascus, preaching in the synagogues, and proving that Jesus was the Messiah.

He subsequently went into Arabia, Gal. i. 17. probably, in the neighbourhood of Damascus, then under the government of Aretas, king of Arabia. After a while, he returned to Damascus, and preached the gospel. The Jews, unable to bear the growing progress of the gospel, resolved to put Saul to death; and gained over the governor. But he escaped, by being let down along the wall in a basket, Acts ix. 24, A. D. 37, the third year after his arrival at Damascus. Coming to Jerusalem to see St. Peter, the disciples were fearful of intercourse with him, not believing him to be a real convert, Gal. i. 18. But Barnabas having introduced him to the apostles; Saul related to them the manner of his conversion, &c. From Jerusalem he went to Cæsarea of Palestine, and to his own country, Tarsus.

Here he continued about five or six years, from A. D. 37, to 43; when Barnabas being sent to Antioch by the apostles, and finding many Christians there, he went to Tarsus to seek Saul, and brought him to Antioch, where they continued a whole year, Acts xi. 20, 25, 26. During this time there happened a great famine in Judæa, and the Christians of Antioch having made collections to assist their brethren at Jerusalem, they deputed thither Paul and Barnabas with their offering, A. D. 44.—After discharging this commission, they returned to Antioch.—Shortly after, God warned them by his prophets in this church, that he had appointed them to carry his word into other places. Then the church, after fasting and prayer, with the prophets Simeon, Lucius, and Manaen, laid their hands on them, and sent them to preach whither the Holy Ghost should conduct them. Probably about this time, A. D. 44. this apostle being enraptured into the third heaven, saw ineffable things, 2 Cor. xii. 2, 3, 4.

Saul and Barnabas went first to Cyprus, preaching in the synagogues of the Jews. At Paphos, A. D. 45, they found a Jewish magician called Bar-jesus, with the proconsul Sergius Paulus. Bar-jesus did all he could to prejudice the proconsul against the Christian faith. As a punishment, Saul deprived him of sight for a time, and the proconsul seeing this miracle, became a convert. Many think that Saul received the name of Paul, (which St. Luke always gives him afterwards) in memory of this conversion of Sergius Paulus: Asterius, Homil. 8, believes he changed his name at his conversion, in Damascus. St. Chrysostom, (Homil. 28, in Acta. also Theodoret. Theophyl. Ecumen. in Rom. i.) at his ordination, and when he received his mission at Antioch. Others say (Aug. serm. 315, cap. 5. Grot. Fromond.) he took the name of Paul, which is a Latin name, only when he began to preach to Gentiles, and especially to the Romans. Lastly, many think that he always went by both names, like many other Jews; who had one name in Hebrew, and another in Greek, or Latin. But if this were so, how comes it that neither St. Paul himself, nor St. Luke, nor any other author, has called him Saul after the conversion of Sergius Paulus?

From Cyprus St. Paul and his company went to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark, Barnabas's cousin, left them, to return to Jerusalem. Making no stop at Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, where being desired to speak in the synagogue, St. Paul in a long discourse shewed that Jesus was the Messiah foretold by the prophets; and that he rose again the third day. He was desired to repeat the same subject the next Sabbath-day, when almost all the city came together to hear. The Jews seeing this concourse, and moved with envy, opposed what St. Paul said. Then said Paul and Barnabas boldly: "We turn to the Gentiles."

The Jews unable to bear this happy progress of the gospel, drove away Paul and Barnabas from thence, who went to Iconium: preached in the synagogue, converted a number both of Jews and Gentiles, and God confirmed their mission by many miracles. In the mean time the Jews having incensed the Gentiles against Paul and Barnabas, and threatening to stone them, they retired to Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia.

At Lystra was a man called Aeneas, crippled in his feet from his birth. This man the apostle bid to rise and stand on his feet. The people seeing this miracle, exclaimed, the gods are descended in human shape!" They would have offered sacrifice to them; but Paul and Barnabas with much difficulty restrained them.

Some Jews of Antioch in Pisidia and of Iconium, coming to Lystra, animated the people against the apostles; the rabble stoned Paul, and drew him out of the city, thinking him dead.—But the disciples gathering about him, he rose up, and the next day went for Derbe. Having here also preached the gospel, they returned to Lystra, to Iconium, and to Antioch of Pisidia; to Pamphylia, and Perga, thence they went down to Attalia, and sailed for Antioch in Syria, whence they had departed a year before. They related to the church the great things God had done by their means.

St. Luke omits the actions of St. Paul, from A. D. 45, to the time of the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 50. There is great likelihood, that during this interval St. Paul preached from Jerusalem to Illyricum, as he asserts, Rom. xv. 19, 20, without making any stay in places where others had preached before him. He says in general, that he had suffered more labours than any other apostle, and had endured more prisons: was often very near death, sometimes on the water, sometimes among thieves: sometimes from the Jews, and sometimes from false brethren and perverse Christians. He was exposed to great hazards, as well in cities as in deserts. He suffered hunger, thirst, nakedness, cold, fasting, watchings, and the fatigues inseparable from long journeys, undertaken without any prospect of human succour; in this very different from the good fortune of some who lived by the gospel, and who received subsistence from those to whom they preached it. He made it a point of honour to preach gratis, working with his hands, that he might not be chargeable to any; he having learned a trade, (as was usual among the Jews) which was, to make tents for soldiers.

During this course of preaching, he five times received from the Jews thirty-nine stripes: was twice beaten with rods by the Romans; thrice he suffered shipwreck, and had passed a night and a day in the deep. This is differently interpreted. Some think he was actually a night and a day at the bottom of the sea, God having there miraculously preserved him, as heretofore Jonah. Others, that he was hid for a night and a day at the bottom of a well, after his danger at Lystra, where he had been stoned. Others, that at Cyzicus he was put into a prison called Bythos, or the Deep; for this is the term used by St. Paul, without adding sea to it, as in the Vulgate. But the greater part of the fathers, as St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Ecumenius, Ambrosiaster, Thomas, and several moderns, explain it by saying, that after a shipwreck, St. Paul was a day and a night in the sea, struggling against the waves; and this seems the most reasonable opinion. The word Bythos, when put by itself, is commonly taken for the bottom of the sea, or for the open sea. St. Paul had suffered all this before A. D. 58, when he wrote his second Epistle to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xi. 25.

St. Paul and St. Barnabas were at Antioch, when some persons coming from Judæa, presumed to teach, that it was requisite to salvation to use circumcision, and other legal ceremonies. (Epiphanius and Philaster say, this teacher was Cerinthus.) Paul and Barnabas withstood these new doctors, and it was agreed to send a deputation to Jerusalem, about this question. Paul and Barnabas were deputed, and at Jerusalem they reported to the apostles the subject of their mission. Some of the Pharisees who had embraced the faith, asserted, that the converted Gentiles ought to receive circumcision, and the law. But after consultation, it was decreed, that the Gentiles should only avoid idolatry, fornication, and eating of things strangled, and blood.

Being returned to Antioch, the deputies assembled the faithful, read the decree, and comforted them, A. D. 51. Some time after, St. Peter also coming to Antioch, lived with the converted Gentiles, without scruple; but, certain brethren coming thither from Jerusalem, he separated himself from the Gentiles. St. Paul publicly censured him for this conduct, which which indeed was blameable, and might have been of very dangerous consequence, Galat. ii. 11—16.

St. Paul, in this journey to Jerusalem, declared the doctrine he preached among the Gentiles; and discoursed of some points of it in private, in the presence of Barnabas and Titus, with Peter, James, and John, who could find nothing amiss in it. They saw with joy the grace that God had given him; and his appointment as apostle of the Gentiles.

After Paul and Barnabas had continued some time at Antioch, Paul proposed to Barnabas to visit the cities where they had planted the gospel. Barnabas consented; but wished to take John Mark with them. This was opposed by St. Paul, and caused a separation between them. Barnabas and John Mark went together to Cyprus; and St. Paul taking Silas, they crossed Syria and Cilicia, and came to Derbe, and afterwards to Lystra: Here they found a disciple called Timothy, son of a Jewish mother, but of a Gentile father, whom St. Paul circumcised, and took with him; that he might not offend the Jews. They went over the provinces of Lycania, Phrygia, and Galatia, to Mysia, and coming to Troas, St. Paul had here a vision in the night, of a man habited like a Macedonian, who entreated him to pass over into Macedonia.

Embarking therefore at Troas, they sailed to Neapolis, a city of Macedonia, near the frontiers of Thrace, and came to Philippi, where they found some religious women, among whom was Lydia. Another day they happened to meet with a maid-servant, who was possessed with a spirit of Python: Paul commanded this spirit in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her; on which it immediately left her. But her masters, who made great profit by her enthusiastic powers, accused Paul and Silas before the magistrates, [military officers.] who ordered them to be whipped with rods, and sent to prison.

Towards midnight, as Paul and Silas were singing hymns to God, there was a great earthquake, the foundations of the prison were shaken, all the doors flew open, and the fetters of the prisoners burst. The gaoler awoke, and seeing all this, drew his sword with intention to kill himself: but Paul cried out to him to do himself no mischief, for they were all safe." The gaoler then brought out Paul and Silas, asking them what he must do to be saved? Paul and Silas instructing him and his family, baptized them. In the morning the magistrates sent orders to release his prisoners; but Paul refused, saying, after they have publicly whipped us, being Roman citizens, they shall come themselves and fetch us out; which, the magistrates hearing they were Roman citizens, did. Paul and Silas went first to Lydia, and comforted the brethren [Luke, Timothy, &c.] at her house; then they departed from Philippi.

Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica; where Paul according to his custom, preached in the synagogue, three sabbath-days. Several believed in Jesus Christ, but the greater part of the Jews raised a tumult in the city. The night following, the brethren conducted Paul and Silas towards Berea, where a great number were converted.

The Jews of Thessalonica being informed that Paul and Silas were at Berea, came thither and animated the mob against them; so that St. Paul was forced to withdraw; and went to Athens.

Disputing with the Athenian philosophers, they brought Paul before the Areopagus, where he made his defence; meaning to instruct them respecting the "Unknown God." A few embraced the faith at Athens. Vide ALTAR; ATHENS.

Timothy came from Berea to Athens, according to the request of St. Paul, and informed him of the persecution which afflicted the Christians of Thessalonica: which obliged the apostle to return him to Macedonia, that he might comfort them. After this, St. Paul went to Corinth, where he lodged with one Aquila, a Jew, a tent-maker; and with him St. Paul worked, being of the same trade. Here he made several converts, and baptized Stephanus and his family, with Crispus and Gaius, 1 Cor. i. 14, 16, 17. xvi. 15. Silas and Timothy came to Corinth, Acts xviii. 5. 1 Thess. iii. 6, 9. A. D. 52, and brought him great comfort, by acquainting him with the good state of the faithful of Thessalonica. Shortly after, he wrote his first Epistle to the Thessalonians. A. D. 52.

The second Epistle to the Thessalonians, was written not long after the first. St. Paul encouraged by the presence of Silas and Timothy, prosecuted the work of his ministry with new ardour: but the Jews opposing him, with blasphemous and opprobrious words, he shook his clothes at them, and said, Your blood be upon your own head. From henceforth I go to the Gentiles." He then quitted the house of Aquila, and went to lodge with one Titus Justus, originally a Gentile, but one that feared God. In the mean time, the Lord encouraged him by a vision, and told him, that he had much people in Corinth. He continued here eight months.

Gallio, proconsul of Achaia being at Corinth, the Jews of Corinth brought Paul to his tribunal: but Gallio would not meddle with disputes foreign foreign from his office. Paul at last sailed for Jerusalem, to be present at the Feast of Pentecost. Before he went on ship-board he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth; because he had completed a vow of Nazariteship. He arrived at Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whence he went to Cæsarea of Palestine, and to Jerusalem. Having performed his devotions, he came to Antioch, and made a progress through the churches of Galatia and Phrygia. He returned to Ephesus, where he abode three years; from A. D. 54 to 57. Acts xix.

St. Paul found at Ephesus some disciples who had been initiated into the baptism of John the Baptist. St. Paul instructed them, baptized them with the baptism of Jesus Christ, and laying his hands on them, they received the Holy Ghost, &c. He taught daily in the school of one Tyrannus: he did not omit by day or night to visit private houses, to confirm believers, and to convince unbelievers; working with his hands, that he might not be burthensome. He did there several miracles: he also suffered much there, and informs us, that after the manner of men he fought with beasts at Ephesus, i. e. he was exposed to wild beasts in the amphitheatre; so that it was expected he would have been devoured by them, had not God miraculously delivered him. [Or, he maintained a conflict against men as savage as beasts.]

Some are of opinion, that this fight alluded to was that of Demetrius the silversmith, and his companions; but this opinion cannot be supported, since his first Epistle to the Corinthians, wherein this fight is mentioned, was written before that sedition. — Jerom by these beasts understands the demons, who raised up an infinite number of enemies against St. Paul.

But the most natural sense of the text is, that he was exposed to beasts at Ephesus, and was delivered from them by miracle. This is the opinion of St. Chrysostom, of Theodoret, of Ambrosiaster, of St. Cyprian, Ep. 6. of St. Hilary, in Auxent. p. 121. and of most modern commentators. Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 25, quotes the apocryphal book of the Travels of St. Paul, which implies, that Jerom, governor of Ephesus, condemned the apostle to be exposed to wild beasts. Being in prison, he was visited in the night by two women, called Tabula and Artemilla, who required baptism of him. He freed himself from his bonds, went out of prison as far as the sea shore, where he baptized them; then returned to prison, and put on his fetters again, without any one perceiving it. When he was exposed in the theatre, they let loose a lion at him, which went to him and lay down at his feet, as did several other beasts. At the same time there fell such a violent storm of hail, that many present were killed by it, and Jerom himself was converted, and received baptism. The ancients have often spoken of an apocryphal book of the Travels of St. Paul; but we cannot rely on it.

During his abode at Ephesus, he wrote his Epistle to the Galatians, about A. D. 56. He wrote it all with his own hand, whereas his custom was to use an amanuensis in writing. Gal. vi. 11.

After this, St. Paul purposed, in obedience to the Holy Ghost, to pass through Macedonia, Achaia, and to visit Jerusalem, saying, he must also see Rome. Having sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia, he tarried some time in Asia. During this time he received intelligence of troubles in the church of Corinth, of divisions among them, and abuses. On this he wrote his first Epistle, in which he reproves the Corinthians, and teaches them excellent lessons for reforming their manners. This letter was written at Ephesus, and sent by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus.

Before St. Paul left Ephesus, the Christians were disturbed by a sedition raised by Demetrius, a silversmith, whose chief trade consisted in making little models of the temple of Diana, at Ephesus. Demetrius tampered with the other workmen and silversmiths: the spirit of mutiny spread among the people, and presently the whole city was in an uproar. They hurried to the theatre Gaius and Aristarchus, Macedonians who had accompanied St. Paul. The apostle would have presented himself among them: but his friends dissuaded him. The town-clerk with much address appeased the tumult, and St. Paul taking leave of the disciples, departed.

He took Timothy with him into Macedonia: Titus came thither to him, and acquainted him with the good effects of his letter among the Corinthians: this engaged him to write a second letter to the Corinthians, which was sent by Titus, to whom he joined a brother, whom the churches had associated with him, to collect the alms of the faithful. Some think this brother was Silas, others Barnabas, and others St. Luke.

St. Paul having passed through Macedonia, came into Achaia, visited the faithful of Corinth, and having received their alms, as he was on the point of returning into Macedonia, he wrote his epistle to the Romans. St. Paul had not yet been at Rome, but he promises to come to see them, and salutes many of the faithful of that church. The letter was dictated by St. Paul, and written by Tertius. It is thought it was carried by Phebe, deaconess of the church of Cenchrea;

Cenchrea ; whom St. Paul recommends to the Romans.

At last he came into Macedonia, intending to be at Jerusalem at the Pentecost. He staid some time at Philippi, where he celebrated the passover. From hence he embarked, and came to Troas, where he continued a week. On the first day of the week, the disciples being assembled to break bread, St. Paul being to depart the day following, discoursed to them till midnight. During this time a young man called Eutychus, happening to sit in a window, overcome by sleep, fell down from three stories high, and was killed by the fall. St. Paul came down to him, embraced him and restored him to life. He went on foot as far as Assos, (otherwise, Apollonia) and embarked at Mitylene :— whence he came to Miletus, whither the bishops, &c. of the church of Ephesus came to see him.

After having exhorted them, and prayed with them, he went on board, and arrived safe at Tyre. At Cæsarea they found Philip the evangelist, one of the seven deacons, While St. Paul was here, the prophet Agabus arrived from Judæa ; and having taken St. Paul's girdle, he bound his own hands and feet with it, saying, Thus shall the Jews of Jerusalem bind the man who owns this girdle, and shall deliver him up to the Gentiles. See AGABUS.

At Jerusalem the brethren received St. Paul with joy ; and the day following he went to see St. James, at whose house he gave an account of what God had done among the Gentiles by his ministry. St. James informed him, that the converted Jews were strangely prejudiced against him ; and advised him to join himself to four men in Jerusalem, who had a vow of Nazariteship ; to contribute to the charges of their purification, and purify yourself also, that you may offer with them the offerings and sacrifices ordained in such cases. See NAZARITE.

St. Paul followed this advice, and the next day went into the temple, and declared to the priests, that in seven days these four Nazarites would complete their vow, and that he would contribute his share of their charges. But, towards the end of these seven days, the Jews of Asia observing him in the temple, inflamed the people against him, seized him, shut the gates of the temple, and would have killed him, had not Lysias, the tribune of the Roman garrison there, run and rescued him. St. Paul being on the steps leading to the fort, desired permission to speak to the people ; the tribune allowed him, and St. Paul related the manner of his conversion, and his mission from God to preach to the Gentiles.—At his mentioning the Gentiles, the Jews cried out ; “ Away with this wicked fellow out of the world, for he is not worthy to live ! ”

The tribune brought him into the castle, and ordered that he should be put to the question by whipping : but being bound, he asked the tribune ; Is it lawful for you to whip a Roman citizen before you hear him ? The tribune understanding this, caused him to be unbound, and assembling the priests and the chiefs of the Jews, he brought Paul before them, that he might know the occasion of this tumult. Paul said “ Brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day.” At which words, Ananias son of Nebedeus, the chief-priest, ordered to smite him in the face. St. Paul replied, “ God shall smite thee, thou whited wall ; for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and forgetting the duty of a judge, commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law ? ” Those present said to him, “ Revilest thou God's high-priest ? ” St. Paul excused himself by saying, that he did not know he was the high-priest.— Then, perceiving that part of the assembly were Sadducees, and part Pharisees, he cried out,— “ Brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee ; for the hope and resurrection of the dead I am now called in question.”

The assembly being divided in opinion, and the clamour increasing, the tribune with his soldiers brought him out of the assembly into the castle. The following night the Lord appeared to Paul, to encourage him. The next day more than forty Jews engaged themselves by oath, not to eat or drink till they had killed Paul. But St. Paul being informed of this conspiracy by his sister's son, acquainted the tribune with it, who gave orders that the night following he should be sent to Cæsarea, to Felix the governor.

Five days afterwards, Ananias the high-priest, with a deputation of the council, came to Cæsarea, bringing with them Tertullus, an advocate, to plead against Paul ; who easily refuted all their calumnies : and Felix having heard these discourses, put off the cause. Some days afterwards Felix and his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, being at Cæsarea, they desired to hear Paul : and the apostle spoke of justice, charity, and of the last judgment, so earnestly, that Felix was terrified, cut short his discourse, and referred him to a leisure time. In hopes that St. Paul would purchase his liberty, he used him well : and had frequent conversations with him.

Two years thus passing away, Felix transferred the government to Portius Festus ; and being willing to oblige the Jews, he left Paul in in prison. Festus, being come into his province, after three days went up to Jerusalem, whither the chief priests desired him to send for Paul, they having plotted to destroy him by the way: but Festus told them they might come to him at Cæsarea. Here the Jews accused the prisoner of several crimes, but he so well defended himself, that Festus could find nothing that deserved punishment. He proposed to him to go to Jerusalem, and be tried there; but Paul answered, that he was now at the emperor's tribunal, where he ought to be tried; and he appealed to Cæsar.

Some days after, king Agrippa with his queen Berenice, coming to Cæsarea, to salute Festus, the governor mentioned Paul's case, observing that he did not know what he was guilty of; nor how he should represent his affair to the emperor. Agrippa desiring to hear him, Festus sent for him publicly, on the morrow, and Paul related to Agrippa the manner of his conversion; he spoke to him of Jesus Christ, of his character, and his resurrection. While he was enlarging on these things, Festus cried out, "Paul, you are beside yourself, overmuch learning distracts you!" He replied, I am not distracted, most noble Festus, but speak the words of sober truth. King Agrippa told Paul, you have almost persuaded me to become a Christian. I would to God, says Paul, that you and all, were, not only almost, but altogether, such as I am: except these bonds.

As it was resolved to send Paul into Italy, he was taken on board a ship of Adramyttium, for Myra in Lycia, where, having found a ship bound for Italy, they sailed. But the season being far advanced, (for it was at least, the latter end of September) and the wind proving contrary, they arrived with difficulty enough at the Fair-havens, in Crete. St. Paul advised them to winter here; but others preferred Phenice, another harbour of the same island. As they were going thither, the wind drove them towards a little island called Claudia; the mariners fearing to strike upon some sand bank, they lowered their mast, and lay at the mercy of the waves. They afterwards threw overboard the tackling of the ship. Neither the sun or stars appeared for fourteen days. In this extreme danger an angel assured St. Paul, that God had given him the lives of all who were in the ship with him, being two hundred and seventy-six persons. On the fourteenth night the seamen thought by their sounding they approached land. They were attempting to save themselves in the boat; but St. Paul told the centurion and the soldiers, that except the sailors continued in the ship, the lives of the passengers could not be saved.

About day-break St. Paul persuaded them to take nourishment, assuring them that not a hair of their heads should perish: and after his example they took food. The soldiers fearing lest any of the prisoners should escape by swimming, were for putting them all to the sword: But the centurion would not suffer that, being willing to save Paul; and all of them came safe to shore. The island was called Malta, and the inhabitants received them with great humanity, Acts xxviii.

Being all very wet and cold, a great fire was lighted to dry them; and Paul having gathered a handful of sticks, and put them on the fire, a viper sprung out of the fire, and seized his hand. The people said, this man is surely a murderer, and divine vengeance doubtless pursues him. But Paul shaking off the viper into the fire, received no injury from it. The people seeing this, changed their opinion, and took him for a God. He cured the father of Publius, the chief man of the island, of a fever and bloody-flux. After which, all their sick were healed. See MALTA or MELITA.

At the end of three months they embarked again, and arrived at Puteoli. Here St. Paul found some Christians, who detained him seven days: then he set out for Rome. The Roman Christians having been informed of Paul's approach, came to meet him as far as Appii-Forum, and the Three-Taverns. At Rome he was allowed to dwell where he pleased, having a soldier to guard him, joined to him with a chain.—Three days after his arrival, St. Paul desired to see the chief of the Jews. A day was appointed, and St. Paul explained to them the kingdom of God, endeavouring to convince them from Moses and the prophets, that Jesus was the Messiah. Some believed, and others disbelieved.

Paul dwelt two whole years at Rome, in a hired lodging, where he received all that came to him, preaching the kingdom of God, and the religion of Jesus Christ, without interruption.—His captivity contributed to the advancement of religion, and he converted several persons even of the emperor's court. Philip. i. 12, 14, 18. iv. 22. It has been said, that he had a correspondence by letters with Seneca, the philosopher, but the letters now extant are rejected by every body, as utterly unworthy either of the writers; and manifest impostures.

The Christians of Philippi in Macedonia, sent Epaphroditus, with money and other assistance, in their name, Phil. ii. 25. iv. 18. This good man fell sick at Rome. When he returned to Macedonia, Maccedonia, the apostle sent by him a letter to the Philippians, in which he thanks them for their reasonable relief, &c.

Onesimus, slave of Philemon, at Colosse in Phrygia, having run away from his master, came to Rome, found out St. Paul, and was very serviceable to him; being converted, the apostle sent him back to his master with a letter, about A. D. 62. See ONESIMUS and PHILEMON. He also sent by him a letter to the believers, in the city of Colosse. St. Paul had not preached in that city, and was not personally acquainted with the faithful there; but he had been informed by Epaphras, who was then a prisoner at Rome with him, in what manner they had received the word.

It is not known by what means St. Paul was delivered from prison; there is great probability, that the Jews durst not prosecute him before the emperor. It is certain, that he was set at liberty A. D. 63. He was still in this city, or at least, in Italy, when he wrote his Epistle to the Hebrews, A. D. 63.

Very many difficulties have been started on the writer of this Epistle. It has been attributed to Clement, to Luke, to Mark, to Barnabas, to Apollos, to another Paul, but general conviction ascribes it to Paul the apostle of the Gentiles.—In what language it was written, has been questioned, whether Greek or Hebrew. Some have thought that it was first written in Hebrew by St. Paul, and then translated into Greek by Clement, or some other. Others, that the original of the Epistle was the Syriac, still extant. It is pretty well admitted, that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem; but the time when, and the place where, are not agreed on. He speaks of the brethren of Italy, chap. xiii. 24, but it is unknown whether it was composed at Rome, while St. Paul was in bonds, or after he was at liberty, in some other city of Italy.—Lastly, there has been a long dispute about the authenticity of this Epistle. The Arians maintained it was not St. Paul's; the Marcionites pretended it was corrupted; the Greeks have long received it as canonical; but the Latins hesitated for several ages.

St. Paul being out of prison, went over Italy, and according to some of the fathers, passed into Spain: he also went into Judæa; to Ephesus, where he left Timothy: to Crete, where he preached, and fixed Titus. Probably, he also visited the Philippians, according to his promise, Phil. ii. 24, i. 25, 26. And it is believed, that from Maccedonia he wrote his first Epistle to Timothy, about A. D. 64.

Some time after, he wrote to Titus, in Crete; in which letter he desires him to come to him at
VOL. II. PART XXI. Edit. IV.

Nicopolis, A. D. 64. The year following he went into Asia, and at Troas he left a cloak and some books, with Carpus his host. Thence he visited Timothy, at Ephesus; and at Miletum, he left Trophimus sick, 2 Tim. iv. 20. Lastly, he went again to Rome, where the fathers believe, that God had revealed to him he should suffer martyrdom. He arrived here A. D. 65.

St. Chrysostom says, it was reported that St. Paul going to see a cup-bearer and a concubine of Nero, he made a convert of the concubine.—This so provoked Nero, who was very fond of her, that he put St. Paul in prison. The apostle tells us, in 2 Tim. iv. 16, that at his first appearance he was forsaken by all. In his prison he was much assisted by Onesiphorus, who found him after much enquiry. In this prison he wrote his second Epistle to Timothy, which St. Chrysostom, 2 Tim. Hom. 9. regards as the apostle's last Testament. This Epistle, is perhaps the most sublime and most difficult of all those written by St. Paul.

This great apostle at last consummated his martyrdom, June 29, A. D. 66. He was beheaded at a place called the Salvian Waters.—Some have said, that his head spouted out milk instead of blood, and that this miracle converted the executioner and two others; but this has no sanction from antiquity. He was buried on the Ostian way; a magnificent church was afterwards built over his tomb, and is still in being.

Besides the fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, which we have mentioned in the course of his history, Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. vi. quotes several of his discourses, which are not now extant. We have seen that it was supposed he had corresponded with Seneca. There is also extant a spurious Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans. It has been pretended also, that he wrote a third Epistle to the Thessalonians, a third to the Corinthians, and a second to the Ephesians. There are ascribed to him an Apocalypse and a Gospel, which were condemned by pope Gelasius. The Simoneans composed a book, called, The Preaching of St. Paul; and a priest of Asia composed the Travels of St. Paul, and St. Thecla. But, being convicted of this imposture, he was deprived of his priesthood, by the apostle John. Tertul. de Baptismo, cap. 17. Hieronym. de Viris illustr. in Paulo.

[PAVILION. This word usually gives us the idea of an edifice, small but handsome; it is therefore unhappily used in 1 Kings xx. 12, 16. "Benhadad, &c. were drinking in pavilions:" the sutling booths of the army—is much more likely to be the proper description of those places of intemperance. This Benhadad must have been a man, of an unworthy spirit : a braggadocio, as appears by his inconsiderate orders ; a drunkard, as appears from his history ; and a coward, as appears from his hiding place. Comp. FRAGMENTE, No. XXV.]
2 R must

PEACE, pax. This word is used in Scripture in different senses. Generally, for quiet and tranquillity, public or private ; but often, for prosperity and happiness of life. To go in peace, to die in peace. God give you peace. Peace be within this house. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, i. e. wish it all sorts of happiness and prosperity. Is it peace ? i. e. Is all well ? The just in the other life are in peace ; They enjoy a perfect tranquillity, while waiting for their happy change. St. Paul in the titles of his Epistles generally wishes grace and peace to the faithful, to whom he writes. Jesus Christ recommends to his disciples, to have peace with all men, and with each other. God promises his people to water them as with a river of peace, Isaiah lxvi. 12. and to make with them a covenant of peace, Ezek. xxxiv. 25. These expressions are very intelligible.

PEACOCK, Pavo, תיח, Tuchiim. 1 Kings x. 22. Interpreters are pretty well agreed about the signification of this word. The Septuagint have not expressed it in their translation. Some understand by Tuchiim, apes or monkeys. The fleet of Solomon that went to Ophir brought a great number of peacocks, whether from Ophir itself, or from any other place on their return is uncertain.

The peacock is a tame bird well known among us ; distinguished by the beauty of its plumage. It has a very long tail, diversified with several colours, and adorned with marks at equal distances, in the form of eyes. It has a little tuft or crown on its head. Its wings are mixed with azure and gold colour. Its cry is very harsh and disagreeable. It is said to have the head of a serpent, the train of an angel, and the voice of a devil. Its feet are ugly. It frequently makes a turn, especially in spring, to admire its tail, the splendor of which is increased by the light, which does not only set off its colours, but also multiplies them. It is said the flesh of the peacock is not apt to corrupt.

PEARL. The Arabians, Persians, and Turks use the word Merovarid to signify pearls. The word Margarites, or Margarita, used by the Greeks and Latins, seems to be derived from thence. The finest pearls are fished up in the Persian gulph, and on the coast of Bahrein, so called from the city of that name, on the borders of Arabia. Idumea and Palestine being not far from this sea, it is not to be wondered at that pearls were well known to Job, and the Hebrews. They are also found in other places ; and many are now brought from America. They are sometimes found in common oysters. Pearls, that have been long worn, turn yellow, and moulder away. It is an ancient error, that pearls are formed of the dew, and that they are soft in the sea.

As to passages of Scripture, wherein pearls are spoken of, Job says, xxviii. 18. " No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls, for the price of wisdom is above rubies." [PENINIM.] Solomon has nothing finer or more precious than pearls, by which to extol the value of wisdom, Prov. iii. 15. viii. 11. xx. 15. He uses the simile of pearls three times, to express his esteem for wisdom ; and says, Prov. xxxi. 10. that a good woman comes from as far, and is as hard to find, and of as great value, as pearls. Jeremiah, speaking of the Nazarites of Jerusalem, says, that they were more ruddy than pearls, Lam. iv. 7. אדמו עצם מפנינים. [The English translation has rubies.] Pearls are not commonly ruddy ; but we have observed, that Oriental pearls incline to carnation ; which is exactly what the prophet intended, by commending the vermilion complexion, and clear, healthy faces of the Nazarites.

Jesus Christ forbids his apostles to cast their pearls before swine, Matth. vii. 6. i. e. Expose not the sacred truths and mysteries of religion to the raillery of prophane libertines and hardened atheists. The author of Ecclesiasticus means the same thing, when he advises us not to speak when we find the persons we speak to are not disposed to hear, Eccclus. xxxii. 6. The Hebrews call pearls Peninim, the Greeks Margarita, the Latins Unio, Margarita, or Perula. Peninim is mentioned Job xxviii. 18. Prov. iii. 15. viii. 2. xx. 15. xxxi. 10. Lament. iv. 7. where the Seventy and the Vulgate translate it by precious stones, or things hid, or ivory. [Our English version always translates it by rubies.] But certainly Peninim signifies pearls ; and the word Pinna, which stands for the shell-fish that produces them, is probably derived from Peninim. Pearls are marine productions, found in the shells of fishes ; precious stones are found in mines. These are things of very different natures, yet are often confounded.

[Pearls are certainly very different things from precious stones, strictly taken ; yet the Greek term margarites, seems to be used in a more general sense, for jewels, or splendid gems. So Matth. vii. 6, cast not your pearls—jewels,—diamonds, if known to the ancients—would answer the import of the passage as well as pearls. So the parts of a building, pearls ; but pearls are unfit things for walls and gates.

Rev. xxi.

Rev. xxi. Many kinds of precious stones are more suitable. And perhaps, the parable of the merchant seeking goodly pearls, Matth. xiii. might be understood in a more extensive sense, as importing valuable jewels of whatever kind. Such appears to be the application of the Chaldee and Arabic words, which yet properly, signify pearls.]

PECTORAL, Rational, Gr. or breast-plate of judgment. This was a piece of embroidery about ten inches square, Exod. xxviii. 15, [וְהָיָה הָאֵפֹדֶת הַזֶּה חֵף חֹשֶׁן, is the half cubit, Ezek. xliii. 13, 17.] of very rich work, which the high-priest of the Jews wore on his breast; it was set with four rows of precious stones, on each of which was engraved the name of a tribe of Israel. This breast-plate was double, or made of two pieces, a front and a lining, forming a kind of purse, or bag, in which according to the Rabbins, the Urim and Thummim was inclosed. This piece of the high-priest's dress was named the breast-plate of judgment, probably, because by it was discovered the judgment and the will of God; or, because the high-priest who wore it was the fountain of justice, and put on this ornament when he exercised his judicial capacity in matters of great consequence, which concerned the whole nation. Comp. ORACLE.

The Hebrew Exod. xxv. 7. xxviii. 28. has חֹשֶׁן Choshen. LXX. Λόγιον, the oracle, or λογιον. Exod. xxviii. 15, 29, 30. חֹשֶׁן הַיָּדָוָה Λόγιον τῆς κρίσεως, the oracle of judgment. Sometimes the LXX. also translate חֹשֶׁן by ποδήρης tunica, talaris, and by περιστήθιον, pectorale, and Jerom by Rationale, or Rationale judicii. The literal signification of Choshen is not well known. It is generally derived from the Arabic Casan, which signifies rough, rugged, thick, as this pectoral was, with the rows of stones, and embossed flowers, &c. which adorned it. See EPHOD, and URIM and THUMMIM, and PLATE of PECTORAL.

PEDAGOGUE, Παιδαγωγός, he that leads a child to school; from the Greek παῖς, a child, and ἄγω, I conduct.

PEDAGOGUE. This word now carries with it an idea approaching to contempt; a pedagogue, with no other word to qualify it, excites the idea of a pedant, who assumes an air of authority over others, which does not belong to him; but among the ancients a pedagogue was a person to whom they committed the care of their children, to lead them, to observe them, and to instruct them in their first rudiments. Thus the office of a pedagogue nearly answered to that of a governor or tutor, who constantly attends his pupil, teaches him, and forms his manners.

St. Paul, 1 Cor. iv. 15. says; "For though you have ten thousand instructors (pedagogues) in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers." Representing himself as their father in the faith, since he had begot them in the gospel. The pedagogue indeed may have some power and interest over his pupil, but he can never have the natural tenderness of a father for him.

To the Galatians, St. Paul says, iii. 24, 25, "the law was our school-master (pedagogue) to bring us unto Christ." It pointed out Christ in the Scriptures, the figures, the prophecies, of the Old Testament; but since we are advanced to superior learning, and are committed to the tuition of the faith which we have embraced, we have no longer need of a schoolmaster or pedagogue; as such are of no further use to young persons, when advanced to years of maturity. "But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster—pedagogue."

[It is certain that the term schoolmaster does by no means express a person employed to accompany youth to school from home, and from school to home, again; the Greek word didascalos, or didcher, approaches much nearer to the notion of a schoolmaster, and is distinguished accordingly by Plutarch, de Puerorum Educatione x 9. Among the great number of slaves possessed by certain families, it was customary to entrust the care of the children of the family to some confidential slave, who superintended their conduct, and directed their proceedings. A domestic usher, then, may be thought to resemble the ancient pedagogue; and, for females, the duenna of foreign countries. That such an attendant is more proper to early youth than to mature manhood, is obvious. Another class of instructors were called by the Greeks paidomatheis, teachers of children. Quint. lib. i. cap. 11.]

PEDAHZUR, פֶּדַח־צֹר, saviour, strong and powerful, or stone of redemption; from פֶּדַח padah, to save, to redeem, and from צֹר tzur, fortress, stone, rock: otherwise, the redemption of that which is placed or set up; from padah, redemption, and צֹרָה tsurah, placed or set up. Father of Gamaliel. Numb. i. 10. ii. 20. vii. 54.

PEDAHEL, פֶּדַח־אֵל, redemption of God; from פֶּדַח padah, to save, to redeem, and אֵל el, God. Son of Ammihud, of Naphtali, one appointed by Moses, to allot the Holy Land, Numb. xxxiv. 28.

PEDALAH, פֶּדַח־יְהוָה, redemption of the Lord; from פֶּדַח padah, to redeem, and יְהוָה jah.

I. PEDALAH, or PHADALIA, of the city of Rummah, father of Zebudah, mother of Jeboiakim, king of Judah, 2 Kings xxiii. 26.

II. PEDALAH, son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, father father of Zerubbabel and Shimrei, 1 Chr. iii. 18.

 VII. PEDAIAN, son of Patosh. Nehem. iii. 25. viii. 4.

[PEDIGREE, vide GENEALOGY.]

PEKAH, פָּכָח, פֶּכַח, פֶּכַחַי, he that opens; from פָּחַח pacah: otherwise, that opens the eye, or that is at liberty: from the same.

PEKAH, son of Remaliah, general of the army of Pekahiah, king of Israel. He conspired against his master, 2 Kings xv. 25. A. M. 3245, ante A. D. 759, attacked him in the tower of his royal palace of Samaria (being seconded by Argob and Arieah, [perhaps Argob and Arieah may here signify the cities of Argob and Areopolis, beyond Jordan, which were parties in the conspiracy of Pekah.] and by fifty men of Gilead) he slew him, and reigned in his place twenty years. He did evil before the Lord, and followed the wicked example of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. Under the reign of Pekah, Tiglath-pilessar, king of Assyria, came into the country of Israel, and took Ijon, Abel-beth-maacha, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and all the country of Naphtali, and carried the inhabitants into Assyria. At last, Hoshea, son of Elah, formed a conspiracy against Pekah, slew him, and reigned in his stead.

PEKAHIAH, פִּקְחִיָּה, פֶּכַחִיָּה, the Lord that opens: from פָּחַח pacah, to open, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

PEKAHIAH, son and successor of Menahem, king of Israel, 2 Kings xv. 22, 23, A. M. 3243, ante A. D. 761. He reigned but two years. He did evil before the Lord, and imitated Jeroboam son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. Pekah, son of Remaliah, conspired against him, and killed him in his own palace. See PEKAH.

PELAIAH, פֶּלְאִיָּה, פֶּלְאִיָּה, miracle, or mystery, or secret of the Lord: or the Lord is admirable; from פָּלַח pala, a thing hidden, or wonderful, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. One of the principal Levites who returned from captivity: he signed the covenant that Nehemiah renewed with the Lord. Nehem. viii. 7. xi. 10.

PELALIAH, פֶּלְלִיָּה, who thinks on the Lord, or who prays to the Lord; from פָּלַח pillel, to judge, to pray, and יָהּ jah. Son of Amzi, father of Jehoram, of the family of Pashur, son of Malobiah, a priest, Nehem. xi. 12.

PELATIAH, פֶּלְטִיָּה, let the Lord deliver, or deliverance or flight of the Lord; from פָּלַח palat, deliverance, flight, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. PELATIAH, פֶּלְטִיָּה, or PHELT, son of Hananiah, and father of Ishi, of Simeon. He subdued the Amalekites on Mount Seir, 1 Chr. iv. 42. The time of this action is unknown.

II. PELATIAH, or PHELT, son of Benaiah, a prince of the people, who lived under Zedekiah, king of Judah, and opposed the advice given by Jeremiah, to submit to Nebuchadnezzar. Ezechiel, then a captive in Mesopotamia, had a vision, chap. xi. 1, 2, &c. in which he saw twenty-five men at the door of the temple of Jerusalem, among whom Jaazaniah, son of Azur, and Pelatiah, son of Benaiah, were distinguished. The Lord said to him, Son of man, these are the men that have thoughts of iniquity, and who are forming pernicious designs against this city, &c. As he was prophesying in this manner, Pelatiah, son of Benaiah, died.

PELEG, פֶּלֶג, division; from פָּלַח pillel, to cut, to divide.

PELEG, or PHALEG, son of Eber, born A. M. 1757, ante A. D. 2247. Scripture says his father named him Peleg, signifying division, because in his time the earth was divided; Gen. x. 25. xi. 16. whether Noah had begun to distribute the earth among his descendants, some years before the building of Babel: or, that Peleg was born the year that Babel was begun; or that Eber, by a spirit of prophecy named his son Peleg, some years before the Tower of Babel was begun. [or, that the name was given him at a later period of his life, as a commemorative appellation; on recollection.] Obs. 1. Peleg was born not above one hundred years after the deluge. But it should seem that the number of men was not then sufficient for such an undertaking as that of Babel. 2. Joktan, brother of Peleg, had already thirteen sons at the time of the dispersion, after the confusion of Babel. Peleg being born in the thirty-fourth year of Eber, Gen. xi. 16. it is impossible his brother Joktan should have such a number of children at the birth of Peleg. It seems, therefore, that he was not born at the time of the dispersion. To this may be answered, that Moses has enumerated the thirteen sons of Joktan, Gen. x. 26. by anticipation, though they were not born till after the confusion of Babel: but, as they possessed a large country, it was convenient to notice, and to name them, among the other descendants of Noah, who participated the provinces of the East. However this were, at the age of thirty years Peleg begat Reu: and he died at the age of two hundred and thirty-nine.

PELET, פֶּלֶט, that delivers, deliverance, [refuge] flight; from פָּלַח palat. Son of Azmaveth, a valiant man of David's army, who joined him at Ziklag, 1 Chr. xii. 3.

[BETH-PELET, the temple of refuge.

A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 27. Nehem. xi. 26. Perhaps, the temple of the deity under whose conduct we here found a settlement.]

PELETH, פֶּלֶת, פֶּלֶת, judgment; from פָּלַח palat, to judge: otherwise, ruin; from פָּלַח maphalah naphal, or from נָפַל naphal, to fall. נָפַל is its infinitive, which, in the Oriental languages, is used for a noun. Son of Pallu, of Reuben. Father to On, and Jehiel, Numb. xvi. 1.

PELETHITES, פִּלְתִּי, פִּלְתִּי, פִּלְתִּי, in Chaldee, those that draw the bow, or slingers. In Hebrew, judges, or destroyers.

PELETHITES. The Pelethites and the Cherethites are famous under the reign of David, as the most valiant men of his army, and the guards of his person. They were originally Philistines, of Gath. Vide CHERETHITES.

The word Peletim seems to be formed from Philistim, and may signify men that break, separate, &c. as Cherethim signifies men that destroy, or exterminate; denominations that suit the Pelethites and Cherethites. Some think that by this name should be understood the members of the great Sanhedrim. Others derive Pelethim from Pala, or Nipla, which signifies to do wonders, and they think these to have been prodigious, or miraculous men.

PELICAN. The author of the Commentary on the Psalms, which bears the name of St. Jerom, in Psalm cii. 6. says, there are two sorts of pelicans; one lives on the water, and feeds on fish; the other keeps in deserts, and feeds on serpents and reptiles. Eusebius says, in Psalm cii. that the pelican has a peculiar tenderness for its young. St. Austin, and Isidore, of Sevil, notice the same thing; they say the pelican draws blood from itself by striking with its bill, and so by shedding it on its nest brings the young to life. But these histories may be placed among the errors of the old philosophy. [The fact is, the pelican preserves the fish it has caught, in a bag beneath its throat; — it casts them forth for its young, by striking this bag against its breast: this action ill observed, gave rise to the idea, that the pelican fed its young with blood drawn from its breast.]

The Hebrew קָאֵת, Kaath, from קָאֵת Vomere, which the LXX. translate Pelicanus, Psalm cii. 6. and Levit. xi. 18. is elsewhere translated Mergulus, the diver, as Deut. xiv. 17. elsewhere by birds, as Isaiah xxxiv. 11. and elsewhere by lions, as Zeph. ii. 14. Jerom has translated it Onocrotalus in Levit. xi. 18. Isaiah xxxiv. 11. and Zeph. ii. 14. Others, by this word understand the bittern, or the heron, or the swan, or the lapwing, or the cuckow. Bochart, de Anim. Sacr. Part. ii. lib. ii. cap. 24. thinks Kaath signifies the pelican, a water bird, which they say gorges its crop with shell-fish, and when they are opened by the heat of its crop, disgorges them again, that it may have the fish to eat. See the NAT. HIST. also PLATE OF UNCLEAN WATER BIRDS, Nos. 5. 6.

PELLA, a city beyond Jordan. Pliny places it in Decapolis, and commends its fine waters, lib. v. cap. 18. Stephanus places it in Coele-Syria. There is nothing inconsistent in this, nor in what others affirm, that Pella was in Perea, in Batanea, in the country of Basan, Epiphanius, de Hæres. lib. i. Perhaps, also, when Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. speaks of Pella, in the country of Moab, he means the city of which we are speaking, which was situated in Perea, in Batanea, in the country of Basan, which profane authors sometimes call Coele-Syria, and in the country which belonged to the Ammonites, the brethren and allies of the Moabites; unless he confounds Pella with Abila in the country of Moab, called by Moses Abel-Shittim, Numb. xxxiii. 49, and by Josephus, Abila, Ant. lib. iv. cap. 7. v. 1, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 3. Pella was situated between Jabesh and Gerasa, six miles from Jabesh, Euseb. ad vocem 'Αριώθ. — It was also of the number of the ten cities of Decapolis. Matth. iv. 25. Mark v. 20.

Josephus relates, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. that under the reign of Alexander Jannæus, the Jews were masters of Pella, and destroyed it, because the inhabitants would not embrace Judaism. The first Christians having been forewarned by our Saviour, that Jerusalem should be demolished, took refuge at Pella, Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 5. as soon as they saw the fire of war against the Romans kindled. — Epiphanius says, de ponderib. et mensur. p. 171. that the disciples were warned by the revelation of an angel to withdraw thither. This city belonged to the kingdom of Agrippa, who assisted the Romans.

I suspect that Pella takes its name from Abila, or Abela. There were more cities than one named Abila; but that I mean, is called by geographers, Abila of Batanea; and in Scripture, Abel of the Vines. Polybius, Hist. lib. v. distinguishes Abila from Pella, since he says, that Antiochus the Great took Pella, Kamos, Gephros, Abila, Gadura, &c. Stephanus the geographer, says that Pella had Alexander the Great for its founder, probably in memory of the city of Pella, in Thessaly, where he was born. Abila and Pella were afterwards episcopal cities of the second Palestine. Josephus says, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 3. that Pella was one of the seven toparchies of Judæa; but elsewhere he calls it Betlephthepha, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 4. and Pliny gives it the same name, lib. v. cap. 14. It is unknown where Betlephthepha was. The name of Pella is not in Scripture.

PELONITE, פִּלְוִי, פִּלְוִי, פִּלְוִי, that falls; from נָפַל naphal; otherwise, that is concealed; from נָפַל pala. A pronoun put instead of a noun, expressing expressing such or such an one, whose name is understood, and whom we are unwilling to name. Matth. xxvi. 18. The Greek expresses this by δέῖνα, quidam, a certain one. Peloni, or Pheloni, was a city of Judæa, 1 Chr. xi. 36.

PELUSIM, or PELUSIUM, פֶּלֶס, Sin, bush; from פֶּלֶס sene. Pelusium, in Greek signifies muddy; from πῆλος, lutum. [as Strabo observes, red.]

PELUSIUM, a city of Egypt, at the mouth of the eastern arm of the Nile, that nearest to Palestine. Pelusium, otherwise, Damietta, was, as it were, the key of Egypt, toward Phœnicia and Judæa. Ezekiel, xiii. 15, 16, calls it the rampart, or strength of Egypt. The Septuagint read, Sais, instead of Sin, in this place. Scripture speaks of the desert of Sin, between Elim and Mount Sinai, Exod. xvi. 1. Numb. xxxiii. 11.

Ezekiel pronounces against Pelusium. "And I will pour my fury upon Sin, the strength of Egypt, and will cut off the multitude of No. And I will set fire in Egypt, Sin shall have great pain," &c. It is thought these threats regarded the expedition of Nebuchadnezzar against this country. For the Lord had said to Ezekiel, chap. xxix. 18, 19. "Son of man, behold, I will give the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey: and it shall be the wages for his army." Pelusium by its situation, suffered the first efforts of the king of Babylon and his army.

Before Nebuchadnezzar's time, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, had attacked Sethon, otherwise, Sevechus, king of Egypt, and besieged Pelusium. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 1. Herodot. lib. ii. A. M. 3291, ante A. D. 709. Sethon was a prince void of prudence, and little capable of government: he had alienated the affections of his soldiers, and was forsaken by all who could defend him. Having addressed himself to Vulcan, whose priest he was, he was bid to advance to Pelusium, to meet Sennacherib, and his god would send him assistance. He therefore put himself at the head of such people as he could, and his god sent against Sennacherib's army a great multitude of rats, which in the night time gnawed the strings of the bows, and the thongs of the bucklers, of the Assyrians, by which their arms became useless to them. This is what the Egyptians related. But the sacred books of the Hebrews inform us, that an angel of the Lord, by night, slew a great proportion of Sennacherib's army, 2 Kings xix. 35. Comp. Fr. No. IV.

We are assured, Polyxen. lib. vii. that Cambyses, king of Persia, invading Egypt, and resolving to take Pelusium, he devised this stratagem. In an assault against the town, he placed a great number of cats, dogs, sheep, and such other animals as the Egyptians held sacred, in the front of his troops. Thus the soldiers which defended the city, being Egyptians, durst not throw their lances, or shoot their arrows, for fear of wounding any of those animals. By this means Cambyses became master of the place.

PENIEL, פְּנֵי אֵל, face, or vision of God: or that sees God: from פָּנָה panah, to see, and אֵל el, God.

PHANIEL, PHANUEL, or PENTUEL, a city beyond Jordan, near the ford on the brook Jabbok. Jacob on his return from Mesopotamia, rested at the brook Jabbok: and very early the next morning, having sent all his people before, he remained alone, and an angel came and wrestled with him, till the day dawned. The angel blessed him in the same place, which Jacob, in consequence, called Peniel, saying: I have seen God face to face, yet continue alive. Gen. xxxii. 30.

In after ages the Israelites built a city in this place, which was given to the tribe of Gad. Gideon returning from the pursuit of the Midianites, overthrew the Tower of Peniel, Judg. viii. 17. A. M. 2759, ante A. D. 1245, and slew the inhabitants, for having refused sustenance to him and his people, in a very insulting manner. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, rebuilt Peniel, 1 Kings xii. 25. A. M. 3030, ante A. D. 974. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3, this prince built himself a palace here.

PENINNAH, פִּנְנָה, Πεννανή, pearl, precious stone; from פִּנְיָנִים paninim: otherwise, his face; from פָּנִים panim, the face, and the pronoun הָ a, his.

PENINNAH, or PHENENNA, second wife of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, 1 Sam. i. 2, 3, &c. Peninnah had several children, but Hannah, afterwards mother of Samuel, was barren: Peninnah, instead of giving glory to God, the author of fruitfulness, was elevated with pride, and insulted Hannah. But the Lord having graciously visited Hannah, Peninnah was humbled; and some interpreters think, that God took her children from her, or at least, that she ceased bearing after this time, according to the expression of Hannah: "the barren hath borne seven, and she that hath many children is waxed feeble."

[PENNY, a Roman coin, equal in value to seven-pence three farthings, sterling. As this was a single coin, perhaps we should do well in translating, to express it by a coin of our own, as near to it in value as possible—say, for instance, a sixpence, or shilling.—read now the passages passages—"When the Lord of the vineyard had agreed with the labourers for six-pence (or a shilling) a day."—"Shew me the tribute money—and they shewed him a six pence (or shilling)"—"two hundred shilling's worth of bread is not enough for this multitude"—the good Samaritan took out two shillings, and gave them to the keeper of the kane. Something like this is absolutely necessary in Rev. vi. 6. "a small measure (or pint) of wheat for a shilling"—As the passage now stands it indicates great plenty to an English reader : whereas, it really is descriptive of a most distressing scarcity. Let this article stand in proof of the propriety of being acquainted with the minutia in Scripture : for who sees any hint at a famine "in a measure of wheat for a penny"? Former times, indeed, in England, have given a labourer his choice of a measure of wheat, or a penny, for his wages—the difference in the value of money renders this recollection very improper in our days. Nor is it less improper at the present time to suppose the Lord of the vineyard would so greatly undervalue the hire of labourers, as to pay them only a penny for the day's work : it sounds like an avaricious advantage taken of the necessities of the poor ; when, in fact, it is directly the reverse—a bounty, a liberality.]

PENTAPOLIS, Πεντάπολις, a country of five cities. From the Greek πέντε, five, and πόλις, a city.

PENTAPOLIS, Wisd. x. 6. Descendente igne in Pentapolim. The five cities, were Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar. They were all condemned to destruction, (but Lot interceded for Zoar, otherwise called Bala) and were consumed by fire from heaven : the place where they had stood became the lake Asphaltites, Gen. xiii. xix. Comp. ASPHALTUS.

PENTATEUCH, Πεντάτευχος, the five books ; from the Greek πέντε, five ; and τεύχος, a volume.

PENTATEUCH. The books of Moses, i. e. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. See their proper Articles ; See also Moses : and the Commentators on the Pentateuch. The following are the arguments of some modern critics, who have disputed Moses's right to the Pentateuch.

1. We find in this work, say they, several things that agree neither to the age, nor character of this legislator. The author speaks of Moses much to his advantage, Numb. xii. 3,—“Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth.” He speaks always in the third person, “The Lord spake unto Moses saying,” &c. “Moses said unto Pharaoh,” &c. Moses would never have spoke of himself in this manner ; at least he would sometimes have expressed himself in the first person.

2. The author of the Pentateuch sometimes abridges his narration, like a writer who collected from ancient memoirs. Sometimes he interrupts the thread of his discourse ; e. gr. he makes Lamech the bigamist say, Gen. iv. 23. “Hear my voice ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech ; for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt :”—without informing us beforehand, to whom this relates.

3. These observations for example, Gen. xii. 6. “And the Canaanite was then in the land,” cannot be reconciled to the age of Moses, since the Canaanites continued masters of Palestine all the time of Moses. The passage out of the book of the Wars of the Lord, quoted Numb. xxi. 14. seems to have been clapped in afterwards, as also the first verses of Deuteronomy.

4. The account of the death of Moses, at the end of the same book, certainly cannot belong to this legislator ; and the same may be observed of other passages, wherein it is said, that the places mentioned lay beyond Jordan ; that the bed of Og was at Ramah, to this day ; that the havoth, or cities, of Jair, were known to the author, though probably they had not that name till after Moses's time, Numb. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.

It is observed also in the Pentateuch, that some places are defective ; in Exodus xii. 8. we see Moses speaking to Pharaoh, where the author omits the beginning of his discourse. The Samaritan copy inserts in this place what is wanting in the Hebrew. In other places the Samaritan adds what is deficient in the Hebrew text ; and what it contains more than the Hebrew seems so well connected with the rest of the discourse, that it is difficult to separate them. Lastly, they believe that they observe certain expressions in the Pentateuch, which can hardly agree with Moses, who was born and bred in Egypt ;—as, what he says of the earthly paradise, of the rivers that watered it, and ran through it : of the cities of Babylon, Erech, Resen, and Calneh ; of the gold of Pison, of the Bdellium, of the stone of Sohem, found in that country ; these particulars observed with such precision, seem to prove, that the author of the Pentateuch lived east of the Euphrates. Add what he says concerning the ark of Noah, of its construction, of the place where it rested, of the wood wherewith it was built, of the bitumen of Babylon, &c.

These last observations have led some to surmise, that the Levites sent by Esar-baddon to the Cushites, Cushites settled in Samaria, 2 Kings xvii. 24, 27. might possibly have composed the Pentateuch; and that the Jews might have received it with some little variation from the Samaritans.—Others have imagined that the Pentateuch, in its present condition, is the abridgement of a larger work, composed by public writers, to whom this trust was committed in the republic of the Hebrews.

Not to undertake an examination of all these proofs, or to refute all the opinions on which they are founded; we shall content ourselves with making three reflections.

First, to divest Moses of a possession he has maintained for so many ages, as author of the Pentateuch; a possession supported by the joint testimony both of the synagogue and the church, of the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testament, of Jesus Christ and his apostles; this certainly requires proofs beyond reply, conclusive demonstrations. But it is plain that the objections are even below convincing arguments.

Secondly, the additions, the dislocations, the confusions, the omissions, which we cannot but allow therein, will not determine that Moses was not the author of these books. They only prove that some amendments have been made, either by adding, or by expunging. God has suffered that the sacred books should not be exempted from such alterations, as proceed from the hands of copiers, or which are consequences of great length of time. If a slight addition, or change, in the text of an author, be thought sufficient to deprive him of his labours, what writer could remain in quiet possession of his work even a single century?

Thirdly, the conjectures of M. le Clerc and of F. Simon, about the author of the Pentateuch, have been so often confuted, that it is quite needless to touch that matter here. The priest or Levite, sent by Esar-haddon to the Cushites, could not have composed the Pentateuch. It is quoted in works extant before his time. The law was in constant practice from Moses to the captivity, consequently, it had been given and recorded. A copy of it was lodged in the ark, and was found in the days of king Josiah. The Jews and Samaritans had too much aversion for each other, to communicate and adopt their sacred writings. By comparing the Samaritan Pentateuch with that of the Jews, we easily perceive that both are derived from the same original; but not copied from one another. The Samaritans have preserved the Hebrew Pentateuch written in the ancient Phœnician characters, which are the Hebrew characters used before the captivity of Babylon. See SAMARITAN. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCII.

[Since the time of F. Simon, Le Clerc, and CALMET, the question of the originals of the Pentateuch has been discussed, with great acumen, and much critical investigation. The result seems to be,—not, that those documents were composed, or arranged, since the days of Moses, (except so far as concerns Ezra's revision for his edition) but, that they existed before Moses, were combined and regulated by him—perhaps, even, were some of them, translated from more ancient memoirs, preserved in the families of Shem, Abraham, and the Hebrew Patriarchs. As these came from far east of the Euphrates, the objections derived from that incident, are completely obviated, by this supposition; and the others dwindle into insignificance, by our better acquaintance with the ancient history of persons and places.

It may be taken, for instance, 1. That the book of Genesis contains sundry repetitions, or double narratives of the same early events. 2. That these duplicate narratives, when closely compared, present characteristic differences of style. 3. That these differences are too considerable, and too distinct, to admit of any other explanation, than that of different originals, taken into association.

This may be justified by a short extract from Eichhorn's comparison of the two supposed original documents used by Moses, containing Histories of the deluge.

1. And Jehovah said unto Noah, Come thou, and all thy house, into the ark.

8. And Noah was six hundred years old, when the flood of waters was upon the earth.

In this manner the ingenious author of this hypothesis proceeds to compare other passages, also. The reader will remark, that the most particular account, is contained in that document in which the deity is denoted by the term Elohim: and this is its general character, throughout. The system is not without its difficulties; like all enquiries into subjects so extremely recondite.]

PENTECONTARCHUS, Πεντακόνταρχος, the chief of fifty; from πενήκοντα, fifty, and ἀρχομαι, I command. 1 Macc. iii. 55.

PENTECOST, Πεντηκοστή, the fiftieth; from the Greek πενήκοντα, fifty: ημέρα, day, is understood.

PENTECOST. A Feast celebrated the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the Feast of the Passover, Levit. xxiii. 15, 16. The Hebrews call it the Feast of Weeks, Exod. xxxiv. 22, שבועות, because it was kept seven weeks after the passover. They then offered the first fruits of their wheat harvest, which at that time was completed, Deut. xvi. 9, 10. These first fruits consisted in two loaves of leavened bread, of two assarons of meal, or of three pints of meal each, Lev. xxiii. 16, 17. [Some interpreters think, that each family was obliged to give two loaves for first fruits; but others maintain, and I think with more reason, that they offered but two loaves in the name of the whole nation; this is sufficiently marked by Josephus, who puts but one loaf of two assarons. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10.] Besides which they presented at the temple seven lambs of that year, one calf, and two rams, for a burnt-offering, two lambs for a peace offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. We do not find in Scripture, or in Josephus, that the Pentecost had an octave, though it was one of the three great solemnities, in which all the males were to appear before the Lord. Besides the victims appointed Levit. xxiii. 18, 19, for the day of Pentecost, they offered two calves and a ram for a burnt-offering, seven lambs for a peace-offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. Numb. xxviii. 27. Josephus puts all these sacrifices together, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 10.

The Feast of Pentecost was instituted, first, to oblige the Israelites to repair to the temple of the Lord, there to acknowledge his dominion over their country, and their labours, by offering to him the first fruits of all their harvests. Secondly, to commemorate, and to render thanks to God for the law given from Mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The modern Jews celebrate the Pentecost on two days, they abstain from labour and business, as on the Sabbath-day, except that they may make fires, dress victuals, and carry necessities from place to place. They hold by tradition, that this day the law was delivered from Mount Sinai; for which reason they adorn the synagogue and the places appointed for reading the law; and even their houses, with roses and flowers in crowns and garlands. Leo of Modena, P. iii. cap. 4.

The prayers are accommodated to the festival, and they read from the Pentateuch the sacrifice that was offered on that day, with a lesson out of the prophets, which has relation to the Feast of Pentecost. Afterwards, they pronounce a blessing for the sovereign, and a sermon in commendation of the law.

On the second day of the festival, in the evening, they perform the ceremony of the Abdala, i. e. distinction, to distinguish the day of the feast from a working day, and to shew that they pass from the feast to a day in which work is allowed. This ceremony consists in repeating certain prayers, and certain blessings, and in wishing one another good health, and prosperity. After which every one employs himself at pleasure, the feast being over.

This Abdala, or distinction, is also performed at the passover, and on the Sabbath; but on the Sabbath there is more ceremony. When every one is come home to his house, they light a torch, or a lamp with two cottons, the master of the house takes wine in a cup, with sweet-scented spices; and when he has said some passages out of the Psalms, and the end of the eighth chapter of the book of Esther; "The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour," &c. then he blesses the wine and the spices, and enjoys the flavour of them as it were to begin the week with pleasure: he blesses the brightness of the fire, of which no use has yet been made, looks on his hands and nails, because he is then beginning to work, and throws the wine on the ground, as a token of joy and gladness. Then wishing each other a happy week, they begin their business. But at the end of the passover, and of Pentecost, they make the Abdala with words only.

Buxtorf adds other ceremonies, peculiar, perhaps, to the Jews of Germany. To recall to mind more sensibly mount Sinai, on which the law was given, they make a very thick cake, of seven layers of paste; this they call Sinai, and inculcate, that these seven thicknesses of paste represent the seven heavens, which God was to re-ascend, from this mountain to the heaven of heavens, his abode. They reckon up exactly all the days that pass after the passover, that they may not be mistaken in the moment on which the Pentecost is to begin. The king, they say, has promised liberty to a prisoner, with his daughter in marriage, at the end of seven weeks. Is it not fit that this prisoner should count the days, the hours, the moments, at the end of which his happiness is to begin? This king is God, who has promised liberty to the Jewish nation, and also his law. Buxtorf, Synagog. Jud.

That they may not be mistaken in their calculation, they celebrate two festival days for their greater security. They did the same formerly at other festivals, as may be seen from Judith. viii. 6, in Græco. And Buxtorf affirms they did the same at the passover; hence he removes the difficulty arising from our Saviour's eating the paschal lamb a day before the Jews.

To return to the Pentecost. Twice they bring the book of the law; five persons read it one after another. The synagogue and the windows of the houses are adorned with flowers, to insinuate, that every thing was dressed in verdure about Mount Sinai, when the Israelites received the law.

The Christian church also celebrates the Feast of Pentecost, fifty days, or seven weeks after the passover, or the resurrection of our Saviour. We are convinced that the true day of the passover, in the year that our Saviour died, fell on the Saturday, and that Pentecost fell on Sunday, May 24, fifty days after our Saviour's resurrection. The church has always kept the Pentecost on the Sunday, at least it is a tradition very express among the fathers, Constit. Apost. lib. v. cap. 20. Leo, Ep. ii. cap. 1. Aug. de Civit. lib. xviii. cap. 54. Serm. 154. de tempore, nunc in App. 167. and the ecclesiastical writers. Barou. ad An. 34. n. 284. Usser, Pearson, &c. After the ascension of Christ, the apostles having retired to a house at Jerusalem, (which it is said, was that of Mary the mother of John, on Mount Sion: Alexand. apud Surium. xi. Jun. Cornel. à Lapide in Acta.) they there waited for the Holy Ghost, which our Saviour had promised. On the day of Pentecost, about the third hour of the day, (nine o'clock in the morning) suddenly they heard a great noise, like the rushing of a mighty wind, from heaven, which filled the whole house where the apostles were assembled. At the same time appeared among them, as it were, tongues of fire, parted, or cloven, and rested on each of them: all were immediately filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak different tongues or languages, as the Spirit gave them utterance, Acts ii. 1, 2, 3.

There were then at Jerusalem pious Jews of all nations, who were astonished to hear such a variety of languages: others [probably, Jews of Jerusalem] mocked, saying, these people are full of new wine. Peter took up their defence, and said, These persons are by no means drunk, for it is yet but the third hour of the day:—(On festival days they did not eat before noon, Joseph. lib. de vita sua; especially they tasted nothing before nine in the morning, which was an hour of prayer:)—but this is the accomplishment of what was spoken by Joel, ii. 28. I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, &c. And then, whoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved, &c.

Those who heard St. Peter were moved with compunction, and said, Brethren, what must we do? Peter answered them, Repent, and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, to obtain the remission of sins, and you shall also receive the Holy Ghost, &c. That day were baptized about three thousand souls. This was on the day of Pentecost, A. D. 33.

Deut. iv. 3. Psalm cvi. 28.

Peor was a city of Judah, but is not read in the Hebrew, nor in the Vulgate, but only in the Greek, Josh. xv. 60. Eusebius says it was near Bethlehem; Jerom adds, that in his time it was called Paora.

PERFECTION. The Son of God commands us, Matth. v. 48, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect:" Not that we can ever attain his perfection, but we ought constantly to be making advances towards it: we ought always to propose it to ourselves as our pattern, in the exercise of all virtue, and especially his mercy and charity: whence St. Luke says in the parallel passage, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful," Luke vi. 36. In Matth. xix. 21, our Saviour says, that he who would be perfect must forsake all and follow him. And Luke vi. 40. that the disciple who would arrive at perfection must become like his master. St. Paul often exhorts his disciples to be perfect, i. e. to acquire the perfection of Christianity, to be convinced of the excellence of it, and to practice its truths, 1 Cor. i. 10. xiv. 10, &c.

In the Old Testament, the words perfect and perfection answer to the Hebrew words Tham and Thummim, which properly signify, intire and complete, without blemish or defect, irreprehensible, perfect. Thus it is said, Gen. vi. 9. "Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations." And God says to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 1. "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." And speaking to his people, Deut. xviii. 13. "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God." In all these places perfect is put for without reproach, unproveable, sincere. In like manner, to serve God with a perfect heart, is to serve him faithfully, purely, not admitting a rival. Perfect knowledge, a perfect law, perfect charity, a perfect work; in these expressions the word perfect signifies whatever may make those things complete, finished, intire, without deficiency. St. Paul says, Heb. vii. 19. "The law made nothing perfect:" it may be said to give only sketches of things; to enjoin things of less perfection than what the gospel requires.

A perfect captivity is when a whole people are transported into a strange country, without leaving any to cultivate the land, Jer. xiii. 18. Amos i. 6, 9. In Deut. xxxiii. 8. Vulg. Lights and perfections stand for the Urim and Thummim, carried by the high-priest about his person.

PERFUMES; the use of perfumes was frequent among the Hebrews, and among the Orientals in general, before it was known to the Greeks and Romans. Pliny says, lib. xiii. cap. 1. that they knew not who was the first inventor of perfumes, and that they were unknown at the siege of Troy. Ovid, Fast. lib. iii. imputes this discovery to Bacchus. Arnobius maintains, contra Gentes, lib. vii. that they were unknown in the heroic ages. But in the time of Moses they must be known in Egypt, since he speaks of the art of the perfumer, and gives the composition of two perfumes, Exod. xxx. 25, of which one was to be offered to the Lord, on the golden altar in the holy place; and the other, Exod. xxx. 34, 35, &c. was for anointing the high-priest and his sons, the tabernacle, and the vessels of divine service. Exod. xxx. 23.

The first of these perfumes was composed of stacte, the onyx, or odoriferous shell-fish, of galbanum, and incense, each of equal weight.—This perfume was sacred and inviolable, and it was forbid on pain of death, for any man whatever to use it. It was placed every morning and evening on the golden altar in the Sanctum: by one of the priests of the week. This perfume

Zacharias, father of John the Baptist went to offer, when the angel foretold to him the birth of that forerunner of the Messiah.

The other kind of perfume was rather an ointment, to anoint the priests and sacred vessels of the tabernacle, it was composed of the best myrrh, five hundred shekels, of cinnamon two hundred and fifty shekels, of Canna Aromatica a like quantity, of Cassia Aromatica five hundred shekels; and one hin of oil olive. But it is thought they did not afterwards anoint the successors of Aaron, because the dignity being hereditary in his family, this unction did not seem necessary. God reserved this ointment, or perfume, to his own service; and whoever should make it, either for himself or another, was to be cut off from his people.

The Hebrews had also perfumes which they used for embalming their dead. The composition is not exactly known, but they used myrrh, aloes, and other strong and astringent drugs, proper to prevent infection, and corruption. Vide EMBALM.

Besides these perfumes, there are others noticed in Scripture. Those, for example, which king Hezekiah preserved in his repositories. "The spices and precious ointment," 2 Kings xx. 13. And those burned with the body of king Asa. They "laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours, and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecary's art," 2 Chr. xvi. 14. Judith perfumed her face when she was to appear before Holofernes. They prepared the virgins which were to appear before the kings of Persia, for six months together, by the use of oil of myrrh, and for six other months, by other perfumes, and sweet-scented oils. The Spouse in the Canticles, commends the perfumes of her lover; and her lover in return says, that the perfumes of his spouse surpass the most excellent odours. He names particularly, the spikenard, the Canna Aromatica, the cinnamon, the myrrh, the aloes, as composing these perfumes. The voluptuous woman described by Solomon, Prov. vii. 17, says, that she had perfumed her bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.—The epicures in the book of Wisdom, ii. 7. encourage one another to the use of the most luxurious and costly perfumes.

Isaiah reproaches Judæa, whom he describes as a faithless spouse to God, as being painted and perfumed to please strangers, Isaiah lvii. 9. "Thou wentest to the king with ointment, and didst increase thy perfumes." Ezekiel, xxiii. 41. seems to accuse the Jews with having profaned the odours and perfumes, whose use was reserved to sacred things, by applying them to their own use. "Thou sattest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it, whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil." Amos, vi. 6. inveighs against the rich men of Ephraim, who drank costly wines, and perfumed themselves with the most precious oils. The woman-sinner in St. Luke vii. 37, and Mary Magdalen in St. John xii. 3. anointed our Saviour's feet with costly perfume. That of Mary Magdalen was spikenard.

These instances shew the taste of the ancient Hebrews, which was, and still is, the taste of the Orientals, who made much use of scents and perfumes. They prove also, that both men and women used them, and that wise and serious men condemned the too frequent and affected use of them. It may also be observed, that to abstain from perfumes, scents, and unctions, was esteemed a part of mortification. Esther refrained from perfumes and ointments during the humiliation of her people, Esth. xiv. 2. Daniel did not anoint himself all the three weeks that he was urgent in prayer, to obtain the communications he desired of God. Dan. x. 3.

Solomon says, "that dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour." One dead fly is sufficient to spoil the scent of a whole box of perfumes: so one fault is enough to destroy a man's good name.

PERGA, Πέργη, very earthy; from the preposition περί very, and γῆ the earth.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia, Acts xiii. 14. This is not a maritime city, and St. Paul must have gone up the river Caystrus to it, or else must have gone on foot. [Mentioned by Pliny, lib. v. cap. 27. Mela, lib. i. Strabo, lib. xiv.]

Perga was one of the most considerable cities in Pamphylia: and when that province was divided into two parts, this city became the metropolis of one part, and Sidé of the other. There was, on a neighbouring mountain, a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergæa, from the name of the city: almost all the medals of this city commemorate that goddess. It appears that Bacchus also was worshipped in Perga.]

PERGAMUS, Πέργαμος, height, elevation.

[One of the most renowned cities in Asia. It was in Mysia, the residence of King Eumenes, and of the other Attalic princes. Famous for an annual exhibition of cock-fighting. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 30. Strabo, lib. xiii.]

PERGAMUS. Jesus Christ, Revelations ii. 13 speaks to the angel, or bishop, of Pergamus; "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is; and thou holdest fast my name." &c. Some have thought that this angel of Pergamus, was Carpus, who suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, as we learn from Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. 15. But he does does not acquaint us that he was then bishop of this church. The Roman martyrology makes him bishop of Thyatira : but, besides, Carpus died under the empire of Decius. Therefore it is not credible, he could be bishop of Pergamus under Dioclesian. Pergamus was a considerable city of Troas in the time of St. John. At Pergamus parchment was invented, thence called Pergamena.

PERIBOLUS, Περὶβολος, a wall, Ezek. xlii. 7. Vulg. From περιβάλλω, I surround.

PERISCELIDES, Περίσκεληδής, a bracelet ; or ornament worn by women about their legs. Vide Isaiah iii. 20. and Numbers xxxi. 50.—Moses says, that the Israelites, when they had defeated the Midianites, offered to the Lord the garters, (periscelides) the rings, bracelets, and collars taken from the enemy. We see the same in the victory which Gideon obtained over the same people, Judg. viii. 25, 26, 27. The Hebrew πηγκ, translated Periscelides, comes from a root, which signifies to walk ; this favours the translation of those who understand it of costly garters, or ornaments worn by the Midianites about their legs. The Septuagint translate it by χλιδωνά, a bracelet : it certainly has this signification, 2 Sam. i. 10, where the Amalekite who had slain Saul, says, that he took off the bracelet (Azadah) from the arm of that prince. See FRAGMENTS, and PLATES, DRESSES.

Isaiah uses this term in his enumeration of the ornaments of women. The Chaldee translates it chains of the foot. Clemens Alexandrinus Pædag. lib. ii. cap. 12. calls πίδαας περιφύρας, those silver or golden circlets that women put about their legs ; γ. fetters or bonds. Profane authors call them in the same manner, shining fetters, golden shackles. So Martial,

A pedibus niveis fulserunt aurea vincta.

And Seneca,

Crura distincta religavit auro.

The women of Syria and Arabia at this day wear great rings around their legs, to which are fastened many other lesser rings, which make a tinkling noise, or like little bells, when they walk, or stir. These rings are fixed above the ankle, and are of gold, silver, copper, glass, or even of varnished earth, according to the substance and condition of the wearer.

The princesses of Arabia wear large hollow rings of gold, within which are inclosed little pebbles, that tinkle. Others have lesser rings called Kelkal, hung round them, which have the same effect. The larger circles, or rings, are open in one place, in form of a crescent, by which they pass the small of the leg through them.

The Egyptian ladies were also very valuable leg-rings ; for we read in an inscription found in Spain, that the statue of Isis had ornaments of gold on its legs, set with two emeralds, and with eleven other precious stones. The Roman and Grecian women also used them. Trimalchio in Petronius, speaking of his spouse, says, See what she wears on her legs ; Videtis mulieris compedes : by way of complaint at her extravagance.

PERJURY. The law of God severely condemned perjury, false oaths, vows, and promises, made without intention to perform them, Levit. xix. 12. Exod. xxiii. 13. Perjury offends against the veracity and justice of God himself, and is a great insult on his Majesty, by appealing to him as a witness to a lie, and engaging his mighty name in commission of a crime. See Philo, de decem præceptis et de specialibus legibus. Moses, in Leviticus, v. 4, 5, 6. vi. 2, 3. seems to appoint sacrifices to atone for perjury ; which is contrary to St. Paul, who assures us, that the sacrifices and ceremonies of the law did not remit internal sins, but only external and legal faults. Heb. vii. 18. Gal. ii. 16. Rom. viii. 3. Heb. ix. 9, 13. It must therefore be presumed, that the sacrifices ordained by Moses, regarded the ignorance only, or temerity of him, who had made a rash promise, or a secret oath, or promise. Or else he supposes, that he who was permitted to offer such a sacrifice, had already expiated his internal fault, by a perfect repentance and contrition ; of which the external sacrifice prescribed, is only [the public acknowledgment, or ratification] as we may say, to satisfy for faults committed, by approaching holy things in a state of defilement. Wilful perjury, in public, and before the judge, was not to be remitted by sacrifices, according to Moses's law. He was punished by the sentence of the judges, when he was found guilty. Portabit iniquitatem suam : which is usually understood of capital punishment. See Levit. v. 1. xix. 8. xx. 17, 19, 20. xxiv. 15. Numb. ix. 13.

PERIZZITES, פְּרִיזִיטִים, who dwell in villages, or places not enclosed with walls ; from פָּרַז peraz.

PERIZZITES, or PHERESÆI, ancient inhabitants of Palestine, mingled with the Canaanites. There is great probability, that they themselves were Canaanites, but having no fixed habitations, and living sometimes in one country, sometimes in another, were called Perizzites, which signifies scattered or dispersed. Pherazoth stands for hamlets, or villages. The Perizzites did not inhabit any certain portion of Canaan ;

Canaan ; there were some on each side of the river Jordan, in the mountains, and in the plains. In several places of Scripture the Canaanites and Perizzites are mentioned as the chief people of the country. E. gr. in the time of Abraham and Lot, the Canaanite and Perizzite were in the land, Gen. xiii. 7. The tribe of Ephraim complained to Joshua, that they were too much confined in their possession : he bid them go, if they pleased, into the mountains of the Perizzites and Rephaim, there clear the land, cultivate, and inhabit it, Josh. xvii. 15. Solomon subdued the remains of the Canaanites and Perizzites, which the children of Israel had not rooted out ; and made them tributary, 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. 2 Chron. viii. 7. The Perizzites are mentioned by Ezra, after the return from Babylon : and several Israelites had married wives from among them. Ezra ix. 1.

PERSECUTION, to persecute. Persecution in all ages has been the portion of the elect, and of good men. Cain persecuted Abel. Joseph was persecuted by his brethren : David by Saul ; Elijah and Elisha by Ahab ; the prophets by the kings and people of their time ; Jesus Christ by Herod, and the chief of the Jews ; John the Baptist and the apostles by the enemies of piety, truth, and justice. It is a maxim laid down by the apostle, that all those who will lead a godly life shall suffer persecution. 2 Tim. iii. 12. But happy are those who suffer persecution for righteousness sake, says our Lord, Matth. viii. 3—10.

But, to persecute, persequi, is not always taken in this odious sense ; it is often put for following an enemy in his flight, or for applying one's self vigorously to any thing, Deut. xvi. 20. Iuste quod justum est persequeris ; you may apply yourself diligently to the practice of justice, Psalm xxxiv. 14. Inquire pacem, et persequere eam. Prov. xiii. 21. Peccatores persequitur malum : punishment pursues sinners. Ecclus. xxxiv. 2. He that depends on deceitful visions is compared to one that catches at a shadow, or grasps at the wind. Quasi qui apprehendit umbram, et sequitur ventum.

PERSIA, פָּרַס, Πέρσαι, that cuts or divides : or nail, gryphon, horse man ; from פָּרַס paras, or peres. Ezek. xxvii. 10.

PERSIA, a kingdom of Asia. The Persians became very famous after Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. Their ancient name was Elamites ; in the time of the Roman emperors they were called Parthians : at present Persians. See PARTHIANS.

Persia is bounded east by the province of Kerman ; west by Chusistan ; south by the Gulph of Persia ; and north by a great desert that separates it from Chorassan. It is about three hundred leagues in extent, along the ocean. Yezd is the most eastern city of this province, Hamadan the most western, Gireft or Sireft the most southern, and Rey the most northern.

[Classic writers often put Persians for Parthians, though it is probable that Parthia was only a part of the kingdom. They generally also speak of the Persians in the plural : and describe this people as extremely magnificent and luxurious.

PARS, appears to be the Hebrew name for Persia. There is in the district of Sumbiel, near the borders of Pars, a mountain from which fire issues at all times. At night this fire gives light ; and smoke issues from it in the day-time : and the general opinion is that here is a fountain of naptha, or of pitch, which has taken fire.

There is also a species of scorpion, which they call kexoureh : they are like the leaves of anje-dan, (the herb laserpitium, or pellitory) and are more destructive than serpents. Ibn Haukal.

Kashan, says Ibn Haukal, p. 171, is a small town. Here are great numbers of black scorpions which kill : and another species, called Heiratah. Comp. Ezek. ii. 6.

In Pars, says Ibn Haukal, the weight of the direm is two methkals. The stone is of two kinds, great and small : the great stone is one mun a thousand and forty direms, like the stone of Ardebil : the small stone is the stone of Bagdad, and the stone of Beiza, one mun eight hundred direms. At Istakar four hundred direms make the stone. At Behreh, two hundred and eighty direms ; at Shapour, three hundred direms ; and at Ardeshir Khereh, two hundred and forty direms. Sir W. Ouseley's Trans. p. 135.

It is very possible, that these differences of weight, in different parts of the same kingdom, (which is no more extraordinary than the various bushel measures for corn in our country) may explain the differences which we sometimes find among the talents of Scripture. Com. Deut. xxv. 13. Prov. xx. 10. 1 Kings, x. 14. 2 Chron. viii. 18.]

The Arabians say, that Fars, father of the Persians, was son of Azaz, or Arphaxad son of Shem. Others derive him from Japheth ; but the Persians derive their origin from Kaiumath, who is among them, what Adam is with us. They assure us that they have always had kings of their own nation, whose succession has never been long interrupted.

The Dilemites, the Curdes, and even the Oriental Turks, according to some authors, are descended ceded from the Persians. The Dilemites inhabit the shores of the Caspian sea, called also the sea of Dilem, from that nation. The Curdes are scattered in Assyria, to which they give the name of Kurdistan. The Turks are withdrawn beyond the river Oxus, into Turkestan.

Authors speak differently of the religion of the ancient Persians. Herodotus, Clio, sex lib. i. cap. 31. is the first who has given any account of it. He tells us, "That they had neither temples, nor statues, nor altars. They look on it as folly to make, or to suffer any, because they did not believe as the Greeks, that the Gods were of human origin." They sacrificed to Jupiter on the highest mountains. They gave the name of God to the whole circuit of the heavens. They sacrificed also to the sun, and the moon, and the earth; to the fire, and the water, and the winds. They knew no other gods, anciently, but these. Since that time they have learned from the Assyrians and the Arabians, to sacrifice to Urania, or Celestial Venus; whom the Assyrians call Militta, the Arabians, Alitta, and the Persians, Mithra.

Strabo, lib. xix. copies Herodotus almost word for word, but does not agree that the Persians gave the name of Mithra to Venus; he says they call the sun Mithra; and all authors agree with Strabo in this. "They sacrifice, (says he) in a pure place, where they offer up their prayers, and bring thither their victim crowned.—After the Magus has divided the flesh, each takes his part; they leave nothing for the gods, saying that God is contented with the soul of the sacrifice. Some throw into the fire a small part of the double fat that is wrapt about the intestines. They chiefly sacrifice to the fire and the water. They put upon the fire dry wood, without bark, upon which they throw fat, and then oil also. They light the fire without any bellows, only making a wind with a kind of fan. [vide the Plate to FRAGMENTS, No. CXXVIII]. If any one blows the fire, or throws any carcase, or dirt, into it, he is punished with death.

"The sacrifice to the water is performed in this manner. They assemble near a lake, a river, or a fountain, and make a ditch, where they kill the sacrifice, taking care that the neighbouring water is not defiled with the blood, which would make it unclean. After which they put the flesh upon myrtle, or laurel. The Magi put fire to it with little sticks, and sprinkle their libations of oil mixed with milk and honey, not upon the fire, or upon the water, but upon the ground. Then for a long time they make their enchantments, holding a little bundle of heath. The Cappadocians have a great number of Magi, whom they call Pyretæes, and several temples of the gods of the Persians. They kill their victims without knives, but by a lever, with which they strike as with an axe. They have great enclosures which they call Pyretæes, in the midst whereof is an altar, on which the Magi preserve ashes and a perpetual fire. They enter therein every day, and there make their enchantments for the space of an hour, holding whisks of rods, and wearing mitres that come down so low, as to cover their lips and cheeks.

"The sacrifices of the Persians, says Herodotus, are performed after this manner. They have no libations, nor any players on music, nor garlands, nor meal. But he who offers the sacrifice brings the victim into a clean and pure place, and invokes the god to whom he would sacrifice, having his mitre crowned with myrtle. It is not allowed the priest to pray for himself in particular, but he must pray for the king, and the whole nation. After he has roasted the flesh of the victim, being cut into several pieces, he spreads young grass, or especially clover, and lays them thereon. Afterwards, a Magus comes to sing the theogony, a kind of song in use among them; and they are not allowed to sacrifice without a Magus. A little while afterwards the priest takes away these pieces of flesh, and does with them what he pleases."

Plutarch, de Iside et Osiride, informs us of some articles of their creed. "Among those who admitted of two principles, one good, the other bad, was, (says he) the famous Zoroaster, who lived, according to some, five thousand years before the Trojan war. One of these gods he named Oromazes, the other Arimanius; and said, that one had a relation to light and knowledge, the other to darkness and ignorance. Between these two, was another of a middle nature, whom he called Mithras; for this reason the Persians called Mithras, him who has the middle place. He taught, that the first was to be sacrificed to, to obtain favours, and the other, to be defended from evils.

"In this manner they invoked darkness. They bruised in a mortar a herb called Omomi, which afterwards they mingled with the blood of a sacrificed wolf, and taking it all away, they threw it into a dark place, [cavern] where the sun never shined. They believed that some plants and trees belonged to the good god, others to the evil god; and that among animals, dogs, birds, and urchins belong to the good god, and all those of the waters, to the evil one. Oromazes, according to them, was born of pure light; and Arimanius of gross darkness. They are always at variance. Oromazes has produced six gods, of which the first is the author [or principle] of benevolence, the second of valour, the the third of equity, the fourth of wisdom, the fifth of riches, the sixth of such pleasures as attend good actions. Arimanius also, by way of emulation, produced a like number of gods.

"Oromazes having made himself three times greater than he was at first, withdrew as far from the sun, as the sun is from the earth. He adorned the heavens, placing the stars there. He made a star which is more excellent than the rest, and, as it were, their guardian. This is Sirius, or the great dog. He made besides, twenty-four gods, and put them all into an egg. Arimanius made the same number, who broke the egg in which the good ones were inclosed, and then good and evil were mingled together. They say there is a time fixed, in which Arimanius must die, when the earth being united, all men shall live happy in a perfect union, being assembled into the same city, and speaking the same language. Theopompus adds, that according to the opinion of the Magi, during three thousand years one of the gods shall be too powerful for the other; during three thousand years more they shall make war, and shall endeavour to destroy each other. At last, Pluto [rather Arimanius, the evil deity: for Pluto is the Greek deity] shall be overcome, and then men shall be happy, and shall no longer need sustenance, &c."

The Persians at first used no images, yet they had them afterwards, as Berosus says in the third book of his Chaldean history, as quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, Protrept. Artaxerxes son of Darius, and father of Ochus, introduced them, and was the first who erected a statue, that of Venus Tenaides, at Babylon, at Shushan, and at Ecbatana: and taught the Persians, the Bactrians, the people of Damascus and Sardis, to worship it as a goddess.—Such was the religion of the ancient Persians, according to ancient authors, who had the best opportunities of being informed.

A modern author, very skilful in the eastern languages, and who had purposely studied the religion of the Persians, pretends that these people had just notions concerning Deity, and believed but one God. That, indeed, they admitted of two principles: but one of them was uncreated, and the other created. The created principle was the world. He maintains, that the worship they paid the sun and fire, was merely civil and relative. [Vide Hyde, de Relig. Vet. Pers. Comp. FRAG. Nos. DII. DIII.]

The modern Persians refer their religion to Abraham, whom some confound with Zoroaster, and others will have to have been the master of Zoroaster. They think the world was created in six days; that in the beginning God created a man and a woman, from whom mankind are derived: that there are several terrestrial paradises, one universal deluge, one Moses, one Solomon. All this, without doubt, is taken from the history of the Jews, and from the traditions of the Mahometans.

They hold, says D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.* p. 340. one eternal God, called in their language, Jesdan, or Oromazdes, who is the true God, called by the Arabians, Allah, the author of all good; also another god, produced by darkness, whom they name Aherman, (properly the Eblis of the Arabians, or the devil,) the author of all evil. They have a very great veneration for light, and a great aversion from darkness. God the Creator of all things has produced light and darkness, and from a mixture of these two, of good and evil, of generation and corruption, the composition and decomposition of the parts of the world is effected, and will always continue, till light withdrawing itself, on one side, and darkness on the other, shall cause a destruction and dissolution. This is an abridgement of the doctrine of Zoroaster, which is still maintained by the Magians Guebres, who worship fire; and who always, when they pray, turn themselves towards the rising sun.

- PERSIS, Περσίς, Persa, Persian.

PERSIS, a Roman lady, whom St. Paul salutes, Rom. xvi. 12. and calls his beloved sister. He says she had laboured much for the Lord, and still labours. Nothing of her life is come to our knowledge; nor do we see that she is honoured by any church; which is something singular.

PERUDA, פֶּרֻדָּא, divided, or separated: or mule, or horse; from פֶּרֶד parad or pered. Chief of a family of Nethinim. Ezra ii. 55.

PESTILENCE, or PLAGUE. In the Hebrew tongue, as in most others, plague or pestilence expresses all sorts of distempers and calamities. The Hebrew דִּבָּר, Debir, which properly signifies the plague, is extended to all epidemical and contagious diseases. Commonly the prophets connect together the sword, the pestilence, and the famine, as three evils, which generally accompany each other.

The pestilent man, Prov. xv. 12. Vulg. is the scorner, the fleerer, the pretended free-thinker, who diverts himself with the simplicity of good people, and with the timidity of pious souls.—The Hebrew word Lex, translated pestilent, signifies a scorner. The chair of pestilence, [or seat of the scorner,] mentioned in the first Psalm, is the seat of such pernicious people. Solomon in many places cautions his readers against their discourses. The scorner loves not him that reproves him, Prov. xix. 25. Vulgate. And elsewhere, Pestilenti flagellato, stultus sapientior erit. The correction of such scoffers is great instruction for the weak, the low, the foolish, those that want light and understanding. Homines pestilentes dissipant civitatem, Prov. xxix. 8. Such kind of men are only fit to draw down the anger of God on a community, in order to its destruction. Tertullus, the advocate of the Jews, says, Acts xxiv. 5. that St. Paul was a pestilent fellow, a common disturber and mover of sedition, because he maintained that Jesus was the Christ. Jeremiah gives to Babylon the name of the contagious mountain. Ecce ego ad te, mons pestifer; because it spread the infection of idolatry and superstition through the whole world. The Messiah says, Hosea xiii. 14. "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." Jerom translates it; Ero mors tua, ó mors: morsus tuus ero, inferne.—And in Psalm xci. 3. the Hebrew has, He shall deliver thee from the snares of the hunter, and from the dangerous pestilence. The same letters that signify—a word, DABAR, also signify the pestilence—DEBER.

PETER, Πέτρος. See CEPHAS.

PETER, the apostle, born at Bethsaida, was son of John, Jona, or Joanna, and brother of Andrew, John i. 42, 43. His first name was Simon or Simeon, but when our Saviour called him to the apostleship, he added the name Cephas, i. e. in Syriac, a stone or rock; in Greek and Latin, Petra, whence Peter. He was married; and dwelt with his mother-in-law, and his wife, at Capernaum, on the lake of Gennesareth, Mark i. 29. Matth. viii. 14. Luke iv. 38. Andrew having been first called by Jesus Christ, met his brother Simon, and told him, we have found the Messiah: and brought him to Jesus, John i. 41. A. D. 30. After having passed one day with our Saviour, they returned to their ordinary occupation, which was fishing. Yet it is thought they were present with him, at the marriage of Cana in Galilee.

Towards the end of the same year, Jesus Christ being on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth, saw Peter and Andrew busy, washing their nets, Luke v. 1, 2, 3, &c. He entered their boat, and bid Peter throw out his nets into the sea, in order to fish. Peter obeyed him, though he had been fishing the whole night without catching any thing. They took so many fishes at this draught, that their own vessel, and that of James and John, sons of Zebedee, were filled. Then Peter threw himself at the feet of Jesus, and said, Depart from me, Lord, for I am a sinner. Jesus said to them, Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. He said the same to James and John, who quitted their boats and nets, and followed him.

Some time after, Luke iv. 38. Matth. viii. 14. A. D. 31. Jesus coming to Capernaum, entered the house of Peter, where his mother-in-law lay sick of a fever. He immediately healed her; and she assisted to serve them. A little while before the feast of the passover of the following year, A. D. 32. after Jesus returned into Galilee, he chose twelve apostles, among whom Peter has the first place. One night when Jesus Christ walked on the waters of the lake of Gennesareth, Peter proposed to come and meet him, Matth. xiv. 28, 29. Jesus gave him leave, but he seeing a great wave coming, was afraid, and began to sink: but Jesus held him up, and said to him; O man of little faith, why were you afraid? Afterwards, some of Jesus's disciples being offended at his figurative expressions, left him: and Jesus asked his apostles, if they also would leave him? Peter replied, to whom shall we go, Lord? for thou hast the words of eternal life, John vi. 53, 54, &c.

One day, as our Saviour was near Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his apostles, whom men took him to be? Matth. xvi. 13, 14. They answered, some said he was John the Baptist, others Elias, others Jeremiah, or one of the old prophets.—And you, says he, whom do you say I am? Simon Peter answered, You are the Christ, the son of the living God. Jesus said to him, Happy are you, Simon, son of Jona, for, not flesh and blood has revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. Your name is Peter, [rock] and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever you shall bind on earth, shall be also bound in heaven, and whatever you shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXXIV. About eight days after, our Saviour being transfigured on a mountain, had with him Peter, James, and John, and shewed them a glimpse of his glory. Peter being in an ecstasy, and seeing Moses and Elias with Jesus, exclaimed, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if you please, we will make three tents, one for you, one for Moses, and one for Elias! Matth. xvii. Luke ix. 28.

Jesus returning to Capernaum, being on the road the apostles disputed among themselves, which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of God, which they thought to be very near. Jesus and Peter came to Capernaum some time before the rest; those who gathered the half shekel a head for the use of the temple, came and asked Peter, if his master would pay it then? Jesus bid Peter throw his line into the sea, and he should find a piece of money to pay for them two, in the mouth of the first fish he should take. Peter obeyed; and found a shekel in the mouth of the fish, which he gave to the collectors, for Jesus and for himself.

One day, as Jesus was speaking concerning the forgiveness of injuries, Matth. xviii. 21, 22, Peter asked him how often they must forgive? seven times? Jesus told him, seventy times seven. On another occasion, A. D. 33. Matth. xix. 27, as our Saviour was speaking of the danger of riches, Peter said to him; Lord, we have left all to follow thee; what reward shall we have? Jesus answered, an hundred-fold, even in this world, and in the other world eternal life.

On the Tuesday before our Saviour's passion, Peter shewed him the fig-tree he had cursed the evening before, now withered, Mark xi. 12—21. and the day following, as they sat on the Mount of Olives, he, with the other apostles, asked Jesus, when the temple was to be destroyed? On Thursday he was sent with John to prepare for the passover; in the evening, when Jesus was at table, and began to speak of him who should betray him, Peter made signs to John, to ask him who this could be? After supper, the disciples disputed who should be the greatest? whereupon Jesus laying aside his garments, washed their feet, to give them an example of humility. Peter at first made some difficulty; but Jesus telling him, that if he did not wash his feet, he could have no part in him; Peter replied, Lord, wash not only my feet, but my hands and my head, John xiii. 6—10.

Some time after, Jesus said to him, Peter, Satan has desired to sift you as men sift wheat:—But I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail; and when you are converted, confirm your brethren. Peter asked Jesus, where he was going? and said, he was ready to follow him every where, even to death. But Jesus foretold to him, that he would abjure him three times that very night, before the cock should crow.—When supper was ended, Jesus went to the garden of Olives, taking Peter, James, and John, apart, as witnesses of his agony. Peter, though he had lately shewn so much resolution, yet fell asleep with the rest; which occasioned Jesus to say to him, Do you sleep, Simon? Could you not watch with me one hour? Mark xiv. 37. Matth. xxvi. 40, &c.

Judas being come with the soldiers to seize Jesus, Peter drew his sword, and cut off the right ear of one Malchus, servant to the high-priest: but Jesus bid him put up his sword, adding, those who fight with the sword perish by the sword: at the same time he healed Malchus's ear. John xviii. 10, &c. Peter followed Jesus afar off, into the house of Caiaphas; where the soldiers and servants having a fire in the middle of the hall, Peter stood among them to warm himself; when a maid-servant said, surely this man was with Jesus of Nazareth! Peter answered, I know not what you say; I do not so much as know the man. A little while after another maid said, This man was with Jesus of Nazareth!! But Peter denied it with an oath. About an hour after, one of the company affirmed, that Peter was a disciple of Jesus. Others insisted on the same thing, and said, that certainly he was one, for his very speech betrayed him to be a Galilean. One of them, a kinsman to Malchus, whose ear Peter had cut off, asked him, Did not I see you with him in the garden? Peter again denied it with an oath, protesting that he did not know the man. And now the cock crowed the second time. Jesus being in the same hall, and not far from Peter, turned and looked on him; Peter remembering that Jesus

Jesus had said to him, Before the cock crowed twice he should deny him thrice, he threw himself out of Caiaphas's house, and wept bitterly, Matth. xxvi. 73, 75. Mark xiv. 30, 72.

Very probably he remained in secret, and in tears, all the time of our Saviour's passion, Friday and Saturday, but on Sunday morning Jesus being risen, and Mary having been at the tomb, and not finding the body of Jesus, she ran into the city, to tell Peter and John that their master was taken away. Peter and John ran to the sepulchre; John coming first, did not enter it; but Peter coming, stooped down, and saw the linen cloths wherein the body had been wrapped.— They returned to Jerusalem, not understanding what had come to pass. The same day our Saviour appeared to Peter to comfort him. Vide John xx. Luke xxiv. 12, 34, &c. Mark xvi. 7. Chrysost. in 1 Cor. xv. 5. Hom. 38.

Some days after, Peter being returned into Galilee, and going to fish in the sea of Galilee (or lake of Gennesareth) with some others of the apostles, Jesus appeared to them on the shore. John said to Peter, it is the Lord. Peter immediately swimming to shore came to Jesus; and Jesus dined with them. After dinner Jesus said to Peter; Simon, son of Jona, do you love me more than these? He answered, yea, Lord, you know that I love you. Jesus says to him, then feed my sheep. He put the same question to him again, and Peter making the same answer, our Lord said to him again, Feed my lambs.— This he repeated a third time, at which Peter being mortified, said, You know, Lord, that I love you. Jesus replied to him, "Feed my sheep. I tell you for a truth, that when you were young, you girded yourself and went where you pleased; but now you are old another shall gird you, and lead you where you would not go." At the same time Peter seeing John the Evangelist following, said, Lord, what must become of him? Jesus answered, "If I will have him continue, what does that concern you? Do you follow me." Thus, though he forewarned Peter, yet he refused to declare, in what manner John should end his life.

After Jesus Christ had ascended into heaven, and the apostles had seen his ascension, they returned to Jerusalem, to wait for the Holy Ghost. During this interval, Peter proposed to fill up the place vacant by the treachery of Judas. This was agreed to, and the lot fell on Matthias.

The tenth day after the ascension of our Saviour, the Holy Ghost having descended on the apostles, and faithful, and having filled them with supernatural gifts, and especially with the gift of tongues, there being then at Jerusalem Jews from all the east; none could comprehend by what means these people, who were Galileans, should speak such variety of languages. Some said, the apostles were full of wine: but Peter in their defence, stated that, this was not the effect of drunkenness, but the completion of the promise, Joel ii. 28. to send the Holy Spirit on all flesh, &c. Vide PENTECOST.

Some days after, Peter and John going to the temple at the hour of prayers, found at the gate of the temple a man of more than forty years of age, who from his birth had been a cripple, and could not walk. Peter healed him, and on this occasion preached Jesus to the people.

While he was speaking, the priests and Sadducees laid hold on Peter and John, and put them in prison. The day following, the senate, the magistrates, and the chief priests being assembled, they asked the two apostles, in whose name they had performed the miracle of healing the lame man? Peter answered them, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom they had crucified, and whom God had raised again, &c. The council strictly charged them to teach no more in this name: but Peter and John told them, judge yourselves which is most just, whether to obey you or to obey God.

Many of the faithful sold their estates, and brought the money, and laid it at the feet of the apostles. Of this number was Ananias, with his wife Sapphira, who, by agreement between themselves, concealed part of the money for which they had sold their land, and brought the rest, as if it were the whole. Ananias came first, and Peter said to him, How could you suffer Satan to seduce you, to lie to the Holy Ghost, by concealing part of the price of your land? &c. Immediately, Ananias fell down dead, and was carried out and prepared for burial. About three hours afterwards his wife Sapphira came in, and Peter said to her the same he had said to her husband; immediately, she also fell down, and gave up the ghost: which infused a great awe into all who heard of it. Vide ANANIAS.

The number of believers increased daily; the people even brought their sick into the streets, that the shadow of Peter might fall on some of them. Again the high-priest and the Pharisees put the apostles into prison. But an angel brought them forth, and bid them go into the temple, and boldly declare the words of life.— This they did; whereupon the princes and priests apprehended them, and demanded why they had disobeyed their orders? by continuing to speak in the name of Jesus Christ. Peter and the apostles answered, that it was more necessary to obey God than man. This answer provoked them, and they inclined to condemn them to death; when Gamaliel suspended their resolution, by representing, that if this matter were from God, it was in vain to oppose it; but if otherwise, it would soon vanish of itself. So they dismissed the apostles, after giving each of them thirty-nine stripes.

After the martyrdom of Stephen, the apostles alone continued at Jerusalem; Philip, the deacon, going to Samaria, the Samaritans received the word of the Lord, and several were baptized. Peter and John repaired thither also, to impart the Holy Ghost; which Philip had not power to do. Simon the magician was also baptized among others; and admiring the power of the apostles, in conferring the Holy Ghost, he offered money for it to Peter. But Peter with indignation replied to him, Thy money and thyself perish together, who thinkest the gifts of God can be bought with money! Acts viii.

St. Peter departing from Jerusalem, visited the disciples from city to city; and came to Lydda. Here he cured Æneas, who had been paralytic eight years. A certain holy woman of Joppa named Tabitha, happening to die while Peter was at Lydda, the disciples sent for him; and the apostle happily restored her to life. Peter staid at Joppa a good while, lodging with one Simon, a tanner. Acts ix. 36, &c.

At Cæsarea of Palestine resided a centurion called Cornelius, a man who feared God: he was directed by an angel, to send to Joppa for Peter, from whom to receive instruction; and Cornelius immediately sent two of his servants. While they were on the road, Peter being on the terrace of his host Simon's house, in an extacy, saw, as it were, a great sheet of linen let down from heaven, full of animals clean and unclean. He heard a voice, saying, Arise Peter, kill and eat. But Peter answered, Lord, I have never eaten any thing unclean. The voice replied, Call not that unclean, which God has purified. This vision was repeated a third time, after which the sheet was again taken up into heaven. The men sent by Cornelius, arrived, and conversed with Peter, who, the day following, went with them, and also some of the brethren from Joppa. Acts x.

He found Cornelius with his kindred and friends waiting for him. When Cornelius first saw him, he fell at his feet: But Peter lifting him up, said, I am but a man, as well as you.—Cornelius related what had happened: and Peter giving thanks to God, began to preach Jesus Christ. While he was speaking, the Holy Ghost descended on all who heard him. Then Peter said, can any one refuse baptism to those who have already received the Holy Ghost, as well as ourselves?

When St. Peter was returned to Jerusalem, the faithful of the circumcision said to him, Why have you gone unto those that are not circumcised? but when Peter had related to them the whole, they glorified God.

It is thought Peter went to Antioch soon after this, where he founded a Christian church. A. D. 36. (Vide Euseb. Chronic. Leo, Serm. 80. Hieronym. in Galat. xi. et de Viris illust. c. 1. Chrysost. t. 5. Homil. 12.) St. Chrysostom says, he continued there a long while; it is believed seven years; not constantly, but at intervals.—For during this time he visited Jerusalem, Asia Minor, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Pontus, as is concluded from the epistle he afterwards addressed to the faithful of those provinces. From thence, say some, he went to Rome, A. D. 42, the second year of Claudius, about twenty-five years before his martyrdom; which time the church of Rome generally allows to the bishopric of Peter. It is thought that at his leaving Antioch, he fixed Ignatius in his place. It is said, (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 17. Hieronym. de Viris illust.) that at Rome he contracted an acquaintance with Philo, the Alexandrian Jew. See PHILO. It is thought also, that the chief occasion of his journey was to oppose Simon Magus, who by his deceits had perverted many, and was adored almost as a God. The presence and miracles of Peter, abated or ruined the reputation of the impostor, Simon, says Eusebius, lib. ii. cap. 14, Cyril, Catech. 6. Justin, Apolog. 1, 2. If at this time St. Peter did not continue long enough at Rome, to undeceive those seduced by Simon, yet he did it effectually afterwards, as we shall see in its proper place.

Peter being come to Jerusalem, at the passover, A. D. 44. Herod Agrippa began a persecution against the church, Acts xii. He slew James the Greater, brother of John, and caused Peter to be apprehended, designing to put him to death after the passover. But the very night before Herod thought of executing him, as Peter, loaded with chains, was sleeping between two soldiers, the angel of the Lord awoke him, opened the prison, and brought him the length of a street. He came to the house of Mary the mother of John, where many of the faithful were assembled at prayer, on his behalf.

He left Jerusalem, but we are not told what became of him, till the council at Jerusalem, A. D. 51. Possibly before this time he made his second journey to Rome, whence he wrote his first epistle, about A. D. 50. It is dated from Babylon, i. e. Rome, as the ancients explained it [and as the church of Rome affirms. But comp. BABYLON, III. and ILLUSTRATIONS of SCRIPTURE JOURNIES.]

Peter was obliged to leave Rome by that order

der of the emperor Claudius, which banished all Jews, because of the tumults they continually raised there, excited by one Chrestus, as Suetonius says, lib. v. cap. 25, meaning, probably, Christ. He returned into Judea, and was at the council of Jerusalem, in which, after a strict examination, the council came to this conclusion, which Peter promoted, That no new obligation should be imposed on the Gentiles; but only abstinence from fornication, from eating blood, and from meats offered to idols.

Some time after, Peter coming to Antioch, he ate and drank with the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic distinctions of meats. But, when some converted Jews from Jerusalem arrived, Peter being unwilling to offend them, separated himself from the converted Gentiles. Paul fearing, that this action of Peter, might be interpreted, as if he meant to revoke and annul what he had determined in the council of Jerusalem, withstood him to his face, and expostulated with him; to which Peter submitted, Gal. ii. 11.

The particulars of St. Peter's life are little known, after the council of Jerusalem, A. D. 51. Some time before his death he proposed to write to the faithful who had been converted by him, to remind them of the truths he had taught them, which he did in his second epistle. 2 Pet. i. 14. Athanasius, de Fuga. For some time the canonicalness of this epistle was questioned, because of its difference in style from the former; but at length it was generally received.

The apostles Peter and Paul came to Rome about A. D. 65, where they performed many miracles, and made many converts. Simon Magus, by his tricks, it is said, continued to deceive the people, pretending to be the Messiah, and even, say some, attempting to ascend into the air by his demons, in a fiery chariot. Peter and Paul betook themselves to their prayers; when the impostor, being forsaken of his demons, fell down upon the ground; and having broken his legs, he was carried to Brunda, where, through rage and shame, he threw himself headlong from the top of his house. This Brunda was probably in Rome, for several of the ancients expressly affirm, that he died at Rome. St. Ambrose Serm. 68. relates, that the Pagans being provoked against Peter, because of what had happened to Simon Magus, sought to kill him, and that the believers urged him to quit Rome, to avoid their fury. He was got already to the gates of Rome, when he saw Jesus Christ coming in at the same gate. Peter said to him Lord, whither are you going? to which our Saviour answered, I am coming to Rome to be crucified over again. St. Peter understood by these words, that our Lord would have him stay there, and glorify him by his death. He returned, and related this to the faithful. He was taken and put into prison, where, it is said, he continued nine months. He was crucified at Rome, in the Via Ostia, A. D. 66. June 29, (on the same day and in the same place where St. Paul was beheaded) with his head downwards, as he had desired of his executioners. Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 1, Hist. Eccl. Prudent. p. 144. Aster. p. 148. Chrysost. in Genes. Homil. 66. &c. This he did out of a sense of humility, for fear it should be thought, he affected the glory of Jesus Christ, as St. Ambrose says, in Psal. cxviii. Aug. Serm. 203.

Gregory the Great, lib. iii. ep. 30. says, the body of St. Peter was first buried in the Catacombs, two miles from Rome, whence it was afterwards transported to the Vatican, where it has lain ever since. He held the primacy of Rome about 24 or 25 years. His age might be about 74 or 75 years. It is generally agreed, that Linus was his successor. See LINUS.

This is the portraiture that Nicephorus, lib. ii. cap. 37. gives of St. Peter, which he probably took from some ancient picture of this apostle. "He was not fat, but pretty tall and upright, having a fair and palish countenance. The hair of his head and beard was thick, frizzled, and not long. His eyes were black, and blood-shot, his eye-brows protuberant and lofty, his nose something long, and rather flat than sharp."

The Ebionites imputed several of their superstitions to him, and these forgeries they inserted in a book intitled, The Voyages of St. Peter, which they ascribed to St. Clement. He has been made also the author of several books, Eusebius, lib. iii. cap. 3. Hist. Eccl. Hieronym. de Viris illust. cap. 1. mentions his Acts, his Gospel, his Revelation, a work about Preaching, and another about Judgment. We have still a large history of St. Peter, called the Recognitions, imputed to St. Clement. Clemens of Alexandria in his Hypotyposes, cites the Revelation of St. Peter. They read this false Revelation in some churches of Palestine, on Good Friday, in the fifth century. Origen rejects the book of St. Peter's Preaching; but Clemens Alexandrinus often quotes it. The Nazarene heretics used St. Peter's gospel. Origen relates something from it. The Orientals ascribe some liturgies to him, but without reason. Vide Baronius, and de Tillemont, tom. 1. Hist. Eccl. St. Peter, art. 39, 40. Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T.

We have already observed, that St. Peter was a married man. But the Fathers inform us, that after his call to the apostleship he renounced the use of marriage, and regarded his wife only as his sister. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. vii. Chrysost. de Virgin. cap. 82. Some have concluded that the the wife of St. Peter, (as those of the other apostles that were married,) followed her husband, and assisted him in preaching the gospel, according to her abilities, visiting and instructing those of her own sex. Vide S. Arit. tom. 1. Miscel. Baluz. p. 357.

We are assured, by Clem. Alex. Str. lib. vii. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 30. that Peter's wife suffered martyrdom. This apostle seeing her led to death, cried out to her, with great resolution, Wife, remember the Lord. It is said, also, that he had a daughter named Petronilla, or Petrina, whose name is in some martyrologies May 31. Clemens Alexandrinus, Str. p. 445. and Epiphanius, Heres. 30. cap. 22. acknowledge that St. Peter had children, and St. Austin, in Adimant. cap. 17. mentions a daughter of this apostle. The Acts of Nereus and Achilleus relate several things concerning her. Vide the Bollandists, May 31.

PETHAHIAH, פתחיה, Phathia, gate of the Lord, or to whom the Lord opens; from פתח pathach, to open; or gate; and יה jah, the Lord. Head of the nineteenth family of priests, 1 Chr. xxiv. 16.

PETHOR, a city of Mesopotamia, of which Balaam was native. The Hebrew, Numb. xxii. 5. calls this city פתורה, Pethura: Ptolemy calls it Pachora, and Eusebius, Phathura. He places it in the upper Mesopotamia. We think it to be towards Thapsacus, beyond the Euphrates. Jerom in his translation has omitted this name. He has only, "To Balaam who dwelt on the river of the Ammonites." The LXX. have, "To Balaam Son of Beor Pathura, who dwells on the river of the country of his people." Certain it is, that Balaam was of Mesopotamia. Deut. xxiii. 4. Comp. PATHROS ad fin.

[PETHOR, the city of the interpretation of dreams, as is gathered from the roots of the words, Gen. xl. 41. as if this city were the seat of those who professed the science of Oneirocritics, as Bonfrere and Grotius supposed. It is called an academy by the Chaldee paraphrast.]

PETHUEL, פתואל, mouth of God; from פת path, a mouth: otherwise, dilation, or persuasion of God; from פתח pathah, to persuade, or from פתח pathach, to dilate, and אל el, God.

PETHUEL, or PHATUEL, father of the prophet Joel. The Hebrews think, that the fathers of prophets were also prophets, when their names are mentioned in Scripture. Joel i. 1.

PETRA, סלע, Πέτρα, Rock; from סלע selah, a stone, or rock.

PETRA, the capital city of Arabia Petraea. It is appropriated to Palestine in the ancient Notitia Ecclesiastica, and was the capital of what was called the Third Palestine. Sometimes Eusebius, and Jerom also, extends Palestine to the Red Sea, to Elath, so that it comprehended Idumea and Arabia Petraea: but it was not so, anciently. The old name of Petra, they say, was סלע, Rekem, or as Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 4, 7. and Eusebius read it, Arke, or Arkeme, or Arkem. Josephus says, that the city of Rekem takes its name from a king of Midian, called Rekem: mentioned Numb. xxxi. 8. But we nowhere find in Scripture, that Rekem was the name of a city.

In 2 Kings xiv. 7. it is said, Amaziah king of Judah took Selah (the rock, the stone) by war, and called the name of it Joktheel. It is commonly thought this means the city of Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea; but we cannot be certain of it. Amaziah may have taken by storm some rock, (Selah) to which the Idumeans had fled;—and may afterwards have named this rock Joktheel, the obedience of the Lord.

Petra, in Greek, signifies a Rock, and was probably given to this city because of its situation on a rock, or because it was encompassed by rocks, or because, as they say, the greater part of the houses were dug in the rock. It is called also by the ancients Agra, or Hagar, whence comes the name of Agarenians. But neither can those names be found in Scripture; so that unless it be meant 2 Kings xiv. 7. and Isaiah xvi. 1. xlii. 11. under the name of Selah, or Rock, I do not see that it is mentioned in Scripture.

Strabo says, lib. xvi. that Petra was the capital of the Nabatheans, that the Mineans and the Gerreans brought their perfumes thither for sale; that the city was situate in a plain full of gardens, and watered with fountains, but all encompassed by rocks. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 28. speaks of it almost in the same terms. This description is very different from that by the geographer of Nubia, who says, that most of the houses of Petra were dug in the rock; and Herodian gives a description of the capital of the Agarenians, as standing on the point of a very high mountain. This author calls it Atra. Dion does not name it, but in the manner he speaks of it, it must be situated upon a steep rock, in a very dry and barren country. Lib. lxviii.—Trajan besieged it, and though he had made a breach, yet he was forced to raise the siege. It appears, that the city he mentions was in Mesopotamia, and therefore must be very different from the city of which we are now treating.

Some geographers think, that there were more than one Petra. St. Athanasius distinguishes two, one in Palestine, and the other in Arabia, Epistola ad Monachos, p. 635. Vide Reland, Palest. lib. iii. p. 927, 928. He calls Arius or Macarius Macarius bishop of Petra, in Palestine; and Asterius, bishop of Petra, in Arabia. The paraphrasts Jonathan and Onkelos distinguish Rekem and Petra as different cities. Josephus speaks of Petra, in the country of the Amalekites, i. e. Rekem or Petra, near to which Aaron died; and he confounds it with Petra, in the land of the Midianites, which took its name from king Rekem. Lastly, I am of opinion, that we should distinguish Petra or Selah, in Moab, or eastern Idumæa, mentioned, Isaiah xvi. 1. xlii. 11. 2 Kings xiv. 7. which was afterwards called Joktheel, from the other Petra, called Rekem, in south Idumæa, or in Arabia Petraea, or in the country of the Amalekites.

As to the situation of this last city, it will be difficult enough to determine it. Strabo, lib. xvi. places it three or four days' journey from Jericho, and five days' journey from the forest of palm-trees, on the Red-Sea. Phny, lib. vi. cap. 28. places it 600 miles from Gaza, and 125 from the Persian Gulph. But Cellarius and Reland think that the numbers have been changed, that we ought to read 125 miles from Gaza, and 600 from the Persian Gulph. Eusebius places Theman, five miles from Petra, Carcaria a day's journey from it, Beeroth Bene-jaakan at ten miles west, and Elath at ten miles east.

It is thought that the city of Krak, or Karak, lying on the confines of Arabia and Syria, inclining toward the south, is the ancient Petra, in Arabia, formerly its metropolis, in Ptolemy called Charat-Moab, or Charat-Moba; in Stephens, Mobu-charas; and perhaps Caraca, 2 Macc. xii. 17. and Carcar, Judg. xi. 3. Carach or Crat, signifies a fortress, in Chaldee and Syriac. It is known to our historians by the name of Crak of Montreal. It was long in the possession of the Christians, in the time of the Holy War; but at last Saladin took it, A. D. 1188. The Aiubites, his successors, enjoyed it till they were driven from thence by the Mamalukes.—D'Herbelot thinks, that the name Krak was given it from that of Arak, as it was called by the Jews.

[See the MAP, ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE HISTORIES: also MAP of the TRAVELS of ISRAEL in the WILDERNESS, where Petra is marked Wady Mousa; also, FRAGMENTS.]

Since that time it has obtained the name of Hag, or Hagiar, which signifies a stone or rock. It stands in the province of Hegiaz, and is distant from Jemamah a journey of twenty-four hours. The city of Agr, or Hagiar, has given its name to a country between Syria and Arabia, which we call Arabia Petraea, where the people of Saleh, i. e. the Themudites, inhabited formerly. There are still seen in this country, as the Mussulmen affirm, the rocks and caves where they hid themselves, from the anger of God, with which they were threatened by the prophet Saleh. Here are also seen the graves of those who were killed fighting against the false prophet Museilemah, who pretended to do in Yemen what Mahomet had done in Hegiaz.

Hagiar, by its advantageous situation, became the capital and fortress of the Carmathes, whence those rebels long infested the dominions of the chalifs of Bagdat, and so much harrassed the pilgrims of Mecca, that the pilgrimage was suspended for several years. Abusaid built there a castle called Hagiarah, which his son Aboutaher exceedingly fortified, so that afterwards Hagiar passed for impregnable.

There is another city called also Hagr, or Hagiar, lying farther in Arabia, which belongs to the province of Baharain.

PEULTIAL, פֶּעֻלְתַּי, my works, or my work; from פָּעַל pahal, or pohal, to do, or work, and the pronoun 'i, my. Of the race of the Levites, the eighth in order of the porters of the temple, 1 Chron. xxvi. 5.

PHALLU, פָּלוּ, admirable, or hidden; from פָּלָה phala. Second son of Reuben, and father of Eliab. Head of a family, Gen. xvi. 9. Num. xxvi. 5.

PHALTI, פָּלְטִי, deliverance, or flight; from פָּלַט palat. Son of Laish. He married Michal, Saul's daughter, after Saul had taken her from David; but David afterwards recovered her. 1 Sam. xxv. 44. 2 Sam. iii. 15. See MICHAL.

PHANNIAS, or PHANASUS, son of Samuel, of the priests, a native of the town of Aphtasi, Josephus, de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 5. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8. says, He was a brutish and ignorant person, not only unworthy of the high-priesthood, but did not so much as know, as he ought, what this office was. After the faction had made themselves masters of the temple, they usurped the power of setting up and deposing the high-priests. Matthias, the son of Theophilus, was then in possession of this dignity. They pretended to appoint him a successor, and because that formerly, according to their notions, the high-priesthood had been given by lot, they proceeded to cast lots on the sacerdotal family of Eniakim, (probably the same as Jakim, 1 Chron. xxiv. 12, the twelfth of the sacerdotal families) and the lot fell on Phannias, about A. D. 68. Under his pontificate the temple was destroyed by the Romans, A. D. 70.

PHANUEL, פָּנוּאֵל, face, or vision of God; from פָּנָה pana, to see, and אֵל el, God. Father of the holy widow and prophetess Anna, Luke ii. 36, &c.

[PHARA, or PHARATHONI, fruit-bearing, or or making fruitful; otherwise, increasing, or a cow. 1 Macc. ix. 50. Perhaps this term signifies a palm branch, or spread of leaves: frons.]

PHARAOH, פֶּרַעַח that disperses, that spoils, that discovers; from פֶּרַע parah: according to the Syriac, the revenger, the destroyer, the king, the crocodile.

PHARAOH, a name common to the kings of Egypt. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. that all the kings of Egypt, from Minæus, the founder of Memphis, who lived several ages before Abraham, had the name of Pharaoh, to the time of Solomon; more than three thousand three hundred years. He adds, that in the Egyptian language, the word Pharaoh signifies king, and that these princes did not assume this name, till they ascended the throne; when they quitted their former name. Hence, says Josephus, Herodotus names none of the kings of Egypt after Minæus, the builder of Memphis, though three hundred and thirty kings were his successors, because they had the name of Pharaoh; but he names an Egyptian queen, Nicaule, who succeeded them. I find, adds Josephus, from the ancient records of our nation, that after the age of Solomon no king of Egypt had the name of Pharaoh.

But Josephus is not very accurate in this passage. True it is, Herodotus says, lib. ii. cap. 4, 99, 100. that Mines or Minæus was the first king of Egypt, and founder of Memphis; that there were three hundred and thirty kings after him in Egypt; that after them was a queen called Nitocris, (not Nicaule, as Josephus writes it) but it is not true that these kings had no other name than Pharaoh. Herodotus says expressly, that in the books of the Egyptian priests were registered the names of three hundred and thirty kings; that in this number eighteen were Ethiopians; also, a woman who was a foreigner, called Nitocris; and that the others were Egyptians: these princes therefore had each his proper name in this catalogue. So we see in the Fragments of Manetho, that each king of Egypt had a name peculiar to him; and we find the name Pharaoh only in Scripture.

What Josephus says, that after the time of Solomon, the kings of Egypt had no longer the name of Pharaoh, is manifestly false, since we find this name under Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 21. under Josiah, chap. xxiii. 29, 30, &c. where this name is joined to Necho, which was the proper name of this prince; under Jehoiakim, ch. xxiii. 35. and in the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; who are much later than Solomon. It is very probable, that the Egyptians gave the name Pharaoh to their kings, as long as the Egyptian language was in common use; and as long as their kings were of their own nation.— But, after the conquest of Egypt by the Persians, and especially by Alexander the Great, when the Greeks introduced their language, with their government, the name of Pharaoh ceased among them. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXXIII.

Bochart, de Animal. P. 2. lib. v. cap. 17. thinks that Pharaoh properly signifies the crocodile, and that Ezekiel, xxix. 3. alludes to this, when he says, “Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers.” Le Clerc, in Gen. xii. 15. thought he found the true root of the word Pharaoh, in the Arabic verb Pharah, to be exalted, to be superior. Abbé Renaudot, Dissert. de lingua Coptica. p. 127. says, that Pharaoh is the same as the Egyptian word Pouro, which signifies a king. F. Kircher, Œdip. Egypt. lib. i. cap. 76. derives Pharaoh from the root Pharah, which sometimes signifies to deliver; and he would have Pharaoh to signify one who is exempted from the jurisdiction of the laws.

The first Pharaoh known to us, is he, in whose time Abraham went down into Egypt, Gen. xii. 10, &c. A. M. 2084, ante A. D. 1919, whose officers took Sarah into that prince’s harem; from which she was not recovered without divine interference. The character of this Pharaoh seems to have been but indifferent. Vide ABRAHAM III.

The proper name of this king of Egypt is unknown: but it may be seen from his history, that he feared God in some degree; and that the true religion was not entirely suppressed in Egypt.

The second Pharaoh noticed in Scripture, reigned in Egypt in the time of Joseph, when he was sold thither by the Ishmaelish merchants. This prince, or perhaps his successor, had the mysterious dream of seven fat kine, and seven full ears of corn, consumed by seven lean kine, and seven barren ears; and he promoted Joseph to be regent of the whole kingdom, Gen. xlv. 8, 9. This is the same Pharaoh who sent for and entertained the patriarch Jacob, and his family in Egypt.

The third Pharaoh, is he that persecuted the Israelites. Moses tells us he was a new king, and had no knowledge of Joseph. He oppressed Israel; and directed the destruction of their children. His daughter preserved Moses, and adopted him. Moses being grown up, and having killed an Egyptian, who had abused a Hebrew, was obliged to fly from Egypt, to avoid the anger of this Pharaoh.

There is the strongest probability, that the Pharaoh before whom Moses appeared, and in whose sight he smote Egypt with plagues, was a different different person, a successor of the former. This Pharaoh being at last compelled to send the Hebrews out of Egypt, repented of the leave he had given, and pursued them with his army of chariots: but he was drowned in the Red Sea. Some historians pretend to give us the name of this Pharaoh; some, as Appion, call him Amosis, or Amasis; Eusebius calls him Chenchris: Usher calls him Amenophis. Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria relates, that the Oriental Christians gave him the name of Amious.

The fifth Pharaoh known in Scripture, gave protection to Hadad, son of the king of Edom, 1 Kings xi. 15, 16, 17, 18, about A. M. 2960. and gave him to wife a sister of his own queen, enriched him with lands, and brought up his son Genubah in his own court.

The sixth Pharaoh is he who gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, king of the Hebrews; 1 Kings iii. 1. ix. 10.

The seventh Pharaoh is Shishak, who protected Jeroboam, and afforded him a refuge against king Solomon his master. Shishak declared war against Rehoboam, son and successor of Solomon, besieged and took Jerusalem, carried away all the king's treasures, and those of the house of God, 1 Kings xiv. 25. 2 Chron. xii. A. M. 3033. The Chronicles inform us, that the army of Shishak consisted of twelve hundred chariots, sixty thousand horse, and an infinite number of infantry, composed of Libyans, Troglodytes, and Ethiopians; besides native Egyptians; which gives a grand idea of the power and magnificence of Shishak.

The eighth Pharaoh is he with whom Hezekiah made a league against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, A. M. 3290. Vide SENNACHERIB and HEZEKIAH. This Pharaoh is probably the same whom Herodotus, lib. ii. names Sethon, priest of Vulcan, who came to meet Sennacherib before Pelusium, and to whose assistance Vulcan sent an army of rats, which gnawed the bow-strings, and the thongs of the bucklers, of Sennacherib's soldiers.

The ninth is Pharaoh-Necho, or Nechos, son of Psammitichus, who subdued Josiah. Herodotus also mentions this prince. See NECHO.

The tenth is Pharaoh-Hophrah, who confederated with Hezekiah, king of Judah, and attempted to assist him against Nebuchadnezzar, king of Chaldea. Against this Pharaoh, Ezekiel pronounced several prophecies, Ezek. xxix. xxx. xxxi. xxxii. He is called Apries in Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 161. He is also mentioned by the prophets Habakkuk ii. 15, 16. Isaiah xix. xx. Jeremiah xlv. 17.

This is pretty nearly what the Scriptures contain, concerning the Pharaohs, the ancient kings of Egypt.

Those who would enter more deeply into this affair, may consult the Chronicon of Eusebius as given by Scaliger, and the Chronicon of Georgius Syncellus, Sir Robert Marsham's Canon Chronicus Egyptiacus, &c.

PHARATHONI, or PHARA, a city of Ephraim, 1 Macc. ix. 50. The Greek calls it Pharaton, or Pirathon, which is its name, Judg. xii. ult.

PHAREZ, פָּרֶז, horseman, or rider: otherwise, that divides, that exposes, or that declares: from פָּרַשׁ parash, or paras, according to different readings. Son of Machir, 1 Chron. vii. 16.

PHAREZ, פָּרַץ, division, rupture; that breaks forth violently. Son of Judah and Tamar. Tamar being just ready to lye-in, found herself with child of twins. Vide the history, Gen. xxxviii. 27, 28, &c. The year of the birth of these twins is not noticed in Scripture. The sons of Pharez were Hesron and Hamul. Numb. xxvi. 20, 21.

PHARISEES, Φαρισαῖοι, separated; from פָּרַשׁ separated, or divided. [separatists?]

PHARISEES. The sect of the Pharisees was one of the most ancient and most considerable among the Jews; its origin is not very well known. Maccabees 4th, chap. vi. says, that in the time of John Hircanus, the high-priest, there were three sects among the Jews, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes. Josephus, after mentioning the letter of Jonathan to the Lacedemonians, speaks of these three sects; which letter was written A. M. 3680, Jonathan died the year following. Simon succeeded him, and governed eight years. After Simon succeeded Hircanus, who governed twenty-nine years. So that we may place the rise of the sect of the Pharisees about A. M. 3820, ante A. D. 184.

Jerom, in Isaiah viii. places the beginning of the Pharisees pretty late; for he says, the Scribes and Pharisees proceeded from the division of the two famous schools of Hillel and Shammai. It is known from Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 17. that Shammai, or Samæas, lived in the time of Herod the Great; consequently, not long before our Saviour. The Rabbins also acknowledge Hillel as founder of the sect of the Pharisees, or at least, as the chief ornament of it. But we make no doubt that it was more ancient; and in credit long before Herod; under Hircanus, Alexander Jannæus, and Salome his wife.

The Pharisees take their name from a Hebrew word, which signifies division or separation, because they distinguished themselves by a more strict manner of life. They imputed much to destiny, or fate, and to the decrees of God, which appointed all things before time was. Josephus, himself a Pharisee, tells us, in Vita sua, initio, et Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 9. that the opinions of this sect nearly approached those of the Stoicks; who did not ascribe every thing to destiny, but left to men a liberty of doing good actions or not. He adds, that they were much addicted to astrology; thinking, that by means of the stars, they might arrive at a fore-knowledge of the secrets of Providence.

The sect of the Pharisees was very numerous and extensive. The reputation they gained by their learning, and by the regularity of their lives, rendered them early formidable, even to kings.—Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, was during his whole life at variance with the Pharisees, and often had occasion to repent it. At his death he advised his wife, if she would reign peaceably, to win the Pharisees to her interest. She followed his advice, and the Pharisees taking the opportunity, made themselves masters of the government. See ALEXANDRA.

When our Saviour Jesus Christ appeared in Judea, the Pharisees were in great credit among the people, because of the reputation of their learning, sanctity, and exact observance of the law. They fasted often, made long prayers, paid tithes scrupulously, distributed much alms: but all was vitiated by pride, ostentation, hypocrisy, and self-love. They wore large rolls of parchment on their foreheads, and wrists, on which were very legibly written certain words of the law; they affected to have fringes and borders at the corners and hems of their garments, broader than those of other Jews, as a badge of distinction, and as denoting them to be greater observers of the law than others.

Epiphanius, Hæres. 16. relates surprising effects of the great austerities of the Pharisees.—Some almost deprived themselves of sleep.—Others slept on a plank a foot broad, that if they should sleep too soundly, they might fall on the ground, and being awakened, might go to prayers. Others laid on sharp and uneven stones; others on thorns: so that even in sleep they might practise mortification.

Some of them, Jerom says, on Matth. xxiii. 27. fixed thorns to the bottom of their robes, which as they walked might prick their legs, and draw blood from them; that they might make mortification familiar, and be continually obliged to think on God. They often washed their hands, and affected great external purity, never entering their houses, or sitting down to table, without washing. When they had been in the streets, or in the market, for fear they should have touched any unclean person, they washed from their fingers ends up to their very elbows, Mark vii. 4. They would not so much as touch a publican, or any man who they thought led an ill life; nor would they eat, drink, or pray with him, Matth. ix. 11. Luke vii. 39. All the vessels they used, their utensils, and dining tables, were carefully washed: and they often bathed themselves in cold water, by way of purification; Joseph. in Vita sua.

They kept many fasts of supererogation. The Pharisee, Luke xviii. 12. boasts of his fasting twice a week, i. e. Monday and Thursday, according to Epiphanius, Hæres. 16. and they did it with greater strictness than other Jews. Vide Matth. vi. 16. The Pharisees upbraided our Saviour and his disciples, for eating and drinking as other men, whereas they and the disciples of John the Baptist fasted often, Mark ii. 18. And Josephus gives an account, that being young, he put himself under the conduct of one Banneus, a very austere man, who ate nothing that was dressed or prepared, but contented himself with what the earth produced of itself.

In matters of religion, the traditions of the ancients were their chief studies; to these they made additions as they thought fit; imposing their own opinions as traditions of the ancients. By this means they over-burthened the law with a vast number of trifling observances, both useless and disgusting, which made it a heavy and insupportable yoke. They had even altered and corrupted it, in important articles, by perverse interpretations: as our Saviour reproaches them, Mark vii. 10, 11, 12.

The observance of the sabbath was another point they had refined upon, and our Saviour had strong debates with them on this. They maintained, that on this day, it was not allowed so much as to heal a sick person, though Christ did it by a word speaking, Luke vi. 7. John ix. 16. They found fault, that on this day the people brought their sick to be healed. They were scandalized that a man carried home his bed on the sabbath, after he had been cured of a palsy, Mark ix. 11. John, v. 8, 9. From all which they concluded, that Jesus Christ could not be a man sent from God, because he so little observed that profound rest, which they thought due to this day. John ix. 16.

Our Saviour upbraids them with making long prayers, standing in the synagogues, or at the corners of streets; and, under pretence of prayer, consuming widows' houses. He says, they affected to build up the tombs of the old prophets, and openly declared, that they disapproved the actions of their forefathers who persecuted persecuted them; while they themselves were actuated by the same spirit, and opposed all who would reclaim them from their enormities. The followers of this sect condemned only the actual commission of sin, and thought themselves allowed to entertain evil desires, thoughts, and designs, if not attended with outward acts of sin. Thus Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 13. laughs at Polybius, for thinking the gods had punished Antiochus, for having only formed a design to pillage a temple of Diana, though he had not put it in execution.

The Pharisees believed the soul to be immortal, and acknowledged the existence of angels and spirits; they admitted a kind of transmigration of the souls of good men, which might pass from one body to another; whereas those of wicked men were condemned to dwell for ever in prisons of darkness, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. et de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12. In consequence of these principles, some of the Pharisees said, that Jesus Christ was John the Baptist, or Elias; or one of the old prophets; Matth. xvi. 14. i. e. that the soul of one of those great men had passed into the body of our Saviour. They believed also the resurrection of the dead, and admitted all the consequences of it, against the Sadducees, who rejected it. Josephus, who was a Pharisee, believed that the demons that possessed men, were the souls of wicked men, which enter the bodies of others, and are sometimes driven from thence by exorcisms. See Matth. viii. 29, 30, 31.

The sect of the Pharisees was not extinguished by the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem, and by the dispersion of the Jews. The greater part of the present Jews are of this sect, and equally devoted to their traditions, which they call the Oral Law. "He that rejects the oral law is an apostate, and deserves death," say the modern Pharisees, or Rabbinites. Benjamin of Tudela, who lived about the latter end of the twelfth century, says, that in his journey he found Pharisees, who were continually bewailing the desolation of Sion and Jerusalem; who abstained from flesh, and were always clothed in black, fasting every day, except the sabbath, and perpetually praying for the deliverance of Israel.

The opinions of the modern Pharisees are the same as the ancient. They leave every thing to destiny, except what depends on human liberty. They say that all things are in the hand of heaven, except the fear of God, i. e. that in the exercise of acts of piety they have free will, and may voluntarily determine themselves to good or evil. M. Basnage says, they do not differ in this from those in Holland, called Remonstrants. Those of this day are less strict than the ancients as to food, and other austerities of the body; but they come nothing short of them in vanity, and tenacity for the pretended traditions of their fathers. They also hold a kind of metempsychosis, or revolution of souls. The Fathers who have written concerning heresies, have made a heresy of the Pharisees, as if those who made profession of this sect had been separated from the body of the Jews, as among us, heretics are excommunicated and rejected by the Orthodox: but it was not so with the Jewish sects. Whatever abuses and corruptions might prevail among them, whether in manners or opinions, they were united in communion with the other Israelites. The Pharisees and the Sadducees even discharged the chief offices of religion and the state.

[We are so much accustomed to consider the Pharisees as public and leading men in the Jewish government, that we usually overlook the circumstance, that the people also, the mass of the nation, was Pharisee;—i. e. of that party, as contradistinguished from the Sadducees, the Essenes, &c. So St. Paul says, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee," Acts xxiii. 6. but we have no reason to suppose that he, or his family, had ever had any share in the government. He appeals to one of their distinguishing tenets,—“for the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am now called in question.” This was felt by those of this religious sect who were in office; who took this occasion to triumph over their antagonists the Sadducees, by arguing, “if a spiritual existence, whether a pure spirit, or a departed human spirit, have spoken to this man—as he affirms—let us not fight against God.” This was not the first mortification suffered by the Sadducees, on account of Christianity, for we read, Acts iv. that the priests, the captains of the temple, and the Sadducees, [not the Pharisees] imprisoned the apostles, being grieved that they taught, in the recent instance of Jesus, to which they appealed in proof of their doctrine, the resurrection of the dead.” Hence we find Gamaliel, a Pharisee, speaking in behalf of the apostles; but, we never find a Sadducee uttering a syllable in their favour, or shewing them any mercy; and no doubt, it was to a certain degree, favourable to the church at Jerusalem, that the power of the Sadducees was counterbalanced by their fear of the Pharisees.

It will naturally be imagined, that a sect which held the existence of spirits separate from the body, would be best disposed towards the doctrine of a risen Saviour. Accordingly, we find, that the Jewish Christian church was greatly composed of Pharisees, Acts xv. 5. who insisted on the universal necessity of observing the Mosaic institutions, "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved,"—which was another distinguishing tenet of their sect. They would have imposed on the Gentiles the same rituals as they themselves adhered to, being Hebrews. The same spirit animated the body of Jewish believers, long after; "Thou seest, brother, (says James to Paul, Acts xxi. 20,) how many thousands of Jews there are who believe, and they are all zealous of the law," i. e. zealous Pharisees, though Christian believers. Nor was this disposition subdued, till after the destruction of Jerusalem had rendered the observance of the legal ceremonies impossible. The Pharisaic Christians retained the national rites: the bishops of their church were circumcised; and the children were both circumcised and baptized; as they are at this day, where the churches are descendants of ancient Jewish converts. It should seem, from the Talmud, that there were at least seven distinctions, or sects, among the Pharisees, (so St. Paul says "according to the most strict—the strictest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee.") Some were, probably, less severe in their opinions than others.]

PHARPAR, פֶּרְפֶּר, that produces fruits: or the bull of the bull; פָּרָה מִמּוֹ parah, to produce, or from פָּר par, a bull.

[The Samaritan root imports swiftness, rapidity; the Chaldee to roll on, and in the duplicate form to move one's self: the Arabic to flow, hence to be swift, to increase in progress. Radzivil, who saw this river, calls it a rapid stream, Peregr. Hieros. epist. ii. p. 32. the same says Cotovicus, Itin. lib. iii. cap. 11. Simon, however, inclines to derive the name of this river from its fertilizing effects, as divided among the gardens of Damascus, as parah certainly signifies to render fruitful. This name coincides with Farfarus, the name of a river among the Sabines, mentioned by Ovid, Metam. lib. xiv. 330.

— et amænæ Farfarus undæ.

The remains of this name are preserved in the present Barrady: contracted from Parwadi, or Parwar-wadi,—"the river Parpar."]

PHARPAR, a river of Damascus, or rather an arm of the Barrady or Chrysorrhoeas, which waters the city of Damascus and the country about it, 2 Kings v. 12. This river of Damascus has its fountain in the mountains of Libanus.—Near the city it is divided into three streams, one of which passes through Damascus, the other two water the gardens round about; then reuniting, they lose themselves four or five leagues north of the city. See Maundrell's Travels from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

PHARURIM, פָּרוּרִים, Φαραρῖμ, kettle, or caldron: from פָּרַר parar: or suburbs; from פָּרוּר paruar.

PHARURIM. Nathan-melech, eunuch to king Josiah, had his dwelling at Pharurim, near the entrance of the temple. The Chaldee, and most interpreters, think Pharurim signifies the suburbs. We find 1 Chron. xxvi. 18. a place west of the temple, called Parbar. I imagine Pharurim, or Phrurim, is the same as Phrourion in Greek, which signifies a watch or guard.—Nathan-melech had his abode near the body of the guard of the temple.

PHASELIS, Φασηλῖς, passage, or halting of the birth, or of the generation; from פָּסַח pasach, to pass, or to halt, and from יָלַד jalad, to bring forth, to be born. The true etymology of this word is unknown. 1 Macc. xv. 23.

I. PHASAEI, eldest son of Antipater the Idumæan, and brother of Herod the Great. Hircanus the high-priest and prince of the Jews, having committed to Antipater the chief government of the country, he made his eldest son Phasael general of the Jewish army, and governor of Jerusalem and round about. On several occasions Phasael proved his valour and conduct. He beat Felix, who intended to revenge on him the death of Malichus, whom his brother Herod had caused to be slain at Tyre. Some time afterwards the Jews accused the two brothers, Phasael and Herod, to Mark Anthony, as having usurped the whole authority, and left Hircanus only the name of prince. But Herod so well insinuated himself into Anthony's favour, that his enemies were forced to drop their cause.

During the war of Antigonius against Herod, Pacorus, son to the king of the Parthians, entering Judea, resolved to place Antigonius on the throne. He caused Barzaphernes with his troops to enter Galilee, and sent towards Jerusalem one Pacorus, cup-bearer to the king of Persia, with a body of horse. Pacorus advanced with Antigonius to Jerusalem, where they first made themselves masters of the city, and then of the temple. Herod and Phasael, who had sided with Hircanus, having shut themselves up in the royal palace, Pacorus staid in the suburbs with his people. But Antigonius having wished him to come into the city, Phasael went to meet him, and received him into his house. Pacorus pretending a desire to terminate these commotions, advised Phasael to come with him into Galilee, to meet Barzaphernes, and to treat of peace.—Phasael fell into this snare, and followed Pacorus into Galilee; where Barzaphernes at first received him very kindly, making him presents; but afterwards caused him to be apprehended, and and imprisoned. This treachery was so resented by Phasaël that he dashed out his own brains against the walls of his prison. Joseph. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 8. A. M. 3957, ante A. D. 47.

II. PHASAEL, son of Phasaël, who afterwards married Salampso his cousin german, daughter of Herod the Great.

PHASAEL, a square tower built by Herod at Jerusalem, in honour of his brother; it was forty cubits square, and forty in height. Above this height were porticoes, supported by arches; and in the midst of these porticoes rose a second tower, adorned with fine apartments and magnificent busts, having parapets and redoubts above them. The whole height might be about ninety cubits. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 6. See the PLATE, FOUR PLANS of JERUSALEM.

PHASAELIS, a city three leagues from Jordan, in a plain, on the brook Carith. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 16. xvii. 9. that Herod built it in honour of his brother; north of Jericho. He says not that it was built beyond Jordan, as they make travellers believe.

PHASIRON, Φασιρὼν, the song of the mouth; from פֶּה pe, and שִׁיר shir, a song: otherwise, flat, or streight mouth; from יָשָׁר jashar. Smitten with his children. 1 Macc. ix. 66.

PHEBE, Φοίβη, shining, pure; from the Greek φοῖβος.

PHEBE, a deaconess of the church in the eastern port of Corinth, Cenchrea. St. Paul had great esteem for this holy woman. Theodoret, ad Rom. xvi. thinks the apostle lodged at her house for some time, while he continued near Corinth. It is thought she carried to Rome the epistle he wrote to the Romans, wherein she is commended, Rom. xvi. 1, 2. Some moderns have advanced a notion, that Phebe was wife to St. Paul, but none of the ancients have said any thing like it. It is thought in quality of deaconess she was employed by the church in ministrations suitable to her sex and condition; such as, to visit and instruct Christian women, to attend them in sickness, distribute alms to them, &c. The martyrologies mention Phebe September 3.

[It is most likely, from what the Apostle says of Phæbe, that "she had been a succourer of many, and of myself, also," that she was a woman of property; not to say, of distinction. Cenchrea was a port of considerable commerce; and as it is clear, that Phæbe went to Rome on important business, and business in which the faithful at Rome might assist her, it is probable, also, that she was engaged in trade on her own account; something like Lydia of Philippi. That she was much in the confidence of the Apostle, cannot be doubted: and, I think, from the import of the term rendered succourer, (patroness)

she may be taken for the counterpart of the hospitable Gaius, "mine host, (says St. Paul) and the host of the whole church;" Comp. the second and third Epistles of John. A laudable emulation! Gaius at Corinth; and Phæbe at its neighbouring port, Cenchrea.]

PHENICE, Φοινίκη, red, or purple; from the Greek φοινικῆς: otherwise, palm-tree; from φοίνιξ. A port of the island of Crete, to the west. St Paul anchored at Phenice, when he was carried to Rome, Acts xxvii. 12. A. D. 60.

PHENICIA, Φοινίκη. A province of Syria; but, not always of the same extent.— Sometimes its limits have been defined from north to south, from Orthosia to Pelusium, vide Herodot. lib. iv. cap. 39. vii. 89. Strabo, lib. xvi. At other times, its southern boundary was Mount Carmel and Ptolemais. After the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews, its limits were narrow, and excluded the country of the Philistines, on the coast, from Mount Carmel along the Mediterranean, toward Egypt. It had also little extent on the land side, because the Israelites, who occupied Galilee, confined it to the vicinity of the Mediterranean sea.

Thus when we speak of Phenicia, we must obtain a right notion of the time. Before Joshua conquered Palestine, the country was possessed by Canaanites, sons of Ham, divided into eleven families, of which the most powerful was that of Canaan, the founder of Sidon, and head of the Canaanites, properly so called, whom the Greeks named Phanicians. Only these preserved their independence under Joshua; also under David, Solomon, and the succeeding kings: but they were subdued by the kings of Assyria, and Chaldea. Afterwards, they successively obeyed the Persians, Greeks, and Romans. At this day Phenicia is in subjection to the Ottomans, not having had any national or native kings, or any independent form of government, for more than two thousand years: for the kings which the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Grecians sometimes established, were tributary, and possessed but a precarious authority.

The chief cities of Phenicia were Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais, Ecdippe, Sarepta, Beryth, Biblos, Tripoli, Orthosia, Simira, Aradus. The Phenicians also anciently possessed some cities in Libanus. Sometimes the Greek authors comprehend all Judea under the name of Phenicia. In the ancient Notitia Ecclesiastica, they distinguish Phenicia above the sea, and Phenicia of Libanus. The first contained the cities of Tyre, Beryth, Arca, Gegarta, Paneas, Trierii, Sidon, Biblos, Orthosia, Aradus, Gonaiticus Saltus, Ptolemais, Tripoli, Botrys, Antaradus, Politiana. Phenicia of Libanus contained Edessa, Abila, Abila, Justinianopolis, Gonaiticus Saltus, Laodicea, Damascus, Palmyra, Salamina, Heliopolis, the district of Jambrudes, the district of Magludes, the Eastern district. By this may be seen the then great extent of Phenicia.

PHENICIANS. Herodotus says, lib. iv. cap. 104, that the Phenicians inhabited at first a country beside the Red Sea, whence they removed and settled on the Mediterranean, between Syria and Egypt. This may be easily reconciled with Moses, who says they came from Ham, who peopled Egypt and the neighbouring countries. The name Phenicia is not in the books of Hebrew Scripture; but in the Maccabees and the New Testament. The Hebrew always reads Canaan. St. Matthew, who wrote either Hebrew or Syriac, calls the same person a Canaanitish woman, chap. xv. 22, whom St. Mark, writing in Greek, calls a Syro-phenician, or a Phenician of Syria; because Phenicia then made a part of Syria; also, to distinguish the people from the Phenicians of Africa, or the Carthaginians. The name Phenician is derived either from the palm-tree, in Greek Phoinix, which is very common in Phenicia; or from a Tyrian chief called Phœnix, known in fabulous history; or from the Red-Sea, from the shores of which it is presumed this people came. Phœnix sometimes signifies red, whence comes Punicus and Phœniceus color. Others derive it from the Hebrew Pinchas, or Phineas; Bochart from Bene-anak, sons of Anak. The giants, the sons of Anak, were very famous in Palestine. Vide Bochart, Canaan, lib. i. cap. 1.

[It appears from the Pænulus of Plautus, that the Carthaginians, who were a colony from Tyre, called their city by the name of Chaderi Onek, (or Anak) the "chambers" or "abodes of Anak." The Thebans, another colony from the same coast, led by Cadmus, called their goddess Minerva by the name of ONECA; Ογκα: and a gate of their city was called the (Oncaian or) "Onecaian gate." Minerva, indeed, seems to have been a Phenician deity; so Lycophron calls the Trojan Palladium, the Phenician goddess; and Nonnus calls her "Onecaian Athene." Selden, de Diis Syris. p. 274. This seems to be the same appellation in Greek as Anak or Onek in Hebrew. Comp. Numb. xiii. 28. Such is the opinion and reasoning of Bochart.

The name Phenicia, notwithstanding the authority of Bochart, in all probability was not derived from the Hebrew Bene-Anak, as the conformation of the word is repugnant to that derivation.

The name Anak is thought to denote a collar, or ornamental chain, worn about the neck; which might originally refer to the splendid breast-plate, &c. of Minerva: but others think it is used in the sense of tall, portly, gigantic.

Herodotus says, "The Phenicians were seated on the Red Sea, before they came to the Mediterranean, where they addicted themselves to navigation and commerce."

Justin also says, lib. xxi. cap. 3, that "the Tyrians were a people conducted by a chief named Phœnix, which left their native land on account of the earthquakes to which it was subject. They first settled on the Assyrian lake, (sea of Tiberias) afterwards they settled on the shore of the Mediterranean, where they built a city, which from the plenty of fish they named Sidona."

Beside Phenicia on the sea coast, there was a Phenicia interior, or midland: of which Ptolemy says, it contained the cities of Arcé, Paleo-Biblus, Gabala, Cæsarea of Paneas. This account agrees with what we have seen from Justin, who says this people first settled on the lake of Tiberias, north of which are these towns.

It is probable Syro-Phenicia extended still further north. Nicholas Choniates mentions "the Syro-Phenician cities bordering on Antioch."

Many excellent inventions have been ascribed to the Phenicians; particularly the art of writing:

Phœnices primi, famæ si oreditur, auri
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.
LUCAN. lib. iii. v. 22.

It is said also, they discovered the arts of astronomy, voyages in the open sea, extensive navigation, and the commerce consequent on their enterprizes. Dionys. v. 904. Bochart, by incredible labour and industry, has shewn, that they had sent out colonies, and that they have left traces of their language, in almost all the isles, and on all the coasts of the Mediterranean sea. The most famous of their colonies was Carthage. It is thought, that at Joshua's invasion, many of them retired into Africa, and other places on the coast. Procopius says, de Bell. Vandal. lib. ii. cap. 10, that at Tingis in Africa, stood two columns of white marble, near the great fountain, whereon was read in Phenician characters;—"We are the people who took our flight from before the robber Jesus the son of Nave." Vide AFRICA, CANAAN.

[The Phenician letters, medals, and ancient inscriptions, have been much attended to by the learned, since the days of Mr. Swinton, and the Abbé Barthelemy. They are best understood through the medium of the Hebrew language; though they differ entirely in form from the Chaldaic Hebrew; and rather incline to the old Samaritan. They evince, that the language of Canaan,

Canaan, at large, was anciently the same, though varied by dialects; and consequently, that the Hebrew, the Chaldee, and their cognate dialects extended over a great space of country; from the eastern districts of Babylonia to the coasts of the Mediterranean; and by the Phenician colonies, as far west as Britain itself; to which island the Phenicians traded for tin.]

PHÉRORAS, fourth son of Antipater, and brother of Herod the Great. He is not much known in Jewish history, except by his wicked artifices; and the confusion he occasioned in the family of his brother. He was the chief cause of the death of Mariamne, wife of Herod; also of his two sons Alexander and Aristobulus. He refused to marry his niece Salampso, his brother's daughter, because he was in love with a servant maid whom he kept. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 11. However, afterwards he married Cypros, another of his brother's daughters: and he joined in the conspiracy of Antipater against Herod. He withdrew from Jerusalem to beyond Jordan, and resolved never more to see his brother. He kept his word, and would not come to Jerusalem, though sent for by Herod, when ill of a dangerous sickness. But Herod did not do the same by him; for in Pheroras's last sickness he went to see him, and shewed him all the tokens of brotherly affection. Pheroras being about to die, caused a box of poison to be burnt, which Antipater had provided, and which was intended for Herod. Herod made a magnificent funeral for Pheroras, and knew not till after his death, the secret measures concerted between Pheroras and Antipater, to poison him. This discovery was the beginning of Antipater's misfortunes, says Josephus, loco citato. A. M. 3999, ante A. D. 4.

PHIALE, a famous mountain or lake, at the foot of mount Hermon, whence the Jordan derives its stream. The Greek name Phiale was given it, from its resemblance to a great bason. Josephus relates, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 18. that, a hundred and twenty furlongs from Cesarea Philippi, on the road leading to Trachonitis, the lake Phiale may be seen perfectly round like a wheel, in which the water is always up to the brim, neither increasing nor diminishing. It was unknown which was the source of the Jordan, until Philip, Tetrarch of Galilee, threw chaff and straw into the lake, which found a passage through the subterraneous channels to Pannium, from whence it was usually thought Jordan had its source. See MAGEDAN or DALMANUTHA. The name Phiale has been given to several other lakes or reservoirs of water. Re-land, Palest. lib. i. cap. 41. See PANEAS.

PHICHOL, כָּל־פֶּה, the mouth of all, or every tongue; from פֶּה pe, a mouth, tongue, or word, and כָּל calal, all: otherwise, perfection, or completing of the mouth; from pe, a mouth, and כָּל calah, to complete. General of the army of Abimelech king of Gerar. See ABRAHAM, ABIMELECH. Gen. xxi. 22.

PHILADELPHIA, Φιλαδέλφια, love of a brother, or of fraternity; from φίλος, a friend, [lover] and ἀδελφός, a brother.

PHILADELPHIA, a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor. When St. John the Evangelist wrote his Revelations, the angel of the church here was a very holy man. Rev. iii. 7. It is unknown who this bishop of Philadelphia was: Aureolus and De Lyra think it was St. Quadratus, a disciple of the apostles, who presented an apology to the emperor Adrian. The Greeks in their office give him the name of an apostle; and Eusebius, Ilist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 37. calls him an evangelist, because he had devoted himself to go from province to province to preach the gospel. But none of the ancients say, that Quadratus was bishop of Philadelphia.

[PHILADELPHIA, was so called from Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It is situated east of Sardis about twenty-eight miles, and became famous for its public games.

Attalus Philadelphus, brother of Eumenes, was the founder of Philadelphia, which stood on a root of mount Tmolus, by the river Cogamus. The frequent earthquakes which it experienced, were owing to its vicinity with Catakekaumene. Even the city walls were not secure, but were shaken almost daily, and disparted. The inhabitants lived in perpetual apprehension, and were always employed in repairs. They were few in number, the people residing chiefly in the country, and cultivating the soil, which was fertile.

John Ducas, the Greek general, to whom Laodicea submitted, took Philadelphia, with Sardis, by assault, in 1097. It was again reduced, about the year 1106, under the same emperor, without difficulty. Two years after, the Turks marched from the East, with a design to plunder it and the maritime cities. In 1175 the emperor Manuel, falling into an ambuscade of the Turks, not far from the sources of the Mæander, retired to Philadelphia. In the division of the conquests of Sultan Aladin in 1300, the inner parts of Phrygia, as far as Cilicia and Philadelphia, fell by lot to Karamân. The town in 1306 was besieged by Alisuras, who took the forts near, and distressed it, but retired on the approach of the Roman army. The Tripolines requested succour from the general, on his way by Kliara; and he defeated the enemy at Aulak. It is related, that the Philadelphians despised the Turks, having a tradition, that their city had never been taken. After this exploit, the Grand Duke Roger returned hither, built the forts of Kula and Turnus, and exacted money. In 1391, Philadelphia singly refused to admit Bajazet; but wanting provisions was forced to capitulate. Cineis, after his reconciliation with Amir, prince of Ionia, drew over to his interest this place, with Sardis, Nymphéum, and the country as far as the Hermus.

It was anciently matter of surprise, that Philadelphia was not abandoned; and yet it has survived many cities less liable to earthquakes, and continues now a mean, but considerable town, of large extent, spreading on the slopes of three or four hills. Of the wall, with which it was encompassed, many remnants are standing, but with large gaps. The materials of this fortification are small stones, with strong cement. It is thick and lofty, and has round towers. On the top, at regular distances, are a great number of nests, each as big as a bushel; with the cranes, their owners, by them, single or in pairs. The bed of the Cogamus, which is on the north-east side, was almost dry, when Dr. Chandler was here.

Going a little up the Cogamus, between the mountains, in the bank on the right hand, is a spring of a purgative quality, much esteemed and resorted to in the hot months. It tastes like ink, is clear, and tinges the earth with the colour of ochre. Farther up, beyond the town, on the left hand, is the wall, which, it has been said, was built with human bones, after a massacre, by one of the sultans. That wonder, (see Rycart—and Woodward's Catalogue of foreign Fossils, p. 11.) is the remnant of a duct, which has conveyed water of a petrifying quality, as at Laodicea. This incrusts some vegetable substances, which have perished, and left behind, as it were, their moulds.

The bishop of Philadelphia was absent, says Dr. Chandler, but the proto-papas, his substitute, whom we went to visit, received us at his palace, a title given to a very indifferent house, or rather a cottage, of clay. We found him ignorant of the Greek tongue, and were forced to discourse with him, by an interpreter, in the Turkish language. He had no idea that Philadelphia existed before Christianity, but told us that it had become a city in consequence of the many religious foundations.—The number of churches he reckoned at twenty-four, mostly in ruins, and mere masses of wall decorated with painted saints. Only six are in a better condition, and have their priests. The episcopal church is large, and ornamented with gilding, carving, and holy portraits. The Greeks are about three hundred families, and live in a friendly intercourse with the Turks, of whom they speak well. We were assured that the clergy and laity in general knew as little of Greek as the proto-papas; and yet the liturgies and offices of the church are read as elsewhere, and have undergone no alteration on that account.

The Philadelphians are a civil people. One of the Greeks sent us a small vessel full of choice wine. Some families, beneath the trees, by a rill of water, invited us to alight, and partake of their refreshments. They saluted us when we met.

Philadelphia, possessing waters excellent in dyeing, and being situated on one of the most capital roads to Smyrna, is much frequented, especially by Armenian merchants. The khan, in which we lodged, was very filthy, but full of passengers. Mules arrived almost hourly, and were unladen in the area. A caravan goes regularly to Smyrna, and returns on stated days.]

II. PHILADELPHIA, otherwise called Rabbath, or Rabbath Ammon, Rabbath of the children of Amman, or Rabbat-Amana, the capital of the Ammonites, was situated in the mountains of Gilead, toward the source of the river Arnon. It is sometimes mentioned as belonging to Arabia, sometimes to Coele Syria.—Eusebius places it ten miles from Jazer east. It is very probable this city was the residence of king Og, since in the time of Moses his iron bed, nine cubits long, and four cubits broad, was shewn there, Deut. iii. 11. Philadelphia was one of the ten cities of Decapolis beyond Jordan. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 18. Josephus extends Perea, or the region beyond Jordan to Philadelphia. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 2. See RABBATH AMMON. It is said this city received its name from Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Ignatius the Martyr, very probably, preached the gospel here; and to the church of this place he wrote his epistle to the Philadelphians. [I believe this will not be admitted by the learned. The inscription of Ignatius's Epistle is "to the Church at Philadelphus in Asia;" and the conclusion of it imports a reference to Cilicia, Ephesus, and Smyrna, inconsistent with this notion.]

PHILADELPHUS. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. See PTOLEMY and SEPTUAGINT.

PHILARCHES, Φιλάρχης, lover of the prince; from φίλος, a friend, and ἀρχος, a prince. A very wicked man, killed by the Jews, with Timotheus, the Syrian general, 2 Macc. viii. 32.

PHILELLEN, Φιλέλλην, a friend to the Greeks. This surname was given to Aristobulus, las, king of the Jews, son and successor of Alexander Jannæus: Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 19. Χρυσίον Φιλάλιν. And to many eastern princes. Vide "JEWISH COINS," Plate II.

PHILEMON, Φιλήμων, that kisses, or is affectionate, from φιλημα, a kiss. [Loving?]

PHILEMON, a rich citizen of Colossæ in Phrygia, converted to the Christian faith, with Apphia his wife, by Epaphras, a disciple of St. Paul; for St. Paul himself did not preach at Colossæ. Col. ii. 1. Ita Interp. Chrysost. Hom. in Col. ii. 1. Perhaps, we should have known nothing of Philemon, had it not been on account of his slave Onesimus, who having robbed him, and run away from him, to Rome, there found St. Paul, and became very serviceable to him. St. Paul converted him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon, to whom he wrote a letter. Philemon had made a church of his family; and his domestics, as well as himself, were of the household of faith. His charity, liberality, and compassion, were a refuge to the distressed. The Apostolical Constitutions, say, lib. vii. cap. 46. that St. Paul made him bishop of Colossæ, but the Menæa insinuate, that he went to Gaza in Palestine, of which he was the apostle and first bishop. From thence he returned to Colossæ, where he suffered martyrdom with Apphia his wife, in the time of Nero. They relate several particulars of his martyrdom, and add, that his body remained at Colossæ, where it performed several miracles. His name is in the martyrologies November 22.

[Short as this article is, it probably needs considerable corrections. It should appear from the expression, verse 19, "thou owest to me even thine own self, besides," that Philemon was really a convert of St. Paul; unless we could admit that Paul had formerly been the means of saving his life; for which we have no warrant. Some have supposed that Archippus was son to Philemon; and as the apostle terms him, "our fellow-soldier," it is possible, that the connection had been of long standing, and consequently, much intercourse might have taken place between Paul and Philemon, distinct from any reference to Philemon's situation at Colossæ. Lightfoot has this thought; and Michaelis adopts it: but, if Archippus were fellow-soldier of Paul the aged, he was too old to be son to Philemon: not to insist, that no reason can be assigned why this son is distinguished from the rest of Philemon's family. He might be brother to Philemon, (or, to Apphia) and living with him, is placed after Apphia; but before the young folks of the family, to whom he was uncle. This conjecture seems to be the most probable; and it agrees with the supposable time of life at which Archippus had (lately) been chosen to an office of deaconship.

Though it is usually said that St. Paul had converted and baptized Onesimus, at Rome; yet from the phrase, Col. iv. 9. "who is one of you," it is natural to infer, that Onesimus had professed Christianity before his elopement; (so Epaphras is called one of themselves, chap. i. 7.) otherwise, he could be no member of the church at Colossæ: and very likely, this transgression of a professor, had not only mortified Philemon, extremely, but had scandalized the church, and had become publicly notorious, among the Heathen, also.

Philemon was undoubtedly a man of property; and, like Gaius, like the lady Eclecta, and like Phebe, he exercised great hospitality towards Christian brethren, especially evangelists. But, from the direction of the apostle "to prepare him a lodging" [not in Philemon's own house; comp. Macknight, et al. in loc.] in a hired house, in the city, where he might receive all comers; it appears, that Philemon's premises were not very extensive. The phrase, "church in thy house," imports, that all his family had been baptized, say Theodoret, Oecumenius, Chrysostom, Theophylact, and all the Greek scholiasts.

As to any ecclesiastical character attached to Philemon, he might be a deacon, but the term "fellow-labourer," is not sufficient to prove he was a bishop; though it implies a previous personal knowledge, and perhaps, much confidential communication, between the parties. If we might add a personal knowledge of Philemon, by those also who salute him in Paul's letter—Timothy, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke,—it would greatly heighten our conception of this good man's character, and suggest a variety of occasions on which he might have rendered the brethren services equally extensive and important.]

PHILETUS, Φιλητὸς, amiable, or who is beloved; from φιλεῖν. [Lovely?]

PHILETUS. St. Paul writing to Timothy, 2 Tim. ii. 16, A. D. 65, a little while before his own martyrdom, speaks of Hymenæus and Philetus; who concerning the truth have erred, saying, that the resurrection is past already.—We have nothing very certain concerning Philetus; for we make small account of what is read in the false Abdias, in the life of St. James Major; even supposing this author has not put the name of Philetus instead of Phygellus.

PHILIP, Φίλιππος, warlike, or a lover of horses.

I. PHILIP, king of Macedon, father of Alexander under the Great, is spoken of in Scripture, only by incident, on occasion of his son Alexander. Philip was killed at Egea, a city of Macedonia, by Pausanias, son of Cerastus, while he was celebrating the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra with Alexander, king of Epirus; A. M. 3688.—Alexander the Great, in his letter to Darius, asserts that the Persians, by a great reward, had engaged the murderers of his father to commit that crime. Diodor. An. 1. Olymp. 111. Justin, lib. ix. cap. 6. Q. Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 1. Arrian. lib. ii.

II. PHILIP, surnamed Arideus, brother of Alexander the Great, succeeded him in the kingdom of Macedonia, A. M. 3681. He was put to death A. M. 3687, ante A. D. 317.

III. PHILIP, foster-brother of Antiochus Epiphanes, a Phrygian by birth, and in high favour with Antiochus. 2 Macc. ix. 29. This prince made him governor of Jerusalem, where he committed many outrages on the Jews, to force them to forsake their religion. Seeing that Apollonius and Seron were defeated by Judas Maccabeus, he sent for new succours to Ptolemy, governor of Coele-Syria, who sent him Gorgias and Nicanor with a powerful army.—Some time after, Antiochus going beyond the Euphrates, to extort money from the people, Philip went with him; Antiochus finding himself near his end, made him regent of the kingdom, put his diadem into his hand, with his royal robe, and his ring, that he might render them to his son the young Antiochus Eupator. But Lysias having taken possession of the government in the name of young Eupator, who was but a child, Philip not being able to cope with him, durst not return into Syria; but he went into Egypt, carrying the body of Epiphanes with him, there to implore assistance from Ptolemy Philometor, against Lysias the usurper. The year following, while Lysias, was busy in his war against the Jews, Philip got into Syria, and took possession of Antioch. But Lysias returning into the country with great diligence, retook Antioch, and put to death Philip, who was taken in that city. A. M. 3840. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 15.

IV. PHILIP, son of Herod the Great, by one of his wives called Cleopatra. He married Salome the daughter of Herod, surnamed Philip, and of Herodias, who is so well known in the gospel, by the death of John the Baptist; and Salome her daughter, the wife of Philip, is she who danced before Herod, and asked for the head of that holy forerunner of Christ. In the will of Herod, Philip was named after Archelaus, and he bore the title of Tetrarch of Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, Batanea, and Paneas. Ant.

lib. xvii. cap. 10. While Archelaus went to Rome, to solicit the confirmation of his father's will from Augustus, he left his brother Philip to govern Judæa. Some time after, Verus governor of Syria, sent Philip to Rome also, to assist his brother Archelaus to take care of his own interests.

As soon as Augustus had confirmed Herod's will, Philip returned into his Tetrarchy, and lived there many years as a peaceable and moderate prince, contented with his condition, and placing his delight in well-governing his people. When he went abroad, if any one applied to him for justice, he presently stopped, in what place soever he was, caused a tribunal to be set, which he always carried with him for the purpose, gave the parties a hearing, and determined the cause on the spot. He built the walls round the city of Paneas, and gave it the name of Cæsarea Philippi. He also enlarged the town of Bethsaida, on the lake Gennesareth, and gave it the name of Julias, in honour of Julia daughter of Augustus. He died A. D. 33, after thirty-seven years' reign; the 20th year of the emperor Tiberius. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 6.

V. PHILIP, otherwise, Herod-Philip: called Philip, Mark vi. 17. Luke iii. 19, but called Herod, Matt. xiv. 3. He was son of Herod the Great, and of the second Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest. This Herod-Philip married Herodias, by whom he had Salome, the young damsel who danced before Herod, and procured the death of John the Baptist. Herodias left him, and married Herod-Antipas his brother. See HEROD-ANTIPAS, HEROD-PHILIP, HERODIAS, and FRAGS. No. CCXXVII.

VI. PHILIP the apostle: native of Bethsaida in Galilee. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 31. says he was a married man, and had several daughters. Jesus Christ invited him to follow him, John i. 43, 44. Philip followed him; and soon after, finding Nathanael, Philip said to him, "We have found the Messiah." Then he brought Nathanael to Jesus; and they were with him at the marriage at Cana in Galilee.—Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromat. lib. iii. mentions it as a thing universally acknowledged, that it was Philip who gave our Saviour the answer, "Let me first go to bury my father," Matt. viii. 21, 22. Tertullian, de Baptismo, cap. 12. assures us, that it was one of the apostles, but the evangelists do not say that it was this apostle; and it would be strange, that St. John, who tells us so particularly what Christ said to Philip, at his call to the apostleship, should not mention so remarkable a circumstance.

St. Philip was called at the very beginning of our Saviour's mission, A. D. 30, and about a year year afterwards he was appointed an apostle.—When Jesus intended to feed five thousand men, he asked St. Philip, only to prove him, whence bread might be bought for such a multitude?—Philip answered, that two hundred pennyworth would not be sufficient for every one to taste a little, John vi. 5, 6, 7. Luke vi. 13. Matth. x. 2. —Certain Gentiles, having a curiosity to see Jesus, a little before his passion, they addressed themselves to St. Philip, who mentioned it to St. Andrew, and these two together to Christ, John xii. 20, 22. At the last supper, Philip asked our Saviour, that he would please to shew them the Father; and that was all they desired. But Jesus answered, that seeing the Son, they saw the Father also, John xiv. 8, 10. This is all we find of him in the gospel.

Clemens Alexandrinus says, Stromat, lib. iii. that some of St. Philip's daughters were married. Theodoret says, in Psalm cxvi. he preached in the two Phrygias; and Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 31. says, he was buried at Hierapolis in Phrygia Pacatiana. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, apud Euseb. lib. v. cap. 24. assures us, that St. Philip, with St. John, celebrated the passover on the fourteenth day of the moon. The same author seems to say, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 39. that Papias had been informed by the daughters of St. Philip, that a dead man had been restored to life in the time of this apostle. The false histories that we have of St. Philip, pretend that he died at the age of fourscore and seven, under Domitian or Trajan. A book of Acts has been falsely attributed to this apostle, which was condemned by pope Gelasius: as also a Gospel, used by the Gnostics. Epiphanius. Hæres. 26. cap. 13. The Bollandists may be consulted, on May 1.

As to his daughters, Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus says, that two of them lived in virginity, and were buried with their father at Hierapolis, Euseb. lib. iii. cap. 31. Polycrates speaks also of another daughter of St. Philip, who lived in great sanctity, and died at Ephesus. This is probably, his married daughter; and, perhaps, it was this, whom the Greeks honoured under the name of Hermione, who, they say, was buried at Ephesus, and was daughter of Philip the apostle, Vales. Not. in Euseb. p. 55.

VII. PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, Acts vi. 5. This deacon, it is affirmed, was of Cesarea, in Palestine. It is certain, his daughters lived in that city, Acts xxi. 8, 9. After the death of Stephen, the Christians, except the apostles, having mostly left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, St. Philip went to preach at Sebaste or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons: Acts viii. He baptized them; but informed the apostles at Jerusalem, that Samaria had hopefully received the word of God; that they might communicate the Holy Ghost to those converts. Peter and John came thither for that purpose. Simon Magus had been admitted to baptism, among others, by St. Philip. Vide MAGUS.

St. Philip was, probably, at Samaria, [if not rather at Cesarea, with his daughters] when an angel commanded him to travel on the road that leads from Jerusalem to Old Gaza, (for there were two cities of Gaza, the Old and the New; the Old was then forsaken) and was in the way to Egypt. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized. See the history, Acts viii. 26. Being come out of the water, the spirit of the Lord took away Philip, and the eunuch saw him no more. Some ancient Greek manuscripts intimate, and some of the Fathers read in this place, that the Holy Ghost descended on the eunuch, immediately after his baptism. See Mills's Various Lectures on the New Testament. But Philip was found again at Azotus, and preached the gospel in all the cities he passed through, till he returned to Cesarea of Palestine, which is about thirty leagues from Azotus.

Scripture does not inform us what Philip did after this time, A. D. 33. The modern Greeks say, that this holy deacon went to Tralles in Asia, where he founded a church, of which he was the apostle and bishop, and where he rested in peace, after performing many miracles. The Latins, after Usuard and Ado, say, June 6, that he died in peace at Cesarea; and that three of his daughters were there buried with him. Ado adds, that the fourth died at Ephesus; but he has mistaken this fourth daughter of Philip the deacon, for St. Hermione, daughter of Philip the apostle, of the former article. Caius also, an ancient priest of the Romish church, apparently confounds the daughters of Philip the deacon, with those of Philip the apostle, when he says, that the four daughters of the deacon dwelt at Hierapolis in Phrygia. Caius, apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 31. When St. Paula came to Cesarea, A. D. 386, she desired to see the house of St. Philip, and the chambers of his daughters. Hieronymus. Ep. 27. The Greeks celebrate the feast of Philip the deacon, Oct. 11.

PHILIPPI, a city of Macedonia, and a Roman colony, Acts xvi. 12. [So called from Philip, king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it: whence it lost its former name of Dathos. Philip's design was, to make it a barrier against the Thracians.] St. Paul preached here

A. D. 52, and converted several inhabitants; among others, Lydia, a seller of purple. He also cast out a Pythonic spirit from a servant-maid. Her masters stirred up the whole city against Paul; and the magistrates [military officers] caused him and Silas to be seized, whipped, and put in prison. But the day following they made excuses for their ill treatment. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXIII. and Plate MISCELLANIES, Nos. 5, 6.]

[This ill treatment, seems to have been recollected by St. Paul, with a resentment not common to him. He says to the Thessalonians, "we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated at Philippi." It should seem that the military officers of the colony, had assumed a power that did not belong to them; and Paul resented their proceedings with the feelings of a soldier, as well as of a Roman citizen:—he therefore, humbled them in a public manner; but he did not forget their shameful usage of him and his companion, Silas.]

PHILIPPIANS. The Philippians were always full of gratitude, for the faith they had received from God, by the ministry of St. Paul.—They assisted him on several occasions. Phil. iv. 16. They sent him money while in Achaia; and being informed that he was a prisoner at Rome, they sent a deputation to him by Epaphroditus, their bishop, to be serviceable to him, Phil. iv. 12, 18. A. D. 61. Epaphroditus fell sick; and St. Paul, in order to remove the anxiety of the Philippians, on hearing of his sickness, sent Epaphroditus to them again, when he was recovered, and by him the epistle which is still remaining: in which he commends their liberality, and shews great acknowledgment, for their readiness. See PAUL. [The church at Philippi was left by Paul and Silas under the ministrations and direction of St. Luke; whose age and experience qualified him for that difficult office. He continued there a long while; probably, several years; though he modestly omits all mention of his services. Comp. Acts xvi. 11. et seq. with chap. xx. 6.]

PHILISTINES, פְּלִשְׁתִּים, Φυλιστινῆς, those that dwell in villages. [Scattered, i. e. as powder or dust; otherwise, opposite ruin, or double ruin, or the drink of ruin; or falling drinking. In Isaiah xiv. 13. Palestina, in the singular: in 2 Chron. xvii. 31. in the plural.

Simon considers this name as importing migration, wandering, travelling, which the Ethiopic root signifies; and Palestine as importing the country migrated to, i. e. by the Caphtorim and Casluhim, Gen. x. 14. Exod. xv. 14. Deut. ii. 23. Jer. xlvii. 4. Amos ix. 7. Pelangi and Pelani he refers to the same idea. The Pelangi were so termed from their wanderings, says Strabo, lib. ix.] See PALESTINE.

PHILISTINES, a people that came from the Isle of Caphtor, (vide CAPHTOR, i. e. Crete,) into Palestine, Amos ix. 7. Jer. xlvii. 4. being descendants from the Caphtorim, who derived from the Casluhim, children of Mizraim, as Moses informs us, Gen. x. 13, 14. and, by consequence, originally from Mizraim, father of the Egyptians. Moses says, Deut. ii. 23. that the Caphtorim, being come out of Caphtor, drove out the Avim which dwelt from Hazerim to Azzah (or Gaza), and dwelt in their stead: therefore, it is only since the time of the Avim (or Avites), or Canaanites, that the Philistines came into Palestine, and possessed that country. We do not know the time of their coming out of Caphtor; but they had been long in Canaan, when Abraham came thither, A. M. 2083.

The name Philistine is not Hebrew. The Septuagint generally translate פְּלִשְׁתִּים by Ἀλλόφυλοι, Allophyloi, strangers. The Pelethites and Cherethites were also Philistines; and the LXX. sometimes translate Cherethim by Cretai, Cretes, כְּרֵתַי, Κρηται, vide Ezek. xxv. 16. Zeph. ii. 5, 6.

The Casluhim, or Casluchim, fathers of the Caphtorim, dwelt originally in Pentapolis Cyrenaica, according to the paraphrast Jonathan; or in the canton Pentaschenites of Lower Egypt, according to the Jerusalem paraphrast. We find in Marmorica, the city of Axilis, or Azylis; and in Libya bordering on Egypt, Sagylis, or Satylis; and this out of Ptolemy. These names have a sensible resemblance to Casluhim. This country is near Egypt, where the children of Mizraim had their settlement: it is over-against Crete. Strabo, lib. xvii. allows but a thousand furlongs between the port of Cyrene, and that of Crete, called Criou Metapon, or the Ram's Forehead. There was, heretofore, a great intercourse between Cyreniaca and Crete, as appears from Strabo and Pliny: it is therefore probable, that the Casluhim sent colonies to this island from Cyreniaca, which afterwards passed to the coasts of Palestine.

Besides the conformity which is observable between the words Cherethim and Crete, we also find a great resemblance between the manners, the arms, the deities, the customs of the Philistines, and those of the Cretans.

The Philistines were a powerful people in Palestine, even in Abraham's time, since they had then kings, and considerable cities. They are not enumerated among the nations devoted to extermination, whose territory the Lord assigned to the Hebrews. They were not of the cursed seed of Canaan. However, Joshua did not not forbear to give their land to the Hebrews, and to attack them by command from the Lord, because they possessed various districts promised to Israel. But these conquests of Joshua must have been ill maintained, since under the Judges, under Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of king David, the Philistines had their kings, and their lords, which they called Sazanim; since their state was divided into five little kingdoms, or satrapies, and since they oppressed Israel, during the government of the high-priest Eli, that of Samuel, and during the reign of Saul; for about 120 years, from A. M. 2848 to 2960.—True it is, that Shamgar, Sampson, Samuel, and Saul, opposed them, and were victorious over them with great slaughter, at various times, but did not reduce their power. They maintained their independence till David subdued them, 2 Sam. v. 17. viii.

They continued in subjection to the kings of Judah, down to the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, about 246 years; from A. M. 2960, to A. M. 3116: when they revolted from Jehoram, 2 Chron. xxi. 16. Jehoram made war against them, and probably reduced them to his obedience; because it is observed in Scripture, that they revolted again from Uzziah, who kept them to their duty during his whole reign, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7. Uzziah began to reign in 3194. During the unfortunate reign of Ahaz, the Philistines made great havoc in the territory of Judah; but his son and successor Hezekiah subdued them again, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18. 2 Kings xviii. 8. Lastly, they regained their full liberty under the later kings of Judah; and we see by the menaces uttered against them by the prophets Isaiah, Amos, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, that they brought a thousand calamities on Israel, for which God threatened to punish them with great misfortunes.

Esar-Haddon, successor to Sennacherib, besieged Azoth and took it, by his general Thasthan, or Tartan. Psammiticus, king of Egypt, took the same city, after a siege of twenty-nine years, [months?] says Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 157. and this is the longest siege of any known. During the siege of Tyre, which lasted thirteen years, Nebuchadnezzar employed part of his army to subdue the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and other nations bordering on the Jews. There is great probability that the Philistines could not withstand him, but were reduced to his obedience, as well as the other people of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine. Afterwards, they fell under the dominion of the Persians, then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed Gaza. Strabo, lib. xxvi. Arrian, lib. ii.

de Expedit. Alexand. the only city of the Phœnicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Asmoneans took by degrees several cities from the country of the Philistines, which they subjected. Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan the Asmonean, the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently, all the country of the Philistines. The name Palestine comes from Philistine, although these people possessed but a small part of this country.

[We are told, Gen. x. 14. that Philistim came out of Casluhim: but, from comparing other places where the origin of this people is mentioned, as Amos ix. 7. "Have I not brought the Philistines from Caphtor?" and Jer. xlvii. 4. where the Philistines are called "the remnant of the country of Caphtor;" it appears that the parenthesis in which the Philistines are named, should have been inserted after Caphtorim, and not after Casluhim. We shall find this arrangement confirmed by other considerations. I am not satisfied with any derivation of Philistine from the Hebrew; by some it is referred to a root signifying lowly, or humble; but what in the character of the Philistines justifies this derivation? Neither did they inhabit low countries, properly speaking, though they held the sea coast of Judea. They are called by the Greek interpreters of the historical books, foreigners. They were uncircumcised, at least the body of their nation were so, 1 Sam. xvi. 6. 2 Sam. i. 20. These people were always at war with the Hebrews. They had probably ancient causes of enmity; and if, as I conclude, religion was one cause, there could be no stronger opposition than between those who supposed they had divine command for worshipping God by the mediation of images, and those who were threatened with death for having any thing to do with idols, whose figures they detested, professedly as a nation, though some individuals were inclined to adopt them.

Under the article CAPHTOR, the reader may see that we derive this people from India; and their history from the Asiatic records, under the description of Philistines, is communicated by Major Wilford, in the Asiatic Researches, vol. iii. p. 72, et passim.]

PHILO, a famous Jewish author, of the city of Alexandria, and of the race of the priests. He was brother to Alexander Lysimachus, alabarch, or chief of the Jews, who in great numbers inhabited that city. Josephus, Ant. lib. xviii. cap. 10. calls him an illustrious man in every thing. He made himself so famous by his eloquence, and by his knowledge of the philosophy of Plato, that that it was commonly said at Alexandria, either Philo imitates Plato, or Plato imitates Philo. Hieronym. de Viris illust. cap. 11. Photius, Cod. 105. And the learned call him the Jewish Plato, or the second Plato. He was advanced in years when he was deputed with others to go to Rome, about A. D. 40, by the Jews of Alexandria, to defend the right of citizenship of Alexandria, which the Jews claimed, before the emperor Caius. They staid at Rome till Caius returned out of Gaul, and when he arrived, they presented their memorial to him. Caius received them with more tokens of friendship than they expected. Philo, Leg ad Caium.

Some time after, he gave them a hearing, near the city, in the houses of pleasure that bore the names of Mecenias and Lamia. The emperor reproached them with being the only people in the world who would not acknowledge him as a God, &c. Vide CAIUS. He dismissed them without deciding the cause.

Philo composed several works, good part of which is extant, and much esteemed by intelligent persons. Photius believes, Cod. 105, that from him the custom was first introduced into the church, of explaining Scripture allegorically; and true it is, that the Fathers, especially Clement of Alexandria and Origen, have often followed the method of Philo; but it cannot be denied, that the custom of allegorizing Scripture, was in use long before Philo. Josephus, Proëm. in Antiq. Jud. ad finem, testifies, that he had thoughts of composing a work, in which he would explain what Moses had concealed under allegories. St. Paul has often used this manner of explaining Scripture: whence, as may be easily seen, it had been long familiar to the Jews. See ALLEGORY, and Wisd. xviii. 24. compared with Philo, de Vita Mos. lib. iii.

Several of the ancients have thought that Philo intended to give a description of the first Christians of Alexandria, in his book intitled, "Of a Contemplative Life," wherein he represents the manners of the Therapeutæ. Vide ESSENES, and THERAPEUTÆ. It is said, Euseb. Hist. Eccl. l. ii. de Viris illust. c. 11. that Philo was acquainted with St. Peter at Rome, under the emperor Claudius; and contracted a friendship with him. Photius says, Cod. 105. that he even embraced Christianity, but quitted it again from discontent: but this circumstance does not appear from any ancient writer. The time of his death is unknown.

PHILOLOGUS, Φιλόλογος, a lover of letters, or of the word; from φίλος, a lover, and λόγος, the word. St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 15. salutes Philologus, of whom nothing particular is known. The Greeks make him bishop of Sinope in Pontus, and place his feast Nov. 4.—Origen believes, that Philologus was husband to Julia, mentioned in the same passage; but others doubt whether Julia is not rather the name of a man.

PHILOMETOR, Φιλομήτωρ, lover of his mother; from φίλος, a lover, and μήτηρ, a mother. A surname of Ptolemy VI. king of Egypt. See PTOLEMY.

PHILOPATOR, Φιλοπάτωρ, lover of his father. A surname of Ptolemy IV. king of Egypt. See PTOLEMY.

PHILOSOPHY, Φιλοσοφία, the love of wisdom; from φίλος, a lover, and σοφία, wisdom.

PHILOSOPHY. St. Paul bids the Colossians beware, lest any man spoil them through philosophy, Col. ii. 8. In Acts xvii. 18. Luke relates, that when St. Paul came to Athens, he there found Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, who made a jest of his discourses. The same apostle in many places of his epistles, opposes the supposed wise men, and the false wisdom of the age, i. e. the Pagan philosophy, to the wisdom of Jesus Christ, and the true religion; which in the notion of the philosophers and sophists of this world, or of that age, seemed to be mere folly, being built neither on the eloquence nor the subtilty of those who preached it, but on the power of God, and his authority; on the operation of the Holy Ghost, which actuated the hearts and minds of believers.

About the time that the several sects of philosophers were formed among the Greeks, as the Academics, the Peripatetics, the Stoics, by a sort of emulation, among the Jews also several sects of philosophers arose, as the Essenes, the Pharisees, and the Sadducees. The Pharisees had some resemblance to the Stoics, the Sadducees to the Epicureans, and the Essenes to the Academics. The Pharisees were proud, vain, and boasting, like the Stoics: the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, and the existence of spirits, freed themselves at once, like the Epicureans, from all solicitude about futurity: the Essenes were more moderate, more simple and religious, and therefore approached nearer to the Academics.

The philosophers against whom St. Paul inveighs, in his Epistle to the Romans, boasted the extent of their knowledge, the purity of their morality, the eloquence of their writings, the strength of their reasonings, and the subtilty of their arguments. Their weaknesses were pride, conceit, presumption, hypocrisy, ambition.—They ascribed every thing to human reason; and would be thought superior in all things. Although their lives were disorderly, shameful, and even injurious to human nature, yet they would pass on on the world for good men ; and while boasting of their knowledge of God, they dishonoured him by their actions. To them St. Paul opposed the humility of the cross of Jesus Christ, the force of his miracles, the purity of his moral doctrines, the depth of his mysteries, and the evident proofs of his mission.

It is disputed whether the heathen philosophers did not borrow the finest sentiments of their morality from the sacred Scriptures. The Fathers have been much divided on this question : some have maintained the affirmative, some the negative. Philo, de Vita Mos. lib. i. teaches that before the translation of the books of Moses, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the Gentiles had no acquaintance with the sacred books. Aristæus, de 70 Interp. makes Demetrius Phalereus say, that the Greek historians, poets, and writers, have made no mention of the books of the Hebrews ; and that certain writers being desirous of inserting something from them into their works, were prevented by divine punishments, of which he gives instances. Origen, in Cantic. maintains, that the name of Moses was unknown to the Greeks, and is not to be found in their writings. Josephus acknowledges the silence of the Greeks, and gives this reason for it ; that they had not read the books of the Jews. Lactantius, de Origin. Err. lib. ii. cap. 11. says expressly, that the prophane had never read the sacred writings. In another place, de Vera Sapientia, lib. iv. cap. 2. that it was surprising that Pythagoras and Plato should go into Egypt, into Chaldea and Persia, to study the religion and customs of those people, and not go into Judea, whither they might easily have passed, and where they might have found what they vainly sought elsewhere.

But, other of the Fathers, and those the greater number, have been for the affirmative : they assure us, that the most celebrated of the philosophers were acquainted with the sacred books and the prophets. St. Austin thinks, de Civit. lib. viii. cap. 11. de Doctrina Christian. lib. ii. cap. 28. that Pythagoras knew Jeremiah, in Egypt. Others believe that he conversed with Ezekiel, in Judea : Quidam, apud Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. that he was acquainted with the Jews, and borrowed several of their laws, which he admitted into his philosophy. Clemens Alexandrinus, Admonit. ad Gentes. p. 46, 47, 48. speaking to the Greeks, asserts, that whatever there is of truth in the laws of Plato, was derived from the Hebrew writings ; that from thence their poets borrowed their finest thoughts, and their noblest expressions. Justin Martyr, Apolo- log. i. p. 18. et Apolog. ii. p. 81, 82. shews, by many examples, that Orpheus, Homer, Solon, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others, travelled into Egypt, and consulted the books of Moses. Celsus the philosopher, (Orig. cont. Cels. lib. vi.) an enemy to the Christians, acknowledges the conformity between the sentiments of Plato and those of Moses and the Jewish prophets : whence he ridiculously concludes, that the Hebrews had imitated the Greeks ; as if Moses and the other sacred writers had not been long prior to Plato and the Greek poets.

Tertullian maintains, that the ancient legislators of the heathen had nothing valuable but what they borrowed from the Hebrews :—that their poets and philosophers had drawn from the fountain of the prophets ; that by the subtle artifice of the devil, some principles of truth slipped into the writings of the prophane, in order to undermine the truth at such time as God should manifest it to the world. For the greater part of mankind want either penetration, or sincerity, to distinguish the truth from such errors as they find blended with it. Justin Martyr had the same opinion. Eusebius has employed two entire books, lib. xi. xii. of his great work of the Gospel-Preparation, to shew that Plato had taken the principal things of his philosophy, and of his theology, from the sacred books of the Jews. Theodoret advances, that the ancient philosophers Pherecides, Pythagoras, Thales, Solon, and Plato, had travelled into Egypt, and had received instructions, not only from the Egyptians, but also from the Hebrews, even so far, that Pythagoras received circumcision, which the Egyptians had borrowed from the Jews. St. Ambrose seems to think, that one of Plato's chief designs in visiting Egypt, was to consult the laws of Moses, and the oracles of the prophets. Ambrose in Psal. cxviii. Serm. 2, 4, 5, 13. et lib. de Fuga sæculi, cap. 8. et de Bono Mortis, cap. 10. et cap. 11. n. 51. et de Arca Noë, cap. 8.

But, as this question is concerning a fact, it ought to be supported by facts, rather than by authorities. Proofs from fact are of two kinds. First, the agreement of conceptions, principles, and expressions, between the sacred authors and the prophane, in matters wherein naturally they could not agree. Secondly, the acknowledgment of those who copied from others ; or the testimony of contemporary authors. But in the writings of the poets and the prophane philosophers, we find no acknowledgment that they had borrowed any thing from the sacred writers ; none of their contemporary writers notices any thing like this. What resemblances may be observed between the sacred and prophane authors, are merely fortuitous, and in such passages wherein men of sense might easily coincide, without without copying one another : therefore nothing can be concluded from hence, in favour of the opinion, that the Greeks had read and imitated the Hebrew writers.

Nay, they could not so much as have read them ; for they must either have read them in the original, or in translations. The Grecians did not study foreign languages ; and the Jews were infinitely jealous of the sacredness of their books, nor would communicate them to prophane heathen : neither could they be read in any version ; for there was none but that of the Septuagint, under Ptolemy Philadelphus ; long after Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Chrysippus, Zeno, and the ancient Greek philosophers and legislators. There is even great probability, that the version of the Septuagint is still more modern than Philadelphus. See SEPTUAGINT.

Another famous question has been debated, concerning the salvation of the ancient philosophers ; whether they, by only following the light of reason, and living good moral lives, in the eye of the world, independently of the law and the gospel, could escape damnation and eternal misery ? St. Paul, Rom. ii. 9, 10, 11, &c. seems not to exclude the Gentiles, who lived virtuous lives, from heaven. Vide GENTILES. “ When the Gentiles, who have not the law, do by nature things contained in the law ; these having not the law, are a law unto themselves : therefore if the uncircumcision (or, the Gentile) keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision ?” ver. 26.

From these passages, it may be concluded, that the philosopher of the Gentiles, who keeps the law of nature, and who worships God, is accepted before the Sovereign Judge, equally with the Jew, who observes the ceremonial law.

[After all, till it be determined what degrees of glory, on one hand, or of misery, on the other, obtain in the future world, it is impossible to answer this question ; but, we may safely leave it to the great Judge of all, who will render to every man according to his deeds. The question of degrees of punishment, as well as of happiness, solves many of the difficulties attending our imperfect information on the nature, &c. of the future state ; and it may prove, hereafter, that many whom mankind regarded as of high character, may there be placed below what might be expected as their station ; while others, who have been disregarded here, may enjoy situations above them. We ought to consider, that, in proportion to the means and privileges enjoyed, should be our improvement :—for certainly, those who with fewest advantages, have brought most glory to God, are entitled to a station above those who with superior advantages, have brought less glory to God. Now, since advantages of birth, education, disposition, situation in life, occurrences,—not to advert to different degrees of mental powers, of the Holy Spirit, of grace, and of the various graces derived from God ;—since these, and a thousand other incidents, and co-incidents, are altogether beyond our conception and estimate, we may well conclude, that many who appear to us among the first, may be finally placed among the last ; and that many shall come from the east and the west, and sit down in the kingdom of God, in the higher stations of glory, because they have well improved what little light was granted to them, rather than others, who, amid the blaze of divine illumination with which they were surrounded, did not make adequate improvements of the favour.]

The Jews, (Rab. Moses, et Rab. Meyr. Gubar.) allow a place in paradise to more than one kind of Gentiles : e. gr. they think, those who have faithfully observed the commandments given to Noah, shall obtain salvation ; also, those who have known God, who have entertained rational notions of the Deity ; who have lived in a regular and laudable manner ; they instance Socrates and Plato. The Talmudists exclude from salvation four sorts of people ; such Gentiles as resemble (1) Balaam and (2) Doeg ; and Jews which resemble (3) Achitophel and (4) Gehazi. Whence it is inferred, that Pagans, who are like neither Balaam nor Doeg, according to them, may be admitted to happiness.

Tostatus, Catharinus, Erasmus, and several other modern authors, seem to think, that some of the ancient philosophers, as Socrates, Plato, and Seneca, were in a state capable of salvation ; which is, on the supposition, that they knew God, and that they lived in a moral and laudable manner. Nevertheless, certain it is, that without faith it is impossible to please God : that faith without works is dead : that without faith in our deliverer, our Messiah, we cannot attain salvation. But the philosophers had neither faith enlivened by charity, nor good works, nor belief in the Messiah.

Socrates, the most unexceptionable of them all, is accused [falsely, I hope ! for Aristophanes, his accuser, is no competent witness] of being addicted to an abominable vice : he worshipped the clouds, he used to swear by a dog, by an oak, by a duck. Lactantius describes him as a buffoon and merry-andrew, if he intended thereby to rally the religion of the Athenians, among whom he lived, and the solemnity of an oath ; or as a fool, if he held things to be gods. The disciples of Socrates vindicated their master from the the imputation of atheism, and proved that he worshipped the gods of the Grecians. At his death he gave orders, that a cock should be sacrificed to Æsculapius. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXII. CHERUBIM, Plate IV. No. 9.

Seneca, the object of admiration of several of the ancients, composed a book of Pagan superstitions, and after having shewn the ridiculousness of them, he concluded, that the wise man ought to observe these things in compliance with custom and the laws, and to practise them in outward appearance, without any belief in them. Dio upbraids this philosopher with the commission of heinous crimes, and with instructing his pupil Nero to practise the same; with accumulating immense riches in a very little time, and with increasing them by daily usury. Such were the most complete of the Pagan philosophers!—Men who had a barren knowledge of the Deity.

The Orientals observe, that the philosophy of Thales the Milesian, who took water to be the principle of all things, has a near relation to that of Moses and the Egyptians, who favoured pretty much the same principles; as also the Phenicians, who contended for the production of all things out of tempered mud and watry sediment; whereas the Persians and Zoroaster made a nearer approach to the principles of Anaxagoras, who supposed fire to be the first natural cause of all material things.

PHINEHAS, פִּנְחָס, PINCHAS. Aspect, or face of trust, or protection; from פָּנָה panah, to behold, and חָסָה chasah, to hope, to trust.

I. PHINEHAS, or as the Jews pronounce, PINCHAS, son of Eleazer, and grandson of Aaron. Third high-priest of the Jews, A. M. 2571, to about A. D. 2590, ante A. D. 1414. He is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal, in vindicating the glory of God, when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to fornication and idolatry: Numb. xxv. 7. Insomuch that the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by perpetual covenant; evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient; for we know the priesthood passed out of the family of Eleazar and Phinehas to that of Ithamar, and that it returned not to the posterity of Eleazar until after about a hundred and fifty years.

This dignity continued in the race of Phinehas, from Aaron down to the high-priest Eli, for about three hundred and thirty-five years. Aaron was appointed high-priest A. M. 2513. Eli was acknowledged high-priest and judge of Israel in 2848. The manner and causes of this change are unknown. It re-entered the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who having put to death Abimelech, and the other priests of Nob, gave the high-priesthood to Zadok, of the race of Phinehas. At the same time, David had with him Abiathar, of the race of Eli, who performed the functions of high-priest. So that after the death of Saul, David continued the priesthood to Zadok and Abiathar conjunctly. But towards the end of David's reign, Abiathar having espoused the interests of Adonijah, to the prejudice of Solomon, he was disgraced; and Zadok only acknowledged as high-priest. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple. From the beginning of Zadok's priesthood alone, and the exclusion of Abiathar, to the ruin of the temple, is 1804 years. Zadok was high-priest alone, and Abiathar disgraced, A. M. 2989. The temple was destroyed A. M. 4073, A. D. 70.

We read also of another memorable and zealous action of Phinehas, Josh. xxii. 30, 31. When the Israelites beyond Jordan had raised upon the banks of the river a vast heap for an altar; those on the other side, fearing they were going to forsake the Lord, and to set up another religion, deputed Phinehas, and other chief men, to inform themselves of their reason for erecting this monument. When they found that it was only in commemoration of their union and common origin, Phinehas praised the Lord, saying, We now know that the Lord is with us, since you are not guilty of that prevarication of which we suspected you. Vide the commendation that Jesus the son of Sirach gives Phinehas, Ecclus. xiv. 23.

We do not exactly know the time of the death of Phinehas. But as he lived after Joshua, and before the servitude under Chushan-rishathaim, his death is put A. M. 2590. Under his pontificate the story of Micah happened, Judg. xvii. also the conquest of Laisha by the tribe of Dan, Judg. xviii. 27. and the enormity committed on the wife of the Levite of mount Ephraim. Judg. xix. Phinehas's successor was Abiezer or Abishuah. Judg. xx. 28.

The Rabbins allow a very long life to Phinehas.

II. PHINEHAS, son to Eli the high-priest, and brother to Hophni. See ELI and HOPHNI.

PHLEGON, Φλέγων, zealous, burning; from φλέγω.

I. PHLEGON, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 14. He was bishop of Marathon in Attica, according to the Greeks. They place his festival April 8, as do the Latins. We know no particulars of his life.

II. PHLEGON, a freed-man of Adrian. He composed a history digested by the Olympiads, as far as A. D. 140. In this history he notices, that in the fourth year of the two hundred and second second Olympiad, (about the middle of A. D. 33.) there happened the greatest eclipse of the sun that had ever been seen, the stars appearing in the heavens at noon-day; that afterwards there was a great earthquake in Bithynia. Euseb. Chronic. p. 202. Hieronym. Chronic. p. 158. Chronic. Alex. p. 520. Several critics believe, this to be that darkness which happened at the death of Jesus Christ. On this account we insert Phlegon. See DARKNESS, Add.

PHRAORTES. We have said, after some learned men, that Phraortes, king of the Medes, noticed by Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 102, is the same as Arphaxad, who was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, mentioned in Judith.

After Dejoces, the first king of the Medes, and founder of Ecbatana, succeeded Phraortes. "Not contenting himself with the empire of the Medes, he declared war against the Persians, and was the first who brought them into subjection to the Medes. Finding himself master of those two potent and warlike nations, he subdued the greater part of the people of Asia, whom he attempted one after another. At last he made war with the Assyrians, whose capital was Niniveh, a people that formerly possessed the empire of Asia, but was then forsaken by their allies, though still powerful enough to make head against him. Phraortes carrying the war into their country, in the twenty-second year of his reign, was defeated, and perished with the greater part of his army. His successor was his son Cyaxares."

Judith speaks of Arphaxad:—in the twelfth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned in Niniveh the great city, in the days of Arphaxad, who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana. And built in Ecbatana walls round about, &c. (Herodotus ascribes the building of Ecbatana to Dejoces, father of Phraortes, but that is not inconsistent with Phraortes's beautifying and fortifying this city.) After that, he boasted of his power, as being invincible; by the strength of his army, and by the multitude of his chariots; but, Nebuchadnezzar king of the Assyrians, who reigned at Nineveh the Great, made war in the twelfth year of his reign with Arphaxad, and overcame him in the great plain of Ragau, near the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Jadason, in the country of Arioch king of the Elymeans.—The twelfth year of Nebuchadnezzar falls, according to our chronology, A. M. 3347.

Difference of names ought to be no objection in Oriental historians. We know that they almost always differ from the Greeks, in the names of their princes: [or rather, the Greeks differed from them; being unable to pronounce several of their letters, or syllables, especially when combined into words.] See F. Montfaucon, concerning the truth of the book of Judith; and for the contrary opinion, M. Basnage's Jewish Antiquities, tom. 2. p. 252, &c.

PHRYGIA, Φρυγία, dry, barren; from φρύγιος. [rather, perhaps, sun-burnt.]

[Phrygia, in Asia Minor, had Galatia north; Lycaonia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Lycia, south; Cappadocia, east. Plin. lib. v. cap. 32. Jerom. says there were two Phrygias: Smyrna was situated in the greater, Ilium in the lesser. Acts xiv. 24.

In Phrygia the greater, called also Pacatiana, were Laodicea and Hierapolis; and some think that Acts ii. 10. speaks of this Phrygia, because Pamphylia is spoken of immediately after it; while Phrygia the lesser is intended, Acts xvi. 6. xviii. 23. because Galatia is there connected with it.

The inhabitants were of a servile disposition; best kept to their duty by stripes (Sero sapiunt Phryges, Erasm. Adag. Cent. i.) and made wise only by sufferings, says Cicero, pro Flacc. They were reported to be ingenious; but stubborn, imprudent and voluptuous.

It abounded with Jews, says Philo: as did all the provinces on the coasts of the Black Sea.]

PHURAH, פֹּרָה, that bears fruit, or that grows; from פָּרָה parah. Servant of Gideon, who went with him to spy the camp of the Midianites, Judg. vii. 10, 11.

PHUT, פֹּט, פֹּתֶת, prayer, big, fat; [extension; i. e. of the family.]

PHUT, or PHUTH, third son of Ham, Gen. x. 6. We believe he peopled either the canton of Phtemphu, Phtemphti, or Phtembuti, of Pliny and Ptolemy, whose capital was Thara in Lower Egypt, inclining towards Lybia; or the canton called Phtenotes, of which Buthas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, (xvi. 9.) Phut was subject to Necho king of Egypt. Nahum, iii. 9. reckons this people among those who ought to come to the assistance of No-Ammon.

[The LXX. write this word with a ϕ, Phoyd; not only Gen. x. but in Judith ii. 23.—In Nahum iii. 9. the Greek is phyges. Jer. xvi. 9. Ezek. xxvii. 10. xxxviii. 6. Josephus writes Phout, which proves that he translated from the Hebrew.

Pliny, lib. v. cap. 1, thus mentions the river Fut; "the natives say, that from a stream which they call Fut to Dyrin, (which is the name of Atlas in their language) is two miles, when they come to a river called Vior." Harduin understands by this river, one which is included in the kingdom of Morocco, at whose mouth is the town of Agasia.

It is remarkable that, from Moses to the prophets in the days of Hezekiah, this people is not mentioned, only when describing the hired auxiliaries of the nations to whom their prophecies refer.

It is, however, absolutely incredible that the Phut mentioned in Judith as conquered by Holofernes, should have been situated in or near Mauritania: nor is it likely that a people so far west should come to the assistance of Egypt.

The Arabic versions, by Phut understand a people in Southern Egypt, if not rather in Nubia: and these might come down the Nile, to assist No-Ammon.]

PHYGELLUS, Φύγελλος, fugitive.

PHYGELLUS, or PHIGELLUS, a Christian of Asia, who being at Rome while St. Paul was there in prison, A. D. 65. forsook him in his necessity, with Hermogenes, 2 Tim. i. 15.—Phygellus is unknown on any other account; and this evasion is by no means to his honour. Metaphrastes, in his discourse on St. Peter and St. Paul, says, that the apostle having made Phygellus bishop of Ephesus, this man seduced the converted Jews to renounce the faith. But these circumstances are altogether uncertain.—Ambrosiaster, in 2 Tim. i. 15, says, that Phygellus and Hermogenes were deceivers, and hypocrites, who attended the apostle only to learn what they could from him, and afterwards to calumniate him, and raise persecutions against him: but when they saw themselves discovered, they left him. [which is just as well founded as the former conjecture: they might be timid, weak and imperfect believers, without being hypocrites.]

PHYLACTERY, Φυλακτήριον, a preservative; from the Greek φυλάσσω, I keep, I preserve. Matth. xxiii. 5.

PHYLACTERY. [A TALISMAN] such as the Pagans carried about them, to preserve them from evils, diseases, or dangers: e. gr. they wore stones, or pieces of metal, engraved under certain aspects of the planets. The East is to this day filled with this superstition, and the men do not only wear phylacteries for themselves, but for their animals also. Jesus Christ in the gospel says, the Scribes and Pharisees “make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments.” These phylacteries were little rolls of parchment, wherein were written certain words of the law. These they wore upon their foreheads, and upon the wrist of their left arm. They founded this custom on Exod. xiii. 9. “And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes.” And verse 16. “And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes.”

The Jews wrote on their phylacteries these four passages of the law: 1st, “Sanctify unto me all the first-born: whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and beast, it is mine,” &c. to the 10th verse. 2. From the 11th verse, “And it shall be when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites,” &c. to verse 16. 3. From the 4th verse of the 6th chapter of Deuteronomy, “Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,” to verse the 9th. 4. From the 19th verse of the 11th chapter, “And it shall come to pass, if you shall hearken diligently to my commandments,” &c. to the end of verse 21.

Leo of Modena informs us particularly about these rolls. Ceremonies of the Jews, P. i. cap. 11. n. 4. Those that were to be fastened to the arms were two rolls of parchment written in square letters, with an ink made on purpose, and with much care. They were rolled up to a point, and were inclosed in a sort of case of black calves-skin. Then they were put upon a square bit of the same leather, but something stiffer, from whence hung a thong of the same, of about a finger's breadth and a cubit and a half long. These rolls were placed at the bending of the left arm, and after the thong had made a little knot in the form of the letter Jod, it was wound about the arm in a spiral line, which ended at the top of the middle finger. It was called Teffila shel-jad, or, the Teffila of the hand.

That of the forehead was composed of four pieces of parchment, on each of which was written one of the sentences before-mentioned.—These four pieces were joined together in a square, and they wrote on them the letter Shin. Then they put over them a little square of stiff calf-leather, from whence proceeded two thongs like the former. This square was put on the middle of the forehead, and the thongs going round the head, made a knot behind like the letter Dalet, and then came round again to the breast. They called this Teffila shel-rosh, the Teffila of the head. The modern Jews content themselves with putting on these phylacteries only at morning-prayers. Some of the most devout put them on at the time of noon-prayers also, but they are under no obligation to do this. Vide FRAGS. No. CCXXXIV. and PLATE.

Some ancients think, (Origen, Chrysostom, Hieronym. Euthym. in Matth.) that the use of the Tephilim (for thus the Jews call what the gospel names phylacteries) is as ancient as Moses; and several interpreters (Lightfoot, Scalig.

Maldon. alii.) insist, that at the time of our Saviour this custom was general, and that even he himself wore them; and that he reproves in the Pharisees only the affectation of having larger phylacteries than other men. But I cannot prevail on myself to think, that this custom ever generally obtained. Jerom says, (in Matth. xxiii. so Theophylact,) that, in his time, the Indian, Persian, and Babylonish Jews, very commonly wore these rolls on their foreheads, and that those who wore them were esteemed as the most religious and devout. This therefore was not universal, even among the Jews beyond the Euphrates, and much less among those on this side that river. The same Jerom thinks, that the Pharisees wrote the decalogue on their phylacteries.—Chrysostom, Homil. 43. in Matth. writing on the same passage, condemns the abuse of them among Christians, who carried phylacteries about their necks, in which were written certain names of angels in Hebrew, or some parts of the gospel. Jerom notices the same abuse, and Pope Gelasius condemned this sort of superstitious phylactery. Vide BUXTORF, Synag. Jud. cap. 4.

PHYSCON, or PHISCON, otherwise, Euergetes VII. king of Egypt. See PTOLEMY.

[PI. Mr. BRUCE tells us, "The Arabs call the narrow passes in the mountains Fum, as the Hebrews did Pi—the mouth. Fum el Beder, is the mouth of Beder; Fum el Terfowey, the passage, or mouth of Terfowey: Pi, or Phi-Hhiroth, the mouth of the valley cut through with ravines." Vide FRAGS. No. XXXIX.

[PI is the Egyptian article, equivalent to our English the: it is therefore, probable, that its occurrence denotes an Egyptian word, a remaining evidence of the sojourning of Israel in Egypt.]

[PIBESETH, or BUBASTUS, the mouth of kicking, or contempt.

A city of Egypt, Ezek. xxx. 17. called also "Jew's town." But, taking this for an Egyptian word, beseth, appears to denote a female, a wife, I suspect the consort of Baal, a lady; whence Isis, as the wife, consort, or lady, of Osiris: as the Hebrew Asheh certainly signifies: and Horus, lib. i. Hierog. 3. informs us that Isis is the Coptic for a female. Bubastis, then, was a city built in honour of Isis. So on the column of Isis, in Strabo, lib. i. we read, "I am Osiris the king, my sister-wife Bubastis built this city," &c. She is considered as having chosen light for her portion, when the gods, according to the Egyptian fable, selected from the whole earth that which was most suitable to their natures. Vide Kircher, Œdip. Egypt, tom. i.

Syntag. i. cap. 3. p. 14. Bubastis was Diana, says Herodotus, who reports that this word signifies a female cat, under which symbol Diana was worshipped in Egypt, as we learn from Stephanus, de Urb. The pi is the Egyptian article, and is so understood by Cassela, Diss. de Templo Oniæ Heliopol. cap. 2. and Chamberlain, Orat. Domin. p. 100. But, in the Coptic language, Bubastis signifies "the given bull," or cow: and we know that under this form Osiris and Isis were worshipped in Egypt. It is so interpreted by Abenephlius, an Arabian writer, apud Kircherum, l. c. cap. 4. See APIS.

It seems to be every way probable that the Hindoo cow of plenty, was commemorated by the Isis in the shape of a cow offering nourishment to Horus: and this may be thought the beseth, or female baal, as we know that Baal was often symbolized under the type of a bull. Comp. the PLATE of BAAL, No. 2.]

PI-HAHIROTH, פִּי-חִירוֹת, the mouth, the pass of Hiroth, or the opening of liberty; from פֶּה pe, a mouth, and חָרַר charar, or חֵר chir, liberty; otherwise, mouth engraved; from חָרַת charath, to engrave.

[Simon renders the mouth, or aperture of caverns. But, taking it as an Egyptian word, it appears that pi is an article, and Jablonski, de Terra Gosen, Diss. v. p. 59. composes it of achi, which in Egyptian signifies grass, and roth to come to; importing the spot which is extremely fertile in grass. But Hardt supposes that by Hahiroth the town of Gerrha is intended, and Hasius understands Ecregma on the Sirbonic lake. Father Sicard, in his Nouveaux Memoires des Missions, tom. vi. mentions a place called Thouares, where are many considerable caverns, which Schmidt takes advantage of in reference to Hahiroth, thinking it the same place.]

PI-HAHIROTH. The Hebrews departing from Succoth, came to Etham. Then the Lord said to Moses, "Turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over-against Baal-zephon." Exod. xiii. 20. xiv. 2. (פִּי חִירוֹת LXX. Ἀπέναντι τῆς ἐπαύλεως. E regione suburbii; as if they had read פִּי חִירוֹת instead of חִירוֹת.) Moses, Numb. xxxiii. 8. calls it simply Hiroth. So does Eusebius, and Jerom, also, in his book of Hebrew places. Others, as the Syriac, translate it, over-against the ditches. The LXX. in Exodus xiv. 2. translate it, over-against the villages; others, (as Rab. Salam. Fag.) over-against the pass of liberty, or the pass of drought. We think Hiroth to be the city Heroum, or Heroopolis, situated at the extremity, or point, of the Red Sea, or else the city of Phagroriopolis, Phagroriopolis, placed by Strabo, lib. xvii. about the same place, and the capital of the canton of Phagroriopolitis. There is great probability that Pi-hahiroth stands for the pass which was near Heroum. Beyond this pass the Hebrews went to encamp at the Red Sea. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXIX.

PILATE, Πιλάτος, armed with a dart.

PILATE, or PONTIUS PILATE. His family or country is not known; but it is believed he was of Rome, or at least of Italy. Peter le Manguer says he was of Dauphiny, of a place not far from S. Valier on the Rhone. Theophylact on Matth. xxvii. believes he was originally of Pontus, because of his name Pontius. He was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, A. D. 26 or 27. He governed this province ten years, from the twelfth or thirteenth year of Tiberius, to his twenty-second or twenty-third year. Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 5.

Pilate was of an impetuous and obstinate temper; he disturbed the repose of Judea, and gave occasion to the troubles and revolt that followed. Having sent his troops from Cesarea to Jerusalem, to winter there, he caused at the same time his ensigns to be carried thither, on which were the images of the emperor; whereas the governors were not accustomed to let their ensigns enter the city, because they would not exasperate the Jews, who thought all images and representations contrary to their religion. Wherefore Pilate caused them to be brought in concealed, and by night. But the day following, the matter being discovered, the Jews from the country ran into the city, and afterwards went in great numbers to Cesarea, to entreat Pilate to take away those images. Pilate refused; and the people continued five days and five nights making supplication to him, without intermission.

At last, on the sixth day, Pilate having caused a tribunal to be set up, in an open place of Cesarea, sent for the Jews, as if to give them an answer. But he posted soldiers round the place, who inclosed them, when they were assembled, and threatened to massacre them every one, if they did not retire. Then the Jews threw themselves on their faces, and presented their necks to the soldiers, as ready to receive the blow.—Pilate was astonished at their intrepidity; and presently caused his images to be brought back to Cesarea. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 4. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 14.

Philo, (Legat. ad Caium. p. 1033, 1034. The time of this event is not known.) relates another history that happened under Pilate, which has some resemblance to the foregoing. He designed to consecrate golden bucklers to Tiberius, in the palace of Herod. These bucklers were without figures or images, and had only an inscription, importing their consecration to the emperor. This, however, alarmed the Jews, who were jealous for their religion. The magistrates of Jerusalem, with the sons of Herod at their head, and followed by the people, came to Pilate, desiring him to suppress a thing so contrary to their law. But Pilate, with his usual obstinacy, was inflexible. They persisted, and conjured him not to lay them under the necessity of sending a deputation to the emperor, to cause this order to be revoked. Pilate was greatly afraid of such a deputation, apprehending the Jews would then expose his insolence, cruelties, rapines, and outrages, to the emperor; but, they contented themselves with writing to the emperor, and Tiberius wrote back the same day to Pilate, and ordered him immediately to remove those bucklers from Jerusalem.

St. Luke, (xiii. 1.) acquaints us that Pilate had mingled the blood of some Galileans with their sacrifices; this being related to Jesus Christ, he said, "Think you that these Galileans were greater sinners than other Galileans, because they suffered this calamity? No, I assure you. And if you do not repent, you shall all perish in like manner." It is not known on what occasion Pilate caused these Galileans to be slain in the temple, while they were sacrificing; for this is the meaning of the expression, mingling their blood with their sacrifices. Some, (See Theophylact, Euthemius, Grotius, Brug. &c.) think they were disciples of Judas Gaulonites, who taught, that the Jews ought not to pay tribute to foreign princes; and that Pilate had put some of them to death, even in the temple; but there is no proof of this. Others think, (Maldonatus, Beza) that these Galileans were Samaritans, whom Pilate cut to pieces in the village of Tirataba, as they were preparing to go up to mount Gerizim, where a certain impostor had promised to discover treasures to them. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 5. But this event did not happen before A. D. 35, consequently two years after the death of Jesus Christ.

At the time of our Saviour's passion, Pilate repeatedly endeavoured to deliver him from the Jews. He knew they accused him capitally, only out of malice and envy. His wife also, who had been disturbed with dreams, sent and desired him not to participate in condemning that just person.

1. Pilate required legal accusation, evidence, and conviction; and in default of these, he proposed to refer his condemnation to the Jews; who had not, as he well knew, the power of inflicting a capital punishment. John xviii. 29,

31. 2. He attempted to appease the Jews, and to give them some satisfaction, by whipping Jesus Christ. 3. He tried to take him out of their hands, by offering to deliver him, or Barabbas, on the festival day of the passover. 4. He wanted to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod king of Galilee. 5. When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him, saying he could be no friend to the emperor, if he let Jesus go; he caused water to be brought, washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person. Yet at the same time he delivered him up to his soldiers, that they might crucify him. This was enough to justify Jesus Christ, and to shew that Pilate held him innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was, as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence, as to punish the guilty criminal.

He ordered to be put over our Saviour's cross, as it were, an abstract of his sentence, and the motive of his condemnation, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: written in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew letters. Some of the Jews remonstrated to Pilate, that he ought to have written, Jesus of Nazareth, pretended king of the Jews. But Pilate answered them peremptorily, What he had written, he had written. Towards evening he gave leave to take the bodies down from the crosses, that they might not continue there the following day, being the passover and a sabbath-day. He also granted the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathea, that he might pay the last duties to it. When the priests came to desire him to set a watch about the sepulchre, lest the disciples should steal Jesus away by night; he answered they had a guard, and might place it there themselves." This is the substance of what the gospels relate concerning Pilate.

Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. Tertullian, Apol. c. 5. 21. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 2. and after them several others, ancients and moderns, assure us, that it was the custom for Roman magistrates, to send to the emperor copies of all verbal processes and judicial acts, which passed in their several provinces. Pilate, in compliance with this custom, having reported to Tiberius what had occurred relating to Jesus, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner which induced a suspicion that he thought favourably of Jesus, and was not unwilling they should decree divine honours to him. But the senate differed from this opinion, and the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these Acts, that they mentioned the miracles of Jesus Christ; and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius intimates, that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these documents with so much confidence, as would make one believe they had copies of them in their hands.

However, neither Eusebius nor Jerom, who were both inquisitive and understanding persons, nor any later author, seems to have seen them; at least, not the true and original Acts. For as to what we have now in great number, they are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. The Pagans forged false Acts of the passion of Jesus Christ, about the beginning of the fourth century, vide Euseb. lib. ix. cap. 5. They were little favourable to him, without doubt: and were very different from those cited by Justin and Tertullian in the second century. The Quartodecimans had also Acts of Pilate, by which they justified themselves in their errors. Epiphanius, Hæres. 50. cap. 1. They were, however, different from those now mentioned, it not being supposeable that Christians would have recourse to a work contrived by Pagans; and they varied from each other, one asserting that Jesus Christ suffered the eighteenth, the other the twenty-fifth, of March. Lastly, these Acts are not allowed as authentic by those who have spoken of them.

Gregory of Tours thought he had obtained the real Acts of Pilate: but the fragment he cites from it proves, that it was probably the false gospel of Nicodemus, which has been often suppressed.

[The Acts of Pilate, if we had them, would, no doubt, afford much illustration of various points of Christian history. That they once existed, is very credible. Justin's words are—"and that these things were so done you may know from the Acts made in the time of Pontius Pilate." He is speaking of the crucifixion: and again, speaking of our Lord's miracles, he says, "and that these things were done by him, you may know from the Acts made in the time of Pontius Pilate." Justin wrote about A. D. 140. It is remarkable, that he does not say Pilate wrote these Acts himself: it is therefore likely that these official papers were written by some public officer, or secretary. Tertullian, (about A. D. 200) says,—“of all these things, relating to Christ, Pilate, in his conscience a Christian, sent an account to Tiberius, then emperor.” He might send other documents, beside his own report. He might address to Tiberius various information not intended for the public eye; and this might be rumoured, especially among the Christians; who naturally supposed, that circumstances well known to them, were also contained in those letters. And in addition to the arguments in support of the truth of the fact asserted by Justin and Tertullian, it may be thought very credible, that Pilate, knowing the ill terms on which he was with the Jews, and the delicacy of his situation, in case they should first persuade Tiberius, that "he was not Cæsar's friend," would endeavour to be beforehand with them; and would compose his communication to the emperor, in such terms as would throw the odium of the whole transaction on the Jewish rulers, completely. He would describe their disposition to sedition, and the compulsion under which he acted,—although the representative of the emperor himself,—in strong language; and without violating truth, very much to the disadvantage of the Jewish people.

As to the supposed proposal of Tiberius, to enroll Jesus among the Roman deities, it is not likely that this was publicly made. The emperor might mention the thing to some of the senators; or he might say, he had no objection to such a vote: but, it certainly never came to a formal proposition. Nevertheless, if what Justin affirms of having seen, at Rome, a statue erected to Simon Magus, as a god, be correct, it should seem that gods were made with little consideration, in those days. On the whole, the most objectionable part of both these incidents seems to be the interference of the senatorial authority, as a public body; what might be done by private persons, or what might be warranted by private opinion, is altogether a distinct question. A statue, in those days, might infer no more than an engraved portrait, in our own.]

We have, a pretended letter of Pilate to Tiberius, in the recapitulation of the false Hegesippus, and in a writing ascribed to Marcellus, a disciple of St. Peter. It is printed in the Chronicon of Martinus Polonus, in Sixtus Senensis, and in several others, though with variations. It is thus translated from the Latin:

"Pontius Pilate to Claudius wisheth health. By the envy of the Jews a thing has lately happened here, of which I myself was a witness, which will involve them and their children in a dreadful punishment. For their fathers having had assurances from God, that he would send them his saint from heaven, to be their realking, and who was to be born of a virgin; God did really accomplish this promise to him, while I was governor of Judea. And the Jews having seen, that he restored sight to the blind, and health to the paralytic; that he cleansed the lepers, drove out devils from those that were possessed, raised the dead, had command over the winds, walked dry upon the sea, and did many other miracles;

while the whole multitude looked upon him as the Son of God, the chief of the Jews conceived an extreme envy and jealousy against him. They seized him, delivered him up to me, and formed many false accusations against him, saying he was a magician, and a transgressor of their law. As to myself, thinking what they said of him to be true, I caused him to be whipped, and then delivered him up to their will. They crucified him, and set a watch at his sepulchre. But the third day he rose again, while my soldiers guarded his tomb. The malice of the Jews was such, that they gave money to the soldiers, and bid them say that his disciples took away his body. But when the soldiers had received the money, they could not forbear from owning the truth. They declared that Jesus Christ was risen, and that the Jews had given them money not to speak of it. Of this I thought proper to give you notice, that credit may not be given to the lies of the Jews."

There is another pretended letter of Pilate to Tiberius, in Florentine, p. 113, and another in the history of Jesus Christ, written in Persian by Jerome Xavier. The Bollandists on February 4, have given a spurious history of our Saviour, sent to Tiberius by Pilate. Lastly, Fabricius has given one in Greek, taken from a MS. of Colbert's, marked 2493. And Cotelerius quotes another also in Greek; in the king's library, No. 2431, which are nothing better than those we have mentioned.

About a year after the death of Jesus Christ, Pilate undertook to bring water to Jerusalem by an aqueduct, from a source about two hundred furlongs from the city. To perform this, Pilate took money out of the sacred treasury. The people raised an uproar, and gathered together to the number of several thousands, making outcries against the governor. Some were so violent, as to vent injurious exclamations against him. Pilate coming into the city, caused many of his soldiers to disguise themselves, and mix with the multitude; while he was addressing the Jews, they began to vociferate and speak insolently; he then made signs to the soldiers, who falling on, struck indifferently all about them, not distinguishing the silent from the brawlers. By this violent means he appeased the sedition.

After this story, Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 5. relates what we have mentioned before, concerning the Samaritans: they being seduced by an impostor who promised to discover many precious vessels, which he said had been hid by Moses in mount Gerizim, assembled in great numbers, with arms, and waited at the village of Tirataba, that they might ascend mount Gerizim, zim together. But Pilate having previously occupied the height of the mountain with his horse and foot, attacked them at Tirataba, slew a great number, dispersed the rest, and put to death the chief of those who fell into his hands. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius governor of Syria, maintaining that this meeting of people at Tirataba was with no intention to revolt, but only to secure themselves from the severity of Pilate. On which Vitellius sent Marcellus, one of his friends, into Judea, to superintend this province, and ordered Pilate to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to Tiberius. Pilate quitted the government of Judea, A. D. 36. the 23rd year of Tiberius. The emperor was dead before Pilate arrived at Rome.

We know not the particulars of what afterwards happened to this governor, but it is an ancient tradition, Ado, Chro. Ætat. 7. that he was banished to Vienne in Dauphiny, where he was reduced to such extremity, that in despair he killed himself with his own sword. Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 7. (vid. Oros. lib. vii. cap. 5.) quotes this fact, as extracted from authors, who had digested (he says) the Roman history by Olympiads. He seems to intimate Phlegon, the freed-man of Adrian.

Pilate is described by Philo the Jew, as a judge accustomed to sell justice; and, for money, to pronounce any sentence that was desired: he mentions his rapines, his injuries, his murders, the torments he inflicted on the innocent, and the persons he put to death without form or process: in short, a man that exercised excessive cruelty during all the time of his government.—Philo, de Legatione ad Caium.

The popular tradition of Vienne in Dauphiny, is, that Pilate was banished to this city, which was the place of his nativity: and they call an ancient edifice, in the form of a temple, (otherwise, Notre Dame de la Vie) by the name of Pilate's Pretorium. On this tradition, the magistrates had caused to be inscribed on the front of this edifice, "This is the head of Pilate's sceptre." M. Chorier, in his Antiquities of Vienne, has confuted these suggestions; he thinks, that the memory of a certain Italian called Humbert Pilati, has given occasion to the people to call a tower at Vienne, near the Rhone, the tower of Pilate; and a country-house (of Pilati) near St. Vallier, the house of Pilate, &c. [There is also a supposititious, but ancient, house of Pilate at Rome; and a mountain among the Glaciers, is called Mons Pileati, which some travellers have taken for the Mount of Pilate; whereas, it simply means the cloud-capped mountain, or peak. Such mistakes cannot be too carefully guarded against.]

PILDASH, פִּלְדָּשׁ, פִּלְדָּשׁ, ruin, or loss of breaking; from פָּלַח palah, ruin, or loss, and פָּרַח dish, bruising of grain: otherwise, judgment of bruising; from פָּלַח pillel, judgment, &c. Son of Nahor and Milcah. Gen. xxii. 22. [More probably, a burning lamp; the light, i. e. joy of his parents. Such names were common among the ancients, as well Latins as Greeks.]

PILEHA, פִּילְהָ, פִּילְהָ, fragment, rupture: from פָּלַח palach, to cleave, to divide. A Chaldee name, to serve, to act; from the Chaldee פָּלַח palach. A chief priest, who signed the covenant, Neh. x. 24. [born in captivity?]

[PILGRIM, should, I believe, denote one who is going forward to visit a holy place, with design to pay his solemn devotions there. Whether pilgrimages are as ancient as the days of Jacob, we cannot now enquire (vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXIX. for a conjecture that they might be as old as Moses) but, if they were, it gives a very expressive sense to the words of that good old man, who calls the years of his life "the days of his pilgrimage;" and is perfectly consistent with the apostle's observation, that the ancient patriarchs "confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on earth," Heb. xi. 3.]

PILLAR: a pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, signify a cloud, a fire, a smoke, which rising up toward heaven, forms an irregular column. The pillars of heaven, Job xxvi. 11. the pillars of the earth, Job ix. 6. Psalm lxxv. 3. are metaphorical expressions, by which the heavens and the earth are compared to an edifice, raised by the hand of God, and founded upon its basis, or foundation. [Somewhat like our axis of the earth; the poles, &c.] This appears from those words, Job xxxviii. 4, 5, 6. "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened, or who laid the corner-stone thereof?"

Pillars of the church,—James, Cephas, and John, "seemed to be pillars." Gal. ii. 9. "Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." Rev. iii. 12. He shall be the support, the strength, and the ornament of the house of God. The church of Jesus Christ, is called by St. Paul, 1 Tim. iii. 15. "the pillar and ground of the truth." When the Lord sent Jeremiah to preach to the nations, he says to him, Jer. i. 18. "Behold, I have made thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls, against the whole land; able to withstand withstand all the efforts of thine enemies, and incapable of yielding to their violence."

PINE, pinus, a tree well known; of the nature of the fir-tree. Isaiah, xliv. 14. speaks of a man who planted a pine, of which he has made an idol. The Hebrew oreḥ, oren, by the Septuagint and Jerom is translated a pine. Others interpret it an elm. The English translation reads an ash. In another place of the same prophet (lx. 13.) we find also pine, in the Vulgate; but the Hebrew has, Tashur, which the Septuagint render the cedar; other interpreters, the elm. The English has the box. Lastly, the wood of the pine is mentioned 2 Chron. ii. 8. but the Hebrew reads Algumim. LXX. Παύλινα, Eng. algum-trees: it probably signifies in general, trees that are fat and resinous, or trees that produce gum.

PINNACLE of the temple. When the devil had tempted Jesus in the desert, Matt. iv. 5. "he taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple; and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down;" &c. This pinnacle was, probably, that gallery, or parapet, or wall on the top of the buttresses, which surrounded the roof of the temple, properly so called. For it is well known, that in Palestine the roofs were covered with terraces, or platforms; round about which was a low wall, to prevent any one from falling down. Deut. xxii. 8. Josephus tells us, Antiq. lib. vi. cap. 6. in Lat. that the roof of the temple was defended by pretty tall golden spikes, to hinder birds from alighting thereon, that they might not defile it with their dung. It was not therefore on the roof of the temple, that Jesus Christ was placed, but on the wall that surrounded the roof.

[It is by no means probable that the temptation of Jesus to throw himself down among the people at worship, took place in any part of the high roof of the temple. It is much more likely, that the place was in some more accessible part, to which there was a passage by stairs: for, as to the very vague, though common, notion of the person of Jesus being carried through the air by the power of the devil, it is by no means eligible. The account given by Hegippus of the death of James the less, (see his Article) may illustrate this incident of the temptation. He went up into a gallery, whence he could be heard by the people, and from whence he was thrown down, without being instantly killed.]

PINON, פִּינֹן, pearl, or gem; from פָּנָה; or that beholds; from פָּנָה panah, to behold.

[A duke of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 41. 1 Chron. i. 52. The name may import great anxieties. Vol. II. PART XXII. Edit. IV.

of his mother. It has been thought, that Punon, a station of the Israelites, said by Jerom in his Hebrew Places, to be a chief town of the Edomites, was named from this Pinon. It was famous for smelting of brass (copper.) Comp. Bochart, Hieroz. P. 2. col. 427. See PUNON.]

[PIPE, vide MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, Plate I. FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXI.]

PIRAM, פִּירָם, their wild ass, or their fierceness; from פָּרָא para, and the pronoun אִם am, their's: otherwise, the bull, or the fruit of the mother; from פָּר par, a bull, or פָּרָה parah, to fructify, and אִם am, a mother. King of Jarmuth; Joshua slew him, and hanged him, Josh x. 8, 24, 25, 26.

PIRATHON, פִּירָתוֹן, his dissipation, his deprivation, his rupture; from פָּרַח paruh, and the pronoun אִנּוּ an, his: according to the Syriac, his vengeance. [The last justice, or vengeance, on the enemy, when taken, say some.]

PIRATHON, or PHARATON, a city of Ephraim, in mount Amalek. Abdon, judge of Israel, was of this city, and was buried there, Judg. xii. 15. Bacchides caused this city to be fortified. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 1. Called Pharathom, 1 Macc. ix. 50.

PISGAH, פִּסְגָּה, hill, eminence, fortress; from פָּסַג pasag.

[The high hill: properly so called, because of its great altitude. It might be a summit, or peak, rising from, or among, a series of lower hills. Numb. xxi. 28. xxiii. 14. Deut. iii. 7, 29, &c.]

PISGAH, or PHASGAH, a mountain beyond Jordan, in Moab. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah, and Abarim make but one chain, near mount Peor, over-against Jericho, on the road from Livias to Heshbon. See Eusebius and Jerom, on Nebo and Abarim.

[In the Hebrew text, Deut. xxxiv. 1—3, the prospect enjoyed by Moses from Pisgah, reaches from Dan, north, to Zoar, south; but in the Samaritan Pentateuch it is much more extensive: "all the land from the river of Egypt, to the river, the great river Euphrates, to the utmost sea." This was the extent of Solomon's dominions: and the utmost bounds of the royal power of the kings of the Israelites. But another use may be made of this passage, not without its importance. Could this whole district be seen from any other mountain than Pisgah? Was this the same extent as was shewn by the tempter to our Lord, when exciting his ambition? "All this, the utmost bounds that ever were enjoyed by the ancient kings of thy nation, from whom thou art descended; all the whole kingdom and dominion of thine ancestors, will I give thee, if," &c. This may account for the term used by St. Luke, iv. 5. rendered in our version, "all the world."

We have had formerly occasion to regret that we have no views from the tops of mountains described to us by travellers. Such a circumstance might determine on what mountain this temptation was presented to our Lord; and perhaps, also, the order of the temptations; which is now subject to different opinions.]

PISIDIA, Πισιδία, pitch, or pitchy; from πισσώδης; [i. e. black pitch, or tar.]

PISIDIA, a province of Asia Minor, having Lycaonia north, Pamphilia south, Cilicia and Cappadocia east, and the province of Asia west. St. Paul preached at Antioch of Pisidia, Acts xiii. 14. and throughout Pisidia, xiv. 24.

[Antioch was a famous city in this province. Strabo, lib. xii. Its inhabitants are commended by Livy for their skill in war, (feroces ad bellandum, lib. xxxviii. cap. 13, 15.) and were anciently called Solymi, who were compared to lions for their courage. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 27.]

PISON, פִּישׁוֹן, Φίσων, changing, or doubling, or extension of the mouth; from פֶּה pe, the mouth, and שָׁנָה shanah, to change, to double: otherwise, extended; from פָּשָׁה pashah: otherwise, multitude; from פָּשַׁח push, to be multiplied.

PISON, or PHISON, one of the four great rivers that watered paradise. We take it to be the Phasis, a famous river of Colchis. Moses says, Gen. ii. 11, 12, it runs through all the land of Havilah, where excellent gold is found. This river rises in the mountains of Armenia, and discharges itself into the Euxine sea. Hardly any river in the world has more turnings and windings, because of the mountains in its way; whence, in the time of Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 4. there were a hundred and twenty bridges over this river: and this, perhaps, Moses hints at, when he says, that "Pison compasseth the whole land of Havilah," which land we take to be Colchis. The gold of this country is much celebrated. All antiquity extols the riches of Colchis. Strabo, lib. xi. observes, that the rivers and brooks of this country, (or of the neighbouring countries, for we cannot tell its ancient limits) carried particles of gold with their waters, which the inhabitants gathered on sheepskins with their wool on, or in wooden trays with holes bored in them. We think the gold of Phaz, Uphaz, or Ophaz, mentioned in Scripture, is the same with that of Pison, or Phasis. Cant. v. 11. Jer. x. 9. Dan. x. 5.

[A great river of India, flowing from Paradise, Gen. ii. 11. written in Greek Pheison, Sirach, xxiv. 34. Eusebius, also Jerom in Heb. Quest. calls it the Ganges: Josephus, Ant. lib. i. cap. 2.

calls it Gotha: Solomon, the commentator, calls it the Nile. [The Nilab of India?]

From similarity of sound it has been taken for the Phasis: which is the sentiment of Reland, Dissert. Misc. P. i. 7. Lakemacher understands the Jordan, Obs. Philol. P. v. obs. 1. Compare FRAGMENTS. Nos. DV. DVII. et al.]

PISPAH, פִּסְפָּה, lessening of the mouth; from פָּסַס pasas, diminution, and פֶּה pe, the mouth. Son of Jether, 1 Chron. vii. 38.

[PITCHER, vide FRAGS. No. LVIII.]

PITCH. See BITUMEN.

PITHOM, פִּתּוֹם, their mouthful, or bit; from פֶּתַח path, and the pronoun הֵם am, their's: otherwise, consummation, or dilatation of the mouth; from פֶּה pe, the mouth, and תָּמַם tham, finished, perfect.

[The Chaldee and Syriac agree in the idea of breadth: whence some think it imports a very spacious place. [flats?] Herodotus and Stephens write Patumos. If this word be derived from the Egyptian, pi is the masculine article, and thom may signify the hero; hero-town; Heroopolis. But Jablonski, de Terra Gosen, Diss. v. p. 58. thinks thom is the same as the Coptic, atsom, "the end of the sea;" for which they also said, with the article, pi-tom: in this case the name may import "shore-town." I conjecture it may denote a town at the extremity of the waters of the Nile, rather than at the extremity of the sea.]

PITHOM, or PHITHOM, one of the cities built by the children of Israel for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude, Exod. i. 11.—This is, probably, the Pathumos mentioned by Herodotus, lib. ii. which he places on the canal made by the kings Necho and Darius, to join the Red Sea with the Nile. We find also, in the ancient geographers, Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, &c. that there was an arm of the Nile, called Pathmeticus, Phatmicus, Phatnicus, or Phatniticus. Bochart says, Descript. Ter. Sanct. that Pithom and Ramesses are about five leagues above the division of the Nile, and beyond this river: but this assertion has no proof from antiquity. Marsham will have Pithom to be the same as Pelusium, or Damietta.

PITHON, פִּיתוֹן, his mouth; from פֶּתַח path: otherwise, his persuasion; from פָּתַח pathah, and the pronoun הֵם an, his: otherwise, gift of the mouth; from פֶּה pe, mouth, and תָּנָה thanah, gift. [spreading? i. e. of the family. Son of Micah. 1 Chron. viii. 35. ix. 41.]

PITY. See MERCY.

PLAGUES of Egypt. See MOSES.

The Hebrews call plagues, all diseases sent as punishments or corrections from God; the pestilence, infection, leprosy, sudden death, famine, famine, tempests;—all calamities, public, or private.

PLAIN. In Palestine we find two large vales, known to historians and geographers by the name of plains. One extends along the Jordan from Tiberias to Segor or Seor; about twelve hundred furlongs in length; in breadth one hundred and twenty furlongs, Joseph. Ant. lib. ix. cap. 11. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. The other is the plain or field, of Esdraelon or Legio, named from these cities standing in it; or, the valley of Jezreel, because of the city of Jezreel, 2 Chron. iv. 17. It reaches from east to west, from Scythopolis on the Jordan, to Legio, at the foot of Carmel, in length about twenty-five leagues. Eusebius and Jerom, in Αὐλῶν, give a still larger extent to the great plain along the Jordan; from Libanus to the wilderness of Parak. The valley or plain of Jericho was in this great plain, and made a part of it, as may be seen from Eusebius, in Ἐγγαδδὶ. These great plains are sometimes called, the plains of Aulon, or Aulos, or Araba.

PLANE-TREE, Platanus. The Hebrew עץ הרמון Hermon, which the Septuagint and Jerom translate by Πλατάνος, a plane-tree, Genesis xxx. 37. by modern interpreters, who generally follow the Rabbins, is rendered a chestnut-tree. In Ezekiel xxxi. 8. the Septuagint translate it a fir-tree. So true it is, that we have but little certainty, concerning the Hebrew names of trees.

PLAY, to play. The Hebrews use this word to express all kinds of diversions, as dancing, sports of exercise, toying, and amusements proper for recreating the mind, and diverting it. The word לעצ Zachak, which signifies to play, is commonly used for laughing, mocking, jeering, insulting. When Sarah saw Ishmael play with her son Isaac, she was offended at it: it was a play of mockery or insult, or, perhaps, of squabbling, as in 2 Sam. ii. 14. Let the young people (or soldiers) get up, and play before us; [shew their skill at their weapons,] let them fight, as it were, by way of play; but the event shews, that they fought in good earnest, since they were all killed.

We see another kind of play in Exodus xxxii. 6. When the Israelites had set up the golden calf, they began to dance about it, and to divert themselves: "The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play." When Samson was delivered by Dalilah into the hands of the Philistines, they bored out his eyes, put him in prison, and some time after made him play before them, i. e. divert them by the tricks they played him, and by the motions he was forced to make, to avoid them, and to screen himself from their insults. Judg. xvi. 25. [by shewing feats of his wonderful strength.]

The women that came out to meet David and Saul, when they returned victorious from the slaughter of Goliath, danced and played on instruments, and shewed their mirth after a thousand manners. 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. In the procession at the removal of the ark, from the house of Obededom to the palace of king David, he danced with great alacrity, played on instruments, and testified his joy before the Lord, 2 Sam. vi. 5, 21. And when Michal upbraided him, for not observing the gravity suitable to his rank, he answered, I will play before the Lord, and will be still more vile in my own eyes.

Sarah the daughter of Raguel, opening her heart before the Lord, says; I have never associated myself with those that play; Tob. iii. 17. And Jeremiah xv. 17. I have never haunted the assemblies of those that are given to play and diversion. The same prophet, comforting the daughter of Sion, tells her the time shall come, in which she shall be rebuilt, and again shall divert herself in dancing with her equals. Jer. xxxi. 4. Solomon represents Wisdom, as playing before the Lord, and taking her pleasure in living among men, Prov viii. 30, 31. Baruch seems to point at the diversion of fowling, by the name of play, chap. iii. 17. where are the princes of the nations, who domineer over the beasts of the earth, and play with the fowls of the air?

I cannot perceive, in Scripture, any particular sorts of plays; neither games of hazard, nor plays, i. e. theatrical representations, nor races either of horses or chariots, nor combats of men or of beasts. Solomon speaks of nothing like this: though he frankly owns, that he had indulged himself in all kinds of pleasure: he mentions fine buildings, gardens, vineyards, orchards, fish-ponds, good eating and drinking, amassing gold and silver; singing-men, and singing-women, &c. In descriptions of prosperity and profound peace, Scripture speaks neither of games, nor shows, but of well-cultivated and fruitful fields, wherein every one reposes under his own vine, and his own fig-tree, enjoying the fruits of his labours in security; where the old men, sitting in public places, might deliberate about their affairs in common, and where the young people might clothe themselves in glorious apparel, and in ornaments proper for military array. The Israelites were a laborious and warlike people, who confined almost all their plays and diversions to the pleasures of the country, and to those of the festivals of the Lord, their religious journies, and their enjoyments in the temple.

I speak of the times in which the observation of the law was maintained, and of the ancient periods of the Hebrew republic. For when they grew irregular, they adopted the utmost excesses of idolatrous nations, their wicked and shameful sports and diversions. From the time of the Grecians, after the death of Alexander the Great, under the government of the kings of Syria in Judea, they began to study the sports and exercises of the Grecians. There were Gymnasia, or schools of exercise, in Jerusalem, and places where they practised the exercises of the Greeks, wrestling, racing, quoits, &c. 1 Mac. v. 16. 2 Mac. iv. 13, 14, 15. And when the Romans succeeded the Greeks, Herod built theatres and amphitheatres in the cities of Palestine, and instituted all sorts of games. Vide Josephus, loc. plur. and Wagenseil, On the Sports of the Hebrews. See GYMNASIUM.

[PLEDGE, a security or assurance given for the performance of a contract. When a man of veracity pledges his word, his affirmation becomes an assurance that he will fulfil what he has promised. But as the word of every man is not equally valid, in matters of importance, it becomes necessary that a valuable article of some kind should be deposited, as a bond on his part. So Judah gave pledges to Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 17. Under the law the taking of pledges was regulated: the millstone was not to be taken in pledge, Deut. xxiv. 6. nor was the person taking a pledge to enter the house to fetch it, verse 10. nor to detain necessary raiment after sun-set, verse 12. nor was the widow's raiment to be taken in pledge, verse 17. How mild, how benevolent, are these directions! and we find some reproached that they take their brother's pledge, Job xxii. 6. that they take the widow's ox in pledge, xxiv. 3, 9. that they do not restore the pledge, (as the law directed, Deut. xxiv. 18.) Ezek. xviii. 7, 12. xxxiii. 15. To understand Amos ii. 8. "They lay themselves down on clothes laid to pledge, by every altar," observe, how galling this must be to the owners, to see carpets, &c. used in idolatry, carried abroad, laid under idolatrously sacred trees, &c. What insolence in the lender, who held these pledges! what mortification to the borrower, who had delivered them! to see his property 1. published, and 2. profaned. Vide HARMER, vol. iv. p. 377.]

PLEIADES. These are seven stars [anciently, say Vitruvius and Pliny, in the bull's tail; but on modern globes in the shoulder] of the Bull: they appear at the beginning of spring. Ovid, Fast. lib. v. 165.

Ora micant tauri septem radiantia flammis.

Job speaks of the Pleiades, chap. xxxviii. 31. ix. 9. and of the Hyades, which are seven other stars in the Bull's-head, which mark out the east point and the spring. "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades?" Hebrew כִּימָה Chima: Can you hinder the Pleiades from rising in their season? He gives them the name—the sweet influences of Chima, because of the agreeableness of the spring season. Jerom has translated Chima, by Hyades, Job ix. 9. and by Pleiades, Job xxxviii. 31. and by Arcturus, the Bear's-tail, Amos v. 8. Aquila sometimes translates it in like manner. The Bear is one of the most northern constellations; Chima rather signifies the Pleiades.

POCHERETH, פֹּכֶרֶת, פֹּחֶרֶת, destruction of the mouth; from כָּרַת carath, to cut, to tear away, and פֶּה pe, the mouth. [This is rendered in Eng. Tr. Pochereth of Zebaim: taking Zebaim for the residence of Pochereth; but some think the whole forms one name, expressing out-stripping the goats, i. e. in swiftness.—The terms are of the feminine gender, and therefore should seem to denote a woman rather than a man, whose sons are mentioned, Ezra ii. 57. Neh. vii. 59. Perhaps they may denote a woman who had the care or superintendence of flocks of goats, or of goat-herds.]

POETRY of the Hebrews. No point of criticism has been more canvassed among the learned, than that concerning Hebrew poetry.—The most skilful commentators, and the most able critics, have abundantly laboured this argument, and yet we cannot say the matter is exhausted, or the difficulty cleared. Since we cannot pretend to know, nor ever shall know, the true pronunciation of the Hebrew language; and consequently we cannot perceive either the harmony of the words, or the quantity of the syllables, which constitute the beauty of the verses. Nor have we in Hebrew, as we have in Greek and Latin, rules for ascertaining the quantity of the syllables, the number of feet, the cadence and construction of verses; and yet it is plain the Hebrews observed these things, at least in some measure, since in their poems we observe letters added to, or cut off from, the ends of words, which evince submission to the rhythm, to the number, or the measure of syllables. Nor have we now any notion of the tune and dance which generally accompanied Hebrew poetry; for we know that the poetry was sung, and composed purposely for singing: and Scripture frequently speaks of choirs and dances in the ceremonies of religion.

From

From the manner in which Josephus, Origen, Eusebius, and Jerom, have spoken of the Hebrew poetry, it should seem that in their time the beauty and rules of it were well known. Josephus affirms in several places, (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. ult. iv. ult. vii. 10.) that the songs composed by Moses are in heroic verse, and that David composed several sorts of verses and songs, odes and hymns, in honour of God; some of which were in trimeters, or verses of three feet, and others in pentameters, or verses of five feet.—Origen and Eusebius adopted the same sentiment, whether out of deference to the opinion of Josephus, or whether of their own judgment, is uncertain. Origen understood the Hebrew, and Eusebius was one of the most learned men of his time.

Jerom, Prefat. in Chronic. Euseb. has carried this notion still farther, affirming, that the Psalter was composed in Alcaic, Iambic, and Sapphic verses, in the manner of the Odes of Pindar and Horace. And that the songs in Deuteronomy, those of Isaiah, the book of Job, and those of Solomon, are in Hexameter and Pentameter verses. He says elsewhere, Ep. 135. ad Paul. Urb. that the canticle in Deuteronomy is in Iambic verses of four feet, as also Psalm cxviii. and cxliv. whereas Psalm cx. and cxi. are in Iambic verses of three feet.

He observes, in the Lamentations of Jeremiah, a kind of Sapphic verse, and verses of three measures. In several places, Epist. ad Paulin. et lib. ix. Comment. in Ezech. cap. 30. he speaks of the book of Psalms, as of a work composed of lyric verses, like those of Pindar, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus, and Serenus. In his preface to the book of Job, he says, that from these words, “Perish the day in which I was born,” are Hexameter verses, composed of Dactyls and Spondees, wherein are sometimes intermixed other feet of the same measure, though they have not the same number of syllables, because of the variation of the language. Sometimes, says he, without any regard to the quantity of syllables, the poet impresses on you a kind of cadence or harmony, which sensibly affects those who are skilful in the rules of poetry.

Philo, de Vita Contemplativa, ad finem, says, that the Essenes have ancient poems, comprising verses of several forms and measures; some have three members, others are hymns sung at the sacrifices, others were rehearsed at meals, and others were accompanied with dances. Theodore Herbert thought he had found verses in the Bible, like those of the Greeks and Latins; and he has really instanced some. Meibomius boasted, that for above two hundred years nobody but himself had arrived at the knowledge of Hebrew poetry; but he kept this knowledge to himself, and did not think proper to communicate it to the world. We only know, that by means of his poetry, and the alterations he makes in the text, he takes the whole Scripture to pieces. Francis Gomarus, in his treatise called Davidis Lyra, has pretended to give the rules of Hebrew poetry, like those of Greek and Latin; but he brought on himself a confutation from Lud. Capellus, which has not been answered.

Le Clerc composed a very ingenious dissertation, to shew, that the Hebrew poetry, was in rhyme, pretty much like the French or English; and his opinion has been espoused by a good number of partisans. Others maintain, that in the old Hebrew verses there is neither measure nor feet. Scaliger, Animad. in Chronic. Euseb. p. 7. col. 1. even affirms, that this language, as well as that of the Syrians, Arabians, and Abyssynians, is not capable of the restraint of feet or measures. Austin of Eugubium says, the Hebrews have neither heroic verses, nor Iambics, nor any other measure; but only something similar. This opinion is supported by Lud. Capellus, Martin Martinus, Samuel Bohlius, Wasmurh, Aust. Pfeiffer, and others. Grotius also declares for this; and this is indeed the sentiment which we think the most probable. Grot. in Luc. 1. 46. Erant enim ῥυθμοὶ Hebræorum non ἑμμετροί, sed lege soluti, cujusmodi etiam erant, et nunc quoque sunt, eorum saltationes.

ADDITION.

[The importance of this subject may justify a few words here, though it may be resumed to more advantage in another place.

All poetry must have its means of exciting the mind; properly, its working tools, or arts; as similes, figures of speech, amplifications, and even hyperboles: select diction, melodious arrangement of words, and words used in senses most expressive, though not always the most current. Without these, and other licences, no poetry can exist. Moreover, one of the duties expected from poetry being to please the ear, all poetry must have its forms, its cadences, its pauses of the voice, &c. and connected with these its emphasis and its energy. Poetry must present a train of thought well arranged, well expressed, well directed, and well closed: in short, according to Aristotle, the smallest or shortest poem must have a beginning, a middle, and an end.

But, we do not here investigate the general principles of poetry; our object is rather to exemplify some of those characteristics, which are presented by Hebrew poetry. We shall do no more more than hint at the contracting of words, by the elision of vowels, as ' jod, or ' vau ; or the insertion of them, or of short syllables, in words wherein they would not naturally appear in prose. Neither need we treat on the selection of words, longer or shorter, to suit the cadence, or exigencies of metre. It is obvious that Hallelujah! as an exclamation of praise, is more appropriate to the voice of a multitude, than HalleluJehovah! would be: to say the least, brevity best suits the vocal praises of the many; whereas, a single voice, or a trained company, may express the same thing, advantageously, by a periphrasis: Praise ye the name of Jehovah!—The name of Jehovah be praised!

We have no poetical works of other nations which can, by any means, pretend to equal antiquity, with those specimens preserved in the Hebrew books. We cannot, therefore, say, with certainty, how far the rules of Hebrew poetry were, strictly speaking, peculiar to that language; the probability is, that the early Asiatic poetry, was uniform, generally, in various nations. Much of the Arabic poetry bears evidence of an origin cognate with the Hebrew; nor are the maxims of our British Druids, conveyed in sententious verses, for the greater accuracy of memory—and they were committed to memory, not to writing—altogether dissimilar.

The first thing remarkable, in Hebrew poetry, is, a duplication of phraseology, so constructed, that the memory by recollecting one member of the sentence, could not fail of recollecting the other. The earliest specimen extant, exemplifies this, throughout. Lamech, the first man who married two wives, (sisters, perhaps) intent on calming their apprehensions for his safety, does not say, in plain prose, "No one will be so unjust as to kill me for this trifling transgression;" but he puts his argument into verse; and by this means it has been preserved; because the memory retained it with ease and certainty: the names of the parties, once known, recall the whole when repetition is contemplated.

Adah and Zillah,	hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech,	hearken to my speech:
Have I slain a man,	in bloody contest,
A young man,	in violent assault?
If Cain shall be avenged	seven times,
Much more Lamech	seventy seven times.

The first column, if read separately, opens the history; but the second column, by its duplication of phraseology, perfects the series of thoughts, and converts the whole into verses, and poetry.

This duplication is so proper to Hebrew poetry, that a Hebrew poet would not be content to say, "Youth and beauty shall be laid in the dust:" but he would singularize these qualities; he would distinguish, and repeat them: E. gr.

Youth shall be laid in the dust;
And Beauty shall be consumed in the grave.

This is more explicit, has greater strength, as well as greater correctness; for beauty is not invariably conjoined with youth; and there is beauty proper to mature life, and even to old age. The ideas, then, are not precisely the same; yet they are so exquisitely similar, that the recollection of one brings the other to mind, instantly. Something like this we have in the prophet Isaiah, lv. 10. He does not say, "As the rain and the snow (plural) descend (plural) from heaven, and thither they (plural) do not return;"—but he keeps the entire passage in the singular; and thereby much increases its strength.

Verily, like as the Rain descendeth from above,
And the Snow descendeth from the heavens;
And thither it doth not return:—
So shall my word be.—

The reader will observe the brevity, the compactness obtained by the poet, in this construction of his verse; to express his thoughts completely, requires the insertion of the words marked in italics; yet the omission of these words occasions no confusion, no interruption, because the property of descending from the atmosphere is common both to rain and snow. To the original readers, in the Hebrew language, this was still clearer; yet in translation, similar supplements (repetitions) are often necessary to a correct view of the poet's intention: so Balaam says, Micah vi. 5.

Wherewith shall I come before JEHOVAH?
Wherewith shall I bow myself unto the High God?
Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings?
Shall I bow myself unto him with calves of a year old?

This supplementary repetition gives the sentiment at full; and in very many places of Scripture the critic must observe these elisions of words, and feel them, too; though the poet may disregard them; and even deem the critic fastidious. This may be further evinced by an instance in which the supplement is taken, not from a preceding, but from a following sentence: Samson says,

With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps have I smitten;
With the jaw-bone of an ass, a thousand men have I smitten.

The

The sense of the first verse is imperfect, till the close of the second verse completes it. There can be no doubt but what this parallelism was esteemed a beauty ; we find it practised by the polite and sagacious Solomon, to a considerable extent, in the preface to his Proverbs ; the intention of which book is, he tells us :

To know wisdom and instruction ;
To perceive the words of understanding :
To receive the instruction of wisdom,
Justice, and judgment, and equity :
To give subtilty to the simple ;
To the young man knowledge and discretion :
A wise man will hear, and will increase learning ;
And a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels :
To understand a proverb, and the interpretation ;
The words of the wise, and their dark sayings.

The ear sufficiently judges, that in these verses there is rhythm, though not rhyme ; consequently there must be in the original, metrical feet, and poetical cadence ; though we know not how to demonstrate them, having no adequate information to guide us in the correct pronunciation of the language. If what may be called private, simple, or personal, poetry, be metrical, undoubtedly, that which was intended for musical accompaniment, was emphatically so ; and especially, when the tune, or air, existed before the poem, the poem was bound to conform to the progress, the extent, and the expression, of the previously fixed notes, or intonations, whether vocal or instrumental ; by these it was absolutely governed. And if such composition were also intended for public performance, by a numerous band, by various instruments playing in concert, the connection between the poetry and the music must needs be intimate and entire. This appears to have been the case, in the instances of several of the Psalms ; and, as these were performed in two parts, by responsive choirs, and possibly a third part was performed by a still fuller chorus, the necessity of metrical arrangement was imperative : for, if this were neglected, the whole would present a mass of inexpressibly discordant confusion.

Among those Psalms which demonstrate this alternation of song, is the cxxxvi. where the burden "for his mercy endureth for ever," certainly was not uttered by the same persons, or band, as uttered the leading theme. So we read, Ezra iii. 13. the Levites, &c. sang this song, together by course, or alternately ;—and the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord, i. e. Hallelujah ! Psalm cxxxv. also, evidently was performed in several parts. In short, we find this responsive manner in the time of Moses, who, with the men, sang one part of his ode, while Miriam, with the women, sang the answering strains ; and this, no doubt, continued to be the custom, to the latest period of the Hebrew polity.

With respect to the longer poems of Sacred Writ, the reader has seen among the FRAGMENTS a humble attempt to elucidate Solomon's Song, by means of arrangement : this is a beautiful performance ; while the book of Job, the longest of all the Hebrew poems, is most sublime. Late writers have done much to illustrate it ; yet much remains to be done.

We must here conclude these brief and imperfect hints on the subject of Hebrew Poetry.—Those who desire further information, may consult Bishop Hare's Metrical version of the Psalms, supported by Drs. Grey, Edwards, &c. and opposed by Bishop Lowth, whose Lectures on Hebrew Poetry deservedly enjoy an established reputation : to these should be added Sir W. Jones's Dissertation on the Asiatic Poetry, with others since published, especially by our learned countrymen, connected with the East.

A few words, by way of close, may be proper on the subject of early Christian poetry. It is perhaps, to be regretted, that none of those primitive hymns of which we read in the N. T. have come down to us. But, if we accept the poems in the Revelations, as copies of hymns then used in Christian worship, or as imitations of them, it will appear, clearly, that they were performed in the Jewish manner ; by alternate choirs.

This is expressly affirmed by Pliny, when describing Christian worship ; and it appears from the documents themselves. The song of Moses and the Lamb, Rev. xv. 3. is alternate : the same is the ode, chap. vii. 10, 11. and we have a truly wonderful chorus, in chap. v. 13. nor ought we to forget, that the Hebrew terms Hallelujah, and Amen, occur in this book, as parts of Psalmody. It is, however acknowledged, that the innumerable references to the Jewish temple and its scenery, which are contained in this mystical book, weaken all arguments drawn from it, as to the real practice of the early Christians ; for certainly, no such courts, no such altars, seas, or lavers, no ark of the testimony, &c. as are alluded to by the Apocalyptic writer, were adopted in Christian assemblies, or places of worship.]

POETS. There is no doubt but that the ancient Hebrews had their poets ; and we have in the Bible a good number of canticles, and other pieces of poetry. What seems very remarkable is, that their poetry is dedicated, by their application of it, to celebrating the greatness of God.

God and his works. The Hebrew poets, so many of them at least whose works are come down to us, were men inspired of God. We find among them kings, law-givers, prophets. Moses, Barack, David, Solomon, Hezekiah, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and most of the prophets, composed poems, or pieces in verse; the most pompous, the most majestic, and the most sublime! The expression, the sentiments, the figures, the variety, the action, every thing is surprising!

St. Paul gives a Pagan poet the name of prophet. Tit. i. 12. "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own said," &c. Because, among the heathen, poets were thought to be inspired by Apollo. They spoke by enthusiasm. Oracles were commonly [originally] delivered in verse. Poets were interpreters of the will of the gods.

The poet quoted by St. Paul, is Epimenides. The ancients relate many particulars of him, which prove, that they esteemed him inspired, and favoured by the gods. Aristotle says, Rhet. lib. iii. cap. 17. that he did not indeed foretell future events, but that he discovered things past and unknown. Diogenes Laertius, lib. i. and Plutarch, in Solone, give an account, that seeing the fort of Munichium, which is the port of Athens, he cried out, O the blindness of men! If the Athenians could but foresee the misfortunes that this fort will create to them, they would demolish it with their teeth. The truth of these words was evinced some years after, when king Antigonos placed a garrison there, to awe the city of Athens. Another time he encouraged the Athenians, who were apprehensive of an invasion from the Persians. He told them, that it would be ten years before they came, and that then they would be obliged to return again, after having suffered great losses. He also foretold to the Lacedemonians and Cretans, the captivity to which the Arcadians should one day reduce them. Probably from such predictions as these, whether true or false, the Greeks considered Epimenides as a prophet. [N. B. These predictions have in them nothing that requires inspiration: they evince a sound judgment, and clear foresight of political probabilities; but nothing more.]

The same Apostle quotes the poet Aratus, a native of Cilicia, as well as himself. Acts xvii. 28. Τῷ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἵκεν. We are the children (the race) of God. This is part of a longer passage, whose import is, "We must begin from Jupiter, whom we must by no means forget. Every thing is replete with Jupiter. He fills the streets, the public places, and assemblies of men. The whole sea and its har-bours are full of this god, and all of us in all places have need of Jupiter." It was certainly not to prove the being, or to enhance the merit of Jupiter, that St. Paul quotes this passage.—But he has delivered out of bondage, as we may say, a truth which this poet had uttered, without penetrating its true meaning. The apostle used it to prove the existence of the true God, to a people not convinced of the divine authority of the Scriptures, and who would have rejected such proofs as he might have derived from thence.

[The son of Sirach, intent on praising eminent men, enumerates Bards or Poets; who were, he says, "Leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people; wise and eloquent in their instructions: such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing." Ecclus. xlv. 4.—It is evident that he considered them as of great importance to the community: and we know that they were of great antiquity, for Moses, himself a poet, refers to those who spoke in proverbs, Numb. xxi. 27. of which he inserts a specimen. Jacob was a poet, as appears from his farewell benediction on his sons. And it appears to be extremely probable that the honourable appellation Nabi, equally denoted a prophet, a poet, and a musician, as the poets principally were. Nor is this ambiguity infrequent in other languages. They were equally supposed to be inspired by some divine furor, which Aristotle calls insanity, Plato terms it out of their common senses, or, inspired by a god, or, enthusiasm. Hence the ancient oracles were mostly delivered in verse; and verse was at first employed in worship, and in transmitting historical events to succeeding ages.

Poets, like other men, could only draw comparisons from objects with which they were conversant: hence we have in Scripture many allusions to the phenomena of nature, as extant in the countries where the writers resided: from storms, tempests, earthquakes, thunder and lightning, &c. The shepherd king describes the Lord as his shepherd, who leads him in security;—not as his steersman, who brings him safely into port: he was little acquainted with nautical affairs. Very few are the descriptions of the sea, or its inhabitants, in Job, although the writer ransacks earth, and heaven, with wonderful science. Poets who dwelt in tents, have little reference to extensive architecture.—But, to understand their language, it is necessary to acquire as intimate knowledge as possible, of the things they knew; and even when they treat of things spiritual or celestial; because these are signified by means of terrestrial objects or incidents; and the just understanding of one may lead to a just understanding of the other. Divine inspiration itself, however super-human it may be, must nevertheless, speak to men in the language of men, or the instruction it means to convey, will continue a perfect blank.]

POINTS, or VOWELS. Though the Hebrews, in their alphabet, have both vowels [their vowels are, א Aleph, ו Vau, י Jod, ה He, ג Gnain. The ה He, is rather an aspiration than a vowel.] and consonants, like other nations, yet, in writing, they do not always insert their vowels. Sometimes the vowels that are inserted are not pronounced; or lastly, these vowels being sometimes long, and sometimes short, it is very difficult to those who have not been long acquainted with the Hebrew, to read rightly the books written in this language. This difficulty gave occasion to the invention and use of pointed vowels; which are, certain points placed below or above the consonants: these supply the place of vowels, when they are wanting; or determine their sound, quantity, and value, when they are present.

Grammarians reckon fourteen pointed vowels, (though some are content with ten or eleven) viz.

Five long.		Five short.		Four very short.
א Cametz	ā	א Patach	ă	א Shevah	ē
א Tzere	ē	א Segol	ē	א Cateph patach	ă
א Chirec	ī	א Chirec short	ĭ	א Cateph segol	ĭ
א Cholem	ō	א Cametz catuph	ō	א Cateph cametz	ō
א Shurec	ū	א Kibbutz	ū

If we have recourse to the Rabbins, and to some Hebrew grammarians among Christians, concerning the antiquity of these points, we must believe them as ancient as the Hebrew Scriptures themselves; and must derive their origin from Moses, or from Esdras, or from the ancients of the great synagogue, who lived in the time of Esdras and Nehemiah. (Vid. Morin, Exercit. Bibl. Exer. 18. lib. ii. cap. 1, 2, 3, &c. Bryan Walton, Prolegom. Biblic. Prol. 3. art. 38, &c. et alios passim.) But the most judicious believe this invention to be much more modern. Some, as Elias Levita, Kimchi, Abenezra, Juda Levit. et alios apud Tirin. refer their origin to the Massorites, or to the doctors of the school of Tiberias, about A. D. 500. F. Morin thinks, that the Hebrews received from the Arabians both the art of grammar, and the use of these points. But the Arabians themselves did not begin to write till very late; for when the empire of the Mahometans was settled, about A. D. 622, they had not very long had the use of letters. The names of these pointed vowels, which are intirely Arabic, prove that they were originally derived from that people. Besides, the first grammarians the Jews had, being Arabians, and having written in their own language, it is very probable, that the pointed vowels are of their invention, and derived from the same source, as their art of grammar. Vide LETTERS, MASSORITES, RABBINS.

VOL. II. PART XXII. Edit. IV.

F. Morin, who has examined this matter deeply, shews that the pointed vowels were not used in the time of Origen, nor in the time of Jerom, nor even in the time of the doctors who composed the Talmud, which was not finished till the seventh century. The same author enumerating several works composed by Jews in the eighth and ninth centuries, says, the first traces he meets with of pointed vowels are in the writings of the Rabbins Ben-Aser, head of the school of the western Jews, and in those of Ben-Nephtali, head of the school of the eastern Jews, about the middle of the tenth century. It follows, that we cannot well place the introduction of these points before the tenth century. Morin, Exercit. Biblic. lib. ii. Exer. 28. cap. 1, 2, 3, &c. Walton's Proleg. 3. n. 38, &c. and other Prolegomena to the Scriptures; Du Pin, F. Frassen, and F. Thomassin, in his method of studying the Scripture.

The modern Jews admit of pointed vowels, and of Bibles printed with them, for private use; but the copies they publicly use in their synagogues, the authentic rolls from which they solemnly read the sacred text, are without points: the Samaritans also, originally, did not insert points in their Pentateuch, which was written in the ancient Hebrew characters. The scrupulosity of both these in this respect, is in opposition to the antiquity of the pointed vowels.

It had been thought, that Esdras inserted the Hebrew

Hebrew pointed vowels, but Elias Levita, a German Jew, about the middle of the sixteenth century maintained, that the pointed vowels were not received till after the completion of the Talmud, about A. D. 500; that till that time the manner of reading the sacred text, and of supplying the vowels, was preserved by use and tradition. The Jews in general, as well those who refer the points to Esdras, as those who ascribe them to the Massorites, maintain, that the manner of reading, according to this punctuation, is of Divine authority, and that the least alteration may not be allowed therein. But the greater part of our critics, even of those who hold Esdras for the first author of the points, maintain it to be a mere human invention, and that no scruple should be made of improving it, when the tenor of the discourse, the analogy of things, or the rules of good criticism offer a better sense.

These are the chief reasons urged by the two Buxtorfs, father and son, to prove the antiquity of the pointed vowels. (Buxtorf Pater, in Tiberiade, cap. 9. Buxtorf Fil. Tract. de Punctor. antiq. cap. 5.) First, two ancient books called Bahir and Zohar, the first written a little before the birth of Jesus Christ, the second a little after it, expressly mention the pointed vowels in more places than one. Secondly, the Massorites of Tiberias, to whom the invention of the points is ascribed, do not appear to have had sufficient capacity for this work, nor does any ancient author impute it to them: Aben-ezra, a Rabbin of the twelfth century, is the first who does them this honour. Thirdly, since the Hebrew has ceased to be the vulgar tongue of the Jews, i. e. since the captivity of Babylon, it was not possible to teach this language without the assistance of the pointed vowels; therefore, at least they must have existed since Esdras, and have been constantly in use from that time. Fourthly, by subverting the authority of the pointed vowels, and putting them on the footing of an invention merely human, the text will be given up to uncertain readings and arbitrary explications, which will overturn the certainty and authority of the Holy Scriptures.

To these reasons we reply: first, that the books Bahir and Zohar have nothing near that antiquity here ascribed to them. There are even found things in these books, that must have been written above a thousand years subsequent to the time specified. No ancient author has either owned them, or quoted them. Secondly, the Massorites of Tiberias were certainly in being a long while in Judea; and abstracting from the notion that has been received of their capacity, and from the testimony of Aben-ezra and of Elias Levita, it is known with certainty, that the pointed vowels were not adopted before their time.

Thirdly, that since the Hebrew has ceased to be a living language, and spoken by the Jews, the necessity of the pointed vowels is not so great as is pretended. The Samaritans, who understand Hebrew no better than the Jews, have no points, to this day; yet they read the Hebrew text in Samaritan characters. The Arabians had points, but late. One might very well be without them in their language, as also in the Hebrew, the Syriac, and the Chaldee, even on the supposition that these were not living languages, provided we preserve the ancient character, provided we speak a language which has some affinity to that whose character we preserve; and lastly, that this language, dead as it is, may however subsist in the ecclesiastical offices, in the prayers, and even in an infinite number of terms written in the language of commerce and conversation. On this supposition, which is really the case of the Jews at present, in respect of the Hebrew, the difficulty of reading the Hebrew without points, is vastly less than might be imagined. We certainly know that many Jews, who are far from understanding this language perfectly, yet can read Hebrew without points, and write it too. This proves sufficiently, whatever may be said to the contrary, that they might have done well enough without points, for several ages; and that we also might do well enough without them. Add to this, that the Hebrew is not absolutely destitute of vowels; it has three or four, viz. א Aleph, י Jod, ו Vau, and י Hain; ה He and ח Cheth, are aspirations. These letters, and these aspirations, are found throughout the text. One vowel alone is sufficient [occasionally] for reading a whole word. To judge of the force of these reasons, it is necessary to understand the language thoroughly.

The fourth proof relating to the authority of these pointed vowels, has but an indirect glance at their antiquity; and it is easy to retort the argument against those who use it, by applying it to the Greek and Latin tongues, which have always written their vowels. Without disturbing the vowels, cannot one often take the same passage in ten different senses? and this without changing any thing in the words, accents, or punctuation, only in the order and structure [or emphasis] of the words. Can this be said to abandon the sacred text to uncertain readings, and to arbitrary explications? Is there any language in the world, in which a reader does not often find equivocal expressions, amphibologies, and uncertainties; and this notwithstanding points, accents, and vowels? I own that the Hebrew without points is more subject to this than than some other languages are ; but tradition, good sense, coherence of the discourse, and custom, supply rules to correct these pretended inconveniences.

N. B. What would be the consequence, if we were always obliged servilely to follow the punctuation of the Massorites? How many passages have been happily restored, or explained, by having recourse to ancient versions, and by quitting the manner of reading assigned by the Massorites?

[On this subject, as on many others, the medium is the safest. To suppose that the learned authors of the points (or, those who most effectually practised and patronized the invention) have laboured to no purpose, is to impute to them a deficiency of understanding, for which we have no authority. They have recorded, by their punctuation, their opinion and judgment of the reading, generally ; and we are obliged to them, in common with other critics. On the other hand, to suppose that they were Divinely inspired, that they committed no errors, that transcribers have never inserted wrong points—especially, as all allow the points to be intricate, is to acknowledge in the pointing, an authenticity that does not belong to the reading itself. For, as MSS. differ from one another, as we have many marginal readings in our printed bibles, which variations appear to be of considerable antiquity, and as some omissions are acknowledged by the Jews themselves, we cannot attribute to the points that infallibility which we deny to the text : we cannot suppose a miracle in favour of this species of commentary, which it is evident has not been exerted in favour of the work on which it is a comment.]

[POLLUTE. It would be necessary to rehearse a considerable part of the Hindoo institutions, to do justice to an enquiry into many particulars of pollution noticed in the Mosaic ritual. These systems illustrate each other.

The altar of God was polluted by being wrought into any other form, than the natural figure of the stones, in their rough state. This rule seems to have been observed among our Druids, though not without exception. Josiah polluted the altar at Bethel, by burning the bones of dead men upon it, 2 Kings xxiii. 16. Blood was pollution to a place where it was shed ; idolatry polluted those who practised it ; the exercise of callings lawful on other days, polluted the Sabbath : every sin polluted the sinner, but some more grossly than others.

There were also, bodily pollutions, though natural evacuations, some voluntary, others involuntary ; and mental pollutions, as the admission of evil thoughts, desires, temptations, &c. which more defiled, or polluted a man, than the neglect, of ceremonial observances, on which the Jews laid great stress.]

POLYGAMY, was tolerated among the Hebrews, and Patriarchs. We do not find it established by any law ; and Scripture, which transmits the name of the first bigamist, and of his two wives, Gen. iv. 19. seems to hint at his fear of the consequences. As if Lamech would comfort his wives, who were terrified at the irregularity of his polygamy, by saying, “ This is not a crime that deserves death : compare my action to that of Cain, and then conclude, that if the murderer of Cain should deserve punishment, how much more shall he deserve it who murders Lamech ? ”

The Rabbins maintain, that polygamy was in use from the very beginning of the world, and that before the deluge every man had two wives. Tertullian, Exhort. ad Castit. cap. 5. et de Monogam, cap. 5. on the contrary, thinks, that Lamech was the first who transgressed the established order of God, by marrying two wives, and that polygamy commenced with a man who was accursed. He says, this bad example had consequences, which continued down to the total subversion of the Jewish nation ; and that before the deluge, nobody imitated Lamech. Jerom, lib. i. cont. Jovin. et Ep. ix. ad Salvian. et Ep. xi. ad Agerach. says, that Lamech, who was a homicide, and a bloody-minded person, was the first who divided one flesh to two wives, and that the flood expiated his parricide and his polygamy together. (He supposes Lamech to have killed Cain.)

The laws of Moses plainly suppose this custom ; yet condemn it not. The Rabbins allow the king to have eighteen wives, after the example of Rehoboam, king of Judah. They allow the Israelites to marry as many as they can maintain. Notwithstanding all this, examples of polygamy among private persons were uncommon. The wiser men easily saw the inconveniences that attended this irregularity. But instead of wives they took concubines. There is this difference between a wife and a concubine, according to the Rabbins ; that a wife was married by contract, and had her dowry ; whereas a concubine was taken without contract, and lived in a state of submission and dependance, under the matron of the family, as Hagar, in respect of Sarah ; and the children of the concubines had no [regularly legal] share in the inheritance.

The Saviour of the world restored marriage to its primitive and lawful condition, by revoking the permission of polygamy and divorce. He allows a Christian to have but one wife, according to those words of the Creator : “ God created them male and female, wherefore a man shall cleave unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh."

Polygamy is not allowed the Jews at present, neither in the East nor in the West. The Emperors Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, forbid it them by their decrees, Anno 393. The Mahometans, who allow themselves this liberty, refuse it to the Jews in their dominions. The Samaritans, who are extremely devoted to the law of Moses, marry but one wife, and make it a crime in the Jews, that they secretly practise polygamy in the East.

Polygamy is divided into simultaneous and successive. The first is, when a man has more than one wife at a time. This is condemned by both canon and civil law. Successive polygamy is, when a man has several wives one after another, each of which he marries after the decease of the preceding wife. This is allowed in the church, though with a good deal of regret; the fathers and councils having often testified, that they did not approve of second marriages.

[This is particularly the case in the Greek church among the priesthood. They hold that a priest must be the husband of one wife, to qualify him for ordination; but, if that wife dies, they hold that marrying a second would vitiate his orders.]

POLYGLOTT. This word literally signifies a variety of languages, and this name is given to bibles published in several languages, or at least in three, of which the texts are ranged in different columns. Some Polyglotts contain all the books of the bible, others contain but a part.—The following are the principal

POLYGLOTTS.

A. D.

1517. The bible of Francis Ximenes, of Cisneros, cardinal of the Order of St. Francis; in four languages, Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin.

1518. The bible of Justiniani, bishop of Nebio, of the Order of St. Dominic, in five languages; in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and Arabic. Only the psalter was printed.

1546. John Potken, provost of the collegiate church of St. George at Cologne, caused the psalter to be printed in four languages. Hebrew, Greek, Chaldee, or rather Ethiopic, and Latin.

1546. The Jews of Constantinople caused to be printed in that city, the Pentateuch, in Hebrew, Chaldee, Persian, and Arabic, with the Commentaries of Solomon Jarchi.

1547. The same Jews caused also to be printed at Constantinople, the Pentateuch, in four languages; Hebrew, Chaldee, vulgar Greek, and Spanish.

1565. John Draconitis, of Carlostad in Franconia, made an edition of the psalter, the Proverbs of Solomon, and the prophets Micah and Joel, in five languages: Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and German. The death of the author prevented the completing of this work.

1572. Benedictus Arias Montanus had the chief care of the edition of the Polyglott bible performed by Christopher Plantin, by order of Philip II. king of Spain. This bible is in eight volumes, in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin, with the Syriac version of the New Testament. It is properly but a copy of that of Cardinal Ximenes.

1586. There appeared at Heidelberg, an edition of the books of the Old Testament, in Hebrew and Greek, with two Latin versions; one of St. Jerom, and the other of Santes Pagninus, ranged in four columns, at the bottom of which were notes ascribed to Vatablus. Hence it obtained the name of the Polyglott bible of Vatablus.

1596. David Wolder, a Lutheran minister at Hamburg, caused to be printed by James Lucias, a bible in three languages; Greek, Latin, and German.

1599. Elias Hutter, a German, printed several Polyglotts. The first is a bible in six languages, printed at Nuremberg.—There were only printed the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth; in Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, Latin, and the German of Luther; the sixth language varied according to what nation the copies were designed for. Some had the Sclavonian version, of the edition of Wittemberg; others the French, of Geneva; others the Italian, also of Geneva; others the Saxon version, from the German of Luther.

This author also gave the psalter and the New Testament, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German. But his chief work is the New Testament in twelve languages, Syriac, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Spanish, French, Latin, German, Bohemian, English, Danish, and Polish. This Polyglott was printed at Nuremberg, in two volumes, folio; and in four volumes, quarto.

1645. The

1645. The bible of M. le Jay, in seven languages, was printed at Paris by Anthony Vitre. It contains the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, Greek, Syriac, Latin, and Arabic. He followed the Greek version printed at Antwerp, also the Chaldee and Latin. Complaint has been made of its incorrectness.

1657. No sooner did the Polyglott of le Jay appear in England, but the learned of this nation undertook to give a new edition, more correct, more extensive, and more perfect. They accomplished this design, and produced a new Polyglott in five volumes, with Prolegomena, and several other treatises in the first tome, several new Oriental versions in the fourth and fifth, and a very large collection of various readings, in the sixth.—Brian Walton was the undertaker of this edition. Hence this bible has the name of Walton's Polyglott. [This is esteemed the most correct of any: and has made a noble addition to the materials for studying Holy Scripture. The learned are daily augmenting this assistance, by collations of ancient versions, with their various readings: which may be esteemed as so many Polyglotts. See BIBLE. Art. Polyglott Editions.]

POMGRANATE. The pomgranate is of the apple form, covered with a reddish rind, and red within, which opens length-ways, and shews red grains within, full of juice like wine, with little kernels. God directed Moses, to put embroidered pomgranates, with golden bells between them, at the bottom of the high-priest's blue robe, or ephod. Exod. xxviii. 33. Pomgranates were very common in Palestine, and being very beautiful fruits, Scripture often uses similitudes taken from them.

Of the pomgranate-tree, malus punica, or malo-granatum, there are two sorts, wild and domestic. The cultivated pomgranate tree has several small angular boughs, armed with prickles, and covered with a reddish bark. Its leaves are small, like those of myrrh, but not so sharp, of a green colour, inclining to red. Its blossom is large, beautiful, of a red colour inclining to purple, composed of several stalks in the form of a rose, in the hollow of the cup.—This cup is oblong, hard, purple, having a figure something like that of a bell. This garden pomgranate tree sometimes bears double flowers, and then it has no fruit.

The wild pomgranate tree is a shrub like the former, but more rude and thorny. Its blossoms are called balaustra by the apothecaries. They are astringent, and serviceable in dysentery, diarrhoea, and hientery.

We are assured, that in Peru have been seen pomgranates as large as a barrel; that the Spaniards, by way of curiosity, carry them in the procession of the sacrament. The Mussulmen speaking of the Holy Land, say, that five men could hardly carry a grape of this country, and that five persons might hide themselves in one shell of their pomgranates. This is hyperbolic enough!

POMPEY. Cneius Pompeius, surnamed the Great, one of the most celebrated generals of the Roman commonwealth. His name is not found in Scripture, but Josephus speaks of him often: nor can we be dispensed with from mentioning his behaviour toward the Jews. Having finished the war against Tigranes, A. M. 3938, Joseph. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 5. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 4. Pompey the next year, ante A. D. 65, sent Scaurus into Judea, who arriving at Damascus, and being informed of the troubles in Judea, occasioned by the two brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobolus; he came thither in much haste, thinking to make great advantage of their divisions. No sooner had he entered this province, but he received ambassadors from each of them, desiring his friendship and protection. But Aristobolus having presented him with three hundred talents, he declared for him, and sent word to Hyrcanus and Aretas, who kept Aristobolus besieged in Jerusalem, that if they did not desist from this undertaking, he should use them as enemies to the Romans. Aristobolus was thus delivered from his danger.

Some time afterwards Pompey himself came to Damascus; Hyrcanus and Antipater waited on him, and complained of the proceedings of Scaurus, who had suffered himself to be corrupted by Aristobolus's money; and they intreated Pompey to fix Hyrcanus on the throne of Judea, which belonged to him by birth. The beginning of the next year, Pompey having again heard the mutual complaints of Hyrcanus and Aristobolus, and also the Jews, who complained against them both, he sent them back in peace, saying, he would soon come into Judea, and decide their controversy. But Aristobolus withdrawing, instead of staying for Pompey's determination, fortified himself, and put himself into a posture of opposing him, if he should pretend to dethrone him.

After Pompey had finished his war against Mithridates, he marched into Judea, where Hyrcanus and Aristobolus came before him, and pleaded their causes, in his presence. Pompey, having ordered Aristobolus to surrender his fortresses into his hands; he obeyed, though not without.

without difficulty, and at the same time withdrew to Jerusalem, to prepare for events. Pompey gave him no time to fortify himself, but followed him closely; and when he came near the city, Aristobulus fearing to engage in a war against the Romans, came out to meet him, promised to put the city into his hands, with a great sum of money, and besought him not to come to an open breach. Pompey forgave him, sent Gabinius to receive the money, and to take possession of the city. But Aristobulus's soldiers shut the gates against him, so that he was forced to return without performing his commission.

This provoked Pompey, who thereupon secured Aristobulus, and kept him in bonds; and then marched against Jerusalem. He first made proposals of peace, but these being rejected, he began the siege. He encamped on the north side of the temple, which was the weakest part of the city. The Roman soldiery, accustomed to labour and fatigue, soon raised terraces whereon to place their machines, and to batter the walls. But the Jews defended themselves with so much courage, and made so many sallies against the besiegers, that if the sabbath-day had not interrupted their opposition, the Romans could not have completed their approaches.—The Romans therefore perceiving that on this day they never attacked them, they carried on their works on this day only.

When their works were finished, they began to batter the towers and walls of the temple with machines brought from Tyre. One thing occasioned great admiration in Pompey, that during the whole siege, as if they had been in profound peace, the Jews did not forbear to offer, morning and evening, their accustomed sacrifices to God, not suffering any prospect of danger to interrupt them. The third month of the siege the breach being practicable, the Romans in great numbers poured into the temple, where they made a dreadful slaughter of the priests, and [12,000] of those who had taken refuge there. Cornelius Faustus, son of Sylla, first entered the breach. This was the first year of Olympiad 179, a day of fasting among the Jews, in memory of the volume of Jeremiah, burnt by king Jehoiakim, the twenty-eighth day of Casleu, the third month of the civil year, (November, and December,) A. M. 3941, ante A. D. 63.—Pompey entered the temple, and saw such things as were not allowed to be seen, but by the high-priests. In the inner part of the temple he found the golden table, the candlestick, the vessels and censers, with a great quantity of incense. There were about two thousand talents of silver in the treasures of the temple. But he meddled with nothing; and when he had ordered to clear the temple of the dead bodies, the day following he caused sacrifices to be offered. After this he restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, and government of his nation; but he forbade him to wear the diadem, or to assume the title of king. Aristobulus he kept in bonds, and carried him to Rome with two of his daughters, and all his sons. Consult Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 8. and Usher on A. M. 3941. The rest of the life of Pompey has no relation to our design.—When this great man was conquered by Julius Cæsar at Pharsalia, he came into Egypt, where he was basely put to death by the officers of the young Ptolemy, last king of Egypt, A. M. 3956, ante A. D. 48.

PONTIUS, Πόντιος, from πόντος, marine, or belonging to the sea. Vide PILATE.

PONTUS, Πόντος, the sea. In Gen. xiv. 1. Jerom has translated אלסר Elasar, by pontus: but Elasar may signify, God that takes away, or that withdraws; from סור sur, that withdraws, or separates himself, and אל el, God.

[Elasar, is also interpreted “help of God,” or wandering of God; otherwise, receding from God.]

PONTUS. The province of Pontus, in Asia Minor, has the Euxine sea north, Cappadocia south, Paphlagonia and Galatia east, and the Lesser Armenia west. It is thought St. Peter preached in Pontus, because he addresses his first epistle to the faithful of this province, and of the neighbouring provinces.

This province was famous among the heathen poets for its poisonous herbs, therefore called by Virgil, Virosa Pontus, Eccl. viii. 95. Georg. i. 58. Medea is said to have procured her poisons from hence. Philo declares that the Jews had sent their colonies to the utmost bounds of Pontus. Ad Caium, cap. 12.]

[POOLS of Solomon, are distant two hours from Bethlehem, the road which leads to them, consisting entirely of rock, is almost impracticable. They are three in number, situated in the sloping hollow of a mountain, one above another; so that the waters of the uppermost descend into the second, and those of the second descend into the third. They are nearly square. The breadth is nearly the same in all, between eighty and ninety paces. The first is about 160 paces long; the second 200; the third 220. They are lined with stone, and plastered. These pools supplied the town of Bethlehem and the city of Jerusalem with water. A garden near these pools is called the garden of Solomon: it is watered by rills, which at times descend from the rocks above it.]

POOR.

POOR. This word often denotes the humble, afflicted, mean in their own eyes, low in the eyes of God. Not so much a man destitute of the good things of the earth, as a man sensible of his spiritual misery and indigence, who applies for succour to the mercy of God. In this sense the greatest and richest men of the world are level with the poorest, in the eyes of God.

In Exodus, xxiii. 3. Moses forbids the judges "to countenance a poor man in his cause:" or Levit. xix. 15. "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour." In a word, judge without respect of persons: have only truth and justice before your eyes; consider that you stand in the place of God on the earth.

One of the characters of the Messiah was, to judge the poor, Psalm lxxii. 2, 4. and to preach the gospel to them, Isaiah xi. 4. Matt. xi. 5.—Jesus Christ chose disciples that were poor, and the greater part of the first believers were really poor men, as we may see in their history.

Solomon says, Prov. xxii. 2. "The rich and poor meet together;" they are like each other in one thing—God created them both; and both riches and poverty are of his bestowing. He says, Prov. xxix. 13. "The poor and deceitful man meet together," or the debtor and creditor: i. e. they belong to God, and each is in the hand of his providence: wherefore the rich should not be supercilious, nor the poor be despondent; both are equal in the eyes of God.

Amos, viii. 6. reproaches the Israelites with having sold the poor for a contemptible price; as for shoes and sandals. Probably the rich actually thus sold their poor debtors, for things of no value.

St. James, ii. 1. seems to carry the obligation, of not respecting persons, so far, as to allow no mark of distinction to persons in power, or in civil dignities, in the public assemblies of religion. "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come into your assembly, a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; and ye have respect to him that wear-eth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place, and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become evil-thinking judges?" But all this ought to be understood rather of an inward preference, and of the sentiments of the heart, than of external marks of respect. It is never allowed a Christian to prefer a rich man before a poor man, only because he is rich, and to think better of him, to judge him more worthy of esteem and consideration, rather than he who has not the same advantages of the goods of fortune. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXCIV.

The poor are often put for the meaner people; for the lowest condition of life, without considering whether they have accommodations suitable to their state: the poor you have always with you."

Poverty, in the Old Testament, was considered by the Jews as a great evil, and a punishment from God. Job speaks of it as of a prison, and a state of bondage, chap. xxxvi. 8. And Isaiah, xlviii. 10. compares it to a furnace or crucible, wherein metals are purified. God tried Job and Tobit by poverty: they looked beyond the old covenant; they knew the value of suffering, of humiliation, of indigence. They knew how to make a right use of them, and to convert them to their greatest advantage. They were already poor in spirit, in the disposition of their hearts, before God made them suffer actual poverty. See POVERTY. Comp. HUMILITY Add.

PORATHA, פֹּרְתָא, Φοραδαθὰ, fruitful; from פָּרָה parah. This word is Persian or Medish. Son of Haman, Esth. ix. 8.

PORTERS of the temple. The Levites discharged the office of porters of the temple both day and night, and had the care of the treasures and offerings. This office of porter was in some sort military; as it were, soldiers of the guard to the Lord. See LEVITE.

PORTIUS, Πόρτιος, calf; from the Greek πορταξ.

PORTIUS FESTUS; vide FESTUS PORTIUS.

POSSESSION Diabolical. Possession and obsession differ in this, in obsession the devil acts outwardly, he haunts the subject of his temptations externally, whereas in possession, he acts internally.

Examples of possession are frequent, especially in the New Testament. Jesus Christ and his apostles cured great numbers of possessed persons. Ecclesiastical historians furnish many other instances. But as it has been found in many cases, that credulity has been imposed on, by fictitious obsessions and possessions; some have maintained, that all were diseases of the mind, the effects of distempered imagination; that persons sometimes thought themselves really possessed; that others feigned themselves to be so, in order to carry on some design; in a word, that there never were any real possessions or obsessions. The most plausible arguments for this opinion are such as follow:

The devil cannot naturally act on our bodies.— He is of a spiritual nature, and by his will only cannot move our limbs, or actuate our fluids, or influence our organs. If he had naturally this power, the world would be full of people possessed or obsessed; he would be always exerting his hatred against man, and would stretch his tyranny to the utmost. How many men should we daily see possessed, agitated, tormented, choked, strangled, thrown from precipices, drowned, burnt, if the devil had this power! If it be said that God moderates this power, that he restrains the devil, and does not allow him to exercise his malice against sinners and wicked men; do not we see on the contrary, that he often possesses or obsesses very harmless persons? We know what sufferings he inflicted on Job; we see children possessed; and other persons, whose lives seem to have been exempt from any great crimes or disorders.

Why do we see men and women possessed, only at certain times, and in certain countries?—There are whole nations, where the thing is not so much as known? How is it that they are only seen in countries where the people are generally superstitious, and in persons of weak understandings, and of melancholy tempers? If we examine those men and women, who either are or have been possessed, we shall find none but such as suffer under some of these infirmities.

If we suppose the devil to suspend the operations of the soul of the party possessed, and to usurp the office of the soul himself; or even that several devils agitate and possess the same demoniac, the difficulty becomes much greater.—What conception can we have of a soul, that no longer acts in the body which it animates, and which surrenders itself, as we may say, to the devil? How can all these evil spirits combine and concur to govern the same man? If all this can be done without a miracle, what proof can there be of miracles? May it not be said, that all such things as we call miracles, are but operations of the devil? And if a miracle be required, that a man should be possessed by the devil, it would make God the author of (or at least a co-operator with the devil, in) his obsessions and possessions of men.

We have so many examples of natural things, which appear supernatural, that there is room to imagine, what are called possessions by the devil, may be of this kind. Many people have fancied themselves to be transformed into wolves, or oxen; to be made of glass, or of butter; to become kings or princes: no one in such cases has recourse to the devil, or to a miracle, to explain the phenomenon. They tell us roundly, that it is a disorder of the brain, a disease of the mind or imagination, caused by such or such distemperatures of the body. Nobody employs exorcisms, or priests for a cure. They apply to physicians, to bodily remedies, to methods of restoring the imagination of the patient, by giving it another turn. Would not it be the same with such as are possessed? Would they not obtain a cure by natural remedies, by purging them, cooling them, deceiving them dexterously, and inducing them to imagine that the devil has forsaken them and fled away? There have been remarkable experiments of this kind; but if we should relate them, the favourers of possessions would acknowledge, that these people were not really possessed, and admit that much delusion has been practised in such matters, yet would still maintain, that among the great number of demoniacs, it cannot be denied, but there must have been some who were really possessed; while others maintain, that there never were any such, and that whatever has happened to those who were reputed to be possessed, might conveniently be explained by natural means, without recourse to the devil. This is the knot of this dispute.

The defenders of possession by the devil observe, that if this were only an illusion, Jesus Christ and his apostles, and the whole church, would be in error, and must wilfully involve us in error, also, by speaking, acting, and praying, as if there were real possessions. Our Saviour speaks to, and commands the devils, who actuated the possessed; which devils answered, and obeyed, and gave proofs of their presence by tormenting those miserable creatures, whom they were obliged to quit. They cast them into violent convulsions, throw them on the ground, leave them for dead, take possession of hogs, and hurry those animals into the sea. Can this be merely delusion? Jesus Christ alleges as proof of his mission, that the devils are cast out; he promises his apostles the same power that he himself exercised against those wicked spirits. Can all this be nothing but chimera?

It is allowed, that there are several tokens of possession which are equivocal and fallible, but there are others which are indubitable. A person may counterfeit a demoniac, and imitate the actions, words, motions, contortions, cries, howlings, and convulsions, of one possessed.—Some efforts, that seem to be supernatural, may be effects of heated imagination, of melancholy blood, of trick and contrivance. But, if a person suddenly should speak and understand languages he never learned, talk of sublime matters he never studied, or discover things secret and unknown: should he lift up himself in the air without visible assistance, act and speak in a manner very distant from his natural temper and condition: and all this without any inducement from from interest, passion, or other natural motive: if all these circumstances, or the greater part of them, concur in the same possession, can there be any room to suspect that it is not real?

There have been possessions in which all these circumstances have concurred. There have therefore been real ones, but especially those which the gospel declares as such. God was pleased to permit, that in our Saviour's time there should be many such in Israel, to furnish him with occasions of signaling his power, and to supply further and convincing proofs of his mission and divinity.

Though we must own, that true possessions by the devil are very rare, and very difficult to be ascertained, yet it cannot be allowed that they are miraculous. They do not happen without divine permission, but they are neither contrary, nor superior, to the laws of nature. Nobody thinks he has recourse to miracle, when he says, a good angel inspires him with good thoughts, or prompts him to avoid a danger. It is supposed in like manner, that the devil may tempt us to evil, may excite irregular impressions in our bodies, or may raise tempests [in our minds].—Scripture imputes to evil angels the death of the first-born of Egypt, and the destruction of Sennacherib's army: it imputes to good angels the rain of fire, by which Sodom and Gomorrah were consumed. These events are miraculous in some of their circumstances, but not in all.—God only suffers the demons to act; they then only exercise a power that is natural to them, which was before suspended and restrained by Divine Providence. Men generally conclude too hastily concerning the power of a spirit, which they know so little of. Vide ADDITIONS to the article ANGEL.

POSIDONIUS, Ποσειδώνιος, who gives to drink, from πόσις, drink, and δίδωμι, I give.—Sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus. 2 Macc. xiv. 19.

POSTS. This name is given to messengers or regulated couriers, appointed to carry with expedition, dispatches of princes, or letters of correspondence. Lewis Hornumck has written a very accurate treatise, on the origin of posts. He notices four kinds: those who travel on horse-back, by water, in a chariot or chaise, or on foot. We may also refer to the article posts, the manner of conveying intelligence by beacons or signals, placed at several distances on the tops of mountains. So Isaiah says, v. 26. xi. 10, 12. that the Lord shall set up a signal among the nations, to gather together the scattered children of Israel, and to bring them back into their own country, from the four corners of the earth." He says, chap. xiii. 2. that signals shall assemble the army of Darius the Mede. And chap. xviii. 3. "All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, see ye, when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains, and when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye."—These signals were set up on the tops of very high trees or masts. "Till ye be left as a beacon [or mast] upon the top of a mountain, and as an ensign on a hill." See Isaiah xxxiii. 23. xlix. 22. lxii. 10. Jer. iv. 6. l. 2. li. 17, 27.—[This will remind the reader of the modern TELEGRAPHS: but these differ, inasmuch as they transmit words and letters, by signals.—Comp. the fire-signals on the MOUNT of OLIVES.]

VOL. II. PART XXII. Edit. IV.

It is thought the use of posts was derived from the Persians. Diodorus Siculus, lib. xix. observes that the kings of Persia, to receive intelligence of what passed in all the provinces of their vast dominions, placed centinels on eminences, at convenient distances, where towers were built. These centinels gave notice of public occurrences from one to another, with a very loud and shrill voice, by which means news was transmitted from any extremity of the kingdom to the court, with great expedition.

But as this could not be practised except in the case of general news, which it was expedient the whole nation should know, Cyrus, as Xenophon relates, Cyropæd. lib. viii. cap. 232. appointed couriers and stations for post-horses; he built on all the high roads, places for reception of the couriers, where one was to deliver his packet to another, and so on. This they did night and day; no weather was to stop them; and, in the judgment of many, they went faster than cranes could fly. [Modern Tartars.]

Herodotus, lib. viii. cap. 98. owns, that nothing swifter was known, for a journey by land. Xerxes, in his famous expedition against Greece, appointed posts from the Egean sea to Susa, to send notice thither of what might happen to his army; he placed these messengers from station to station, to convey his packets, at such distances from each other as a horse might easily travel.

We see couriers or posts plainly described, Esth. iii. 14. Ahasuerus sent expresses to all the nobles of his kingdom, by posts. And when these orders were to be revoked, dispatches were sent by the couriers; missæ per veredarios qui per omnes provincias discurrerent, Esth. viii. 10.

The Orientals ascribe to Darius, king of Persia, contemporary with Philip, king of Macedon, the establishment of posts. D'Herbl. Bibl. Orient. p. 287. col. 1. Darius Codomannus, conquered by Alexander the Great, had been a courier of the king, before he obtained the regal power. Plutarch. Lib. de Fortun. Alex. [This has been doubted: he might be post-master, secretary to the post-office, or &c.: without having actually been a travelling courier, or post.]

The Greeks borrowed the use of posts from the Persians, and, in imitation of them, called them angari. Jesus Christ, Matth. vi. 41. alludes to these. Vide ANGARIARE, also FRAGMENTS, No. XXII.

Among the Romans, Augustus first set up public and regular posts. They were originally young men, active and nimble, who ran from post to post, and delivered packets from hand to hand: but afterwards they were changed for post-chariots and horses, for greater expedition: Juvenes primò modici intervallis, deinde vehicula disposuit. Sueton. in August. Adrian regulated the posts, and discharged the people from their obligations of furnishing horses and carriages.

Procopius assures us, that the emperors appointed posts on the great roads. There were not fewer than five posts a-day, and sometimes eight: they kept forty horses at each post, and as many post-men and riders as were necessary. Justinian dismissed the posts at several places, and particularly those that went from Calsedon to Diacibiza, which is the ancient Lybissa, famous for Hannibal's tomb, in the Gulph of Nicomedia. The same author tells us, that Justinian set up ass-posts in several places of the Levant.

The use of posts having declined with the empire, Charlemagne made many attempts, about A. D. 807, to restore them, but his undertaking was not prosecuted by his successors. Lewis XI. is thought to have fixed the common posts at every two leagues throughout France. Count Taxis first set them up in Germany, at his own expence: as a recompence, the emperor Matthias, in 1616, gave him, in fee, the office of post-master general, to himself and his successors for ever. Lewis Horninck, Treatise of the Origin of Posts.

As early as the ninth century, there were public couriers set up in several places of the Ottoman empire: some went on foot, and others on horseback, and carried dispatches with wonderful diligence. There are some also among the Chinese; but they only carry orders from the king, and the governors of provinces, in public affairs, and those of the greatest consequence. Renaudot, Notes on the Travels of two Arabians to China, p. 193.

POTIPHAR, פוֹתִיפָר, Περσέφου, bull of Africa: from פָּר par, a bull, and פֹּחַד phut, Africa: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, a fat bull. An Egyptian name, not Hebrew.

POTIPHAR, פוֹתִיפָר, that fattens, or demolishes the fat: from פָּר parah, to destroy, and the Syriac word פֹּחַד phut. This is an Egyptian word, and therefore its true etymology is not in the Hebrew.

[The reader will observe the difference of the spelling in these two names, PUTIPHAR: perhaps, properly, PUTIPHRE: PUTIPHRO.]

POTIPHAR, or PUTIPHAR, an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; Gen. xxxvii. 36. General of his troops, according to the Vulgate; chief of his butchers or cooks, according to the Hebrew; פֹּחַד פָּר, princeps lanionum, or coquorum, or victimus jugulantium. The Hebrew also calls him פֶּרֶס Saris, Eunuch; but it is very probable that this word, in this place, means only an officer of the king's court. Potiphar was married, and had children, if Ase-nath, daughter of Potipherah, (Putiphro) who was given to Joseph for a wife, were his daughter.

Potiphar bought Joseph, as a slave from the Midianites, who had bought him of his brethren; seeing all things prosper in his hands, he gave him the superintendence of his whole property. But some years after, Potiphar's wife taking an unlawful liking to Joseph, solicited him to the crime of adultery; Joseph repulsed her, and her love changed into hatred. She accused him to her husband, who put Joseph into prison; where his delegate, who had charge of the prisoners, transferred this care on Joseph.

But God had replenished Joseph with his spirit, and had given him an extraordinary talent of interpreting dreams: which, at length made him known to Pharaoh, who appointed him ruler of all Egypt, and gave him in marriage Ase-nath daughter of Potipher, or Potipherah, priest of Heliopolis, or On, according to the Hebrew.

Opinions are divided, whether this Potiphar be the same as Joseph's master? The Hebrews, Origen, Jerom, abbot Rupert, Tostat, and others, think he is the same person: and the Jews, cited in Origen, say it was Asenath, who informed Potiphar of the injustice of her mother's accusation against Joseph. The quality of chief of the army of Pharaoh, or head of the cooks or butchers, or of those that slew the victims, (for the Hebrew may signify either of these) is not incompatible with the dignity of priest of Heliopolis. The different ways by which the name Potiphar is written, Genesis xxxviii. xxxix. where the master of Joseph is mentioned, and in chap. xli. wherein his father-in-law is mentioned, is so inconsiderable, that it hardly deserves to be taken notice of. (פֹּתִיפָר Putiphar, chap. xxxvii. xxxix. פוֹתִיפָר Putiphara, chap. xli. 45.) Lastly, though the city of of Heliopolis, wherein Potiphar was priest, was pretty far from Tanis, where the king of Egypt kept his court, and where was Potiphar's employment; yet it was not so distant but that these two employments were consistent. Potiphar might divide his time between the king's service and his attendance at the temple of Heliopolis, in quality of priest; for it appears from Strabo, lib. xvi. that anciently there was a great number of priests in this city, who were chiefly employed in studying philosophy and astronomy; and here are still seen extensive apartments where they resided. Nothing in Egypt was more respectable than these priests, and several from among them were exalted to the crown. Their quality of priest did not exclude them either from offices at court, or in the camp. Vide ASENATH. [What if this name be a title of rank?]

[We know so little of the Egyptian language, notwithstanding the assistance of modern learning (as Woide's Egyptian Grammar, &c.) that to hazard conjectures on the etymology of names, is dangerous. Nevertheless, it should appear, that these two appellations intend different objects. It is probable, that Puti-PHER, rather Puti-PHRE, (LXX.) should refer to the Sun; RE being the Egyptian name for that luminary; to which the masculine article, PI, being prefixed, it slurs into the pronunciation PRE: whereas, OUYRO signifies king, and with the article, PI, prefixed, is pronounced PRO. [whence, no doubt, the title written by the Hebrews, Pharaoh.] So says Jablonski, de Rempha. If this be correct, Puti-PHRE, or Puti-PHER, and Puti-PHRO, were certainly, two persons; and these appellations are titles of honour, derived from the office held by them, respectively. If we might trust to the interpretation of the Coptic Phiou Pharao, the name Puti-phro should signify father of the king; but, Puti-phre can hardly signify father of the Sun; [unless it were customary among the Egyptians to call priests fathers, as is common in Romish countries, in the Greek church, and others.] but Jablonski compares it with the title Pate-Neit, an Egyptian title, which clearly signifies priest of the goddess Neit: and, perhaps, Puti-phre may import—he to whom the Sun is a father; which agrees with the leading idea.

We find Joseph afterwards, saying, "God has made me to be (b) Father to Pharaoh:" not natural father, certainly; but official father; and possibly Joseph had even succeeded his father-in-law, in an office which qualified him with this title. However that might be, it seems pretty clear, that Potiphar and Potiphro were not the same person: consequently, the story of Ase-nath's conduct in reference to her mother and father and Joseph, is altogether unfounded.]

[POTSHERD, a broken fragment, or piece, of an earthen vessel; not a brittle pot, only, but a piece of a pot, a pot already broken, Isaiah xlv. 9.]

POTTER. Frequent mention is made of the potter, in Scripture. Jeremiah, xviii. 3. represents him while at work, as sitting on two stones. עוֹשֵׂה בַּיָּדָיו, super duos lapides. And Ecclesiasticus, xxxviii. 29, 30. says, "So doth the potter sitting at his work, and turning the wheel about with his feet; who is always carefully set at his work, and maketh all his work by number: he fashioneth the clay with his arm, and boweth down his strength before his feet." Homer, quoted by Strabo, Geograph. lib. vii. saith, that the potter turns his wheel with his hands. And at this day there are great differences in the several manners and postures used by potters, when at work.

When God would shew his dominion over men, and his irresistible power over their hearts, he has recourse to the similitude of a potter, who makes what he pleases of his clay; of this a vessel of honour, of that a vessel of dishonour; now forming it anon; breaking it; now preserving it, and then rejecting it. Vide Psal. ii. 9. Eccclus. xxxiii. 13. Rom. ix. 21. Jer. xviii. 2, 3, &c.

[The similitude of the potter's power over the clay which he fashions, is used also in other authors. To understand this allusion fully we must see a potter at work.]

POTTERS FIELD; the field that was bought with the money, for which Judas sold our Saviour Christ, but which he brought back again to the temple. See ACELDAMA, and the PLATE, MAP of JERUSALEM.

This field is south of Mount Sion, about a stone's cast from the pool of Siloam: it is surrounded by walls, in length seventy cubits, in breadth fifty; and is covered with a vault, with seven openings above, to let down the bodies which are to be buried there, and which report affirms, are consumed in the space of twenty-four hours. They say, the empress Helena caused the vault to be built over this field; and that she loaded several ships with the earth of Aceldama, and ordered it to be carried to Rome, where it was laid near the Vatican, and still preserves its quality of rapidly consuming dead bodies. This place is called the Holy Field, and is a burying-place for strangers, at Jerusalem.

We cannot tell what use a potter could make of this field, unless to dry his pots in before he baked them; and the price of thirty pieces of silver, for which it was bought, shews its little estimation. Raban Maur. is quoted, to shew, that Judas himself was the first who was buried here. [I have not found this passage in this author, says CALMET.] The Jews of Pisa, they say, have a burial-place like this at Rome, where the bodies are consumed in a very short time; they think the earth was brought from Jerusalem: and they esteem themselves happy, as the Jews of neighbouring cities esteem it an honour, to be buried there; and some comfort to them under their misfortune that they cannot be buried at Jerusalem.

We read in the Mishna, Tract. de Sanhedr. cap. vi. n. 14, 15. that they did not allow malefactors, or such as were executed for crimes, to be buried in the tombs of their fathers, except their flesh had first been consumed in other places, appointed for the punishment of such offenders. Perhaps, for this reason, Joseph of Arimathea begged the body of Jesus from Pilate, that he might immediately deposit him in a private sepulchre, before he could be taken to this public burying-place; where he might have been undistinguished from common criminals.—[Was not the body of Jesus, as a criminal, rather the property of the Sanhedrim, or Jewish government; than of Pilate, or the Roman power? If so, the application of the Jewish senators, Joseph and Nicodemus, to Pilate, rather than to the Sanhedrim (or, had they applied to the Sanhedrim, and been refused?) deserves notice: for the prophet had said, though he was numbered with transgressors, yet he should make his grave with the rich; whereas, according to the regular course of Jewish proceedings, he should not have made his grave at all, but have been dissolved into corruption without remorse, as without distinction: which, also, had been prophetically forbid. Psalm xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27.]

[POTTER'S WHEELS, so renders our translation; the original is "upon the stones." —Dr. BLAYNEY says, the appellation "the stones," will appear very proper, if we consider this machine as consisting of a pair of circular stones placed upon one another like mill-stones, of which the lower was immoveable, but the upper one turned upon the foot of a spindle, or axis, and had motion communicated to it by the feet of the potter sitting at his work, as may be learned from Ecclus. xxxviii. 29. Upon the top of this upper stone, which was flat, the clay was placed, which the potter, having given the stone the due velocity, formed into shape with his hands." Note on Jer. xviii. 3. Verbal description, gives but a very inadequate idea of the subject. From the representation of a potter at work among the Indian drawings of Messrs. DANIELS, it appears that the workman sits on the ground, on which also his stone wheels rest; so that he has neither work-bench, nor wheels connected by spindles, as our potters have: the whole is the most simple apparatus possible.]

POVERTY. Voluntary poverty Jesus Christ has sanctified in his own person, and in that of his parents; in that of his apostles, and of the most perfect of his disciples: but involuntary poverty, especially when extreme, is a consequence of sin, and a punishment from God. Solomon besought the Lord, to give him neither poverty nor riches, Prov. xxx. 8. he looked on each extreme, as a dangerous rock to virtue: and therefore asked only what was convenient for him.

Nothing is more earnestly recommended in the ancient law, as in the new, also, than alms and compassion to the poor.

Moses would have the poor admitted to the religious feasts celebrated in the temple, Deut. xvi. 11, 12. He ordered, that in the fields, in the vineyards, and upon the trees, something should be left for them. Lev. xix. 10. xxiii. 22. that in the sabbatical years, and the years of jubilee, all should be left for the poor, the widow, and the orphan, Exod. xxiii. 11. He commanded to lend to the poor, and observed, that the poor should never be wanting in the country, but that the people should always have opportunity to bestow their alms, Deut. xv. 8, 9. That if any pledge were taken from the poor the lender shall not enter the house to take it by force; Deut. xxiv. 12, 14. and that, if the poor be forced to give his goods, or his clothes, they shall be restored to him at night, that he may have wherewith to cover himself. Jesus Christ has carried this point of the law, concerning almsgiving, to its perfection; he practised it himself, recommended it to his disciples, and has inspired his servants with the tenderest charity towards the poor. He advised those who would in earnest become his disciples, to sell all they had, and give to the poor, Matth. xix. 21. He gives excellent rules for practising charity, and avoiding vain-glory and ostentation, which otherwise may occasion our losing all the fruits of our charity. See Matth. vi. 1, 2, 3, 4.

The Jews take great care of their poor: in most considerable cities they have several established societies, on purpose for the poor. One of them, for example, receives alms for such poor as are too modest to ask for themselves; another gathers for the redemption of captives; a third, for providing portions for poor maidens. Beside which, two persons are appointed for the ordinary collection, every sabbath-day. They go from house to house without separating, that they may not be liable to suspicion of violating violating their trust ; and when they distribute what they have gathered, they call a third person to their assistance. Every Saturday, the parnassim, or judges of the synagogue, give to each poor person wherewith to maintain themselves and family the following week. [The poor Jews in London, I understand, complain that their rich brethren suffer them to perish : perhaps, charity cannot relieve them all.]

[Such was the state of things among the Jews, when the first edition of this work was printed : since that time, the heads of their nation have obtained authority from the British Legislature, for various improvements in their polity. Among others they have established a handsome hospital at Mile End, supported chiefly by voluntary contributions ; and they hold annual meetings of a public and social nature, which mainly contribute to the furtherance of charity. Nevertheless, it is much to be regretted, that the poverty of their people, is too conspicuous, in our streets, and especially in their youth ; to the great disgrace of their nation ; from whatever cause arising. Is this peculiar to the Jews of this country ?]

When any one is under urgent necessity, exceeding their ordinary charities, the chanter passes through the synagogue, and says, to all who promise their relief “Blessed be such an one, who gives for such an occasion.” Each promises as he is disposed ; and afterwards they gather from house to house what has been promised ; which is always strictly performed. If the synagogue of the place is not thought sufficient for the occasion, they issue a certificate, to other synagogues, who receive it honourably, and who give contributions, both public and private.

It is a maxim of the Talmudists, that a poor man ought never to be sent away empty handed, even though we could afford him but a grain of wheat. Vide apud Selden. de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. vi. cap. 6. According to them, the least charitable should give a tenth part of their estate ; others as far as a fifth part. Nor is it sufficient to relieve the poor in his present necessity, but he must be clothed suitably to his birth and education ; and must have a horse and a slave bought for him, if he had such before he fell into poverty. Those who refuse the rates they are assessed at, are punished by the judges, as they formerly were by the Sanhedrim ; who condemned them to the penalty of the whip, till they had satisfied the demand. Maimonides says, that sometimes entry was made into their houses, and pledges were forcibly taken for such alms as were due from them.

[POWER, the ability of performing a thing. It is in a sovereign degree, an attribute of Deity,

God is all powerful. It means sometimes a right, privilege, or dignity, John i. 12. sometimes absolute authority, Matth. ix. 6. sometimes the exertion, or, act of power, as of the Holy Spirit, Eph. i. 19. of angels, &c. or of human governments, magistrates, &c. Rom. xiii. 1. and perhaps, it generally includes the idea of dignity, superiority. So the body is sown in weakness, but raised in power, dignity, honour. For the power which a woman ought to have on her head, 1 Cor. xi. 10. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXI. and PLATE of EASTERN VEILS.]

[PRAISE, is one of the noblest acts of worship, and one which seems to be a direct, simple, unsophisticated dictate of nature ; insomuch that I have often wondered how any possessed of rational powers can omit this delightful duty.— If prayer, to which praise is the counterpart, can be neglected, if a sense of wants, necessities, transgressions, and dangers, may not be sufficiently strong, to excite prayer, yet it is surely very ungrateful, not to notice the benefits we have enjoyed, or are enjoying : what we are in the actual possession of, ought at least so far to affect us, as to render us grateful to that hand which bestows them, that hand which might bestow far different distributions to us. What character is so odious among men as that of the ungrateful ? What so common in respect to God ? Those who deny the being of God, may, to be sure, withhold thanks for mercies received, but that any who acknowledge the Divine attributes should be thus insensible, is most astonishing !]

PRAYER. Prayers directed to God, are the ordinary conveyance of graces received from him. The prayers of a just man are of great power before God, James v. 16, 17. The saints both of the Old and New Testament prayed ; Jesus Christ himself, our great example, taught us to pray, to shew, that thereby we honour God, and draw on ourselves his favours and graces. St. Paul in most of his epistles, entreats the faithful to pray for him ; or offers to God his prayers for them.

PUBLIC PRAYER. Quite down from the first promulgation of the law, the Hebrews did not intermit public prayer in the tabernacle, or in the temple, as opportunity returned. Public prayer consisted in offering the evening and morning sacrifices, every day, with prayers by the priests and Levites in that holy edifice. Every day they offered sacrifices, incense, offerings, first-fruits ; they performed ceremonies for the redemption of the first-born, or the purification of pollutions ; in a word, the people came thither from all parts, to discharge their vows, and to satisfy their devotions, not only on great and solemn solemn days, but also on ordinary days; but nothing of this was performed without prayer.

The Psalmist, cxix. says, he prayed to God, or praised him, seven times a-day. And Psalm lv. "Evening and morning, and at noon, will I pray and cry aloud, and he shall hear my voice." Daniel, vi. 10. bent his knees three times a-day, and worshipped the Lord, opening his windows, and turning himself toward Jerusalem. The Levites appointed to guard the temple, lifted up their hands in the night-time, and encouraged one another to adore the Lord; Psalm cxxxiv. 2. The Psalmist says, Psalm cxix. 62, that he arose in the middle of the night, to praise the Lord. Nehemiah, ix. 3. mentions four hours of prayer on a fast-day.

Some Rabbins tell us, that Abraham instituted morning prayer; Isaac that at mid-day, and Jacob that at evening. Others think, that nothing was fixed relating to the hour, or the form, of prayer, until the captivity of Babylon. Before that time every one prayed as his devotion and his heart prompted him. But during the captivity, Esdras observing that several Jews mingled foreign terms with their prayers, which were not suitable to the sanctity of that exercise, he composed eighteen benedictions, which every Israelite is obliged to learn, and to repeat daily. A little before the destruction of the temple, the rabbi Gamaliel added a nineteenth, against apostates and heretics; under these names, meaning the Christians. Sure it is, that these eighteen prayers are of great antiquity; for the Misnah, in Barachot, cap. iv. § 3. speaks of them as of a formula long established.

The same Esdras also fixed the time for prayer, says, Maimonides, apud Vitring. de Syn. lib. i. part ii. cap. 12. And as they offered to God the perpetual sacrifice in the evening and morning, he appointed two solemn prayers for these two seasons. On festival days, and on the sabbath, there was a sacrifice about the middle of the day; he ordered a prayer for this time also: and because the evening sacrifice was consuming in the night-time, he appointed a nocturnal prayer.

However, there are but three hours obligatory, each day for prayer, the morning, noon, and evening. Morning prayer might be performed any time from sun-rising to the third hour of the day; (nine o'clock in the morning, at the equinox) that in the middle of the day, from the third hour to the sixth; (nine in the morning, until noon) that in the evening, from three o'clock in the afternoon until six in the evening, during the equinox. The prayer that was added on festivals, was said about nine o'clock, and might be completed at noon. That on fast days was not settled.

The public prayers celebrated in the synagogues, were performed thrice every day. The minister began the service with a prayer called Kaphar, because therein they asked of God to sanctify his name, after this manner; "O God, let thy name be magnified and sanctified in the world, which thou hast created according to thy good pleasure. Let thy kingdom have dominion therein, let redemption flourish, and let the Messiah come speedily, that thy name may be glorified," &c. This prayer passes for the most ancient the Jews have preserved; and as it is rehearsed in the Chaldee language, it gives room to think, that it was composed during the Babylonian captivity, or very little after the return from that captivity. The people answer, Amen. It seems to be from hence our Saviour borrowed those words in the Lord's prayer; "hallowed be thy name: thy kingdom come."

After this anthem, or benediction, they heretofore repeated the decalogue, which is the foundation of the Jewish religion. But at present they content themselves with reading a passage out of the fifth chapter of Deuteronomy, which begins, "Hear, O Israel." When this lesson is ended, as also the benediction that follows, the whole assembly arise, and pray standing, with a low voice, the minister as well as the rest. After this private prayer, every one retires three steps out of respect, and the minister repeats the eighteen prayers, of which the first three contain the praises of God, the twelve following regard the necessities of the church and of private persons, and the last three contain a confession of the worshipper's unworthiness and insufficiency. It is allowed them after the third blessing to resume their places; that is, to advance the three steps they had retired.

When they are come to the prayer called Modim, they must stoop a little. They sit down while they repeat other prayers, sometimes they hang down their heads, at other times they lift up their voices, according to the tenor of the prayer that is pronouncing. After several benedictions and several psalms, they repeat the anthem by which the office begun. Then the minister pronounces the benediction to the people; who withdraw, saying, "Lord, do thou guide me in thy justice, and prepare the way before me, because of my enemies." Such are the morning prayers.

Those at noon, and at evening, are also performed regularly every day. The minister of the synagogue presides therein, and the prayers, the benedictions, and the lessons are different, yet almost almost in the same order. The language used is the Hebrew, with some forms of prayer in the Chaldee. The generality of the Jews do not perfectly understand either of these languages; but from their long habit of praying in these tongues, and the great number of words they are acquainted with in both, they do not answer Amen without some understanding of what they say. [Translations of these and other prayers, are published in English; and probably in the language of other countries, where the Jews have been long resident, for the better information of the common people.]

Every Jew is obliged to repeat three hundred benedictions each day. To these benedictions they must add certain extracts from those Psalms which are the most effectual for raising a spirit of piety. They chiefly select the latter verses of Psalm cxxvi. and every one sings them according to the custom of his country. The Germans sing them higher, and with greater vehemence than others. The Spaniards, and those of the Levant, approach nearer to the Turkish way of singing; and the Italians sing them composedly, and with ease.

When they have sung these Psalms, they read the Shema. i. e. three sections from Deut. vi. 4. 9. xi. 19, 21. and Numb. xv. 37, 41. They are called Shema, because the first of these sections begins by the word Shema, which signifies, Hear. These are intermingled with prayers and blessings, which often mention the unity of God.—These prayers are ended by blessing God who redeems Israel; and when they pronounce these last words, they rise up, and begin to repeat the eighteen prayers and benedictions, which Esdras left to the great synagogue, as a rule and standard. When they have rehearsed these, they sit down, they stoop with their faces to the ground, they raise their heads a little, and begin their private prayers. They repeat Psalm cxlvi. and then go about their business.

Some repeat their hundred benedictions one after another, that they may be discharged of them, as of a task and labour. But the doctors condemn this custom, because each benediction should be placed in its proper place, and connected with its proper subject. In the evening they begin their prayers again, and nearly in the same form, at least Maimonides tells us so, and he is the most exact of the Jewish authors, and the one on whom Christian writers chiefly rely.

Leo of Modena says, that the custom of the greater part of the Jews is to repeat the hundred benedictions with their morning prayers in the synagogue. For which reason they call these prayers in the morning, Meah Beracoth, i. e. the hundred benedictions. He says, moreover, that the Rabbins oblige the Jews to repeat blessings and praises to God, not only in their prayers, and when they receive favours from him; but on unforeseen occasions, and at every action, whether they eat, or drink, or smell any sweet savour; lastly, for every precept of the law, or of the Rabbins. And this they extend to the sight of whatever is new or extraordinary: for they have different benedictions for every thing. The particulars may be seen in a large treatise, which the Rabbins have composed.

In the morning when they rise, they say; "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, king of the world, who restorest life to the dead, who enlightenest the blind, and who spreadest the earth over the waters:" and other things of a like kind. If they wash their hands, according to the precept, they say; "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, king of the world, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and hast commanded us to wash our hands." When they apply themselves to study the law; "Blessed be Thou, &c. who hast given us the law." When they take food; "Blessed be Thou, &c. who bringest bread out of the earth." When they drink; "Blessed be Thou, &c. creator of the fruit of the vine." At eating such fruits as grow upon trees; "Blessed be Thou, &c. creator of the fruit of the tree." For fruits of the earth; "Blessed be Thou, &c. creator of the fruits of the earth." For good scents; "Blessed be Thou, &c. who hast created such a smell or scent." When they see a high mountain, or a wide extent of sea; "Blessed be Thou, &c. creator of all things at the beginning." At the commencing of solemn festivals, or when they eat, or put on any thing new; "Blessed be Thou, &c. who hast given us life, and hast preserved us to this day." If any one dies that belongs to them; "Blessed be Thou, judge of truth."

On all occasions, before and after every action, they repeat some blessing to God, thinking it a sin of ingratitude, to enjoy, or use, any thing without first acknowledging by some thanksgiving, that they hold it from God, who is Lord and dispenser of all things. [Vide 1 Cor. x. 31.]

In the Jewish prayers we observe, in general, their length, and their battology, or tedious repetitions, which Jesus Christ reproves, Matth. vi. 7. "When ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do; for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking." Secondly, as to their posture. They generally pray sitting, or stooping with their faces toward the ground.—They stretch out their feet and their hands, and make a loud cry. Jesus Christ prayed thus in the garden of Olives. He prostrated himself, and and sent forth a great cry. "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears." Heb. v. 7. Thirdly, they think that prayers supply the place of sacrifices, which are ceased by the destruction of the temple and its altars; they give them the same name, and impute to them the same efficacy.

It is very likely that the prayers of the first Christians were formed on the model of those of the Jews. We have seen some traces of the first and chief Jewish benediction, in the first articles of the Lord's prayer. Our Saviour principally intended to oppose its brevity to their battology. St. Paul, Ephes. vi. 18. 1 Thess. v. 17. 1 Tim. ii. 8. directs, that believers should pray in all places, and at all times, lifting up pure hands toward heaven, and blessing God for all things, whether in eating or drinking, or any other action; and that every thing be done to the glory of God, 1 Cor. x. 31. In a word, our Saviour has recommended to us, to pray without ceasing, Luke xviii. 1. xxi. 36.

PREDESTINATION, to predestinate.—This word is Latin, predestinare sometimes signifies merely a designation, or appointment, of a particular thing to a particular use; or of a certain person to a certain office or employment.—But, in divinity language, predestination expresses the design formed by God, from all eternity, of bringing by his grace, certain persons to faith and salvation, while he leaves others to their infidelity.

Divines agree, that predestination to salvation is of mere favour. But opinions are divided concerning predestination; some regard it as merely gratuitous; others believe that God formed his predestination on a view of future merits in the elect. St. Austin, and the most celebrated schools of the Latin church, hold predestination to be of mere favour. Some Greek fathers, and some Latin divines, adhere to predestination founded on fore-knowledge. St. Austin, de Dono Perseverantiae, cap. 14. n. 35. says, predestination is a fore-knowledge and preparation of efficacious means; in virtue of which, the elect are most certainly saved: and this great Doctor was fully persuaded of the gratuitousness of predestination, in its uttermost extent.

The ancient Hebrews were persuaded, as well as we are, that God had fore-knowledge of what every person should be, do, and become. This is included in the very notion of God, his providence, and his infinite knowledge. God says to Jeremiah, i. 5. "Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations." But when we endeavour to form a just idea of their system of predestination, and how they reconciled grace and free-will, the attempt is not very easy.

The author of the Book of Wisdom, whom several have thought to be Philo, makes Solomon thus speak: chap. viii. 19, 20. "I was a witty child, and had a good spirit: yea, rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled." Where we see the same principles as in Philo. The apostles, John ix. 2. proposed a question to Jesus Christ, when they saw a man born blind. Whether his condition was as a punishment for his own sins, or for those of his parents? They therefore had a notion, that his soul had a previous existence, and had offended God, before it animated the present body.

St. Chrysostom, who may be considered as the oracle and the mouth of the Greek church, maintained, That God does not reject nor predestinate men on account of their past good or bad actions, but on fore-knowledge of their future merits or demerits: "Whence is it, (says he, on Epist. ad Rom. ix. 325.) that Jacob is beloved, and Esau hated? It is because one is good, and the other is bad. And whence is it, that before their birth, God determined, that the elder should be in subjection to the younger? It is because God has no need to stay for the event of things, as we must do, to judge whether a man shall be good or bad; he sees that even before he is born. It was by the effect of his prescience, that he chose Jacob and rejected Esau. He knew before their birth what they would one day prove. When he chose St. Matthew, there were several persons who appeared better than he: but by his infinite penetration, he knew how to discover the value of that jewel, that then lay upon a dunghill."

In another place, Homil. lxxx. in Matt. xxv. he says, that the kingdom of heaven was prepared for the elect from the beginning of the world, and before they were born, because God fore-knew what they would be. And writing on those words of the Psalmist (cxxxix. 2.) "Thou understandest my thought afar off," he thus reasons: Some people are absurd enough to say, such an one is a good man, because God has chosen him and loved him: and such another is wicked, because God hated him. But the prophet here tells us, on the contrary, that God proves us by our works. He knows whether we will be virtuous or no, even before our birth: and by that he gives us proofs of his prescience: he confirms it by our works, for fear it should be imagined, that his prescience was the cause of our virtue.

The Greek fathers that came after St. Chrysostom, have expressed themselves much in the same same manner, and the modern Greeks have followed the sentiments of the fathers before them.

[Certainly, this is a difficult subject: and equally certainly we conclude, that when God proposes an end, he also proposes the means; when he appoints an effect, he also appoints the causes. Now, where is the essential difference, if we say, God foresaw the elect would be holy, therefore chose them; or say, God chose the elect, to make them holy? because, since their holiness is not from themselves, but from him, he must determine to bestow on them that which they have not of themselves; the difference therefore is in the order only, i. e. whether God determined to elect A. B. purposing his holiness, or determined to make A. B. holy, purposing his election. But observe, that God's determination to render A. B. holy, is in fact, an election of him; an election which implies salvation; and since this principle places an election of the party previous to its effects, it seems to be much more convenient, than contingency in any shape. Especially, considering that all things are known to God, from the beginning to the end, so that he has no need to stay till a certain event has taken place before he can adjust the following event, but in his divine, infinite and intimate fore-knowledge of things, that which is to follow is equally present with him, as that which is to precede. And, doubtless, we had better, on this subject, not only think and speak with the most profound reverence, feeling our ignorance, our scanty powers, but endeavour to persuade ourselves thoroughly of the INFINITE goodness, wisdom, and love of God, and bind ourselves to submit heartily to these attributes, and their operations, than to perplex ourselves, and to render ourselves unhappy about appointments whose concatenation, and universal influence, are infinitely beyond our ken. If, perhaps, we see one single link in the chain of the Divine government, considered as compounded of cause and effect, what proportion does this bear to that infinitely prolonged combination of things, of which the Divine mind ONLY is capable of surveying at once both the extremes, and together with the extremes every connecting link, every acting cause, and every produced effect; from the most trivial, as we call it, to the most considerable, in our estimation.—I say, in our estimation; because, there is no lesser and greater in the sight of God; but, each being appointed by him, is of equal consequence in his appointment, and is equally valued by his infinite wisdom.]

PRÉPARE. Preparare, or parare, is often used for founding, fixing, establishing. The Hebrew pp kun, bears the same signification.—

VOL. II. PART XXIII. Edit. IV.

Preparans montes in virtute sua: He founds, he fixes the mountains by his power. Parata sedes tua ex tunc: Thy seat, thy throne is established from all eternity. Super flumina pręparavit orbem terrę: He has fixed the earth upon the rivers, or upon the waters.

PRESENTATION. By this word is generally understood the presentation to the Lord, by parents, of their first-born son in the temple; or, that presentation which they made of their children, or of any other thing, which they had vowed to the Lord. Thus Samuel, son of Elkanah, and Hannah, was presented to the Lord on two accounts, 1. as the first-born of Hannah; 2. as vowed by her to the Lord; 1 Sam. i. 11, &c. As the first-born, he might have been redeemed, and restored to his parents, for the sum of five shekels: but having been vowed to the Lord, to be employed in his service all his life, he continued at the tabernacle from the age of three years, where he performed what sacred services he was capable of.

The Holy Virgin presented our Saviour at the temple; on the day of her purification, because he was her first-born; and she redeemed him, according to the law, for the sum of five shekels; Luke ii. 22, &c. The same obtained as to all the first-born sons in Israel.

Daughters were not presented, or redeemed, although they might be first-born.

[PRESENTS. For the nature and necessity of presents in the East, vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CX. CXI.]

PRESIDENT, Pręses. This title is given generally to all who preside over others in any affair or business: as, the chief of a band of music, of the affairs of a country, city, or temple. Particularly, it is given to the governors of Judea, after that nation was reduced to a Roman province. Matt. xxvii. 2, 11, 14. xxviii. 14. Luke ii. 2. xx. 20. xxi. 12. Acts xxiii. 24, &c. See GOVERNOR.

PRESS, Torcular; in Hebrew ra gath, in Greek Λήνος. Mention is often made in Scripture of a press: but this word is used, not only for the machine by which grapes are squeezed, but also for the vessel, or vat, whereinto the wine runs from the press; that in which it is received and preserved; which in Hebrew, is called ap jekeb; and in Greek, Λάκκος, laccos, or Λήνος, lenos. Whence proceed these expressions: he digged a wine-press in his vineyard; your presses shall run over with wine; thy presses shall burst out with new wine; to draw out of the press; Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb. It was a kind of subterraneous cistern, in which the wine was received and kept, till it was put into jars or vessels, of earth or wood. See Pliny, lib. xiv. cap. 21. Columella, lib. xii. cap. 19. Cato, de re Rust. cap. 113.—where they speak of these cisterns under ground, wherein the wine was received. Vide LAKE.

We read in several titles of the Psalms, as viii. 1. גִּתִּיתִי לַיָּדָה. LXX. Ὑπὲρ τῶν ληνῶν, (Vide lxxx. 1. lxxxiii. 1.)—Pro torcularibus, “for the presses,” [on Gittith, Eng. Tr.] which is differently explained. Some think that these Psalms are songs of rejoicing for the vintage, and were chiefly sung at the feast of tabernacles, after the harvest and the vintage. Others think, that gittith, translated presses, signifies an instrument of music. (Ita. Rab. quid. Grot. Bossuet.) The fathers explain this in a spiritual sense, of the church of Jesus Christ, the mystical vine, in which the press is built, according to the description of our Saviour in the gospel. (Ita. Euseb. Athanas. Didym. Theodoret. Hesych. Nicephor. Aug. Hieronym. in Psalmos.) We think that the Hebrew may be translated, “a psalm addressed to the master of music, who presided over the band of Gittites.” In the temple were several bands of singers, of which some might be of the city Gath: Gathites.

PRETORIUM. This name is given in the gospels, to the house wherein dwelt the Roman governor of Jerusalem: Matt. xxvii. 27. Mark xv. 16. John xviii. 28, 33. Here the governor sat in his judicial capacity, and here Jesus Christ was brought before him. Notwithstanding all the revolutions that have happened to Jerusalem, especially during the siege by Titus; and notwithstanding the ruin and desolation of that city, after it was taken by the Romans, the present inhabitants pretend to shew travellers the prætorium, or palace of Pilate, where afterwards, (they say) a church was built. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVII. and the MAP of JERUSALEM.

St. Paul speaks also of the prætorium (or palace) at Rome, wherein he gave testimony to Jesus Christ. Phil. i. 13. Some think, that by this, he means the palace of the emperor Nero. (Ita Chrysost. Theodoret. Theoph. Est. Erasm. Menoch. Huber. Dissert. in hunc locum.)—Others, that he means the place where the Roman prætor sat to administer justice, i. e. his tribunal. It is certain, the emperor’s palace did not bear the name of tribunal; but St. Paul being accustomed to call by this name the governor’s palace at Jerusalem, might give it to the emperor’s palace at Rome.—Others have maintained, that under the name of the prætorium at Rome, St. Paul would express the camp of the pretorian soldiers, whither this apostle might have been carried by the soldier that always accompanied him, and who was fastened to him by a chain, as the manner was among the Romans [or, the pretorian soldiers, visiting their fellow soldier who kept Paul, might be addressed by Paul; and so be converted, or at least be convinced of his innocence. Yet, on the whole, it is most probable, that St. Paul having been from his youth conversant with military affairs, and camps, he should be favourably treated as a brother soldier, by his guards; and taken with them to visit the pretorian camp, which always formed a part of the military establishment at Rome.]

PRIEST, PRESBYTER, from the Greek, properly signifies an elder, or old man: The Hebrew is כֹּהֵן Cohen, the Greek ἱερεὺς, Hiereus, or Πρεσβύτερος, Presbyteros; the Latin, Sacerdos, or Presbyter. But the Latin Presbyter, does not always stand for a priest, except in the Latin version of the New Testament.

[It is every way natural that men advanced in life should form the council of that society to which they belong. Hence the aldermen, (eldermen) of our towns, hence the elders of the Jewish cities, hence the elders of their synagogues, and hence the elders of Christian communities. What were the duties of presbyters among the primitive Christians, has been disputed. It is however certain, that several of the apostles rank themselves as elders, i. e. presbyters.]

In the Old Testament, the priesthood was not annexed to a certain family, till after the promulgation of the law of Moses. Before that time, the first-born of each family, the fathers, the princes, the kings were born priests, in their own cities, and in their own houses. Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, and Job, Abimelech and Laban, Isaac and Jacob, offered, personally, their own sacrifices. In the solemnity of the covenant made by the Lord with his people, at the foot of mount Sinai, Moses performed the office of mediator, and young men were chosen from among Israel, to perform the office of priests. Exod. xxiv. 5, 6. See HOLY.

But after the Lord had chosen the tribe of Levi to serve him in his tabernacle, and the priesthood was annexed to the family of Aaron, then the right of offering sacrifice to God was reserved to the priests of this family. Numb. xvi. 40. The punishment of Uzziah, king of Judah, 2 Chr. xxvi. 19. is well known, who having presumed to offer incense to the Lord, was suddenly smote with a leprosy; however, it seems, that on certain occasions the judges and kings of the Hebrews offered sacrifice to the Lord, especially before a constant place of worship was fixed at Jerusalem. See 1 Sam. vii. 9. where Samuel, who was no priest, offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. See also 1 Sam.

ix. 13. where it is said, that this prophet was to bless the offering of the people; which should seem to be a function appropriate to a priest. Lastly, 1 Sam. xvi. 5. he goes to Bethlehem, where he offers a sacrifice at the anointing of David.

Saul himself offers a burnt-offering to the Lord, perhaps as being king of Israel, 1 Sam. xiii. 9, 10. Elijah also offered a burnt offering on mount Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 33. David himself sacrificed, at least the text expresses it so, at the ceremony of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, 2 Sam. vi. 13. and at the floor of Araunah, 2 Sam. xxiv. 25. Solomon went up to the brazen altar at Gibeon, and there offered sacrifices, 2 Chron. i. 6. I know that such passages are commonly explained, by supposing that these princes offered their sacrifices by the hands of the priests; but the text by no means favours such explication; and it is very natural to imagine, that in the quality of kings and heads of the people, they had the privilege of performing some sacerdotal functions on certain extraordinary occasions. So we see David consulted the Lord, being clothed with the priestly ephod: and on another occasion he gave a solemn benediction to the people. His son Solomon did the same, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9. xxx. 7. 2 Sam. vi. 14. 18. (vide EPHOD) 1 Kings viii. 55, 56.

The Lord having reserved to himself the first-born of Israel, because he had preserved them from the hand of the destroying angel in Egypt, by way of exchange and compensation, he accepted the tribe of Levi for the service of his tabernacle, Numb. iii. 41. Thus the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to the sacred ministry, but not all in the same manner; for of the three sons of Levi, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, the heads of the three great families, the Lord chose the family of Kohath, and out of this family the house of Aaron, to exercise the functions of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses, and their descendants, remained among the mere Levites. Vide LEVITES.

The HIGH-PRIEST was at the head of all religious affairs, and was the ordinary judge of all difficulties that belonged thereto, and even of the general justice and judgment of the Jewish nation; Deut. xvii. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. xix. 17. xxi. 5. xxxiii. 9, 10. Ezek. xlv. 24. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. ult. et contra Appion. lib. ii. cap. 6. where this discipline is well explained. Selden, de Synedriis veterum Hebræorum.

The HIGH-PRIEST only had the privilege of entering the sanctuary once a year, on the day of solemn expiation, to make atonement for the sins of the whole people; Levit. xvi. 2, 3, &c. See EXPIATION. He was to be born of one of his own tribe, whom his father had married a virgin; and was to be exempt from corporal defect: Levit. xxi. 13. In general, no priest who had any corporal defect could offer sacrifice, or enter the holy place, to present the shew-bread. But he was to be maintained by the sacrifices offered at the tabernacle. Levit. xxi. 21.

God had appropriated to the person of the HIGH-PRIEST the oracle of his truth: so that when he was habited in the proper ornaments of his dignity, and with the urim and thummim, he answered questions proposed to him, and God discovered to him secret and future things. He was forbid to mourn for the death of any of his relations, even for his father or mother; or to enter into any place where a dead body lay, that he might not contract [or hazard the contraction of] uncleanness. He could not marry a widow, nor a woman who had been divorced, nor a harlot; but a virgin only of his own race. He was to observe a strict continence during the whole time of his service. Vide Joseph. lib. xvii. cap. 8. de Matthia Pontifice.

The ordinary priests served immediately at the altar, offered the sacrifices, killed and skinned them, and poured their blood at the foot of the altar. They kept up a perpetual fire on the altar of burnt-sacrifices, and in the lamps of the golden candlestick in the sanctuary: they kneaded the loaves of shew-bread, baked them, offered them on the golden altar in the sanctuary, and changed them every sabbath day. Every day, night and morning, a priest, appointed by casting of lots at the beginning of the week, brought into the sanctuary a smoking censer of incense, and set it on the golden table, otherwise called the altar of perfumes.

The priests were not suffered to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire, i. e. with any fire but what was taken from the altar of burnt-sacrifices; Lev. x. 1, 2. God chastised Nadab and Abihu with severity for having failed herein.—The priests and Levites waited by the week, and by the quarter, in the temple. They began their week on the sabbath, and ended it on the next sabbath. 2 Kings xi. 5. 7. Moses had fixed the age at which they were to enter on the sacred ministry, at twenty-five or thirty years, and they were to end it at fifty; Numb. viii. 24. iv. 3. but in David's time this order was changed, and they were appointed to the service of the temple at twenty years of age, [rather, the Levites. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCXCIII.] 1 Chron. xxiii. 24. 2 Chron. xxxi. 17. Ezra iii. 8. Those who dedicated themselves to perpetual service in the temple, were well received, and maintained by the daily offerings, Deut. xviii. 6.

The Lord had given no lands of inheritance to the tribe of Levi, in the Land of Promise. He intended that they should be supported by the tythes, the first-fruits, the offerings made in the temple, and by their share of the sin-offerings and thanksgiving-offerings, sacrificed in the temple; of which certain parts were appropriated to the priests. In the peace-offerings the priests had the shoulder and the breast. Levit. vii. 33, 34. In the sin-offerings they burnt on the altar the fat that covers the bowels, the liver, and the kidneys: the rest belonged to the priest, Levit. vii. 6, 10. The skin or fleece of every sacrifice also belonged to him; and this article alone was no mean allowance, says Philo, de præmiis Sacerdotum. When an Israelite killed any animal for his own use, he was to give the priest the shoulder, the stomach, and the jaws. Deut. xviii. 3. He had also a share of the wool when sheep were shorn. Deut. xviii. 4. All the first-born both of man and beast, belonged to the Lord, i. e. to his priests. The men were redeemed for five shekels. Numb. xviii. 15, 16. The first-born of impure animals were redeemed or exchanged, but the clean animals were not redeemed. They were sacrificed to the Lord; their blood was sprinkled about the altar, and the rest belonged to the priest. See FIRST-BORN. The first-fruits of trees, i. e. those of the fourth year, belonged also to the priests. Numb. xviii. 13. Lev. xix. 23, 24.

The people offered at the temple the first fruits of the earth; the quantity was fixed by custom, to between the fortieth and sixtieth part. They offered also whatever any one had vowed to the Lord. See FIRST-FRUIT. They gave also to the priests and Levites an allowance out of their kneaded dough. They, also, had the tythe of the fruits of the land, and of all animals which passed under the shepherd's crook. Lev. xxvii. 31, 32. When the Levites had collected all the tythes and all the first-fruits, they set apart the tythe of this for the priests. Numb. xviii. 26. Thus though the priests had no lands or inheritances, they lived in great plenty. [See FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXV.] God also provided them houses and accommodations, by appointing forty-eight cities for their residence. Numb. xxxv. 1, 2, 3. In the precincts of these cities they possessed a thousand cubits beyond the walls. Of these forty-eight cities, six were appointed as cities of refuge, for those who had committed casual and involuntary manslaughter. The priests had thirteen of these cities; the others belonged to the Levites. Joshua xxi. 19.

A principal employment of the priests, next to attending on the sacrifices and the temple service, was instruction of the people, and deciding of controversies; distinguishing the several sorts of leprosy, divorce-causes, the waters of jealousy, vows, causes relating to the law, and uncleannesses, &c.: "For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts;" Malac. ii. 7. They publicly blessed the people in the name of the Lord. In time of war their duty was to carry the ark of the covenant, to consult the Lord, to sound the holy trumpets, and to encourage the army; "Hear, O Israel, you are now going to fight with your enemies, but fear not, for the Lord is in the midst of you; he will fight for you, and defend you from all danger." Numb. x. 8, 9. Deut. xx. 2.

The consecration of Aaron and of his sons was performed by Moses in the desert with great solemnity. Vide Exod. xl. 12. Levit. viii.

In this ceremony Moses performed the office of consecrating priest. It is doubtful, whether at every new consecration of a HIGH-PRIEST all these ceremonies were repeated. It is very probable they contented themselves with clothing the new HIGH-PRIEST in the habit of his predecessor, as at the death of Aaron: Numb. xx. 25, 26. Yet some think they gave him unction also, which perhaps might be, till the Babylonish captivity, though there is no proof of the fact. We know, that afterwards, Jonathan the Asmonean, contented himself with putting on the HIGH-PRIEST'S habit at the feast of tabernacles, in order to take possession of this dignity, Macc. x. 21. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 5: and Agrippa, king of the Jews, having offered to Jonathan, son of Ananus, the HIGH-PRIESTHOOD, a second time, Jonathan thanked him for it, saying, it was enough for him to have once received the ornaments of this supreme dignity, which he would willingly resign to another more worthy of it. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 6.

As to the ordinary priests, we do not see any particular ceremony used at their consecration; they were admitted to the exercise of their function by filling their hands, as Scripture speaks; i. e. by making them perform the offices of their order. Nor is it certain whether any thing was required more than ordinary sanctification, i. e. exemption from legal defilements and uncleannesses. But when the priests had fallen away from the Lord, or had been long without performing their office, (as under some of the later kings of Judah, as Ahaz, Ammon, and Manasseh,) they thought it necessary to sanctify anew such absentee priests: as happened under Hezekiah, and Josiah; when the number of priests that were sanctified not being sufficient for the

the great number of sacrifices offered, they were forced to employ the Levites in flaying the sacrifices; for the Levites were much sooner sanctified than the priests. Levite quippe faciliiori ritu sanctificabantur quam sacerdotes. 2 Chr. xxix. 34. xxxv. 11. The Hebrew reads "For the Levites were upright of heart, to sanctify themselves, rather than the priests:" i. e. they shewed more zeal and readiness.

The Hebrew priesthood passed from the family of Ithamar into that of Eleazar, as the Lord had declared to the high-priest Eli; 1 Sam. ii. 30. But this was not done presently. The family of Eli possessed the priesthood long. This high-priest was succeeded by his third son Ahitub, or, according to others, Ahijah, to whom succeeded Ahimelech, slain by Saul, with the other priests at Nob. Saul then gave the high-priesthood to Zadoc. But Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, having adhered to the interests of David, was continued in possession of the high-priesthood in the kingdom of Judah. So that for a good part of David's reign, the high-priesthood was exercised by two high-priests, Zadoc and Abiathar: Zadoc of the family of Eleazar; Abiathar of the family of Ithamar. Towards the end of David's reign, Abiathar having adhered to the party of Adonijah against Solomon, he was disgraced, and Zadoc alone was acknowledged as high-priest. He then began to exercise his high-priesthood at Jerusalem, whereas before he had only performed the functions of it on the altar at Gibeon. 1 Kings ii. 26, 27. 1 Chron. xvi. 39.

Some have pretended, that the high-priesthood was exercised, even after the law, by others beside the family of Aaron. For this are produced the examples of Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and Saul, who sacrificed on some occasions.—Granting these facts, yet nobody denies, first, that a prophet may extraordinarily, and by a particular revelation, offer sacrifice. Secondly, this liberty was of much greater extent before the building of the temple, than after the public worship of God was fixed at Jerusalem. Thirdly, it is not certain but Joshua, Samuel, and Saul might offer their sacrifices by the hands of priests; for often the Scripture affirms that to be done by a man's self, which is only done by his orders.

The Hebrew word cohen, which signifies priest, is sometimes put for a prince. In Exod. ii. 16. it is said that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was priest, כהן cohen, of Midian, i. e. according to some, prince, or governor of his city. In 2 Sam. viii. 18. it is said, the sons of David were priests,—cohenim,—i. e. princes; and considered in the country as priests. The Septuagint say, they were Ἀνάρχαι ἡσάν, principal courtiers; chiefs of the court. The author of the first book of Chronicles, ch. xviii. 17. explains this, by saying, they were the nearest at the king's hand. They had the chief employments at court.

The Christian priesthood is the substance and truth, of which that of the Jews was but a shadow and figure. Jesus Christ the EVER-LASTING PRIEST, according to the order of Melchisedec, abides for ever, as St. Paul observes; whereas the priests, according to the order of Aaron, were mortal, and therefore could not continue long. Hebr. vii. 23, 24, &c. The consecration given by Moses to Aaron and his sons, was not to be repeated to their successors, because the priesthood was to continue in the same family; whereas the Christian priesthood not being continued to any particular family, must be conferred on each priest distinctly.

Corporal defects, which excluded from the legal priesthood, and from its privileges, ought in proportion to be understood in an exalted and spiritual sense, in respect of the Christian priesthood. [This is too loosely stated: Corporal defects exclude from the priesthood, on the principle that nothing unfit, nothing by possibility verging on the ridiculous, or indecorous, or contemptible, or at which by-standers might take offence, should be allowed in the service of God. The nature, therefore, of the defect should be well considered.]

We have enlarged on the rights, prerogatives, functions, and revenues of the priests of the old law, under the foregoing article. We cannot do the same in respect to the priests of the new law, because neither Christ in the gospel, nor his apostles in any of their writings, have ordained the ceremonies to be used in the consecration of priests, or elders, in administration of the sacraments, nor all the circumstances that may accompany those rites. The apostles left some things to the wisdom and discretion of the church, though they taught them to the faithful of their own times, vivâ voce.

Among all nations the priesthood was a station so honourable and elevated, and at the same time so commodious, that it was regarded by the people with somewhat of jealousy. The Lord, to express to the Hebrews what great favours he would confer on them, says, he would make them kings and priests; Exod. xix. 6. And St. Peter repeats this promise to Christians, or rather he tells them, that they are in truth what Moses promised to Israel; 1 Pet. ii. 9. See also Rev. i. 6.

61. ELEAZAR, brother to Joazar, made in A. M. 4004, A. D. 1.
62. JESUS, son of Siah, made in A. M. 4009. JOAZAR made a second time in A. M. 4010, deprived in 4016, A. D. 13.
63. ANANUS, son of Seth, 11 years from A. M. 4016, to 4027, A. D. 24.
64. ISHMAEL, son of Phabi; made in A. M. 4027, A. D. 24.
65. ELEAZAR, son of Ananus; made in A. M. 4027, A. D. 24.
66. SIMON, son of Camithus; made in A. M. 4028, A. D. 25.
67. JOSEPH, surnamed CAIAPHAS, made in A. M. 4029, till 4038, A. D. 35.
68. JONATHAN, son of Ananus; made in A. M. 4038, till 4040, A. D. 37.

PRIESTHOOD, Sacerdotium.—We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. 1. That of kings, princes, heads of families, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, because nature and reason teach us, that the honour of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the most mature in understanding, and the greatest in dignity.

2. The priesthood according to the order of MELCHISEDEC, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity; because Melchisedec was raised up of God, to represent the priesthood of Jesus Christ [rather, the priesthood of Melchisedec combined in the same person the right of the kingly and of the priestly offices, with that of the first-born, to exercise the priesthood: or, he was at once king, priest, and prophet, i. e. authoritative teacher, in every sense of the term.]

3. The priesthood of AARON and his family, which subsisted as long as the religion of the Jews.

4. Lastly, the priesthood of JESUS CHRIST, and of the new law. See AARON and PRIEST.

69. THEOPHILUS, son of Jonathan; made in A. M. 4040, deposed in 4044, A. D. 41.
70. SIMON, surnamed CANTHARUS, son of Simon Boethus; made in A. M. 4044, A. D. 41.
71. MATTHIAS, son of Ananus, made in A. M. 4045, A. D. 42.
72. ELIONEUS, made in A. M. 4047, till 4048, A. D. 45.
SIMON, son of Cantharus; a second time made high-priest, A. M. 4048; deposed the same year.
73. JOSEPH, son of Caneus; made in A. M. 4048, till 4050, A. D. 47.
74. ANANIAS, son of Nebedeus; made in A. M. 4050, till 4066, A. D. 63.
75. ISMAEL, son of Phabius; made in A. M. 4066, A. D. 63.
76. JOSEPH, surnamed CABEI; the same year A. M. 4066.
77. ANANUS, son of Ananus; the same year 4066.
78. JESUS, son of Ananus, made in A. M. 4067, A. D. 64.
79. JESUS, son of Gamaliel; the same year 4067.
80. MATTHIAS, son of Theophilus; made in A. M. 4068, till 4073, A. D. 70.
81. PHANNIAS, son of Samuel; made in A. M. 4073, A. D. 70; which is the year of the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, and of the abolition of the Jewish priesthood.

The priesthood of Jesus Christ, is infinitely superior to all other, in its duration, its dignity, its prerogatives, its object, and its power. The priesthood of Aaron was to end, but that of Jesus Christ is everlasting. That of Aaron was limited to his own family, was exercised only in the temple, and among only one people; its object was bloody sacrifices and purifications, which were only external, and could not remit sins; but the priesthood of Jesus Christ includes the entire Christian church, spread over the face of the whole earth, and among all nations of the world. The Epistle to the Hebrews should be considered by those, who would comprehend the excellence of the priesthood of the new law above that of the law of Moses. Hebrews iv. 14, 15, &c. also chap. v. vi. vii. viii. ix. See 1 Peter ii. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

PRIDE, is a sin very odious to God and man, and Scripture condemns it in a multitude of places. For, what is displayed in the whole sacred history, but the pride, presumption, and vanity of men, overthrown? What else, but the humility, the meekness, the acknowledgment of human human weakness, exalted, supported, and recompensed? "God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. A man's pride shall bring him low; but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit. Pride goeth before destruction; and a haughty spirit before a fall. Better is it to be of a humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud."

Pride is also put for the hardness and insolence of a sinner, in opposition to sins of infirmity or ignorance: "but the soul that doeth ought presumptuously, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people." Numb. xv. 30. And Deut. xvii. 12. "And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest, or unto the judge, even that man shall die." The Lord treated the Egyptians with rigour, because they acted with pride and insolence toward the Hebrews. Exod. xviii. 11. Job and the Psalmist have distinguished Pharaoh by the name of the Proud. Job xxvi. 12. Psalm lxxxix. 10. Isaiah, li. 9. uses the same expression, to mark the destruction of Pharaoh. And Ezekiel, xxxii. 12. the Chaldeans shall destroy the pride, the insolence, the cruelty of Egypt. See Neh. ix. 16, 29.

Scripture reproaches the Moabites with their pride; it points them out, under the name of children of haughtiness, or pride; for so we translate, Numb. xxiv. 17. "And destroy all the children of Sheth." The Hebrew may signify, "He shall destroy all the children of pride," or haughtiness; which is confirmed by Jer. xlvi. 29. which alludes to this in Numbers: "We have heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud), his loftiness and his arrogancy, and his pride and the haughtiness of his heart." Comp. Numb. xxi. 28. with Jer. xlvi. 45. Heb. Also Isaiah xvi. 6.

The pride of Jordan, in the prophets, expresses the inundations of that river. Jer. xii. 5. xiii. 9. xlix. 19. Zech. xi. 3. Vide JORDAN.

The pride and the proud, superbia et superbus, often represent Babylon and the Babylonians. Isaiah xiii. 19. "And Babylon the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrha." Jeremiah, l. 31, 32. speaking of the king of Babylon, says, "Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud, saith the Lord of hosts; for the day is come, the time that I will visit thee. And the most proud shall stumble and fall, and none shall raise him up: and I will kindle a fire in his cities, and it shall devour all round about him." See Psalm cxix. 21, 51, 69, 78, 85, 122.

PRINCE, Princeps. This name is sometimes taken for the chief, the principal:—the princes of the families, of the tribes, of the houses of Israel; the princes of the Levites, of the people, of the priests; the princes of the synagogue, or assembly; the princes of the children of Reuben, of Judah, &c. Also, for the king, the sovereign of a country, and his principal officers: the princes of the army of Pharaoh; Phicol prince of the army of Abimelech: Potiphar was prince, or chief of the butchers, or of the guards, of the king of Egypt; and Joseph was in prison with the prince of the bakers, &c.

Prince of the priests, sometimes expresses the High Priest actually in office, 2 Macc. iii. 4. Matt. xxvi. 57. or, he who had formerly possessed this dignity. And sometimes, he who was at the head of the priests, waiting in the temple, Jer. xx. 1. and xxix. 25, 26, 27. 2 Chron. xxxv. 8. or, an intendant of the temple, or the head of the sacerdotal families: whence it comes, that in the gospel, Matt. ii. 4. xvi. 21. xxi. 15, 23. (et passim. Vulgate.) mention is made of the princes of the priests, in the plural.

Prince of the city; he had in the city the same authority as the intendant of the temple had in the temple: he took care of the preservation of the peace, and good order. 2 Chron. xviii. 25. xxxiv. 8.

Prince of the synagogue. In the Old Testament, Exod. xxxiv. 31. Numb. iv. 34. xxxi. 13. those who presided over the assemblies of the people; the chiefs of the tribes and families of Israel. But in the New Testament, the prince of the synagogue, is he who presided over the religious assemblies held in the synagogue.—The Jews call him nasi of the synagogue. He had several associates, also called princes or chiefs of the synagogue. Luke viii. 41. Acts xiii. 15. xviii. 17.

Prince of this world. The devil, who boasts of having all the kingdoms of the earth at his disposal. John xii. 31. xiv. 30. xvi. 11.

Prince of the captivity. This name the oriental Jews give to him, whom they acknowledge as their chief, and whom they obey, in the provinces beyond the Euphrates, under the dominion of the Persians. See Basnage, History of the Jews, tom. ii. lib. iv. cap. 3. Vide CAPTIVITY.

There is among the Jews a succession of the princes of the captivity; but those who have closely examined it, find many errors and anachronisms in it. Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, tom. ii. lib. iv. cap. 11. They pretend that the princes of the captivity were not established in Babylonia till the beginning of the third century, A. D. 220; that the succession exhibited by the author of the lesser Chronicle, Sedar-olam-

Zutha, is not supported by the authority of any ancient author; that neither Josephus, nor Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue against Tryphon, knew any thing of these pretended princes of the captivity beyond the Euphrates; and that the tradition of the sages, on which it is founded, is of very slender authority in matters of history.

As to the title prince, in Scripture, and in Jewish authors, it often means no more than a mere head of a family; or one appointed to preside over his equals. The heads of the synagogues in Germany, and in some provinces of Italy, take the title of duke, or prince of the Jews.—This makes them nothing the greater men, nor gives them the greater liberty.

Principes exercitus, Gen. xxi. 32. generals of an army, which might not be very numerous; or even the captains of a prince's guard. Abraham is called, by those of Hebron, princeps dei, a great prince. Gen. xxiii. 6. xl. 20. The prince of the bakers, was Pharaoh's chief baker. The princes of the family of the Levites, were the heads and chiefs of those families. The prince of the priests, is the High Priest. Nicodemus is called a prince of the Jews; John iii. 1. Vulg. i. e. of great consideration among the Jews. A prince of the Pharisees, is one distinguished in that sect, &c. Vide KINGS.

PRINUS, a species of green oak, otherwise called holm-oak: called green oak, because it preserves its leaves in the winter. These leaves are like those of laurel, but whitish, rough without, and strongly serrated. One of the elders, who accused Susanna, said he had seen her with a young man under a holm-oak, sub prino: and Daniel making an allusion to the word prinus, answered him; "The angel of God waiteth with the sword to cut thee in two." Susan. 59. Πρίσαι σε μέσον. The Greek reads prisai, which is to saw. The commentators may be seen concerning this allusion in the Greek, which seems to prove that this part of Daniel was never written in Hebrew, as the allusion does not hold in that language. Vide MASTIC, LENTISK.

PRISCA, a Latin word, ancient. Its diminutive is

PRISCILLA, Πρίσκιλλα.
